[F] And yet it made ſo formidable a progreſs among a great many of the Italian Philoſophers, that it was neceſſary to have it condemned by the authority of the Pope.] I have quoted in another place (49) the words of a Bull of Leo X, approved in the Council of the Lateran. I ſhall add here, that Raymond Lullius ſollicited Pope Clement V with great zeal to condemn the Commentaries of Averroes upon Ariſtotle, and endeavoured to engage Philip the fair King of France to ſollicit the ſame. He repreſented, that they were Books full of pernicious opinions and which might by degrees lead young men to irreligion; he begged, he preſented petitions, and wrote a Book upon the ſubject, but he found both the Pope and the King of France deaf (50). At preſent it is not at all neceſſary to ſollicit this, or to deſire, that at leaſt there ſhould be a prohibition to prevent this Philoſopher from being conſidered as an Oracle; his authority is ſunk, and no body loſes his time in reading him. But there have been Ages, which were infatuated with his doctrine. Read what follows: Congruentior & ex auditu facilior fuiſſet petitio, pro qua nunc, (quæ Dei benignitas eſt,) non eſt ſatagendum. Nimirum ut Averrois oraculi loco eſſet in ſcholis; quod cum ſuperiore ſeculo, & paucis anterioribus invaluiſſet, præſertim in Italia, ut Canus lib. 10. de locis c. 5. notavit; occaſio fuit magnorum in oris illis errorum & inutilis diligentiæ, qui aliqui non minus in pervolutando Averroe collocabant operæ, quam in ſacris literis ponant, qui iis maximè delectantur; nec fidei minus Averroi tribuerunt, quam optimi quique fideles canonicis ſcriptoribus; quod indigniſſimum fuiſſe, nemo non videt. Nunc Averroes in ſcholis depontanus evaſit (51). i. e. "It would have "been a more proper petition, and at the ſame time "more eaſy to be granted, though we have now "through God's mercy no occaſion to ſollicit ſuch "an one; namely, that Averroes ſhould not be e- "ſteemed as an Oracle in the ſchools; which being "the caſe in the laſt and ſome of the preceding "Ages, eſpecially in Italy, as Melchior Canus has "obſerved in his 10th Book c. 5. de Locis, was the "occaſion of very enormous errors in theſe parts, "and of the loſs of a great deal of labour; for ſome "perſons employed as much time in turning over "the writings of Averroes, as others, who are moſt "delighted with the Scriptures, ſpend in reading "them; and they paid the ſame regard to Averroes, "as the beſt Divines do to the Canonical Writers; "which every perſon ſees to be a very culpable man- "ner of acting. But now Averroes has loſt his au- "thority in the ſchools." Ludovicus Vives complains extremely of the authority, which this Philoſopher had obtained. Quem philoſophi de noſtra ſchola, qui poſt eum ſcripſere, ita ſunt amplexati, ut pene authoritate Ariſtoteli adæquârint, nec ſolum qui longo poſt intervallo vixerunt, ſed illi, qui illius quoque ætate; quod factum eſt & ignorantia meliorum, & admiratione mercimonii lingua & ſenſis peregrini; ut gratiam ei conciliaret apud primos novitas, apud poſteros vetuſtas (52). i. e. "The Philoſophers of our Schools have "paid ſo great a regard to him, that they have al- "moſt equalled him in authority to Ariſtotle him- "ſelf; and this has been done not only by thoſe "who have lived long ſince his time, but even by his "contemporaries; which has ſprung from their ig- "norance of more valuable Books, and their humour "of admiring every perſon, who is foreign both in "language and ſentiments; ſo that his novelty was "the reaſon that the former eſteemed him, and his "antiquity that the latter admired him." Vives obſerves here a remarkable piece of good fortune; for ſome lucky genius's pleaſe us at firſt by their novelty, and afterwards by their antiquity. The reader may examine, if he pleaſes, the following reflection of a modern Writer. We are not to be ſurprized to ſee that men have ſo much eſteem for Averroes, ſince Cardan's father, who ſtudied Magic, aſſures us that the Devils themſelves admired his doctrine, and Bajazet amuſed himſelf in his ſevereſt fits of the gout by reading him; which is a proof no leſs capable of ſhewing his merit, than his having been admired by the intelligences (53). If what relates to Bajazet is not more faithfully told than the reſt, I doubt very much of the truth of it (54); for in order to have given an exact account of what concerns Cardan's father, it ſhould have been obſerved, that one of the Spirits, which appeared to him, declared himſelf an Averroiſt, and not that Averroes was admired by the intelligences; and that Cardan himſelf inſinuates this ſtory of his father to be fabulous. Ille verò palam Averroiſtam ſe profitebatur. Hæc ſeu hiſtoria ſua fabula ſit, ita habuit. Quod fabula videatur ſatis argumento eſſe debet, quod &c. (55). i. e. "He openly profeſſed "himſelf an Averroiſt. And this was the ſtory or "fable. But it ſeems to be a fable from this conſi- "deration &c."

(49) In the article of SPINOZA, note [D] at the end.

(50) Theoph. Raynaudus, Erotem. de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 340. pag. 200. He quotes Charles Bouille in the Life of Raymond Lullius.

(51) Idem, ibid.

(52) De Cauſ. corruptar. Art. lib. 5. pag. 167.

(53) Clavigny de Sainte Honorine, de l'uſage des Livres ſuſpects, p. 48, 49.

(54) I find nothing in Paulus Jovius, Elog. Viror. bellicâ virtute illuſtr. lib. 4. pag. 334. but that Bajazet II, Peripatetici Averroïs opinionibus oblectabatur; i. e. "was "pleaſed with "the opinion of "Averroes the "Peripatetic "Philoſopher.

(55) Cardanus, de Subtilitate. lib. 9. pag. 682.

[G] There is no Book, in which Averroes appears to have had better intentions than that, which is intitled Deſtructiones Deſtructionum contra Algazelem.] Or rather Deſtructorium Deſtructorii. The Arabic title is, disadvantageously of [H]; for it is said, that he despised not only Judaism and Christianity, is, Habapalah Altabapalah (56). Averroes in this work confutes the metaphysical opinions, which Algazel had maintained in opposition to the Philosophers. The greatest part of these opinions of Algazel are very pernicious; for he attacks for instance the assertions of the Philosophers, that the world is the production of God, and that God is an Agent, that he is one simple and incorporeal Being, and that there cannot be two uncreated natures in him (57). As Averroes defends the part of the Philosophers in all these propositions, it cannot be denied, that he has exerted himself in favour of orthodoxy. This is one of his best works, according to Father Rapin (58). But if we consider the matter in another light, could the good cause receive any advantage from the services, which such a defender could do it; since he denied the possibility of breathing, and maintained that all spiritual Beings are eternal, and that God does not know particular things, nor extends his Providence to the individuals of this world (59)?

(56) See Reinesius, Epist. 15. ad Hofman. pag. 33.

(57) See Gesner's Bibliotheca, fol. 100 verso.

(58) Reflex. sur la Philosophie, num. 30. pag. 363.

(59) See Possevini Biblioth. selectæ, lib. 12. cap. 36.

[H] The religion of this Philosopher is spoken very disadvantageously of.] The reader will find in Moreri's Dictionary, that Christianity, according to him, was an impossible religion; that Judaism was a religion for children, and Mahometism a religion for swine; and that he afterwards cried out, Moriatur anima mea morte Philosophorum, i. e. "Let my soul "die the death of the Philosophers." This is the manner in which he imitated Balaam, who said, Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his (60). Moreri does not tell us exactly what relates to the Christian Religion. Averroes, says he, called it an impossible religion on account of the mystery of the Eucharist. It is certain that this Philosopher did not express himself in such civil terms, when he made a reflection upon the practice of the Communion in the Church of Rome. Read the following words of Mr. Daillé addressed to Father Adam. "The wise "men of the world have not excused you for this "strange belief any more than the Jews; as appears "from the saying of Averroes the Philosopher, mentioned by Cardinal du * Perron upon the credit of "Sarga, one of the Fathers of your Society, that he "did not find any Sect worse or more absurd than that "of the Christians, who eat and broke to pieces the "God whom they worshipped." Before I proceed any further, I must make two observations against this learned Minister. The first is, that Cardinal du Perron is not properly the Author who related this saying upon the credit of the brethren of Father Adam, for he only quotes it as mentioned by Mr. du Plessis; for it was Mr. du Plessis, who alledged upon this subject what the Jesuit Scarga observes concerning the reflection of this Arabian Philosopher (61). The second is, that instead of Sarga he should have said Scarga. Let us now quote a passage from another Minister (62). If we receive the holy Sacrament upon our knees . . . we should be a scandal and stumbling-block to the weak; but we should give occasion to Infidels to blaspheme the sacred name of God, and to abhor Christianity. For we cannot forget the sad example of that Pagan Philosopher *, who, having seen the Sacrament which the people had worshipped, eaten by them, said, That he had never seen any Sect more absurd and ridiculous than that of Christians, who worship what they eat; and it was upon this occasion that this wretch cried out, Let my soul be with that of the Philosophers, since the Christians worship what they eat (63). The same Minister quotes in another place a passage from Cicero, which corresponds very much with the reflection of Averroes (64). Ecquem tam amentem esse putas qui illud, quo vescatur, Deum credat esse (65)? i. e. "And whom do you think so senseless, as to believe "that what he eats is God?" Cicero speaks thus, when he considers, that the name of Ceres was given to bread, and that of Bacchus to wine. Cum fruges Cererem, vinum Liberum dicimus, genere nos quidem sermonis utimur usitato (66). Father Lescalopier acknowledges, that this famous Pagan Writer speaks very justly, when he reasons in that manner with regard to Ceres and Bacchus; "but, continues he (67), it is a "great wisdom under Christianity to eat what is believed to be God, and we consider those persons as guilty "of a very absurd and stupid infidelity, who do not "understand these words of Christ, This is my body, "in a literal sense, and object to us these words of "Cicero in the way of ridicule." Amentissimæ ac stolidissimæ infidelitatis damnamus hæreticos homines, qui Christi Domini, hoc est ipsius veritatis planissima disertissimaque verba, &c. . . . . (68). Illud Academicum, jublato cachinno procaciter usurpant, Academicorum non Fidelium nepotes: Ecquem tam amentem esse putas, qui illud, quo vescatur, Deum credat esse? At cum Apostolo Catholici respondemus, Nos stulti propter Christum; utinam vos sitis prudentes in Christo (69). i. e. "We condemn those heretics as guilty of the most "absurd and stupid infidelity, who reject the plainest "and most express words of our Lord, that is, of the "truth itself . . . and make use of that saying of "the Academic Philosopher by way of insult, descendents as they are of the Academicks and not of "the Faithful: Whom do you suppose to be so void "of sense, as to believe what we eat to be God? But "we Catholics answer with the Apostle, We are "fools for Christ's sake; would to God that you were "wise in Christ." The point here is not to examine into the nature of reflections, but only to consider the sentiments of Averroes. I remark that Vossius only speaks in general of this Philosopher's contempt of the Christian Religion; he did not consider it in particular as the result of Transubstantiation. Quam parum viderit tantus Philosophus in verâ & unicâ salutis viâ arguit illud quod diceret, malle se animam esse cum Philosophis quam cum Christianis (70). i. e. "How little "this great Philosopher understood of the true and "only way of salvation appears from what he said, "that he had rather his soul should be with the Philosophers than with the Christians." Some Writers say, that Averroes was born a Christian, and turned Jew, and afterwards Mahometan. De Christiano Judæus, de Judæo factus est Mahumetanus (71). Others tell us, that he wrote against the three great Lawgivers, Moses, Christ, and Mahomet, and that he furnished the materials for the book de tribus Impostoribus (72); i. e. "of the three Impostors." Others observe, that he never believed the existence of Devils (73), and therefore that Cardan does violence to his doctrine, when he introduces a Devil, who said, that he was one of his scholars and followers (74). There cannot be any thing expressed more strongly than this judgment or wish of Erasmus, Utinam prodiisset ingens illud opus adversus Averroem impium καὶ τρὶς κατάρατον (75); i. e. "I wish that great work had been "published against the impious and thrice accursed "Averroes." He wrote this to a person, who had informed him, that his great work against Averroes was printed. Alterum magnum opus sectum in libros sex & quadraginta ex Peripateticâ disciplinâ confecimus adversus Averroem, quod etiam excusum est (76). i. e. "I have composed another great work against A-"verroes upon the principles of the Aristotelian Phi-"losophy, divided into forty six books, which is "likewise printed." Is not this a sign, that when he answered his friends he did not always lay their letters before him, but forgot some circumstances of them? However that be, his wish recalls to my mind a letter of Petrarch, in which he advises a learned Divine to confute Averroes, that mad dog, who had barked so furiously against Jesus Christ. Petrarch adds, that he had made collections for such a work, but that he had neither leisure nor learning sufficient to write upon that subject. He charges the silence of so many great men upon that point with impiety; and he wishes, that the work, which he advised his friend to compose, might be dedicated to him, even though he were dead. Extremum quæso, ut cum primum perveneris quò suspiras, quod cito fore confido, contra canem illum rabidum Averroem, qui furore actus insano, contra dominum suum Christum, contraque catholicam fidem latrat, collectis undique blasphemiis ejus, quod ut scis, jam cæperamus, sed me ingens semper, & nunc solito major occupatio, nec minor temporis quam scientiæ retraxit inopia, totis ingenii viribus ac nervis incumbens, rem a multis magnis viris impie neglectam, opusculum unum scribas, & mihi illud inscribas, seu tunc vivus ero, seu interim abiero (77). Let us quote likewise

(60) Numbers xxiii. 10.

(61) Daillé, Replique au Pere Adam & à Cottiby, Part 1. ch. 16. pag. 116.

(62) Du Plessis, Treatise of the Sacrament, p. 1106.

* Averroes.

(63) Drelincourt, Dialogue 9. contre les Missionnaires sur le service des Eglises Réformees, pag. 305, 306.

(64) Id. Dial. 6. pag. 236.

(65) Cicero, de Naturâ Deorum, lib. 3. pag. 619.

(66) Idem, ibid.

(67) Lescalopierius in Cicer. de Natur. Deor. pag. 622.

* Du Perron del' Eucharist. lib. 3. ch. 29. pag. 973.

(68) Idem, ibid.

(69) Idem, ibid.

(70) Vossius, de Philos. Sectis, cap. 17. p. 91.

(71) Anton. Sirmond. de Immortal. Animæ, pag. 29.

(72) Claudius Berigardus, in Procemio Circuli Pisani, pag. 5.

(73) Naudé, Apolog. des grans hommes, p. 320.

(74) Cardan. de Subtilitate, lib. 19. pag. 682.

(75) Erasm. Ep. 29. lib. 10. pag. 532.

(76) Ambros. Leo, Epist. ad Erasm. This Letter is the 28th of the 10th book among those of Erasmus, p. 531.

(77) Francisc. Petrarcha, Ep. ult. Libri sine titulo, pag. 656.

anity, but even Mahometiſm, which he made an external profeſſion of. Divers Authors have employed their pains in tranſlating his Works into Latin [I]. I ſhould have been glad wiſe a paſſage from Mr. du Pleſſis: Ariſtotle, according to ſeveral Writers, had little religion, and Averroes his interpreter was abſolutely an impious man . . (78). Every body knows that Averroes principally inſiſted upon the eternity of the world, and the univerſal intellect, which are not at all compatible with the principles of religion (79).

(78) Du Pleſſis Mornai, de la Verité de la Religion Chrétienne, cap. 20. fol. 258 verſo.

(79) Idem, ibid. fol. 259.

To compleat this account of the irreligion of Averroes, we muſt not omit to obſerve thoſe touches, which his hypotheſes concerning the ſoul of man will furniſh. It is certain, that he did not admit of puniſhments and rewards after this life, for properly ſpeaking he taught the mortality of the human ſoul. I know indeed, that he acknowledged that the underſtanding will never die, and that he repreſented it as an eternal nature, but in that reſpect he did not conſider it as a ſubſtance appropriated to every particular perſon; and conſequently though he granted that the principle of the actual operations in Peter and Paul ſubſiſted after their death, yet he believed that all that particularly belonged to Peter and Paul both with reſpect to their body and ſoul, ceas'd to live, when they died. He muſt therefore have denied the exiſtence of heaven and hell. Voſſius, who underſtood this doctrine very well, ought not to have aſcribed it abſolutely to Mirandulanus, ſince that Author did not adopt it as true in itſelf, but only as the proper interpretation of Ariſtotle's words (80). Would he have ventured in a printed book to declare in favour of an impious notion, which would have expoſed a man to the puniſhment of death from the Inquiſition? The paſſage of Voſſius, which I am going to quote, will ſerve for a proof, that the moſt learned Writers do not always diſtinguiſh what they ought to have done. They ſometimes impute to a Philoſopher not what he abſolutely thought himſelf, but what he muſt have thought, if he were to follow the opinions of Ariſtotle, or ſome other Founder of a Sect. Bifarium jubet conſiderare hominis intellectum (Averroes), ut eſt intellectus, & ut eſt forma, quam obtinet, dum nobis unitur. Priori modo ait eum à morte noſtra ſupereſſe, quippe æternum; nec dare homini eſſentiam, ſed uniri illi per operationem ſuam phantaſmatum interventu. Hanc ſententiam etiam ſequitur Antonius Mirandulanus Everſ. ſingul. certam. lib. XXXII. ſect I. & lib. ſeq. ſect. II & VI. Similiterque Cardanus, quem propterea reprehendit ac refellit Cæſar Scaliger Exercit. CCCVI (81), ſect. 30. Et ſanè ea ſententia Scripturis è diametro averſatur; utque ſuam cuique animam, ſua etiam à morte præmia & pœnas aſſignent (82). i. e. "Averroes directs us to conſider the intellect of man in "a twofold ſenſe, as it is the intellect, and as it is "the form, which is produced by being united to "us. In the former view he ſays it ſurvives after "our death, becauſe it is eternal, and that it does "not form the eſſence of man, but is united to him "thro' its own operation by the intervention of ideas. "This opinion is embraced likewiſe by Anthony Mi"randulanus Everſ. ſingul. certam. L. XXXII. ſect. I. "& lib. XXXIII. ſect. II. & VI. and alſo by Car"dan, who upon that account is cenſured and con"futed by Julius Cæſar, Scaliger Exercit. CCCVI. "ſect. 30. And indeed this notion is directly oppo"ſite to the Scriptures, ſince they aſſign to every "perſon his own reſpective ſoul, and his reſpective "rewards or puniſhments after death."

(80) See above note [E] quotation (23), what I have quoted from the Jeſuits of Coimbra.

(81) It ſhould be CCCVII.

(82) Voſſius, de origine & progreſſu Idololatriæ, lib. 3. cap. 42. pag. 952.

[I] Divers Authors have employed their pains in tranſlating his works into Latin.] Here follows a paſſage from Huetius, which will acquaint us with the names of ſome of theſe tranſlators, and at the ſame time ſhews us a miſtake of Scaliger. Vix ullos Averrois Arabicos codices in Europa reperiri poſſe putabat Scaliger, ſolamque converſionem ab Armegando Blaſio, Jacobo Mantino, Johanne Franciſco Burana, Abrahamo de Balmis, Vitale Niſſo, Calo Calonymo, Johanne Bruyerino Campegio, Paulo Iſraelitâ, aliiſque adornatum in lucem veniſſe. Ego tamen his verſavi manibus Arabicum Averrois librum ex oriente huc olim à Poſtello devectum; quod miror Scaligerum fugiſſe, Poſtello olim amicitiâ & literariâ conſuetudine conjunctum. Eo libro continentur in Logicam, Rhetoricam, & Poeticam commentaria; quæ ad Jacobi Mantini & Abrahami de Balmis interpretationem à me expenſa, fidem eorum & artem apertè mihi comprobârunt (83). i. e. "Scaliger "thought that ſcarce any Arabic manuſcripts of A"verroes could be found in Europe, and that no"thing had been publiſhed of him except a tranſla"tion by Armegandus Blaſius, Jacobus Mantinus, "John Francis Burana, Abraham de Balmis, Vitalis "Niſſius, Calus Calonymus, John Bruyerinus Cam"pegius, Paulus Iſraelita, and others. But I have "ſeen myſelf an Arabic book of Averroes brought "hither from the Eaſt by Poſtellus, and I am ſur"prized, that this ſhould eſcape Scaliger's knowledge, "who was very intimate with Poſtellus, and kept a "correſpondence with him upon literary ſubjects. "That book conſiſted of Commentaries upon Logic, "Rhetoric, and Poetry; which being examined by "me with the tranſlation of Jacobus Mantinus and "Abraham de Balmis, convinced me of their ac"curacy and abilities." We may obſerve, that there were ſeveral Rabbins, who tranſlated ſome of Averroes's works into Hebrew (84). It is proper to remark here, what I find in Poſſevinus. This Jeſuit aſſures us, that thoſe who were ſo fond of the Arabian Philoſopher, could only read him in ſome wretched tranſlations, before the edition, which John Baptiſta Bagolin publiſhed at Venice, and printed by the Junta's in 1552 (85). This edition, continues he, could not be of any value; ſince Bagolin made uſe of the tranſlation of a Jew, whoſe name was Jacobus Mantinus, for one part of Averroes's works; and with reſpect to the reſt of them, he inſerted the preceding tranſlations, and even thoſe, which Niphus and Zimara had not corrected in their labours upon Averroes. Mantinus the Tranſlator followed the ſteps of Abraham de Balmis, who had ſucceeded very ill. It could not therefore be expected, that a Tranſlator, who had ſuch bad guides, ſhould do juſtice to the original; and as Bagolin underſtood nothing of the Arabic, he could not form any proper judgment of theſe verſions (86). I ſhall tranſcribe a long paſſage from Keckerman, wherein he prays that God would raiſe up a Tranſlator, in order to reſcue the works of Averroes from the groſs ignorance and barbarity of the preceding undertakers. And that then we ſhould be ſenſible of the great ſervices, which that Arabian had done to Philoſophy. Quid & quantum univerſæ philoſophiæ Averroes iſte profuerit, tum clarum perſpectumque haberemus, ſi quem nobis Deus virum excitaret, qui Latinam ejus verſionem ab iſta, qua ſcatet undique, moleſta barbarie liberaret, & ſtylo Latino ſaltem mediocri & intelligibili in gratiam philoſophiæ ſtudioſorum verteret. Ad quam rem illa, quæ nuper Avicennam Arabicum nitidiſſimis typis dedit clariſſima Typographea Medicea plurimum adjumenti adferret, ſi lingua Arabica Averroem ederet, atque ita occaſionem viris ejus linguæ peritis faciliorem præberet barbaræ verſionis emendandæ, & ad intelligentiam traducendæ. Aliàs certam eſt Averroem à multis neglectum iri, à quibus legeretur diligenter, niſi tam multis non intelligeretur. In poſterioribus Anal. apparet ſingularem operam præſtitiſſe, & immortalitate digniſſimam; & epitome Logicæ, quam ſcripſit, laudatiſſima eſt ob varias cauſas, ut & Logica ejus quæſita. Nemo tam interpretum veterum videri poteſt proximus Ariſtotelis menti atque hic Arabs (87). i. e. "What and how "great ſervices Averroes has done to all Philoſophy, "would appear evident, if God ſhould raiſe up ſome "perſon, who might reſcue the Latin Tranſlation of "him from thoſe barbariſms, which it is full of, and "turn it into a tolerable and intelligible Latin ſtyle "out of regard to the ſtudents in Philoſophy. This "deſign would be greatly aſſiſted by the Medicean "Preſs, which lately publiſhed a beautiful edition of "Avicenna in Arabic, if it would likewiſe give us an "edition of Averroes in the ſame language; and by this "means enable thoſe perſons, who underſtand that lan"guage to correct the barbarous tranſlation, and render "it capable of being underſtood. Otherwiſe it is cer"tain, that Averroes will be neglected by a great "many who would read it carefully, if it were not "impoſſible to make ſenſe of it in a multitude of "places. In the latter part of the Anal. it is evi"dent that he has laboured with great ſucceſs and in "a man-

(83) Huet. de claris Interpretibus, pag. 185.

(84) See the Biblioth. Rabbinica of Father Bartolocci, tom. 1. pag. 13, & ſeq.

(85) Poſſevin. Biblioth. Selecta, lib. 12. cap. 16. pag. 43. tom. 2.

(87) Keckermannus in Præcognitis Logicis, Tract. 2. cap. 2. num. 32. pag. 103.

glad that before this Article was ſent to the preſs, I could have had the ſatisfaction of conſulting the book, in which Don Nicholas Antonio treats very fully of Averroes; but I am deprived of this advantage, and obliged to content my ſelf with the extracts of it only publiſhed in the Journal des Savans. What I have collected from thence is as follows. "Averroes of Corduba was inſtructed by his father in the knowledge of the Law "and in the Religion of the Country. He was exceſſively fat, though he eat but once a "day. He ſpent all his nights in the ſtudy of Philoſophy, and when he found himſelf "fatigued, he diverted himſelf by reading ſome books of Poetry or Hiſtory. He was "never ſeen to play at any game, or to ſeek any other amuſement. The errors, of "which he was accuſed, gave occaſion for a ſentence againſt him, by which he was de-"prived of his eſtate, and obliged to retreat. After his condemnation he took a voyage "to Fez, from whence he returned to Corduba, where he continued, till upon the earneſt "entreaty of the people he was ſent for again to Morocco, where he ſpent the remainder "of his life, and died in 1206" (d). The Authors of the Leipſic Journal inform me, that Don Nicholas Antonio in that part of his Work made great uſe of a piece of John Leo, which was publiſhed by Hottinger (e). I can therefore, with regard to that point, have recourſe to the original as well as he. I ſhall obſerve therefore, that we find in that piece, that the people of Corduba raiſed Averroes to two conſiderable poſts, which his father and grandfather had held [K], and which were that of Grand Juſticiary, and that of Chief Prieſt. He was capable of diſcharging them both very well, ſince he was eminently ſkilled in Law and Divinity. After he had ſtudied both theſe Sciences, he applied himſelf to Natural Philoſophy, Phyſic, Aſtrology, and Mathematics. While he held the offices abovementioned, the King of Morocco ſent Deputies to him to offer him the poſt of Judge of Morocco and all Mauritania, upon this condition likewiſe, that he ſhould keep all the employments which he had in Spain. This propoſition pleaſed him; he went to Morocco, but having eſtabliſhed Judges as his Sub-delegates there, he returned to Corduba. Surprizing things are related of his patience, liberality, and mildneſs of temper [L]. He referred to his Lieutenant all the criminal cauſes, and never gave his opinion in thoſe caſes. All theſe good qualities did not prevent him from having a great many enemies, who harraſſed him extremely, and accuſed him of hereſy, which

(d) Journal des Savans, for July the 1ſt 1697, pag. 475 of the Holland edition.

(e) Acta Eruditorum, Lipſ. 1697. p. 305.

"a manner, which ought to immortalize his name; and "the Abridgment of Logic, which he wrote, is valuable "upon ſeveral accounts; and his Logic much ſought "after. None of the interpreters of Ariſtotle ſeems "to have come ſo near the ſenſe of that Philoſopher, "or this Arabian Writer." I doubt, that there are not now many perſons, who would make ſuch a wiſh, and expect ſuch great things from a perfect tranſlation of the works of Averroes, or give him ſuch prodigious commendations.

[K] That the people of Corduba raiſed Averroes to two conſiderable poſts, which his father and grandfather had held.] His grandfather was one of the moſt celebrated Lawyers of his time. He was conſidered as a ſecond Malich, who was one of the four great Caſuiſts of the Mahometan Religion: Unus ex quatuor primariis Juris Mahummedanorum Canonici Interpretibus (88); and he was likewiſe an able Divine. He was ſent by the people of Corduba, when they ſhook off the yoke of their Prince, and reſolved to chooſe the King of Morocco for their Lord, with a Commiſſion to that King, in order to negotiate that important affair. He obtained all the favours, which he required of him on the part of theſe revolters, and returned home loaded with preſents and civilities, having been created chief Prieſt, and chief Judge of the Kingdom of Corduba. He died after he had enjoyed theſe dignities a long time, and left a ſon, who was a Lawyer, and was appointed to ſucceed in the ſame poſts by the votes of the inhabitants of Corduba. The King of Morocco confirmed this election; and by this means our Lawyer was advanced to a conſiderable ſtation. We find, that the authority of theſe poſts extended over all Andalouſia and the Kingdom of Valencia. He lived a long time with great ſatisfaction; and upon his death his offices were conferred upon his ſon by the votes of the people (89). We may obſerve, that at the requeſt of ſeveral great perſons, who deſired his clemency in favour of Ibnu Saigh, a famous Phyſician, kept in priſon for the crime of hereſy, he ſet him at liberty. Ibnu Giulgiul ſaid during this proceeding, The father of Averroes does not know that he has a ſon, who will be a much greater heretic than this man (90). And he was not deceived in it.

(88) Hotting. Bibl. Theolog. lib. 2. cap. 3. p. 272.

(89) Taken from a book de Viris Illuſtrib. apud Arabes, tranſlated into Latin by John Leo Africanus, and publiſhed by Hottinger, Bibl. Theol. cap. 3. pag. 272.

(90) Idem, ibid. pag. 269.

[L] Surprizing things are related of his patience, liberality, and mildneſs of temper.] There was at Corduba ſeveral perſons among the Nobility and Men of Letters, who hated and oppoſed him. One day when he read a Lecture in the auditory of Civil Law, the ſervant of one of his enemies came to whiſper ſomething in his ear. Upon which he changed countenance, and anſwered only Yes, Yes. The next day the ſame ſervant returned to the auditory, and aſked pardon, and confeſſed before all the ſcholars, that he had ſaid a very rude thing to Averroes, when he whiſpered him in the ear. God bleſs you, replied Averroes to him, for having declared, that I am endowed with patience. He gave him afterwards a ſum of money, and ſaid to him, Do not do to others, as you have done to me. Tho' he was rich both by his marriage and his poſts, he was always in debt, becauſe he was very charitable to Men of Letters who were in neceſſity, whether they had a love for him or not. His friends cenſured him one day for his liberality to his enemies. You are unhappy, anſwered he, ſince you do not know, that to ſerve one's relations and friends is not an act of liberality. We are led to that by the affections of nature. To be liberal is to communicate one's eſtate to one's enemies; and ſince my riches did not ariſe from myſelf, or my anceſtors having followed merchandize, or any art, or a military life, but the profeſſion of virtue, is it not juſt that I ſhould diſpoſe of them in acts of virtue? I find, that I have not miſplaced them; they have ſerved to make thoſe my friends who had been my enemies (91). Add to this what I have obſerved concerning his ſobriety, vigilancy, application to his ſtudies, &c. (92). He would not agree, that the youngeſt of his ſons ſhould be advanced to the honours, which were offered him at the court of Morocco; and he was ſo far from ſhewing any peculiar ſatisfaction, when he obſerved the deference, which was paid to this young man, and by which they intended to do a pleaſure to his father, that he was abſolutely uneaſy at it (93). What a pity it was, that ſo many virtues and excellent qualities ſhould not have been attended with orthodoxy, but on the contrary be joined to the moſt enormous errors! The writings of his enemies reproached him only on account of hereſy, and his Panegyriſts have only extolled him on account of his virtue and learning, &c. Hic à multis laudatus, à nonnullis vero aliis vituperio affectus eſt. . . . Adverſarius ejus ſcripſit Epiſtolam, qua vituperabatur Averroes eum de hæreſi infamando, & alius ſcripſit aliam laudando eum de

(91) Hotting. Biblioth. Theolog. lib. 2. cap. 3. pag. 273, 274.

(92) See above in the text of this Article, the paſſage of the Journal des Savans, quotation (d).

(93) Apud Hotting. Biblioth. Theol. p. 274, 275.

which was attended with very grievous conſequences to him [M]. But he was acquitted very honourably before he died. What he anſwered to a young Gentleman, who deſired him to give him his daughter in marriage, is very curious [N]. There is ſomething extremely remarkable related concerning an imprecation, which he pronounced againſt his youngeſt ſon [O]. He wrote a great many amorous verſes, but when he grew old he de nobilitate, juſtitiâ, & doctrinâ, quæ quidem Epiſtolæ ſunt longiſſimæ (94). i. e. "He was applauded by a "great many perſons; but he was condemned by "ſome few. An antagoniſt of his wrote a Letter, in "which Averroès was ſeverely reproached, and ac-"cuſed of hereſy, and another perſon wrote another "Letter, in which he extolls Averroes on account of "his nobility, juſtice, and learning. Theſe Letters "are very long ones."

(94) Ibid. pag. 279.

[M] His enemies accuſed him of hereſy, which was attended with very grievous conſequences to him.] A great many of the Nobility and Doctors of Corduba, and particularly Ibnu Zoar the Phyſician, envied him, and reſolved to proſecute him on account of irreligion. They ſuborned ſome young men to deſire him to read them a philoſophical Lecture, which he conſented to, and diſcovered to them in this Lecture his philoſophical Creed: Inter legendum autem ſuam philoſophalem fidem detexerunt (95). They procured an Act to be drawn up by a Notary, and declared him an heretic. This Act was ſigned by an hundred witneſſes, and ſent to Manſor King of Morocco. This Prince having ſeen it, fell into a paſſion againſt Averroes, and ſaid aloud, It is evident, that this man is not of our Religion. "Hunc noſtræ legis non eſſe patet." He ordered all his eſtate to be confiſcated, and obliged him to keep within the quarter of the Jews. Averroes obeyed; but going ſometimes to the moſque in order to perform his devotions, and the children driving him away with ſtones, he removed from Corduba to Fez, and lay concealed there. He was diſcovered within a few days after, and put into priſon, and Manſor was aſked what ſhould be done with him. That Prince aſſembled together a great many Doctors in Divinity and Law, and enquired of them what puniſhment ſuch a man deſerved. The greateſt part of them replied, that as an heretic he deſerved death; but ſome of them repreſented, that a man of his character ought not to be put to death, ſince he was particularly eminent as a Lawyer and a Divine; ſo that the general report would be, not that an heretic was condemned, but that a Lawyer and a Divine had ſuffered that ſentence. The conſequences of this will be, 1. that no more Infidels will embrace our Faith, and ſo our Religion will be diſcouraged; 2. that there will be a complaint, that our African Doctors ſeek out and find reaſons to take one another's lives away. The moſt proper expedient will be to oblige him to make a retractation before the gate of the great Moſque, where he ſhall be aſked whether he repents. We are of opinion, that your Majeſty ſhould pardon him in caſe he repents; for there is no man upon the earth, who is exempt from all crimes. Manſor approved of this advice, and gave orders to the Governor of Fez to ſee the execution of that ſentence. In conſequence of this one Friday at the hour of prayer our Philoſopher was conducted to the gate of the Moſque, and placed bare-headed upon the higheſt ſtep, and all thoſe, who entered into the Moſque, ſpit in his face. Prayers being done, the Doctors with the Notaries, and the Judge with his Aſſeſſors came thither, and aſked this unhappy man, whether he repented of his hereſy? He anſwered Yes; upon which he was ſent back. He ſtaid at Fez, where he read Lectures in Law. Manſor having given him leave ſome time after to return to Corduba, he went thither, and lived in a miſerable manner, being deprived of his eſtate and books. In the mean time the Judge, who had ſucceeded him, acquitted himſelf ſo ill in his office, and juſtice in general was ſo badly adminiſtred in that country, that the people groaned under the oppreſſion. Manſor being deſirous to remedy this diſorder, aſſembled his Council, and propoſed to reſtore Averroes. The greateſt part of the Counſellors were of that opinion; upon which account he ſent an order for him to come immediately to Morocco, and diſcharge the duties of his former poſt. Averroes removed thither ſoon with his family, and ſpent the remainder of his life at Morocco (96). He was buried there without the Gate of the Curriers (97). His tomb and epitaph were to be ſeen there for a long time after (98).

(95) Ibid. pag. 276.

(96) Hottinger. Bibl. Theolog. pag. 276, & ſeq.

(97) Ibid. pag. 279.

(98) Ibid.

We muſt not omit to mention what he anſwered to thoſe, who aſked him in what ſituation his mind was, while he was under perſecution. That condition, ſaid he, pleaſed me and diſpleaſed me. I was well ſatisfied to be diſcharged from the troubleſome employments of my place as Judge; but I was uneaſy to be oppreſſed by falſe witneſſes. I did not wiſh, continued he, to be reſtored to my poſt as a Magiſtrate, and have not accepted it again till my innocence had been made appear (99).

(99) Ibid. pag. 278.

[N] What he anſwered to a young Gentleman, who deſired him to give him his daughter in marriage, is very curious.] "Give me her, ſays the Gallant to "him, and I will pay you her weight in gold." O Domine judex, da mihi in uxorem filiam tuam, & quanti eam ponderaveris itidem aurum tibi reddam (100). "Do you know, anſwered Averroes, whe-"ther my daughter be beautiful or ugly; or whether "you ſhall be pleaſed with her or not?" I have ſeen the copy of her, replied the other, that is her brother (101). I am fearful, anſwer'd Averroes (102), that your violent paſſion for her has hindered you from knowing her. The young Gentleman went away in confuſion, and did not return to ſollicit him again. This daughter of his was afterwards married by her father to a relation of the King of Morocco (103). When I remarked, that Averroes's anſwer was curious, I had a regard to two things; firſt the circumſtances of it; and then the obſcurity of the Tranſlator. I ſuſpect that he has expreſſed himſelf improperly. He did not underſtand the Latin tongue. It is probable, that the Arabic words have more acuteneſs in them than the tranſlation, and therefore perſons of curioſity will be pleaſed with an examination of this little fact. It is a remarkable incident enough to ſee a Gallant, who will give her weight in gold for a young Lady, whom he never ſaw. The price would be very high even in Spain, where people are not near ſo fat as in many other countries. Averroes would have been in the right to have aſked the Gallant, Do you know whether my daughter be little or luſty? This explanation might have been of conſequence, ſince in the latter caſe the price would have been greater, and the value leſs. According to our cuſtoms, nothing would have been more remarkable, than that a Gallant ſhould not have ſeen the daughter of the chief Magiſtrate of the place where he lived; but among the Mahometans this is common. They do not permit their daughters to appear at the windows and doors of their houſes, to go from one place to another, and to receive viſits every day. And yet I dare ſay, that there was ſomething remarkable in this caſe, that the Nobleman of Corduba (104) did not know but by conjecture, that Averroes's daughter was handſome. Theſe are ſome of the circumſtances which I had in my view.

(100) Ibid. pag. 275.

(101) Comparationem ejus vidi, fratrem ſcil. ejus. ibid.

(102) Teneo te eam non cognoviſſe ob impetum tuum. Ibid. pag. 276.

(103) Ibid.

(104) Juvenit quidam ex nobilibus civitatis. ibid. pag. 275.

[O] There is ſomething extremely remarkable related concerning an imprecation which he pronounced againſt his youngeſt ſon.] I ſhall not amuſe myſelf with tranſlating into our language, what I ſhall make uſe of as a Commentary upon this text. It would appear to very little advantage in our tongue. I ſhall only obſerve, that Averroes wiſhed the death of his ſon rather than to ſee him undutiful, and that he uttered an imprecation againſt him, which the young man did not ſurvive above ten months. Here follows a long Latin quotation. I do not tranſcribe it from Hottinger; for I find it more correct in another Author. De Averrois carminum efficacia hanc hiſtoriam hiſtoricus Arabs refert. Quadam die eo exiſtente cum amicis quibuſdam, colloquentibuſque ingreſſus eſt filius ejus cum aliquibus ſociis juvenibus, quos cum animadvertiſſet Averroes, protulit duo Carmina hujus ſenſus: Rapuerunt pulchritudines tuæ capreolo pulchritudinem ſuam, donec miratus eſt omnis pulcher in te. Tibi eſt pectus ejus, & oculi ejus, & ſtupor ejus. Verum cras cornua ſua patri tuo erunt. Poſt quæ dixit: Sit maledicta peregrinatio; quando he caſt them into the fire (f) [P]. I cannot tell from whence Du Verdier Vau-Privas took theſe words; Averroes was broken by a wheel placed on his breaſt. The Reader will find them in the chapter, which he intitles, Of ſeveral Men of Learning among the Antients and Moderns who died in a miſerable manner (g). I have been ſurprized to find ſo very ſlight an account of this famous Philoſopher in the Bibliotheque Orientale of Mr. d'Herbelot [Q]. One would have imagined, that a perſon, who had ſo extenſive a knowledge verroes was the chief Judge of the Country, they applied themſelves to him. They repreſented to him, that this Abraham had debauched the whole city by his Poems, and eſpecially the youth of both ſexes, and that nothing elſe was ſung at the marriage-feaſts. Averroes was incenſed againſt the Poet, and forbid him to continue writing under ſuch a penalty as the caſe required, or as the Judge ſhould think proper. He was informed, that his prohibition would not ſtop the poetical humour of the Jew, and he reſolved to be aſſured of the truth of it. He ſent to him a perſon, whom he could confide in, who came back and ſaid to him; I have found no body at his houſe but your eldeſt ſon, who writes verſes. He added, that there was neither man, woman, nor child at Corduba, who had learned any of Abraham Ibnu Sahal's verſes. Upon this Averroes ceaſed his enquiry: Can one ſingle hand, ſays he, ſtop a thouſand mouths? Obſerving one day at a Bookſeller's ſhop, that the Koran was ſold but for a ducate, whereas the Poems of this Jew were bought for ten piſtoles at the firſt word (110), he cried out; "This city will be ſoon deſtroyed; for "I ſee the people's neglect of ſacred things, and their "regard for thoſe, which are prohibited and crimi-"nal." Tunc dixit Averroes omnibus adſtantibus, Scitote hanc civitatem mox ruituram, quoniam vidi populum, quæ ad fidem pertinent, viluiſſe; atque prohibita atque inhoneſta grata extitiſſe, majoriſque feciſſe. Et ſicut dixerat ſucceſſit. Non adhuc elapſis quinquaginta annis Chriſticolæ oppugnârunt Cordubam, & multas alias civitates (111). "And as he ſaid, "it happened; for within fifty years after the Chri-"ſtians beſieged this and ſeveral other cities." We may collect from this, that there are ſome vices, which are common to all Countries, Religions, and Ages. Here are Mahometans in Spain, who did in the twelfth Century what a great many Chriſtians at Paris have done in the ſeventeenth. If a perſon wants to buy Mr. Godeau's verſion of the Pſalms, he diſputes a long time about the price of it, and will not purchaſe it at laſt but at a very low one. But if the queſtion is about the Parnaſſe Satyrique, he will readily give the moſt enormous price, which the ſeller ſhall aſk for it. We may obſerve likewiſe, that there are ſome good actions, which we find inſtances of in every Country, Age, and Religion. If Chriſtians in the latter Ages have thrown their profane, amorous, or laſcivious verſes into the fire (112), Averroes did the ſame under the profeſſion of Mahometiſm. I ſay under the profeſſion; for it is doubted, whether in his heart he believed any thing of Religion (113). His prediction with regard to the misfortunes of Corduba does not at all confute this; for it is very natural to think, that a dreadful coruption of manners, and ſuch a degeneracy of mind, as leads men to contemn what is eſteemed ſacred, and to love what is thought vicious, will occaſion great diſorders in a city.

(f) Taken from a book de Viris quibuſdam illuſtribus apud Arabes, tranſlated by John Leo, publiſhed by Hottinger, cap. 3. lib. 2. of his Bibliotheca Theologica.

(g) It is the 18th of the 2d book of his Diverſes Leçons.

(110) Prædictus emptor nihil reſpondens, ſed manus crumenæ imponens, decem aureos numerawit & perſolvit, & librum accepit, & in pace receſſit. Ibid. pag. 290.

(111) Ibid.

(112) Picus of Mirandola did ſo. See the end of the note [D] of the article of ADONIS. Petrarch was deſirous to do the ſame. See Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poetes, tom. 3. pag. 24. He repented of having written his Poems. See the 3d Letter of his 8th book of Familiar Letters, p. 278.

(113) See the notes [H] and [M].

quando eram juvenis, aliquando patrem meum puniebam; nunc autem Senex filium meum punire non poſſum. At Deum deprecor, ut priuſquam videam aliquid contra voluntatem meam, eum mori faciat. Sicque priuſquam tranſirent menſes decem, filius ejus mortuus eſt, & major ſolus remanſit, qui judex opinionis, & ſectæ effectus eſt (105). i. e. "The Arabian Hiſtorian relates the "following ſtory concerning the efficacy of Averroes's "Poetry. As he was one day in converſation with "ſome of his friends, his ſon came in with ſeveral "young men his companions; and when Averroes "ſaw them, he ſpoke two verſes to this purpoſe: "Your beauties have robbed the wild goat of his "beauty, ſo that every beauteous perſon admires "you. You have his heart, his eyes, and his ſtupi-"dity; but to morrow your father will have his "horns. After this he ſaid; Let travelling be ac-"curſed; when I was young, I puniſhed my father; "but now I am old I cannot puniſh my ſon. But I "pray to God that he will cut him off, before I ſee "him do any thing contrary to my will. And thus "before ten months were paſt his ſon died, and none "but his elder ſurvived, who became a defender of "his opinions and ſect." Bartholine, who furniſhes me with this paſſage, erroneouſly aſcribes to the Poetry of this Philoſopher the great effect which is here mentioned, and which ought only to be attributed to the imprecation which Averroes pronounced in proſe. The Compilers have collected a great many inſtances of effects of that nature which have followed ſuch imprecations (106).

(105) Thomas Bartholinus, de Medicis Poetis, pag. 105, 106.

(106) See Camerarius's Hiſtorical Meditations, tom. 1. lib. 5. cap. 6. and tom. 3. lib. 2. cap. 15, 16.

[P] When he grew old, he caſt his amorous verſes into the fire.] What he ſaid upon that occaſion is full of good ſenſe. Man, ſays he, will be judged by his words; and if I have ſpoken ill, I will not let my folly be known. If my verſes ſhould pleaſe any perſon, he would take me for a wiſe man, and I do not find that I am ſo. We ſee here a good character. Averroes having committed a fault, atones for it; he reſolves to decline equally the approbation, which he thought he did not merit, and the blame which he deſerved. He would have met with a great number of people, who would have read his love-verſes with prodigious approbation, and admired him, and bleſſed his memory. Ovid and Catullus are inſtances of this. He would not accept of theſe applauſes. Other perſons would have been diſpleaſed, that ſo great a man, who was a Lawyer and Philoſopher of ſuch merit, ſhould write verſes of Gallantry. He prevented their cenſures by taking an effectual method, that no perſon ſhould read what he had written in that kind. His other Poems are all loſt, except a ſmall piece, in which he declares, that when he was young, he acted againſt his reaſon; but that when he was in years he followed the dictates of it; upon which he utters this wiſh; Would to God I had been born old, and that in my youth I had been in a ſtate of perfection. This, I preſume, is the true ſenſe of theſe Latin words of John Leo (107). De ſuis quidem carminibus tantum duo reperiuntur, ad verbum ſignificantibus: "In-"obediens enim fui voluntati meæ juvenis, ac quando "tempus cum calvitie ſenectuteque agitavit me, tum pa-"rui voluntati meæ. Utinam natus fuiſſem ſenex, & "in juventute abſolutus (108)!" What wiſh can there be formed more worthy a Philoſopher?

(107) Apud Hottinger. Bibliotb. Theol. pag. 278.

(108) In juventute abſolutus. The Tranſlator has perhaps put in inſtead of ab; and ſo it might be tranſlated, exempt from youth.

Let us mention here Averroes's conduct with regard to the Love-Verſes of another Poet. There was at Corduba a Philoſopher, Phyſician, and Aſtrologer, whoſe name was Abraham Ibnu Sahal, who thro' ill luck fell in love, and began to write verſes, without any regard to his character as a Doctor. Poſtea ob diſgratiam ſuæ fortunæ, amore capitur, & dignitate Doctorum poſtpoſitâ, cæpit edere carmina (109). The Jews, his brethren in Religion, adviſed him not to publiſh theſe looſe Poems. He returned them a profane anſwer in verſe. This obliged them to have recourſe to the authority of the Magiſtrate; and as Averroes, [Q] I have been ſurprized to find ſo very ſlight an account of this famous Philoſopher in the Bibliotheque Orientale of Mr. d'Herbelot.] In the firſt place it is ſtrange, that we do not find in this Bibliotheque our Arabian Philoſopher under the name which all the Weſtern nations gave him, I mean that of AVERROES. I grant that this name is not the true one, but a name very much corrupted by being transferred from one idiom to another very frequently; but is it not a juſt motive for placing it in its proper place in a Dictionary, to obſerve, that there is ſcarce any other name made uſe of by the Writers of the Weſtern nations? If our Author ſhould chooſe to give the Article of that Philoſopher under the Arabic name, written according to the proper Orthography, he ſhould at leaſt have given the reader notice of it under the word AVERROES; and therefore Mr. d'Herbelot, who has not done ſo, has forgotten a thing, which ought by no means to have been neglected. We do not find in the body of his work either Averroes, knowledge in the Arabian Book, would have furniſhed us with a variety of curious collections concerning the adventures and opinions of Averroes; whereas we find inſtead of this ſuch an aſtoniſhing brevity, as is ſo far from inſtructing us in what we know nothing of, that it rather confounds what we knew before.

(109) Hotting. Bibl. Theolog. pag. 288.

roes, or Aben-Roes, or Aben-Rois. We are therefore obliged to have recourſe to the Index of the ſubjects treated of, which is not at all agreeable. But what do we meet with there? Averores (114) with a reference to p. 303, 719, 815. What do we find at page 303? That Averroes was a Philoſopher, who thought that the world was eternal. We find at page 815, that Mohammed Al-Gazali was of opinion, that Averroes held principles very contrary to thoſe of Muſulmaniſm. But in page 719 we find the Article of our Philoſopher under the word Roſchd. This Article does not contain twenty lines. Here follows the latter half of it. "Averroes was the firſt who tranſ-
" lated Ariſtotle from Greek into Arabic, before the " Jews had made their verſion of him; and we have " not had for a long time any other text of Ariſtotle,
" than that of the Arabic verſion of this great Phi-
" loſopher, who has added to them very large Com" mentaries, which were made uſe of by St. Thomas
" and the other ſcholaſtic Writers, before the Greek " Originals of Ariſtotle and his Commentators were " known to us (115)." I find here ſeveral things which I cannot credit; for I obſerve, that learned men affirm, that Averroes did not underſtand the Greek Language (116). I know likewiſe, that the Califs Almanzor, Abdalla, and Almamon, who lived ſome ages before Averroes, procur'd a great many Greek books to be tranſlated into Arabic (117). So that there is no probability that the firſt Arabic verſion of Ariſtotle's works was made by Averroes, even though it be ſuppoſed, that he was not ignorant of the Greek Tongue. Alfarabius, who flouriſhed in the tenth Century, found in Meſopotamia the Phyſics of Ariſtotle (118). The tranſlation of the Analytics of that Author is generally aſcribed to him, as Mr. d'Herbelot himſelf informs us (119). Rigord tells us, that a council held at Paris in 1209 condemned to the flames ſome books of Ariſtotle, which were explained in the Colleges, and had been brought from Conſtantinople not long before, and had been tranſlated from Greek into Latin. Delati de novo a Conſtantinopoli, & à Græco in Latinum tranſlati (120). This does not agree with Mr. d'Herbelot; for it appears from hence, that about the time when Averroes died, a tranſlation of Ariſtotle from the Greek was made uſe of at Paris. It is certain, that before the middle of the twelfth Century the Philoſophy of Ariſtotle was taught in the Univerſity of Paris. See the complaints of St. Bernard related by Mr. de Launoi (121). The ſame paſſage of Rigord ſhews, that the Greek books of Ariſtotle were in France in the time of Averroes. In ſhort, I ſhould have been glad, that ſome of the Tranſlators of the Ariſtotle and the Arabic Commentary of Averroes, who lived between Averroes and St. Thomas Aquinas, had been named. All the Latin Tranſlators of this Arabic Philoſopher, who are come to my knowledge, are later than this Angelical Doctor. I don't ſay this, as if I would reject what we read in ſome Authors, that the Emperor Frederic II, who flouriſhed before St. Thomas, and after Averroes, procured a Latin Tranſlation of the books of this Philoſopher. We may infer this from the words of Cuſpinian (122): Libros multos ex Græco & ex Arabico Latinos fieri curavit, inter quos & Ariſtotelis volumina fuerunt, & multa medicorum; i. e. "He ordered a great number
" of books to be tranſlated into Latin out of Greek
" and Arabic, among which were the volumes of " Ariſtotle, and many others of the Phyſicians;" and from this paſſage of Wolphgang Hungerus in his notes upon Cuſpinian (123): Curavit quoque eas fieri tranſlationes operum Ariſtotelis & Scriptorum Medicinæ, ex linguâ Græcâ & Arabicâ, quæ in hunc uſque diem in Scholis lectæ ſunt, atque etiamnum leguntur; & Bononiam eaſdem miſit, ut Academiæ offerentur, quod ex Epiſtolis apparet: i. e. "He procured thoſe Tranſ-
" lations to be made of the works of Ariſtotle and
" the Writers in Phyſic out of the Greek and Arabic " Languages, which are read to this very day in the " ſchools; and he ſent them to Bononia as a preſent
" to the Univerſity, as appears from his Letters."
See likewiſe the Chronicle of Cario (124), in which we are expreſly told, that this Emperor ordered the Almageſt of Ptolemy, and ſeveral of the works of Ariſtotle, Galen and Avicenna, &c. to be tranſlated (125). We find the ſame names in the Theatre of Matthias (126) under the quotation of the 7th book of the Annals of Aventine and in the Chronicle of Cario. I cannot tell why Averroes is not named; and yet I imagine, that he was one of thoſe, who were tranſlated by the direction of that Emperor. I ſhould be glad to know, as I obſerved above, what were the names of thoſe whom he employed to tranſlate theſe Writers. Let us take notice of one thing, which we find in the Bibliotheque of Mr. d'Herbelot, and which is, that the Mahometans conſidered the doctrine of thoſe, who though they admit of a firſt Mover, yet maintain likewiſe the eternity of the world, as mere Atheiſm (127). This opinion is aſcribed to the moſt famous Philoſophers among the Arabians, to our Averroes, to Avicenna, and Alfarabius (128). The Chriſtians generally paſs the ſame judgment upon this doctrine; and it is certain that it cannot be maintained without treating the holy Scriptures as a fable.

(114) It is an error of the preſs.

(115) D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. pag. 719. col. 1.

(116) See above quotations (5) and (9).

(117) See Father Rapin, Comparaiſon de Platon & d'Ariſtote, pag. 403, 404. See likewiſe d'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 546.

(118) Rapin, Compar. de Platon & d'Ariſtote, pag. 404.

(119) D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. pag. 337.

(120) Rigordus in Vitâ Philippi Auguſti, apud Launoium, de variâ Ariſtotelis fortunâ, cap. 1. pag. 6.

(121) Launoius, ibid. cap. 3. pag. 24, & ſeq.

(122) Cuſpin. in Frederico II. init. pag. 419.

(123) Hungeri Annot. in Cuſpinian. pag. 130.

(124) Pag. 480.

(125) Peucer. in Chronico Curionis, l.b. 5. pag. 684.

(126) Pag. 480.

(127) D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient pag. 337. col. 2.

(128) Ibid. and pag. 303. col. 1.

☞We ſhall give an extract from Dr. Freind's Hiſtory of Phyſic (a), containing ſome obſervations upon this article of Mr. Bayle [R].

(a) Pag. 118, & ſeq. 2d edit. 1727.

AUGE

[R] We ſhall give an extract from Dr. Freind's Hiſtory of Phyſic, containing ſome obſervations upon this article of Mr. Bayle.] "Mr. Bayle has collected a " great many paſſages out of Authors, relating to A-
" verrhoes; and as he ſeems never to have been ac" quainted with the original, he follows theſe Au" thors implicitly, who often miſlead him. As where " he tells us from Champerius, that he was a bitter
" enemy of Avicenna, and that for this reaſon he " avoids ever naming him: which he does in this " very book often, and in his metaphyſical Diſputati-
" ons, not to mention the Comment he has writ ex-
" preſly upon that Author's Cantica. And as to his " being his enemy, as is here ſuggeſted, if we look
" into this very Comment, we may eaſily be con" vinced of the contrary: for he thinks this treatiſe
" of Avicenna, one of the beſt introductions to Phy-
" ſick, which ever appeared; and therefore becauſe it
" was conciſe, and ſometimes wanted an explanation,
" he undertook that taſk himſelf. And to ſhew his " candor, even when Avicenna ſeems to lay down
" ſome wrong poſitions, he explains in what ſenſe
" they ſhould be underſtood, ſo as to be conſiſtent
" with truth; as particularly in the doctrine about " bleeding (a) old men, (which he diſtinguiſhes perfect- (a) Pag. 280.
" ly right) and the making uſe of ſubterraneous (b) (b) Pag. 277.
" caverns. The laſt rule particularly, he ſays, would " not ſo well ſuit his climate, which was the fifth,
" i. e. Spain; but might be very proper for the fourth,
" which was hotter, and where Avicenna lived. What
" Mr. Bayle recites from Mr. Paſquier, about Aver-
" rhoes bleeding his ſon at three years old, is equally
" a miſtake; for Averrhoes himſelf tells us, that it
" was Avenzoar, who (c) uſed this practice in the caſe (c) Pag. 54.
" of his own ſon. So where he quotes Mr. Petit for " ſaying, that Averrhoes never gave any medicine to
" the ſick, and that he owns as much himſelf, is di" rectly contrary to what this book will inform us:
" tho' I agree, that it is probable, he was no very " great practitioner.
" Mr. Bayle wonders, why Mr. Herbelot is ſo ſhort
" in his account of this famous Writer: and I ſhould
" wonder why Mr. Bayle is ſo prolix upon the ſame
" head, did I not conſider, that he picks up a few
" bad ſtories which have been handed about concern" ing his irreligion, particularly the celebrated ſaying
" he

AUGE (DANIEL D') in Latin Augentius, was of Villeneuve l'Archevêque in the Dioceſe of Sens in Champagne (a). He lived in the ſixteenth Century, and was eſteemed on account of his Learning and Writings [A]. The office of the King's Profeſſor in the Greek tongue in the Univerſity of Paris was deſigned for him in the year 1574 (b), and he took poſſeſſion of it in 1578. It was vacant by the death of Lewis le Roi (c). He had been Preceptor to the ſon of that Francis Olivier, who was Chancellor of France. This is what I have been informed of by the preliminary Epiſtle of a book, which he dedicated to Anthony Olivier Biſhop of Lombes, and uncle to his pupil (d). It is dated from Paris the firſt of March 1555. I do not know the time of his death; but only, that Francis Parent, his ſucceſſor in the Profeſſorſhip of the Greek tongue, entered upon it in the year 1595 (e).

(a) La Croix du Maine, Bibliotheq. Franç. pag. 68.

(b) Du Breul, Antiquitez de Paris, pag. 566.

(c) Ibid.

(d) It is a Poem of Sannazarius, intitled, De Morte Chriſti Lamentatio. Dan. d'Auge publiſhed it at Paris with his notes in 4to, 1557.

(e) Du Breul, Antiq. de Paris, pag. 566.

" he is charged with, Sit anima mea cum Philoſophis: " a ſaying, which perhaps there was no more ground " to faſten upon Averrhoes, than any of thoſe particu- " lars I have mentioned. This Writer has, with no " little pains, amaſſed together all he could meet with " upon this article in modern Authors; and in a " more emphatical manner enlarges upon what he " found quoted from the Diſputations which this Ara- " bian wrote againſt Algazel, a man famous in the " preceding Century for being the founder of a Sect " called the Motazelas, and who died A. H. 505: a " piece finely writ, as he tells us from Rapin; but, " in his own opinion, very pernicious. In this are " contained a great many ſpeculations concerning the " Soul, conſonant to the doctrine of Ariſtotle; among " the reſt the Unity of the Intellect is explained; from " which Mr. Bayle would infer, that he was a very " impious perſon, and one who muſt of courſe main- " tain the Mortality of the Soul, and conſequently de- " ny any future rewards or puniſhments. Why he " ſhould be ſo fond of drawing Averrhoes into theſe " opinions, I will not take the liberty ſo much as to " gheſs; only give me leave to obſerve, that if he " would have conſulted the Author himſelf, inſtead of " the Collectors he here quotes, he would have found " a very different account of his notions: for in one " (a) Diſſertation Averrhoes aſſerts, that the ſoul is not " material; and in another (b), that it is immortal. " So uſual is it with theſe compilers of ſecret Hiſtory " to run into infinite miſtakes, merely becauſe they " take every thing at ſecond hand, and upon truſt; " whereas would they have been at the pains to go " to the Fountain head, and caſt an eye only upon the " original, their Memoirs would have been much more " exact."

(a) Phyſic. Diſput. 3.
(b) 4.

[A] Was eſteemed on account of his writings.] They are as follow: A conſolatory Oration upon the Death of Meſſire Francis Olivier, Chancellor of France, printed at Paris in 1560; Two Dialogues concerning poetical Invention, the true Knowledge of the Art of Oratory, and of the Fiction of Fable, printed at Paris in 1560; A Diſcourſe upon the Decree made by the Parliament of Dôle in Burgundy with relation to a man accuſed and convicted of being a Were-Wolf * printed (1); The Inſtitution of a Chriſtian Prince tranſlated from the Greek of Syneſius, Biſhop of Syrene, with an Oration concerning the true Nobility, tranſlated from the Greek of Philo Judæus, printed at Paris in 1555; Four Homilies of St. Macarius the Egyptian, printed at Paris, and afterwards at Lyons in 1559; A Letter to the noble and virtuous Youth Anthony Thelin, ſon of the noble Thelin (2), Author of the Book entitled Divine Tracts, in which is repreſented the true patrimony and inheritance, which fathers ought to leave to their children. This Letter is printed in the beginning of the abovementioned Divine Tracts at Paris 1565. He reviſed and corrected them, publiſhed at Paris in 1556. A French Tranſlation of the moſt beautiful ſentences and forms of ſpeaking in the familiar Epiſtles of Cicero (3). This is what I find in la Croix du Maine & du Verdier. I have not ſeen the Notes upon the Poem of Sannazarius, which I ſpoke of in the body of this article.

(2) He was a Gent'eman of Auvergne.

(3) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franç. pag. 248.

Of all the performances of Daniel Auge, I think his Diſcourſe upon the Decree againſt the Were-Wolf, is the moſt curious. Bodin tells us, that this Decree was made by the Parliament of Dôle the eighteenth of January 1583 againſt Giles Garnier of Lyons, and was printed at Orleans, Paris, and Sens. He mentions the principal circumſtances; " namely, that the " ſaid Garnier on St. Michael's day in the ſhape of a " wolf, ſeized upon a girl of ten or twelve years of " age near the wood of Serre in a vineyard of Châ- " tenoy, about a quarter of a league from Dôle, where " he killed and tore her, both with his hands, which " were like paws, and with his teeth, and eat the " fleſh of her thighs and arms, and carried ſome of " it to his wife. That under the ſame form a month " after this he took another girl, and killed her, and " would have eaten her, if he had not been prevent- " ed by three perſons, as he acknowledged himſelf. " That fifteen days after this he ſtrangled a young " child of ten years of age in a vineyard of Gredi- " ſans, and eat the fleſh of the thighs, legs, and belly. " And that in the ſhape of a wolf he killed another " little boy twelve or thirteen years old, in the wood " of the village of Perouſe, with an intention to have " eaten him, if he had not been prevented, according " to his own voluntary confeſſion. He was condemned " to be burnt alive, and the Decree was executed (4)."

* One, who is reported to turn himſelf into a wolf.

(1) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franç. pag. 68.

(4) Bodin, Demonomanie des Sorciers, lib. 2. cap. 6. pag. 208, 209. Lyons edit. 1598, in 8vo.

AUGUSTIN (ST.) one of the moſt illuſtrious Fathers of the Church, was born at Tagaſte in Africa the 13th of November 354. His father, whoſe name was Patricius, was only a mean Citizen of Tagaſte. His mother's name was Monica, and was a woman of great virtue. Their ſon had no manner of inclination to ſtudy [A]. However he was obliged to it; for his father was reſolved to raiſe him by that means, and ſent him to Madaura to be inſtructed in polite Literature. He took him hence at ſixteen years

[A] He had no manner of inclination to ſtudy.] By the repreſentation, which St. Auguſtin gives us of himſelf in his youth, we may ſee, that he was what we call a Rake. He avoided the ſchool as the plague; he loved nothing but gaming and public ſhews; he robbed his father of every thing he could find; he invented a thouſand lies to eſcape the rod, which they were obliged to make uſe of to puniſh his irregularities. Furta etiam faciebam de cellario parentum & de menſâ vel gulâ imperitante, vel ut haberem quod darem pueris ludum ſuum mihi, quo pariter utique delectabantur, tamen vendentibus, ... Fallendo innumerabilibus mendaciis & pædagogum, & magiſtros, & parentes amore ludendi, ſtudio ſpectandi nugatoria & imitandi ludicra inquietudine (1). By this paſſage we may confute what Leo Allatius has related, " that at the age " of twelve years, St. Auguſtin had ſtudied, and un- " derſtood by himſelf, without the aſſiſtance of any " maſter, all the Books of Ariſtotle, which relate " to Logic, and that at the ſame age he had written " ſeveral excellent Books in order to diſcover and con- " fute the errors of a great many Authors (2)." The Writer, who has aſſumed the name of Chriſtianus Liberius, has aſſerted the ſame thing (3). Mr. Baillet confutes both of them very ſolidly from St. Auguſtin's Confeſſions; and diſcovers the ſource of their miſtake: We may ſuppoſe, ſays he (4), that thoſe who led them into this error, might have read twelve inſtead of twenty, in

(1) Auguſtin. Confeſſ. lib. 1. cap. 9.

WHETHER St. Auguſtin was learned and an Author from his childhood.

(2) Leo Allat. in Apibus Urbanis, pag. 146. apud Baillet, Enfans celebres, pag. 59.

(3) Chriſtianus Liberius de ſcrib. & legend. Libris, pag. 178. quoted by Baillet, ibid. pag. 60, 61.

(4) Baillet, ibid.

years of age in order to ſend him to Carthage to ſtudy Rhetoric. St. Auguſtin went thither about the end of the year 371 (a). He made a great progreſs in the Sciences, but he plunged himſelf into great debauchery among the women [B]. He was deſirous of reading the holy Scriptures, but the ſimplicity of the ſtyle diſpleaſed him; and he was ſtill too great an admirer of the Pagan Eloquence to have any reliſh for the Bible. He had in general a ſtrong deſire to know the truth; and imagining that he had found it in the Sect of the Manicheans, he entered himſelf among them, and maintained the greateſt part of their opinions with a good deal of warmth. Having continued at Carthage for ſome time, he returned to Tagaſte, where he taught Rhetoric with ſo much applauſe, that his mother was congratulated upon having a ſon of ſuch admirable merit. This did not hinder that pious woman from being extremely afflicted on account of her ſon's hereſy, and the debauched manner of life into which he plunged himſelf. He returned to Carthage in the year 380, and taught Rhetoric there with prodigious applauſe. It was there that he fixed his incontinency, which had before been rambling in purſuit of different objects. He took a concubine, whom he contented himſelf with, and had a ſon by her, to whom he gave the name of Adeodatus, God's Gift, and who had a very good genius [C]. He became a little wavering in his Sect, becauſe he found no perſon who in the paſſage where St. Auguſtin ſpeaks of it. This Saint acknowledges, that he was almoſt twenty years of age, when there fell into his hands a treatiſe of Ariſtotle, entitled the ten Categories, which he had heard ſpoken of at Carthage with a great deal of applauſe *. ..... He read it by himſelf, and underſtood it perfectly well; ſo that when he had afterwards converſed with thoſe, who ſaid that they had learned it with great application under excellent maſters, who had explained it to them not only in words, but likewiſe by figures, which they traced out in the ſand, they could not tell him any thing more than what he had learned by himſelf in private. He declares alſo that at that age he read and underſtood, without the aſſiſtance of any perſon, all the books of the liberal Arts, which he could meet with. And he ſays the ſame thing with regard to the Mathematics, and particularly Geometry, Muſic, and Arithmetic.

(a) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 3. pag. 158.

* Confeſſ. lib. 4. cap. 16.

[B] He plunged himſelf into great debauchery among the women.] He began very early; for at the age of ſixteen years he reſigned himſelf to the inſtincts of this violent paſſion. Ubi eram, ſays he (5), & quam longè exulabam à deliciis domus tuæ, anno illo ſexto decimo ætatis carnis meæ, cum accepit in me ſceptrum, & totas manus ei dedi veſaniæ libidinis, licentioſæ per dedecus humanum, illicitæ autem per leges tuas? He ſpent that year without any employment, becauſe his father not having ſufficient to maintain him at Carthage, was raiſing by degrees a ſum of money neceſſary to ſend him thither. His good father was extremely glad, when he was in the bath with his ſon, and diſcovered an unuſual forwardneſs of nature in him (6). He could not refrain from acquainting his wife with it; he felt a kind of ſatisfaction from the expectation of being a grandfather, by perceiving that his ſon was ſo early fit for marriage. Quinimo ubi me ille pater in balneis vidit pubeſcentem & inquietâ indutum adoleſcentiâ, quaſi jam ex hoc in nepotes geſtiret, gaudens matri indicavit (7). St. Auguſtin's mother was more uneaſy than pleaſed with this account; ſhe was apprehenſive that he would immediately run into irregular pleaſures; and therefore exhorted him in a very ſerious manner to abſtain from the ſex, but eſpecially to avoid committing adultery. Secreto memini ut monuerit cum ſolicitudine ingenti ne fornicarer; maximèque ne adulterarem cujuſquam uxorem. Qui mihi monitus muliebres videbantur, quibus obtemperare erubeſcerem (8). i. e. "She adviſed me ſecretly "and with a great deal of earneſtneſs not to commit "fornication, but eſpecially not to be guilty of adul- "tery with any man's wife. Theſe ſeemed to me "mere womaniſh exhortations, which I was aſhamed "to obey." But he paid no regard to this good advice; he contracted ſo ſtrong an habit of incontinence, that even when he had renounced Manicheiſm, and prepared himſelf for Baptiſm, he took a new concubine in the room of Adeodatus's mother, till the young Lady, whom he was to marry, was grown up to the proper age for it (9). He was obliged to wait almoſt two years (10). It is remarkable, that in the diſpute between St. Auguſtin and Alypius upon marriage and celibacy, Alypius ſhould be ſo far from perſuading St. Auguſtin to continue in celibacy, that he ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded to marry. Alypius led a chaſte life; he had taſted by the by and as it were in ſtealth the pleaſures of love when he was very young; but he reformed himſelf immediately. He adviſed St. Auguſtin againſt marriage, as it was an obſtacle to the deſign, which they had formed of living together in the ſtudy of wiſdom. Prohibebat me ſanè Alipius ab uxore ducendâ, cauſans nullo modo nos poſſe ſecuro ocio ſimul in amore ſapientiæ vivere, ſicut jam diu deſideravimus, ſi id feciſſem (11). St. Auguſtin confeſſed to him ingenuouſly, that it was impoſſible for him to contain himſelf, and urged to him the examples of ſeveral wiſe men, who were married, and had been faithful to God and to their friends. He added, that there was a great difference between thoſe tranſient pleaſures, which Alypius had taſted and afterwards forgot, and thoſe, which himſelf had made habitual to him, and which would become more agreeable under the honourable name of marriage. Alypius was ſo much moved by this diſcourſe, that he reſolved to marry himſelf, "in order, as he ſaid, to "know by experience what St. Auguſtin thought was "more agreeable than life itſelf." Cum me ille mirareturr, quem non parvi penderet, ita hærere viſco illius voluptatis, ut me affirmarem quotieſcunque inde inter nos quæreremus, cœlibem vitam nullo modo poſſe degere, atque ita me defenderem, cum illum mirantem viderem, ut dicerem, multum intereſſe inter illud quod ipſe raptim & furtim expertus eſſet, quod pæne jam nec meminiſſet quidem, atque ideo nullâ moleſtiâ facile contemneret, & delectationes conſuetudinis meæ, ad quas ſi acceſſiſſet honeſtum nomen Matrimonii, non eum mirari oportere cur ego illam vitam nequirem ſpernere. Cœperat & ipſe deſiderare conjugium nequaquam victus libidine voluptatis, ſed curioſitatis. Dicebat enim ſcire ſe cupere quidnam eſſet illud ſine quo vita mea, quæ illi ſic placebat, non mihi vita, ſed pœna videretur (12). However neither of them married, but they lived very chaſtly.

(5) Confeſſ. lib. 2. cap. 2.

(6) It was thought contrary to the laws of decency even among the Pagans for a father and ſon to bathe in the ſame place. See Cicero de Officiis, lib. 1. cap. 35. Valer. Maxim. lib. 2. c. 1. n. 1. and Plutarch in the Life of Cato the Elder, pag. 348.

(7) Confeſſ. lib. 2. cap. 3.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Ibid. lib. 6. cap. 15.

(10) Ibid. cap. 13.

(11) Ibid. cap. 12.

(12) Ibid.

[C] He took a concubine .... and had a ſon by her, to whom he gave the name of Adeodatus, or God's Gift, and who had a very good genius.] The reader will undoubtedly be pleaſed to find here ſome account of this natural ſon of St. Auguſtin. I ſhall relate what I find in Mr. Baillet. "Adeodatus was but fifteen years "of age, when his father was baptized; but he was "then ſo ripe in knowledge, and had made ſo great "advances in learning, that he ſurpaſſed many per- "ſons in years, and even ſeveral of thoſe, who were "eſteemed in the world for their gravity and learn- "ing. St. Auguſtin compoſed about the ſame time a "Book in the form of a dialogue, intitled, Of the "Maſter. Adeodatus and himſelf are the two inter- "locutors, and he takes God to witneſs, that all that "he introduces his ſon ſpeaking in that work, is "entirely his own, tho' he was then but fixteen years "of age. St. Auguſtin adds, that he had ſeen ſeve- "ral things ſtill more wonderful of that child, than "thoſe, which we have mentioned. In ſhort, as great "a genius as he was himſelf, he declares, that "the greatneſs of his ſon's parts aſtoniſhed him. A- "deodatus received the Grace of Baptiſm with his "father, and died not long after (13)."

(13) Baillet, des Enfans célébres, pag. 63. ex Auguſt. Confeſſ. lib. 9. cap. 6.

who could fully anſwer the difficulties which he had to propoſe [D]. However he did not change his profeſſion, but waited for better explications of his opinions. His good mother Monica went to him to Carthage, in order to endeavour to reſcue him from hereſy and his vicious courſe of life; and did not deſpair of ſucceſs, though ſhe found that her remonſtrances were to no purpoſe. He wanted a new theatre to diſplay his genius, and reſolved to go to Rome; and that he might not be diverted from this deſign, he embarked without acquainting his mother, or Romanian his relation, who had maintained him at ſchool (b). He taught Rhetoric at Rome with the ſame ſucceſs as he had done at Carthage; ſo that Symmachus, Prefect of the city, being informed that they wanted an able Profeſſor of Rhetoric at Milan, appointed him for that employment in the year 383. St. Auguſtin was highly eſteemed at Milan; he went to viſit St. Ambroſe, and was very kindly received by him. He frequented his Sermons, though not near ſo much from a principle of piety, as from that of a critical curioſity. He wanted to know whether the eloquence of that Prelate deſerved the reputation which he had gained. But God made uſe of this means to convert him; for St. Ambroſe's Sermons made ſuch an impreſſion upon him, that St. Auguſtin became a Catholic in the year 384. His mother, who was come to ſee him at Milan, adviſed him to marry, in order that he might abandon that irregular manner of life which he led. He agreed to this propoſal, and ſent his concubine back to Africa; but as the young Lady, who was deſigned for his wife, would not be fit for marriage till two years after, he could not reſiſt his natural inclinations ſo long, but returned to his former debaucheries. At laſt the reading of St. Paul's Epiſtles, the ſollicitations and tears of his mother, and the good diſcourſes of ſome of his friends, compleated in him the work of grace; he felt himſelf a ſincere Chriſtian, ready to abandon every thing for the ſake of the Goſpel. He renounced his Profeſſorſhip of Rhetoric, and was baptized by St. Ambroſe on Eaſter-Eve in the year 387. The year following he returned to Africa. He loſt his mother at Oſtia, when they were going to embark from thence (c). He was ordained Prieſt in the year 391 by Valerius Biſhop of Hippo. Four years after this he was made Coadjutor to that Prelate, and did very important ſervices to the church by his pen and his exemplary piety, till his death, which happened the 28th of Auguſt 430 (d). A particular account of his life in his epiſcopal character, and of his writings, would be ſuperfluous here, ſince the reader may find it in Moreri's Dictionary, and Mr. Du Pin's Bibliotheque; and if thoſe Gentlemen had not paſſed very curſorily over the irregular part of St. Auguſtin's life, I might have excuſed myſelf from this article. But in order to inſtruct the public in a more ample manner, it is expedient to ſhew great men in every part of their character. The approbation which has been given by Councils and Popes to St. Auguſtin's opinion relating to the Doctrine of Grace, has been a great advantage to his reputation, for without that the Moliniſts in theſe latter ages would have raiſed their banner againſt him in a very confident manner, and have made nothing of his authority. We have ſhewed in another place (e), that all their policy could not oblige them to preſerve appearances, or reſtrain them from falling upon him in a very ſevere, though oblique way. It is certain, that the neceſſity which the Church of Rome is under to regard St. Auguſtin's ſyſtem, has thrown it into a perplexity, which is very ridiculous [E]. The Arminians, who have

(b) His father died about the year 372.

(c) Taken from the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of John le Sueur, tom. 3. ad ann. 388. p. 484, & ſeq. ed. in 12°.

(d) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Aut. Eccleſiaſtiq; tom. 3. pag. 158.

(e) Below in the remarks [C] and [D] and [L] of the article (JOHN) ADAM the Jeſuit, you will find ſeveral judgments which have been given of St. Auguſtin. See likewiſe l'Etat de la Faculté de Theologie de Louvain, in 1701, pag. 207.

[D] He found no perſon who could fully anſwer to the difficulties, which he had to propoſe.] St. Auguſtin had a penetrating genius; he was a Rhetorician by profeſſion, and he underſtood Logic. It is eaſy for a ſubtle and eloquent Diſputant to form doubts, and find anſwers; ſo that we are not to be ſurprized that he ſhould perplex the Manichean Doctors. Nor indeed is it at all ſtrange, that he ſhould embarraſs a great many of the Catholics, and that the weak anſwers, which they made to his objections, ſhould confirm him in his hereſies. He acknowledges that to his own loſs he had gained a thouſand advantages over them; ſo true it is, that every orthodox perſon ought not to engage in diſputation; and that unleſs he has to contend with an heretic of his own ſtrength, he can do nothing, naturally ſpeaking, but harden his antogoniſt. Quædam voxia victoria pænè mihi ſemper in diſputationibus proveniebat, differenti cum Chriſtianis imperitis; quo ſucceſſu creberrimo gliſcebat adoleſcentis animoſitas, & impetu ſuo in pervicaciæ magnum malum imprudenter urgebat (14). i. e. "I almoſt always "gained ſome unhappy victory in the diſputes, which "I had with ſome ignorant Chriſtians: by which "frequent ſucceſs the preſumption of my youth was "encreaſed, and imprudently hurried me by its vio"lence into that great fault of obſtinacy."

(14) Auguſt. de duabus Anim.

[E] The neceſſity, which the Church of Rome is under to regard St. Auguſtin's Syſtem, has thrown it into a perplexity, which is very ridiculous.] It is ſo plain to every one, who examines things without prejudice, and with the neceſſary qualifications, that the doctrine of St. Auguſtin and that of Janſenius Biſhop of Ipres are exactly the ſame, that one cannot obſerve without indignation, that the Court of Rome has boaſted of having condemned Janſenius, and yet has notwithſtanding maintained the reputation of St. Auguſtin entire. Theſe are two things abſolutely incompatible. Beſides, the Council of Trent in condemning the doctrine of Calvin concerning Free-Will, has neceſſarily condemned that of St. Auguſtin; for there is no Calviniſt, who does or can deny the concurrence of man's will, and the liberty of the ſoul in the ſenſe which St. Auguſtin has given to the words concurrence, cooperation, and liberty. There is not a ſingle Calviniſt, who does not acknowledge Free-will, and the uſe of it in converſion, if the word is underſtood according to St. Auguſtin's definition. Thoſe, who are condemned by the Council of Trent, do not reject Free-will, any further than as it ſignifies a liberty of indifferency. The Thomiſts reject it alſo under this notion, and yet are conſidered as very good Catholics. But here is another ſcene of the comedy. The phyſical predetermination of the Thomiſts, the neceſſity of St. Auguſtin, that of the Janſeniſts, and that of Calvin, are all at the bottom exactly the ſame thing; and yet the Thomiſts diſavow the Janſeniſts, and both of them pretend to be miſrepreſented, when they are accuſed of preaching the ſame doctrine as Calvin. But if a man were allowed to judge of another's thoughts, one would be tempted to affirm, that the Doctors act the Comedians here, and know well enough, that the Council of Trent has condemned have not the same cautions to observe, deal very plainly with this holy Father of the Church [F]. A learned French Critic with all the terms of respect which he makes use of, has shewn sufficiently, that he thoroughly despises the Commentaries of St. Augustin upon the Scriptures [G]. Mr. Claude, who has condemned this Father for approving ed only a chimera, which never entered into the head of the Calvinists, or that it has condemned St. Augustin, and the physical predetermination; so that when they boast of maintaining the faith of St. Augustin, and never having varied in the doctrine (15), it is only done to keep a decorum, and to avoid the ruin of the System, which a confession of the real truth would necessarily produce. There are some persons, whom it is very happy for, that the people do not take care to oblige them to give an account of their doctrine, or are not capable of doing it; for they would murmur much oftener against these Doctors, than against the Tax-gatherers. If you do not know, they would say, that you deceive us, your stupidity deserves that you should be sent to plow; and if you do know it, your roguery deserves that you should be shut up between four walls with bread and water. But there is nothing to be feared of this kind: the people require only to be led in the usual track; and if they should require more, they would not be capable of entring into the enquiry; for their employments have cut them off from gaining the necessary qualifications.

(15) Mr. Basnage shews clearly, that the Church of Rome in the Council of Trent and elsewhere has determined against St. Augustin, and against other Councils. See his Histoire de la Religion des Eglises Reformées, tom. 2. p. 452, &c.

WHETHER the people might not sometimes make their ecclesiastical guides stand in fear of them, if they had any considerable capacity.

[F] The Arminians . . . . deal plainly with this holy Father of the Church.] It was in their power to have amused and perplex'd the world, as the Jesuits have done; but they thought it more proper to leave St. Augustin entirely to their antagonists, and to acknowledge him to be as great a Predestinarian, (which is the usual term among them) as Calvin himself. The Jesuits would have done as much without doubt, if they durst venture to condemn a Doctor, who has been approved by Popes and Councils.

[G] A learned French Critic . . . . . thoroughly despises the Commentaries of St. Augustin upon the Scriptures.] I mean Mr. Simon. See his Critical History of the Old Testament (16), where the chief commendation which he gives to his father, is, that he knew his own insufficiency. He has well observed, says he (17), the necessary qualifications for interpreting the Scriptures; and as he was modest, he confesses ingenuously, that he wanted most of these qualifications; and therefore it is not strange that we find sometimes a great want of exactness in his Commentaries upon the Scripture. . . . . He soon perceived that his attempt TO ANSWER THE MANICHEES was above his abilities. In Scripturis exponendis tyrocinium meum sub tanta sarcinæ mole succubuit *. I confess, that Mr. Simon does not quote Peter Castellanus without blaming him. But as he wrote in France, was it not necessary to make use of this precaution? I cannot, says he (18), approve of the warmth of Peter Castellanus Grand Almoner of France, who accuses St. Augustin with too much freedom, and reproaches him WITH DOING NOTHING BUT DREAMING, when he attempted to explain the holy Scripture. Those, who have written against him, knew very well how to reproach him with the inconsistency between the regard, which he would seem to shew for the writings of St. Austin, and the judgment, which he has given of him; and they have made use of this opportunity to give a very disadvantageous idea of that Father (19). One cannot, say they, form any other notion of the blessed St. Austin, than of a declaimer, who says every thing that comes into his head, whether to the purpose or not, if it does but agree with a certain system of Platonism, which was then formed of the Christian Religion; we can consider him only as an Author, who loses himself every moment in the clouds, and indulges himself in dry impertinent allegories, which he gives us as if they were Oracles; in short as a man, who had none of those qualifications, which are necessary to an interpreter of the holy Scripture. They give several strong instances of this. Mr. Simon in his Reply has not engaged himself in defending St. Augustin. We see plainly, that he had not much mind to do that; he gives something to the Decorum, which was necessary, but much more to the desire of criticizing upon his antagonist (20). We may observe in divers places of his writings, that he is of opinion, that since Augustin has not scrupled to abandon the Greek Fathers upon the point of Grace, no person is under any obligation to follow him preferably to the Greek Fathers. This evasion would be very convenient; but it is not in his power to make use of it; for as the doctrine of St. Augustin concerning Grace has received the approbation of the Church, it necessarily follows, that every doctrine contrary to this must be rejected; and thus all that St. Chrysostom can say, which is favourable to Molinism, is only a private opinion, and exploded, at least implicitly, by the authentic approbation, which has been given to St. Augustin. This is what I called above the perplexity, which has exposed the Church of Rome to some kind of ridicule. I shall quote the words of Castellanus, which are very remarkable, and his Life is not a very common book in this country. Ut divum Augustinum contra hæreticos de hominis Christiani justificatione disputando, proxime ad divi Pauli sententiam accessisse fatebatur, ita linguarum ignoratione somniâsse frequenter atque etiam deliràsse sacra explicando asseverabat; cumque bonarum artium magis non ignorans quam peritus dici posset, non satis idoneum esse judicabat, cui de artibus disserenti legendo tempus transmitteretur, qui minimè otio abundaret. Eam quoque stili Augustiniani anfractuosam sinuositatem esse, & sermonis omni elegantiâ vacui impuritatem addebat, ut ab homine liberaliter in literis educato citra fastidium legi vix posset (21). i. e. "As he confessed that St. "Augustin in his Dispute against Heretics concerning "the Justification of a Christian, approached very near "to St. Paul's doctrine; so he affirmed, that this Fa"ther thro' his ignorance of the languages was guilty "of great reveries and even extravagances in explain"ing the Scripture. And as he might be said rather "to be not ignorant than well versed in arts and scien"ces, he thought it was to little purpose, that one, who "had little time to spare, should spend it in reading "him upon those subjects. He added, that St. Au"gustin's stile was so rough, and obscure, and inele"gant, that a man of good taste and learning can "scarce read it without tediousness."

(21) Petrus Callandius in Vitâ Castellani, pag. 44, 45.

Since the first edition of this Dictionary, I have seen the explanation, which Mr. Simon has given to remove the complaints of the Jansenists. My intention, says he (22), was not to lessen in any point the authority of St. Augustin, whom I have always acknowledged to be the most able Divine of the Western Churches, and to have deserved the great character, which has been given him by so many Popes. . . . . I allow, that the Church assures us, that those, who have taught Divinity after a systematical way, have taken him as their master and guide. These are the words of the Roman Breviary; but they do not mean, that those Teachers of Divinity, who have followed St. Augustin in his manner of treating that science, were obliged never to depart from the opinions of that learned Bishop, nor that those opinions of his are articles of faith, nor in short that we must quit the other Fathers, when they do not entirely agree with him. The Church tells us in the same lessons of the Breviary, speaking of St. John Chrysostom *, that all the world admires his manner of interpreting the holy Scriptures according to the Letter, and thinks him worthy of the honour which is ascribed to him, namely, that St. Paul, whom he had a singular reverence for, dictated several things to him. I always had a great veneration for these two great men, who are still the admiration of the Eastern and Western Churches; but as I was treating only of the explication of certain passages of Scripture, in which St. Augustin and St. Chrysostom do not always agree, I thought, that I might be allowed to follow the interpretations of St. Chrysostom, when they seemed to me the most exact and literal. This difference, which has no regard to the ground of the doctrine, does not hinder them from agreeing in the essential points of our faith. I might indeed, when I spoke of St. Augustin in my History of the Commentators, have been more moderate with respect to my expressions, and it is true I quoted some words of Cardinal Sadolet, which appear too harsh; but I never had any design to attack the doctrine of this holy Doctor, who has confuted the heresies of his time with so much strength. He adds, that he toook for his (22) Simon in his Preface to his Nouvelles Observations sur le Texte & les Versions du N. T. printed at Paris in 1695, in 4to.

* Interpretandi rationem & inhærentem sententiæ sacrorum Librorum explanationem omnes admirantur, dignumque existimant, cui Paulus Apostolus, quem ille mirificè coluit, scribenti & prædicanti multa dictasse videatur. Breviarium Romanum.

(16) Book 3. cap. 9.

(17) Ibid. pag. 397, 398.

* Lib. 1. Retractat. cap. 18.

(18) Hist. Critique du Vieux Testam. p. 399.

(19) See the book intitled, Sentimens de quelques Theologiens de Hollande sur l'Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament, pag. 357, & seq. and the Defence of those Sentiments, pag. 348, & seq.

(20) See Reponse aux Sentimens de quelques Theologiens de Hollande, pag. 202, & seq and the Reponse a la Defense des Sentimens, pag. 198, & seq.

proving of penal laws in matters of conſcience and religion, would have expoſed himſelf to a very ſevere cenſure, if he had lived three or four years longer [H].

A

his guide Cardinal Gaſpar Contarin, who thought, that a medium was to be taken between thoſe, who under pretence of being enemies to the Lutherans, approach too near to the hereſy of Pelagius, and thoſe, who having ſome tincture of St. Auguſtin's writings; but being far from his modeſty and charity, preach to the people a ſett of very perplexed doctrines which they do not underſtand themſelves, nor are capable of explaining to others without running into extreme paradoxes. "I "thought, continues he, that I could not do better, "than to imitate this great Cardinal, when I was to "anſwer ſome Divines of Holland, who had objected "to me, that the tradition of the Church was not "conſtant and certain, alledging as an inſtance the "doctrines of Grace and Predeſtination, in which the "Church had followed and authorized the doctrine "of St. Auguſtin, tho' he had departed, as they ſaid, "both from the Greek and Latin Fathers, who went "before him. I ſhewed them, that the difference, "which was to be found between them, was only in "points, which were never determined as articles of "faith, and in ſome paſſages of Scripture, which "might receive different explications; and therefore "the Church ought not to be accuſed of not being "conſtant and uniform in her tradition." If we examine this ever ſo little, we ſhall find, that it is nothing but a mere diſguiſe or paint, which can deceive none but the ignorant; for I would aſk, whence ariſe the moſt capital controverſies? Do not they ſpring from different explications of ſome paſſages of Scripture? Why then do you make uſe of the notion of this difference, to give us to underſtand, that St. Chryſoſtom and St. Auguſtin differ in nothing eſſential? It is only an accident, and merely an acceſſory to the doctrine of Grace, to know in what the powers of a ſinner conſiſt, and what the eſſence of liberty is? Is it not rather a fundamental part of this doctrine? If theſe two Fathers therefore are directly oppoſite in explaining the nature of Free-Will, it is certain, that their difference regards the ground of the doctrine itſelf, and that the Church cannot adopt the hypotheſis of the one without rejecting that of the other. Or elſe we muſt ſay, that ſhe approves a truth, without condemning the contrary error; for in ſhort, tho' it were poſſible that both of them may be deceived, yet it is not poſſible that the opinions of both ſhould be true. It follows therefore, either that thoſe, who follow the explications of St. Chryſoſtom, are miſtaken, or that thoſe, who follow St. Auguſtin's, teach an error. Here is once more the great perplexity of the Romiſh Communion. She is obliged to approve of thoſe, who aſcribe every thing, and thoſe, who take away every thing from Grace, with reſpect to the aſſent of man. One part of the Doctors ſay, that man forms this aſſent with a full liberty of refuſing it; another part teach, that grace produces this aſſent, without leaving man the leaſt power to refuſe it. One or other of them muſt be guilty of an error, which does not turn upon a trifle, but upon a point of the greateſt importance. And yet in the mean while the Church of Rome with all her pretended infallibility, has condemned nothing in this affair. If ſhe condemns Janſeniſm, ſhe is obliged to declare at the ſame time, that ſhe does not condemn St. Auguſtin (23); this is pulling down with one hand, what ſhe builds with the other. Obſerve by the way the words of Mr. Simon; The difference . . . . was only in points, which were never determined as articles of faith. That is, if a man publiſhes an error only in points, which have not been determined as articles of faith, he may notwithſtanding be an orthodox good Chriſtian: obſerve here, I ſay, this privilege of an erroneous conſcience. We may remark likewiſe, that tho' it was allowed not to be of St. Auguſtin's ſentiments, when the doctrines of Grace were not yet determined, as they were in that Father's time, it does not follow, that ſince theſe deciſions the Writers of the 17th Century ſhould have the liberty of returning to St. Chryſoſtom's opinion; for we have the following ſolid remark of a Divine, who cannot be ſuſpected by Mr. Simon. "In the Diſputes concerning Grace, Elec- "tion, and Predeſtination, leſs regard is paid to the "ancient Fathers, who lived before the Pelagian He- "reſy, than to thoſe, who lived after; and much "greater deference is ſhewn to the Latins, than to the "Greeks, tho' they were later than this Hereſy. . . . "Now amongſt the Latins, whoſe authority we have "ſhewn ought to be ſuperior to that of the other "Fathers, it is agreed by Divines, that St. Auguſtin is a "Father, who is moſt to be depended upon; for not only "all the Fathers and Doctors, who came after him, but "even the Popes themſelves, and the Councils of other "Biſhops, have maintained his doctrine concerning "Grace as certain and catholic, and they have ALL "OF THEM BEEN OF OPINION, that it was a ſuf- "ficient proof of the truth of any opinion, that this "Saint had taught it (24)."

(24) Petav. Dogmat. Theolog. tom. 1. lib. 9. cap. 6. quoted by Monſ. Arnaud Difficult. propoſ. a Monſieur Steyaert, Part ix. pag. 200.

[H] Mr. Claude . . . . . would have expoſed himſelf . . . . to a ſevere cenſure, if he had lived three or four years longer.] I have two things to ſhew; the firſt, that Mr. Claude objected againſt St. Auguſtin for approving penal laws againſt heretics; and the ſecond, that if he had lived three or four years longer, he would have been cenſured for cenſuring St. Auguſtin.

I. To prove the former of theſe two points, I ſhall only quote the expreſſions of Mr. Claude in a letter, which has been publiſhed. He owns that St. Auguſtin had an admirable genius, a copious and happy imagination, and ſhews every where an exemplary piety, juſtice, and charity. But he adds, that there is one thing, which has done a great injury to his memory, which is, that after he had been in the ſentiments of gentleneſs and charity, with regard to the conduct, which ought to be ſhewn towards heretics, the diſputes, which he had with the Donatiſts, enflamed him ſo much, that he changed his opinion entirely, and maintained expreſly that heretics ought to be perſecuted (25).

(25) See the Letter written from Switzerland, printed at Dort in 1690, pag. 20.

II. The Acts of the Synod of the Walloon Churches of the United Provinces, held at Amſterdam in Auguſt 1660, prove inconteſtably the ſecond point, which I have aſſerted; for this is one of the propoſitions, condemned by that Aſſembly, that the Magiſtrate has no right to make uſe of this authority to deſtroy Idolatry, and reſtrain the progreſs of Hereſy. This propoſition, I ſay, is one of thoſe, which the Synod ſolemnly and unanimouſly declares to be falſe, ſcandalous, pernicious, equally deſtructive to Morality and the Doctrines of Religion. The Synod proſcribes and forbids, and condemns them as ſuch, prohibiting under the ſevereſt cenſures all eccleſiaſtical and ſecular perſons to declare them either in the pulpit, or in private converſations . . . and ordering very expreſly all the Conſiſtories of their Juriſdiction to redouble their care and paſtoral vigilance in proportion to the danger that threatens their flocks, to reſtrain without diſtinction or favour all, whom they ſhall find guilty, by ſuſpending private perſons from the Lord's Supper; and with reſpect to Miniſters, to ſuſpend them from their function till the next Synod, by calling in two Paſtors of the neighbouring Churches to that ſentence (26). But it will be ſaid, that if Mr. Claude had been living when this Synod was held (27), the propoſition which I have mentioned, would not perhaps have been condemned; I cannot tell that; but however that be, it is certain, that this opinion was cenſured by them; for it is plain, that St. Auguſtin has aſſerted nothing elſe, but that the Magiſtrate ought to reſtrain Heretics, by ſubjecting them to certain penalties. Now the Synod of Amſterdam has maintained this ſo ſtrongly, that they have ranked the contrary propoſition amongſt the pernicious errors, for which they order that Lay-men ſhould be excommunicated, and the Miniſters ſuſpended. It follows therefore, that they have determined the ſame doctrine, which Mr. Claude condemned in St. Auguſtin; ſo that the opinion of Mr. Claude has been anathematized by this Synod.

(26) See what has been publiſhed of the Acts of this Synod in the Tableau du Socinianiſme, pag. 563.

(27) He died in January 1687.

If Mr. Claude was ſurprized, that St. Auguſtin ſhould change his opinion entirely, and eſpouſe a quite contrary one, other people are much more ſurprized, that the Refugee French Miniſters (28) ſhould fall into the ſame conduct. For whereas St. Auguſtin changed his opinion, becauſe the laws of the Emperors had put a ſtop to the ſchiſm, the Refugee Miniſters have altered their opinion, while the ruin of their Churches by the authority of the King was yet freſh, and the wound ſtill bleeding. If they had been aſked, while the Edicts of perſecution were ſtill executing upon their party, what they thought of the conduct of a Sovereign, who expoſed to a variety of puniſhments thoſe ſubjects subjects of his, who desired only the liberty of worshipping God according to the dictates of their conscience, they would have answered, that it was unjust; and yet as soon as they have got into another country, they have declared an anathema against those, who condemned the use of penal laws against those, who err. This may serve as an instance of the uncertainty of things in this world: there is great scope for moral reflections upon this subject.

(28) They were much ſuperior in number to the Walloon Miniſters in the Synod, and they acted in concert with the Refugee Miniſters in England. See the Acts of this Synod relating to the Fact in the 8th Letter of the Tableau du Socinianiſme p. 559, & ſeq. The Author of this Tableau affirms, p. 558. that the Reſolutions and Definitions of this Synod were carried unanimouſly.

(23) See the Anſwer written by a Janſeniſt againſt Mr. Leydecker. It is mentioned in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans in 1697. pag. 251.

A Physician of Paris has published a very singular observation; he pretends, that this great Saint was able to drink a great deal, and that he did so sometimes, but without being drunk. We shall give an account of his reasons, and those of the Journalist, who confutes them [I]. I shall not say much of the editions of St. Augustin's works.

The person, who was the promoter of these determinations in the Synod, had before absolutely changed his opinion, but it was in some measure by a special privilege, and a prophetical dispensation, from which others could draw no manner of consequence to themselves. His Politics of the Clergy, his Preservative, &c. had expressly condemned the use of penal laws in matters of Religion. He had treated fully of this point in his Answer to the History of Calvinism, at least he shewed himself willing to give us a solid confutation of the writers in defence of penal laws. It is true, he pulled down with one hand what he attempted to build up with the other, and fell into a miserable contradiction, which exposed him to terrible reproaches in several pieces, which were published against him; but in short he could not till now be proved to have clearly and expressly asserted either the affirmative or the negative. It was only in consequence of the revelations, which he imagined he had from heaven concerning the approaching destruction of Popery; it was only, I say, in consequence of this, that he has fallen upon those, who do not allow the lawfulness of extirpating Sectaries by the authority of the secular arm. He imagined, that such persons made a personal attack upon him, and had conspired against his Explication of the Apocalypse (29). The Clergy of France made use of St. Augustin's arguments, to justify the conduct of that Court towards the Reformed. They published separately in elegant French all that St. Augustin had wrote upon that point. A Protestant has given a confutation of it in the third part of the Philosophical Commentary upon the words Compel them to come in. See (30) the Reflections, which have been made upon the prejudice, which the authority of this Saint has done to the right cause. It is surprizing, that Monsr. Poiret should attempt to excuse him. See the History of the Works of the Learned for May 1692 p. 358, and for August the same year, p. 552.

(29) See the Apologie pour les vrais Tolerans, by Mr. Huet, Minister of Dort, p. 133, 134.

(30) In the Defense des Sentimens de quelques Theologiens de Hollande sur l'Histoire Critique, pag. 365, & seq.

[I] A Physician . . . . . pretends that this Saint was able to drink a great deal, ... but without being drunk. We shall give an account of his reasons, and those of a Journalist, who confutes him.] The Physician, whom I speak of, is Mr. Petit. The chapter in which he treats of this point is entitled, Videri B. Augustinum non invalidum potorem fuisse (31); that is, that St. Augustin seems to have been an hard drinker. He grounds at first his pretences upon these words of St. Augustin: Ebrietas longe est à me; miserereris, ne appropinquet mihi. Crapula autem nonnunquam surrepit servo tuo; miserereris, ut longe fiat à me (32). That is, "Drunkenness is far from me; have mercy on me, "O Lord, that it may not come near me. The Crapula "sometimes surprizes thy servant; have mercy on "him, that it may be far from me." Here seems to be some kind of contradiction; for the crapula being the effect of drunkenness, how is it possible for a man without contradicting himself to confess, that he never drinks to be drunk, and yet that he sometimes is overcome by the crapula? Mr. Petit proves from the authority of Aristotle, that the crapula is the last period of drunkenness, that it is the head-ach, which remains, when sleep has dispersed the fumes of the wine, and when a person, who has been drunk, recovers his senses, and continues no longer under that stupidity of mind, occasioned by the liquor. He confirms this by a passage of Pliny and by the verses of the Poet Alexis; and the way, in which he solves the seeming contradiction, is as follows. He supposes, that this Saint had a very strong head, able to bear a great deal of wine, without losing his senses, but not without suffering some inconvenience from it the next day. Quod eâ esset cerebri ac mentis firmitate, ut posset in eadem vini quantitate, quæ multos ad insaniam redigeret, rationis usum conservare (33). Upon this foot a man may say, that he never was drunk, tho' upon some occasions he has found himself troubled with the crapula from having drunk too freely; and he ought to acknowledge this a fault, and desire the forgiveness of his heavenly Father. Sic nobis dubitatio illa vanescit, vindicaturque Augustinus à turpitudine eorum, qui rationem suam vino obruere non dubitant; non tamen à culpa omnino, ipso judice, qui tantum vini hauriret, inde ut crapulam aliquando incurreret, nec posset sibi inter pocula temperare, quin nimio potu interdum valetudini suæ incommodaret. Quâ de re ibi misericordiam implorat (34). Mr. Petit excuses St. Augustin on account of the climate where he lived, and the custom of the Africans, and proposes to himself this objection. It is probable, that this great man put in practice what he advised others to: now he commends those, who content themselves with living upon herbs and bacon, and drinking two or three glasses of pure wine. Duæ vel tres vini meracæ potiones propter diligentiam valetudinis sumptæ cum olusculis & lardis laudantur (35). It is answered, that very likely St. Augustin did not oblige himself so strictly to this rule, as not to break thro' it sometimes amongst his friends, and those, whom he invited to his episcopal table. Velim & mihi illud concedi, non minus probabile, non ita hunc regulæ illi addictum vixisse, ut non eum vini modum nonnunquam inter amicos & mensæ episcopalis hospites bibendo excederet (36). For otherwise we must conclude, that he lived only upon herbs and bacon; which can never be imagined without even a monkish stupidity: Quod putare cucullatæ esset dementiæ (37).

(33) Petrus Petitus, Homeri Nepenth. pag. 138.

(34) Idem, ibid. pag. 139.

(35) Augustin. in Libro de Moribus Manichæorum, apud Petitum, ib. p. 140.

(36) Petitus, ibid.

(37) Idem, ibid.

Let us see what Mr. Cousin has replied to this strange paradox of Mr. Petit, as he calls this opinion (38). He insists upon reading the whole chapter of the Confessions, from which this passage was taken (39). We shall find, that St. Augustin represents there the disposition, which he was in with regard to drinking and eating, and declares that he had learned of God, to seek food only as he would seek a remedy, and to use one in the same manner as the other. He says that following this principle he is always upon his guard against pleasure, when he satisfies the wants of nature; that he is in a continual struggle with himself by fastings and abstinence; that he frequently brings his body into subjection, and regards without ceasing the voice of God, who cries, NE GRAVENTUR CORDA VESTRA IN CRAPULA ET EBRIETATE (40). Mr. Cousin asks, Whether a Bishop, who lived in this manner, could be suspected of drinking sometimes to excess? He asserts that the case will admit of no distinction, that St. Augustin never drank more than necessity required; and therefore, when he says, Crapula autem nonnunquam obrepit servo tuo, he takes the word crapula in another sense (41). Besides that of Aristotle, where it signifies the heat and pain occasioned by drinking to excess, it may have two other senses, in one of which it is taken for excess in eating, and in the other for the pleasure itself of eating and drinking. It was not in the former sense that St. Augustin took it, for he was as far from eating to excess, as from drinking to excess. He could therefore take it only in the second sense; and tho' he owns that he endeavoured continually to resist the temptation of pleasure, which laid in wait for him at the entrance of the necessary food for satisfying his hunger and thirst, and maintaining his health, yet he found himself sometimes surprized. This surprize happens to the most perfect of mankind, to those, who refuse every gratification to their bodies, and nourish them only with fastings and abstinence. Mr. Cousin confirms this by instancing in several things, which Possidius has related concerning St. Augustin's Sobriety. I think he would have done well to have given good proofs of the two senses of the word crapula, which he has added to that, which has been so well proved by Mr. Petit.

(38) Journal des Savans, for the 27th of June 1689, pag. 426. Holland edition.

(39) Ibid. pag. 427.

(40) Ibid.

(41) Ibid. pag. 428.

(31) It is the 15th of his book intitled, Homeri Nepenthes, sive de Helenæ Medicamento, printed at Utrecht in 1689, in 8vo.

(32) Augustin. lib. 10. Confess. cap. 31.

I leave

works [K]. Several of his Treatiſes have been tranſlated into French.

I leave the reader to give his judgment upon this diſpute, aad content my ſelf with having repreſented the reaſons of both parties. I ſhall only add, that I have conſulted ſeveral Dictionaries without finding the leaſt trace of the ſignification, which Mr. Couſin applies to the word Crapula in this place. I have found, that ſome Phyſicians maintain, that Drunkenneſs and Crapula mean the ſame things, and that thoſe who attempt to diſcover any difference, amuſe themſelves with mere diſputes about words. Qui differentiam inter CRAPULAM & EBRIETATEM fingunt λογομαχοῦσι. Foës. pag. 353. Dict. num. 475 (42). It is certain, that in Cicero the expreſſions crapulam edormire, crapulam exhalare, mean the ſame thing, as the French cuver ſon vin, that is, to ſleep one's ſelf ſober (43). Plautus uſes in the ſame ſenſe crapulam amovere (44), crapulam edormire (45), crapulam edormiſcere (46). We know very well too that at preſent the French word Crapule is more odious than that of Ivreſſe or Drunkenneſs; for it ſignifies the moſt exceſſive degree of drunkenneſs. It is, as Furetiere remarks, a ſhameful and continual debauch of wine or other liquors, which intoxicate. Crapuler, adds he, ſignifies to drink without intermiſſion, to be drunk ſcandalouſly and continually. The Dictionary of the French Academy confirms theſe definitions. But there is no conſequence to be drawn from one age to another with regard to the ſignification of words. Cuſtom makes it vary prodigiouſly. The difference between Drunkenneſs and Crapula was certain in Ariſtotle's and St. Auguſtin's time. This appears more evident from the paſſage of the Father, than from that of the Philoſopher. The queſtion is in what the difference conſiſted in St. Auguſtin's time. If Mr. Petit had replied to Mr. Couſin (47), he would without doubt have ſhewn a great ſcope of learning; and I ſuppoſe he would not have forgot this obſervation, that Authors, who treat dogmatically upon a ſubject like Ariſtotle, deſcend even to a minute diſtinction of Genius's and Species, and obſerve the propriety of the terms deſigned to ſignify the differences of the Species, or the different degrees of the ſame quality; but Poets and Orators ſoon quit this exactneſs, and introduce a freer uſe, or rather accommodate themſelves to the publick uſage, in which the terms, which the Doctors have diſtinguiſhed with ſo much accuracy, are taken one for the other upon a thouſand occaſions.

(42) Jacob. Pancratius Bruno in Lexico Medico, pag. 385.

(43) See Ciceron. Philippic. cap. 12. & contra Verr. 8. lib. 3. cap. 11.

(44) Plaut. in Pſeudolo, Act. 5. Scen. 1. verſ. 35.

(45) Idem in Moſtell. Act. 5. Scen. 2. verſ. 1.

(46) Idem in Rudente, Act. 2. Scen. 7. verſ. 28.

(47) He could not do this, for he died before his Nepenthes was publiſhed.

[K] I ſhall not ſay much of the editions of St. Auguſtin's works.] Mr. Du Pin has given us a catalogue of them (48), which is not ſo full nor exact as that, which the Journaliſts of Leipſic have publiſhed (49). As it is very eaſy to conſult theſe Authors, it would be ſuperfluous to copy them here. I ſhall only ſay, that the beſt edition of this Father's works is that, which was publiſhed at Paris by the care of the Benedictines of St. Maur. It is divided into ten volumes in folio, as ſome others are; but we have a new order or œconomy of the ſeveral pieces in each volume. The firſt and ſecond were printed in 1679; the third in 1680; the fourth in 1681; the fifth in 1683; the ſixth and ſeventh in 1685; the eighth and ninth in 1688; and the tenth in 1690. This laſt volume contains the works which St. Auguſtin wrote againſt the Pelagians.

(48) See his Nouvelle Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſiaſtiques, tom. 3. pag. 257. Holland edition.

(49) For January 1613, p. 2.

There was publiſhed a Letter from the Abbot D to the Reverend Fathers the Benedictine Monks of the Congregation of St. Maur concerning the laſt volume of their edition of St. Auguſtin (50). The Author of this Letter pretends, that their deſign was to favour Janſeniſm, and that the proofs which he alledges are convincing. I have been informed, that this Letter has ſo much the more perplexed the Benedictines, as ſome of the Biſhops have queſtioned them upon their conduct, and threatened them to prohibit the reading of their edition of St. Auguſtin in their Dioceſes. The learned Fathers have given us an explanation upon this point, and ſatisfied the publick with regard to that imputation. See The Letter of a Divine to one of his friends concerning a Libel intitled, A Letter from the Abbot  &c. It was printed off the 22d of February 1699, and contains eighty eight pages in 12mo; but it did not put an end to the diſpute. There was publiſhed a Memorial of a Doctor of Divinity, addreſs'd to the Prelates of France concerning an Anſwer of a Divine of the Benedictine Order to a Letter from a German Divine (51), in which memorial it is aſſerted, that all the imputations which have been caſt upon the Benedictines are well grounded, and that theſe Fathers have anſwered but very weakly. It is remarked there (52), that they had ſent from Roan to Paris a ſecond anſwer to the German Abbot, and that Father de Sainte Marthe was very well pleaſed, it is ſaid, that it ſhould be aſcribed to him. The Benedictines have replied to this, and yet have not ſilenced their adverſaries. There have been other pieces publiſhed on both ſides, but I cannot give a particular account of them, having ſeen but a ſmall part of them. I have ſeen the book intitled, The Conduct of the Benedictine Fathers ſince their edition of St. Auguſtin has been attacked. It contains ſeventy nine pages in 12mo, and was printed in 1699. We are informed there among other things, 1. that before they had publiſhed any thing in their defence, an unknown perſon .... had addreſs'd a piece to them, which he took care to diſperſe all over Paris, before he had ſent them a ſingle copy (53). 2. That he intitled his piece, A Letter from a Commendatory Abbot to the Reverend Benedictine Fathers of the Congregation of St. Maur. 3. That as the piece which was written by the German Abbot againſt theſe Fathers, was called, The German Benedictine, this was called, The Little Benedictine; and every body ſaid that the younger was as good as the elder: 4. That the Author diſguiſed himſelf from the beginning to the end, and ſpeaks only the language of the Janſeniſts, that he might be better underſtood by the Benedictines (54): 5. That the Little Benedictine provoked and exaſperated the party, ſo that from that moment they reſolved to maintain their new Auguſtin, and the Abbot du Guet went to the Abbey to offer his pen to the Congregation of St. Maur (55): 6. That the Little Benedictine was no ſooner read by every body, but another ſmaller and more agreeable one appeared on a ſudden (56); it was intitled. A Letter from a Benedictine not reformed to the Reverend Benedictine Fathers of the Congregation of St. Maur, and came from the ſame hand as the Little Benedictine: 7. That the Benedictines were ſtill deliberating, when a fourth Benedictine was publiſhed, which was written with ſo ſerious an air, that one would imagine it really came from ſome Cloyſter; it was intitled, A Letter from a Reformed Benedictine Monk of St. Dennis, in anſwer to the German Abbot, the Commendatory Abbot, and the Benedictine not Reformed (57): 8. That the firſt anſwer of the Benedictines came from St. Dennis, which every body aſcribed to Dom Lamy; it is intitled, A Letter from a Divine to one of his Friends, on a Libel intitled, a Letter from the Abbot  to the Reverend Benedictine Fathers, &c. (58): 9. That another anſwer appeared, which was not expected; it was that which Dom St. Marthe boaſted he had written in leſs than two days, and is intitled, Reflections upon the Letter of the German Abbot, &c. (59): 10. That every body agrees, that the beſt piece, which appeared yet in relation to the edition, is that intitled, A Memorial of a Doctor of Divinity addreſſed to the Prelates of France upon the anſwer of a Benedictine Divine to the Letter of a German Abbot (60): 11. That a Gentleman of greater learning than politeneſs handed about a Manuſcript againſt Dom de Sainte Marthe, which he intitled, Sainte Marthe a bad Divine, but a good Janſeniſt (61); that the Manuſcript of this learned man was followed by a Manuſcript written by ſome melancholy perſon of a very weak judgment, intitled, Antimony to ſerve as a preſervative againſt the Calumnies of Father de Sainte Marthe (62); and that the Manuſcript of this melancholy perſon was followed by another, which was aſcribed to a Jeſuit, and intitled, Vindiciæ Petavii, i. e. a Vindication of Petavius (63): 12. That in the book intitled, A Solution of divers Problems, and aſcribed to Mr. de Guet, the Janſeniſts reſolutely undertake the defence of the Benedictines (64); 13. That there appeared a third anſwer of the Benedictines (65), intitled, Vindiciæ Editionis S. Auguſtini a P. P. B. B. adornatæ, i. e. a Vindication of the edition of St. Auguſtin publiſhed by the Benedictine Fathers; that it preceded moſt of the writings which I have mentioned, and is ſcarce any thing but a tranſlation of the anſwer of Father Lamy, (50) This piece was printed in 1699, and contains 72 pages in 12mo.

(51) Printed in 1699; it contains 128 pages in 12mo.

(52) Pag. 121.

(53) Conduite des Benedictins, pag. 24.

(54) Pag. 25.

(55) Pag. 28.

(56) Pag. 29.

(57) Pag. 31.

(58) Pag. 35.

(59) Pag. 40.

(60) Pag. 44.

(61) Pag. 47.

(62) Pag. 50.

(63) Pag. 51.

(64) Pag. 67.

(65) It is without doubt that which is mentioned in pag. 64, in quoting theſe words extracted from a Manuſcript of Mr. Simon to Father Martianas. A Benedictine Monk named Dom Bernard de Montfaucon, .. has written a ſmart anſwer to the German Abbot, printed with the permiſſion of the Maſter of the Sacred Palace.

(b) It is surprising that Gabriel Sionita and his Collegue should place this city on the Euphrates; miſtaking it, as it ſeems, for Baſra. See their Treatiſe de Nonnullis Orientalium urbibus, &c. annexed to the Geogr. Nubienſ. cap. 3.

AVICENNA (ABU ALI AL HOSAIN EBN ABDALLAH EBN SINA)

a moſt celebrated Philoſopher and Phyſician among the Mohammedans, was born in the year of the Hejira 370 (a), at Affhana, a ſmall town near Bokhâra (b), in the Province of Mawara'lnahr [A]. His mother, whoſe name was Sitâra, was of Affhana; but his father

(a) A. C. 980.

(66) Conduite des Benedictins, pag. 68.

Lamy, and publiſhed under a borrowed name, &c. (66).

I have likewiſe ſeen a piece, which is aſcribed to Dom Lamy; it is A complaint of the Apologiſt of the Benedictines to the Prelates of France on the defamatory libels, which are diſperſed againſt thoſe Monks, and againſt their edition of St. Auguſtin, with a ſummons to the authors of thoſe libels to appear before the Archbiſhop of Paris; and an account of the proceedings, which have been carried on againſt the Benedictines with relation to their edition of St. Auguſtin. The whole contains eighty eight pages in 8vo. The Author having deſired the Prelates to puniſh his adverſaries, obſerves, that the difficulty . . . is to know who are thoſe unquiet and ſeditious perſons, who have attack'd the Benedictines (67). It is not ſo great, continues he, as may be imagined. It is true, they take care not to name themſelves in their libels; but the reverend Fathers the Jeſuits are ſo anxious of aſcribing the honour of them to themſelves, and diſcover themſelves in ſo many paſſages of thoſe ſeditious writings, that they cannot but be detected by every one, who does not wilfully ſhut his eyes. He propoſes then his own conjectures, and after ſome general conſiderations, he advances ſomething more preciſe and definitive (68).

(67) Plainte de l'Apologie des Benedictines, pag. 10.

(63) Pag. 12.

" And now, ſays he, with reſpect to the letter of the " German Abbot, tho' theſe Fathers had not diſco- " vered themſelves by their air, their voice, their ac- " cent, their principles and doctrine, yet it is a fact, " which appears now uncontested, and allowed by " every body, that Father Langlois, a Jeſuit of the " College of Lewis the Great, is the author of it. And " certainly the good Father could not pretend to con- " ceal it; ſince that piece was ſold even in the Col- " lege itſelf in a very public manner. As for the " other libels, particularly the letter of A Commenda- " tory Abbot, and that of The Monk not reformed, be- " ſides that it is notorious now, that they made pre- " ſents of them every where, and raiſed trophies up- " on their pretended victories, how often have they " taken pleaſure in characterizing and naming them- " ſelves, in order to be conſidered as our adverſaries. " It is proper, my Lords, to ſhew you in what dreſs " and with what colours they ſhew themſelves; I ſhall " only make uſe of their own expreſſions. Conſider, " ſay they in theſe letters, what the Jeſuits do, a ſett " of men, whom you may ſuſpect to be your Antago- " niſts. Take them for a model to you in this affair. " They anſwer every thing." And then having particularized in ſeveral other characters, he proceeds thus, " I do not think, that from all theſe ſtrokes there " is any doubt but that the Jeſuits are the men. But it " will be ſaid, that they are only a few particulars " of them. I agree to it; we know they muſt be " but ſome particular perſons; for we have never " ſeen the whole Society join their aſſiſtance in com- " poſing a ſingle book. But have not we reaſon to " aſcribe writings to the whole body, when they " are mentioned amongſt them in general with ap- " probation and pleaſure? When, I ſay, they claim " the honour of them, make preſents of them, raiſe " trophies every where, as we know the Jeſuits have " ſo often done on account of theſe fine letters? In a " word, my Lords, however ſcandalous the writings " of particular men belonging to a body are, there " is reaſon to aſcribe them to the whole body, when " their ſuperiors take no care to ſtop the progreſs of " them; when, if it be not in their power, yet they " do not teſtify by a public Act, that they diſapprove " them; or when they do not themſelves make as " public reparation to the parties offended, as the " injuries and calumnies caſt upon them have been. It is " by this rule, that the ſcandalous piece called the " Comedy of the Monks has always been conſidered the " work of the body of the Jeſuits, in which piece al- " moſt all the Religious Orders are treated with an " indignity and ridicule, which would ſcarce be ex- " cuſed in the moſt inveterate heretics. This, I ſay, " has been juſtly aſcribed to the whole body, tho' it " was written and acted only by their young pupils; " becauſe it never appeared, that their Superiors made " any ſatisfaction for the injury (69)." He ſhews then, that it belongs to the Archbiſhop of Paris to decide this diſpute (70); and he ſummons the adverſe party to appear in perſon at that Tribunal, and to prove their ſeveral accuſations, under penalty, they if they failed either in one or the other, of being condemned as ſlanderers, and their libels cenſured as defamatory. But that we may not give them occaſion of abuſing this citation as too uncertain and undetermined in point of time, and for fear of preſſing them too ſuddenly, we allow them two months time, reckoning from the day, when our Citation ſhall be publiſhed at Paris (71). At laſt he ſhews the ſtate of the affair, and then in drawing up the Proceſſes he confutes ſeveral things publiſhed againſt the Benedictines.

(69) Pag. 21.

(70) Pag. 23.

(71) Pag. 24.

I dare ſay, that the Archbiſhop of Paris, and even a National Council itſelf, would find themſelves perplexed in the determination of ſuch a cauſe; for, beſides that the queſtions of Janſeniſm are all of them full of equivocations, two Societies of great power and learning, who have each their friends and enemies, are capable of opening a very extenſive ſcene of buſineſs, and ſtarting new incidents to infinity. The beſt expedient, when ſuch diſputes ariſe, is to have recourſe to the ſecular Arm, like a God from a machine, in order to cut the knot. This was made uſe of in the caſe before us. The King ordered the Chancellor to write a letter to the Archbiſhop of Paris, that this diſpute might be ſtop'd, and both parties ceaſe from publiſhing any thing more upon it (72). But however that be, it appears the Benedictines took the moſt reaſonable method, as well to ſhew that they were ſure of the fact, as to put a ſtop to libels againſt them. They demanded a regular procedure, in which their accuſers ſhould be obliged to name themſelves, and prove in form the facts in queſtion. Without this, there was no expectation of any good iſſue of it; for even in cauſes, which have the leaſt grounds, thoſe, who have the liberty of pleading only at the Tribunal of the Public, by anonymous pamphlets, have it always in their power to be inſolent, and clamorous, and abuſive, if they have but Writers and Printers on their ſide. A mere private perſon, whether he is in the right or not, is reduced to ſilence, when his factums do not meet with a ſale; he cannot continue them without bearing the expence of printing them, which he cannot afford. This inconvenience never happens to rich and powerful Societies, ſuch as that of the Jeſuits.

(72) You will find it in the Lettres Hiſtoriques of January 1700, pag. 99.

They are about reprinting this edition at Amſterdam, in a ſmaller character, ſo that it will be ſold much cheaper than that of Paris (73). They deſign to add to it the critical Notes of a learned man, who conceals himſelf under the name of Joannes Phereponus (74); but I am informed ſince, that this deſign is changed, and that theſe critical Notes will be printed ſeparately, with the Commentary of Ludovicus Vives upon St. Auguſtin's book de Civitate Dei &c. They were apprehenſive of diſpleaſing the Roman Catholics; and for that reaſon they will give them an entire liberty of buying ſuſpected Notes, or not, as they think proper. Theſe Notes will be printed in a diſtinct volume, and the whole works of St. Auguſtin publiſhed exactly after the Paris Edition, will be ſold to thoſe, who do not care to purchaſe the reſt.

(73) See Mont. Bern. Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, for March 1699, pag. 358.

(74) Ibid.

[A] Avicen was born in 370, at Affhana near Bokhâra.] This is his own account. Ebn Khalecan (1) ſays he was born at Harmatein. The Writers who make him a native of Bokhâra (2), are, tho' not exact, yet far more excuſable than thoſe who tell us he was of Balkh (3), or Hamadan (4): but they are moſt groſly miſtaken who make him an Egyptian, or a Spaniard born at Corduba (5), and contemporary with Averroes (6). " It is amazing, ſays Dr. Freind, " where Neander could pick up the materials to fur- " niſh out ſuch a romance as he has made of this " Writer's Life. He tells us very formally that he " was born at Edeſſa, the capital of Comagena, in " 1145; that he went from thence to Alexandria, " where

(1) In vita Ebn Sina.

(2) Pocock. in Elencho Scriptor. præfixo Vitæ Hai Ebn Yokdhan. D'Herbel. Bibl. Orient. Art. SINA. Dr. Freind's Hiſt. of Phyſic, Part 2. p. 69. Ed. Lond. 1727. And. Alpagus, in Vita Avicennæ.

(3) Voſſius, de Philoſ. lib. 14.

(4) J. Leo Africanus, de Viris quibuſdam illuſtr. apud Arabes, cap. 9.

(5) Lud. Nonnius, apud Gab. Sionit. & Joh. Heſronit. de nonnullis orient. urbibus, cap. 3. See Freind, ubi ſupra, p. 71.

(6) V. Pocock. loco ſupra citato; (where inſtead of Avicennæ cœvum, read Averrois, &c.)

father was a native of Balkh in Khoraſân, whence he removed to Bokhara in the reign of Nûh Ebn Manſûr, and was employed by him to collect the public revenues at Harmatein, a principal town in that territory. Avicenna's parents retiring to Bokhara, put him to ſchool there; and by that time he was ten years old he had perfectly learnt the Korân, and made a wonderful progreſs in polite Literature. He was next ſent to a man who dealt in herbs, and was ſkilled in the Indian method of accounts, to learn Arithmetic: after which Abu Abdallah al Nâyeli coming to Bokhara, and profeſſing Philoſophy, Avicen's father took him into his houſe to teach his ſon. This tutor read to him the rudiments of Logic, but was ignorant of the nicer parts of that Science; he alſo explained to him the firſt five or ſix propoſitions of Euclid. Avicenna then began to read books by himſelf, conſulting the Commentaries, and went through the reſt of Euclid without farther aſſiſtance. When he entred on the Almageſt, al Nâyeli left him. He afterwards applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Phyſic [B], and viſited patients to gain experience. By this time he was ſixteen. The following year and half he employed in reading books with incredible application, and on any difficulty his immediate recourſe was to heaven [C]. Having attained a perfect knowledge of Logic, Natural Philoſophy, and Mathematics, he proceeded to the ſtudy of Divinity, and preparatory thereto read the Metaphyſics of Ariſtotle, which he took infinite pains to underſtand (c) [D]. About this time Nûh Ebn Manſûr [E] al Samâni, King of Khoraſân and Mawâra'lnahr, falling ſick, Avicen, though ſo very young a man, was recommended to him as a Phyſician; whereupon that Prince ſent for him, and being recovered by his preſcriptions, kept him near his perſon for ſome time, and allowed him free acceſs to his Library, which was a very noble one, in reſpect both to the number and value of the books, many of them being no where elſe to be found. Our Philoſopher, we may imagine, made the beſt uſe of this opportunity; but the Library happening by ſome accident to be burnt ſoon after, Avicen's enemies laid the blame on him, and accuſed him of having ſet it on fire, that no body elſe might enjoy the ſame advantage, and what he had learned thence might be taken for his own (d). When Avicenna was eighteen he had entirely finiſhed his ſtudies; after which time, as he himſelf declared, his knowledge received no addition, though his judgment became more mature as he advanced in years. Having loſt his father in the 22d year of his age, he was by the Soltan appointed Intendant of the revenues of certain territories; but that Prince's affairs taking an ill turn, Avicen was obliged to leave Bokhâra, and go to Jorjân, deſigning to retire to the Court of Kabûs, the Sovereign of that country; but Kabûs in the mean time being depoſed by his ſubjects, and dying in priſon (e), he went thence to Daheſtân where he had a ſevere fit of illneſs (f). This circumſtance makes me doubt the truth of a ſtory which is related as an inſtance of Avicen's ſagacity [F]. From Daheſtân our Philoſopher returned to Jorjân, and there compoſed the firſt book of his Canon, a Compendium of the Almageſt,

(c) Ebn Sina, apud Abulfarag. Hiſt. Dynaſt. p. 229, 230. Ebn Khalecân, in vita Ebn Sina.

(d) Ebn Khaleć ibid.

(e) This happened in the year of the Hejira 403, and of Chriſt 1012.

(f) Ebn Sina, apud Abulfarag. & Ebn Khaleân, ubi ſupra.

"where he ſtudied under Rhazes; and that afterwards he travelled into Spain, where he was the diſciple of Averroes at Corduba. But it is no new thing, in this extraordinary Author, to write as many falſities and contradictions as he does pages (7)."

(7) Freind, ubi ſupra, p. 71.

[B] He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Phyſic.] His maſter in this ſcience, it is ſaid, was Abu Sahl, an eminent Chriſtian Phyſician of Khoraſân, and a very learned man; who wrote a famous Syntagm, intitled, Miyahketâb, i. e. "An hundred Books," and died at the age of forty (8).

(8) Abu'lfarag. Hiſt. Dyn. pag. 233.

[C] He employed a year and half in reading with incredible application; and on any difficulty his immediate recourſe was to heaven.] Hear his own words. "Whenever "I was puzzled about any queſtion, or could not find "the middle term in a ſyllogiſm, I went to the "Moſque, and humbly poured out my prayers to "the Creator of all things, that he would be pleaſed "to make plain to me what appeared abſtruſe and "difficult; and returning home at night, I ſet a "lamp before me, and applied myſelf to reading "and writing: and ſo often as I was overcome by "ſleep, or found myſelf faint, I drank a glaſs of "wine to recover ſtrength, and then returned to read-"ing again. If I ſlept ever ſo little, I dreamed of "thoſe very queſtions, ſo that the reaſons of many of "them were made known to me in my ſleep (9)."

(9) Ebn Sina, apud Abulfarag. ibid. pag. 230.

[D] Avicen took infinite pains to underſtand the Metaphyſics of Ariſtotle.] Having read the book over forty times, and even got it by heart, without being able to comprehend the Author's meaning, he was obliged to lay it by, as unintelligible. But it happened, one day, as he viſited the Bookſeller's ſhops, that a Broker offered him a book of Metaphyſics to ſell, which Avicen immediately rejected with ſcorn, ſaying it was a uſeleſs ſcience: the Broker, however, telling him the owner was obliged to ſell it, and he might have it cheap, he was at laſt prevailed on to buy it. The book proved to be a treatiſe of Al Farabius Concerning the Objects of Metaphyſics, which Avicen had no ſooner ran over at home, than he plainly perceived the ſenſe of Ariſtotle, whoſe work he retained in his memory; and out of joy gave a conſiderable alms to the poor (10).

(10) Idem, apud eundem, ibid. See the 4th book of Picus Mirandulanus, de Vanitate doctrinæ, and Baker's Reflections on Learning, ch. 9. pag. 125.

[E] Nuh Ebn Manſur.] It muſt be this Prince who invited Avicen to his Court, and not Nuh Ebn Naſr, his great grandfather, as Ebn Khalekân writes: for Nuh Ebn Naſr died twenty ſeven years before Avicen was born. I attribute this ſlip to Ebn Khalekân himſelf, and not his tranſcribers; becauſe I not only find it in my Arabic copy, and in a Turkiſh Tranſlation of that Author's work now before me, but the manuſcript which Dr. Pocock made uſe of agreed likewiſe in the ſame reading (11).

(11) See Dr. Pocock's Elenchus Scriptor. ubi ſupra.

[F] A ſtory related as an inſtance of Avicen's ſagacity.] They tell it thus: Sultân Mahmûd Ebn Sebecteghin, being informed that there were at the court of Mâmûn, King of Khowarezm, ſeveral learned men of diſtinguiſhed merit, of whom Avicen was one, deſired that Prince by meſſengers to ſend them to him into Khoraſân. Orders were accordingly given for their departure, and Avicen, full againſt his will, ſet out among the reſt; but, inſtead of taking the road to Khoraſân, he went to Jorjân. Mahmûd ſeeing Avicen appeared not at his court with the others, highly reſented his refuſal, and cauſed pictures of that Philoſopher to be ſent about all the adjacent countries, with orders to ſtop him; but in vain: for Avicen was already arrived at Jorjân, where he performed admirable cures. Kabûs, who reigned there at that time, hearing that a ſtranger practiſed Phyſic in his capital with great ſucceſs, ſent for him to viſit his nephew, who was confined to his bed by a diſtemper which none of the Phyſicians of that country could find out.

Avicen

Almageſt, and other Treatiſes. Then he went to Rey, where for ſome time he ſerved al Seyyidah, and her ſon Majdo'ddawla, a Prince of the family of Bûyah. Leaving Rey, he removed to Kazwin, and thence to Hamadân, where he became Wazir, or prime Miniſter, to Shamſo'ddawla. After a while the ſoldiery, who ſuſpected he meant them no good, raiſing a ſedition againſt him, hurried him out of his houſe to priſon, and not contented with plundering him of all he had, ſollicited Shamſo'ddawla to put him to death; but this was refuſed, though to pleaſe them the Prince ſeemed inclined to baniſh him. However, Avicen was releaſed, and having lain concealed forty days in a friend's houſe, he was ſent for, and reinſtated in his office, which he exerciſed to the death of Shamſo'ddawla: his ſon and ſucceſſor was deſired to continue the Doctor in the ſame high poſt, but he refuſed; whereupon Avicen ſhutting himſelf up in the houſe of one Abu Ghâleb, an Apothecary, he there finiſhed ſo much of his work intitled al Shefâ as treats of Phyſics and Metaphyſics, except the two books of Animals and Plants. It being diſcovered that he had privately written to Alâo'ddawla Ebn Cacûyeh, Soltân of the Perſian Irâk, deſiring leave to wait on him, he was ſeized on ſuſpicion of treaſonable practices, and clapped up in the Caſtle of Berdawân, where he lay four months, and was then carried back to Hamadân; but eſcaping thence in the habit of a Sûfi, he repaired to Iſpahân, and was honourably received by Alâo'ddawla. He wrote ſeveral of his works during his abode in that city. Avicen died of the colic at Hamadân (g), whither he had accompanied Alâo'ddawla, in the year of the Hejira 428 (h), being fifty eight lunar years old, and was buried there (i). The method he took to cure himſelf of that diſtemper was of fatal conſequence [G]. Some Authors write that he died in priſon (k). He was of a good conſtitution, but much addicted to wine and women, wherein he indulged himſelf to the prejudice of his health. It is ſaid he was the firſt Philoſopher who took ſuch liberties, which were indeed not very conſiſtent with his philoſophic character, tho' he was therein greedily imitated by thoſe who came after him (l). The number of books which Avicen wrote, including his leſſer Tracts, is computed at near a hundred (m), much the greater part of which are either loſt, or not known in Europe: I ſhall ſpeak of three or four of them in the note [H]. Some charge him with being a plagiary, and having ſtollen (g) Ebn al Athir writes that he died at Iſpahân; but, as Ebn Khalecân obſerves, againſt the general current of Hiſtorians.

(h) A. C. 1036.

(i) Abulfar. & Ebn Khal. ubi ſupra.

(k) Kemâlo'ddin Yuſo', apud Ebn Khalec. Vide Leon. Afric. de Viris q. ibuſd. illuſtr. apud Arabes, cap. 9.

(l) Abulfarag. & Ebn Khalec. ubi ſupra.

(m) Ebn Khalec.

Avicen had no ſooner felt the young man's pulſe, and ſeen his urine, than he judged his illneſs to proceed from concealed love. To clear the matter, he cauſed the chief Eunuch of the Palace to be called in, and while he kept his finger on the patient's pulſe, deſired him to name over the ſeveral apartments, and obſerved a great emotion in the ſick man at the naming of one particular apartment. He then obliged the Eunuch to name all the women in that apartment, and finding his patient's pulſe to beat extremely high at the name of one perſon, he no longer doubted but that ſhe was the object of his paſſion, and declared the only way to cure him would be the enjoyment of that Lady. Kâbûs, being informed of this diſcovery, had the curioſity to ſee the Doctor, and having received one of the pictures abovementioned, immediately knew him, and loaded him with honours and preſents, without obliging him to wait on the Sultan Mahmûd (12). Dr. Freind (13) obſerves the caſe to be ſo parallel, that one would be apt to think this account ſtollen from what is related of Eraſiſtratus, in a like illneſs of Antiochus the ſon of Seleucus (14).

(12) Nigâriſtan, apud D'Herbel. Bibl. Orient. Art. SINA.

(13) Hiſt. of Phyſic. Part II. pag. 70.

(14) V. Appian. in Syriacis.

[G] The method he took to cure himſelf of the colic, was of fatal conſequence.] Being impatient to procure himſelf eaſe, he took no leſs than eight clyſters in one day, which exulcerated his bowels, and cauſed an excoriation; and his colic being attended with with an epilepſy, he was weakened to that degree that he could not ſtand (15). Some charge the perſon, who made up the clyſter, with having miſtaken the preſcription, and uſed five drams of one ingredient inſtead of a ſcruple: and others ſay his ſervants, who had cheated him, and feared they ſhould be puniſhed if he recovered, put a large quantity of opium into one of his medicines (16). However he perſiſted to phyſic himſelf till he was ſo far amended as to be able to walk; but not taking proper care, and trying various remedies, his illneſs ſtill continued on him, ſometimes encreaſing, and ſometimes abating. He had been afflicted with this diſtemper before he left Iſpahân, and was attacked by it again on the road to Hamadân; where finding his ſtrength gone, he made no farther uſe of medicines, ſaying, They would be to no purpoſe, ſince his inward Phyſician failed him. Hence an Arabian Poet took occaſion to ſay, "Avicen's ſkill in Phyſic was of no ſervice to him, nor "his judgment in Aſtrology; Healing did not heal "him of the pain of death, nor did Deliverance de"liver him (17);" alluding to his two books, intitled,

(15) Abu'lfarag. ubi ſupra, pag. 232. Ebn Khal.

(16) Ebn Khalec.

(17) Abulfarag. ubi ſupra.

Al Shefâ, i. e. Healing, and Al Najât, i. e. Deliverance.

[H] I ſhall ſpeak of three or four of his books.] The moſt famous of our Author's works are: I. His Canon, or Syſtem of Phyſic, which gained him a prodigious reputation. The fame of it was ſo great throughout Aſia, that it was epitomized and commented on by ſeveral Arabian Writers in the 12th and 13th Centuries (18): and even long before this it began to prevail ſo much in Europe, that there was no other doctrine taught in the ſchools of Phyſic; and it happened to be the good fortune of Avicenna to continue his empire there till the reſtoration of learning (19). The different judgments which have been made of this work will be mentioned below (20). II. His work intitled, Al Shefâ, i. e. "Healing;" which contains almoſt all parts in Philoſophy, and the liberal Arts (21). In the beginning of it he ſays, that the truth was, in his opinion, different from what he had there delivered; that he had written that Book according to the Philoſophy of the Peripatetics, but thoſe who would know the truth without obſcurity, he refers to the work which I am going to mention (22). III. His Book Of the Eaſtern Philoſophy, wherein he took a much greater liberty than in the preceding, and more fully expreſſed his own ſentiments. The greater part of this work, by the injury of them, is loſt; and therefore what the deſign of it was cannot eaſily be ſaid. He ſeems to have therein examined the opinions of the Orientals, i. e. the Indians, and to have compared them with thoſe delivered by the Peripatetics. This has been conjectured, becauſe Al Birûni, who flouriſhed at the ſame time with Avicen, travelled into India and learned their Philoſophy, and taught them the Philoſophy of the Greeks (23). IV. The ſhort treatiſe of our Author concerning Hai Ebn Yokdhan deſerves to be mentioned; that being the foundation of the larger treatiſe, under the ſame title, written by Abu Jâfar Ebn Tofail: or at leaſt it was from thence that this latter borrowed what he delivers concerning Hai's production from the earth without father or mother; which kind of production from matter rightly diſpoſed, God contributing the like aſſiſtance as in the ordinary way of generation, Avicen thought not abſolutely impoſſible (24).

(18) See D'Herbel. Bibl. Orient. pag. 250.

(19) Freind, ubi ſupra, pag. 72, 73.

(20) In the notes [K] and [L].

(21) Pocock. ubi ſupra.

(22) Ebn Tofail, de vita Hai Ebn Yokdhan. p. 19. See Ockley's Engliſh Tranſlation, p. 17.

(23) Pocock, ibid.

(24) V. Ejuſdem præfat. ad Epiſt. Hai Ebn Yokdhan.

Avicen's Canon was publiſhed at Rome, in 1593, in folio; together with [ſome other of] his Tracts in Logic, Phyſics, and Metaphyſics (25). There have been divers Tranſlations of theſe into Latin, by Gerard of Cremona, (25) See Pope Blount's Cenſura celebrior. Auctor. pag. 358. ed. Genev. 1694. 4to.

ſtollen what he publiſhed from a Phyſician who had been his maſter [I]; and a late Writer aſſures us that he compiled his books out of Rhazes (n), one of the oldeſt Arabian Authors extant in Phyſic (o). Learned men differ widely in their judgments of the merit of Avicen; ſome highly extolling him [K], and others depreciating him as much [L]. He was one of the three great Mohammedan Philoſophers (p) who were ſuſpected of infidelity among thoſe of their own religion, and accuſed of believing the eternity of the world (q). This was occaſioned by their attachment to the Ariſtotelian Philoſophy, which the more rigid Divines judge inconſiſtent with the doctrines delivered in the Korân, and has therefore been publickly inveighed againſt from the pulpit (r). It muſt not be forgotten that Avicen, beſides his other accompliſhments, was alſo a great Poet; and that ſome have imagined him to have been a Prince [M]. The account which Leo Africanus has given of this eminent perſon ſeems to be made up of fabulous traditions; and he is egregiouſly miſtaken in ſaying, that he died about the eighticth year of his age, and

(n) Al Razi.

(o) Freind, ubi ſupra.

(p) The other two were Alfarabius and al Kendi.

(q) Vide Poc. ubi ſupra. D'Herbel. Bibl. Orient. pag. 303, 311, 337.

(r) Pocock. ibid.

Cremona, Andrew Alpagus, Arnold de Villa Nova, and others; and ſeveral learned men have written Annotations on them. Vopiſcus Fortunatus Plempius publiſhed a Tranſlation of ſome of his pieces, with Notes, at Louvain, in 1658 (26), and is allowed to have ſucceeded better than thoſe who went before him. For a fuller account of Avicen's printed works, and their verſions, I refer you to Mercklinus (27) and Bartoloccius (28).

(26) Idem, ibid.

(27) In Lindenio renovato.

(28) Bibl. Rabbinic. tom. 1. p. 6, &c.

[I] Some charge him with having ſtollen what he publiſhed from a Phyſician who had been his maſter.] The ſtory ſeems apocryphal: I ſhall relate it as I find it in my Authors; who name not their vouchers. There lived in the Eaſtern parts, ſay they, a celebrated Phyſician, who excelled all others in his profeſſion, and had gained ſo much honour and riches, that ſeveral perſons ſollicited him, by offers of money and entreaty, to take their ſons to be his ſcholars, and even his ſervants; but he, being reſolved to diſcover the ſecrets of his art to none, would admit no ſpies into his houſe. Avicen's mother, however, formed the following ſtratagem. She went to the Phyſician, and offered him her ſon as a ſervant, pretending he was naturally deaf and dumb, ſo that there could be no danger of his coming to the knowledge of any thing; and the youth, by his mother's inſtructions, counterfeited the defects ſhe mentioned ſo well, that the Phyſician, having made uſe of ſeveral artifices to diſcover the reality of them, was at length perſuaded there was no fraud in the affair, and imagining himſelf ſecure from the incapacity of a boy who could underſtand nothing but by ſigns, took him into his ſervice, and by degrees truſted him ſo far, as to leave his writings open in his room when he went abroad; and Avicen took the opportunity to tranſcribe them, and carried the copies to his mother, which, after his maſter's death, he publiſhed under his own name (29).

(29) Gab. Sionit. & J. Heſron. ubi ſupra.

[K] Some learned men highly extol Avicen.] Voſſius (30) tells us that he has delivered a complete ſyſtem of Phyſic in an admirable method, (meaning his Canon,) and that he has ſurpaſſed Galen himſelf in that reſpect. Sir Henry Savil (31) obſerves, that he was the firſt Writer who has given us a regular body of that art, whereas Galen had only written occaſional Treatiſes. John Heurnius affirms that Avicen's works contain a vaſt variety of remedies, and that all thoſe which were in uſe in his own time were deriv'd from him (32); and to him, it is ſaid, we abſolutely owe ſeveral valuable medicines (33). Julius Scaliger (34) gives him the epithet of Divine, and his ſon Joſeph Scaliger recommended the reading of him as neceſſary to all Phyſicians, being of opinion that no perſon could attain any conſiderable knowledge in that art, without being converſant in the writings of Avicen (35). Scheffer ſays he was a man of an extraordinary genius, a great Philoſopher, an excellent Phyſician, and eſteemed a conſummate Divine among thoſe of his own Religion; and that being endowed with ſo fine a genius, ſo uncommon a ſkill in Philoſophy, and ſo great a knowledge of Phyſic, he undertook a taſk which had never been attempted by the Greeks themſelves, to reduce the whole art of Phyſic into one ſyſtem. He adds, that though it muſt be owned there are a great many things in his Canon which want correction, yet the work deſerves admiration, and that Leonard Fuchſius and other enemies of the Arabian Phyſicians have in vain endeavoured to explode that excellent performance. Fuit Avicenna vir ſummi ingenii, magnus Philoſophus, excellens Medicus, & ſummus apud ſuos Theologus. Quum itaque tanto ingenio, tantâ Philoſophiæ cognitione, tantâ denique peritiâ artis inſtructus eſſet, rem hactenus Græcis ipſis intentatam aggreſſus eſt, integram artem Medicam in unum Syſtema redigere conatus. Quanquam enim non negaveris multa in illo opere Canonis occurrere, quæ correctionem mereantur, fatendum tamen eſt eſſe opus admiratione dignum. Leonardus ſane Fuchſius, & alii Arabum medicorum hoſtes, eximium illud opus damnando nihil egerunt (36).

(30) De Philoſ. cap. 14.

(31) Lectur. 2. in Euclid.

(32) Cuncta enim hujus ævi remedia ex eo manant. Heurn. Diſſert. de ſtudio medicinæ bene inſtituendo, publiſhed in a collection intitled H. Grotij & alior. Diſſert. de ſtudiis inſtituendis. p. 570. Ed. Amſtel. 1645.

(33) Huic debemus coctūram Sacchari, item Caſſiam fiſtularem, Myrobalanum, Tamarindum, & Rhabarbarum. Konig. Bibl. vet. & nov. pag. 73.

(34) Comment. in prim. lib. Theophraſti Hiſt. plant.

(35) Scaligerana prima, pag. 18.

(36) Sbaſt. Scheffer. Introd. in Art. Medic. pag. 63. apud Pope Blount, ubi ſupra, pag. 358.

[L] Others depreciate him as much.] John Manard (37) is of opinion that he ought to be ranked neither among the Ancients nor among thoſe Authors who have made improvements in the art of Phyſic, ſince his writings are tranſcribed word for word from others, with a great number of errors, occaſioned by his own ignorance, or that of his Tranſlators: [but ſure the faults of theſe latter, which I ſuſpect to be both conſiderable and frequent, are not to be imputed to him]. The ſame writer ſays, in another place (38), that tho' Avicenna has been adored as a Deity by many perſons, yet there is a prodigious obſcurity and confuſion in his book. Nicholas Leonicenus (39) calls our Philoſopher a Tyrant, and objects to him a variety of groſs miſtakes. Ludovicus Vives (40) condemns his Metaphyſics, as well as Averroes's doctrines, and all the Arabian writings of that kind, becauſe they ſavour extremely of the abſurdities of the Koran; and adds that nothing can be more trifling and inſipid than thoſe tracts. Dr. Freind ſays, that one would naturally expect to find ſomething in this Author anſwerable to the great character which he has had in the world; "but tho', continues he, I have "very often look'd into his writings upon ſeveral oc"caſions, (for you won't ſuppoſe, I believe, that I "have gone thro' him in any regular courſe of read"ing) I could meet with little or nothing there, but "what is taken originally from Galen, or what "at leaſt occurs with a very ſmall variation in Rhazes "or Haly Abbas. He in general ſeems to be fond "of multiplying the ſigns of the diſtempers without "any reaſon; a fault too much imitated by our mo"dern writers of Syſtems. He often, indeed, ſets "down ſome for eſſential ſymptoms, which ariſe "merely by accident, and have no immediate con"nection with the primary diſeaſe itſelf. And to "confeſs the truth, if one would chooſe an Arabic "ſyſtem of phyſic, that of Haly ſeems to be leſs con"fuſed and more intelligible, as well as more con"ſiſtent, than this of Avicenna (41)." I ſhall only add, that notwithſtanding the Arabians generally give Avicen the firſt degree in Phyſic, and the ſecond, next Alfarabius, in Philoſophy, yet ſeveral of their learned men ſtick not to ſay, that he was one-eyed in the former ſcience, and ſtark blind in the latter. Multi docti Arabes aiunt, Avicennam in medicina fuiſſe luſcum, in philoſophia cæcum (42).

(37) Lib. 9. Epiſt. 3. apud eundem, ibid.

(38) Lib. 1. Ep. 1.

(39) In his book concerning the errors of Pliny.

(40) De Cauſis corrupt. Art. l. 5.

(41) Freind, ubi ſupra, pag. 73.

(42) J. Leo Afric. ubi ſupra.

[M] Some have imagined him to have been a Prince.] Nay, others have aſſerted that he was a King, though they do not agree whether he reigned in Corduba or Bithynia (43). The miſtake was occaſioned by the honourable title given him by the Arabian writers, who uſually call him Al Sheik al Rayis, i. e. The "prime Doctor, and ſimply, Al Rayis, i. e. The Prince "or Chief: which he may alſo ſeem to have ſome right to, from his advancement to the dignity of Vizir (44).

(43) See Freind, ibid. pag. 71.

(44) Idem, ibid. Pocock ubi ſupra.

and in the 442d of the Hejira. I ſhall however preſent the reader with one of his ſtories for a ſpecimen [N].

[N] I ſhall preſent the reader with one of the ſtories related of Avicen by Leo Africanus.] I make choice of this, becauſe he pretends to have taken it from Ebn Khalekan, tho' I find no ſuch thing in that Author. Avicen, ſays he, uſed ſilver inſtead of iron to adorn the furniture of his mule, according to the cuſtom of the Princes of thoſe countries; which being objected to him, as inconſiſtent with the character of a man of letters, he excuſed himſelf by ſaying he did it not out of pride, but to give encouragement to the ſtudy of Phyſic, which was ſo much neglected in that Age. This is the ſubſtance of the following Latin of Leo: Dixit Ibnu Chalican Chroniſta, quòd Avicenna loco ferri uſus eſt argento ad mulæ ſuæ ornatum, ſecundum morem principum ejus regionis. Et dictum ei fuit; O magnifice! hic non fuit mos neque conſuetudo doctorum hominum. Reſpondit Avicenna; Filioli mei: hoc argentum, quo ferri loco utor, & aurum pro clavis, ſuperbiæ non aſcribatur, ſed his temporibus: vidi hanc artem eſſe mortuam, Medicinam; volui etenim ut ei adhibeatur fides, quouſque videantur fructus ejus; forſitan reſurget, & ejus ſtudia multiplicabuntur (44). Y. (44) Leo Afric. ubi ſupra.

AULNOI (MARY CATHERINE LE JUMEL DE BERNEVILLE, Counteſs d') ſo famous for her writings [A], was married to Francis de la Motte, Count d'Aulnoi. She was a widow, when he died in January 1705. Her mother who was married a ſecond time to the late Marquis de Gadaigne, died at Madrid, where ſhe enjoyed a conſiderable penſion, which was allowed her by King Charles II, for an important ſervice, which ſhe had done the Kingdom, whilſt ſhe was at Rome. Philip V continued that penſion to her. The Counteſs d'Aulnoi left four daughters (a).

(a) Mercure Galant, Januar. 1705, pag. 244, & ſeq.

[A] She is well known for her writings.] The firſt, which was publiſhed, was intitled A Voyage to Spain. She attended the Queen of Spain, the firſt wife of Charles II. Her other pieces are Memoirs of the Court of Spain, which was printed three times in France, and once in Holland; Memoirs of the Court of England; Hippolytus, Earl of Douglaſs; the Hiſtory of John de Bourbon, Prince of Carency; the Earl of Warwick. Theſe are ſo many little romances, which are read every where. She has likewiſe given us ſeveral Fairy-Tales, and a paraphraſe upon the Miſerere (1). (1) Mercure Galant, Januar. 1705, pag. 247, & ſeq.

AURAT, or D'AURAT (JOHN) in Latin Auratus. See DAURAT.

(a) The Emperor Claudius writing calls him only Valerius Aurelianus. Vopiſcus in Aureliano, cap. 17.

AURELIAN (LUCIUS DOMITIUS) (a), Emperor of Rome in the third Century, was one of the great Generals in Antiquity. The place of his birth is not certainly known [A]; but it is generally agreed that his extraction was very mean, and that his mother, who undertook to foretel things, was Prieſteſs of the ſun (b). He was a perſon of a noble ſtature, beautiful, robuſt, and of a very lively genius (c). He was fond of labour, wine and good cheer (d), but had no paſſion for women (e). He was an exact obſerver of diſcipline, himſelf, and kept it up with the greateſt ſeverity [B]. There (b) Idem, ibid. cap. 14. (c) Ibid. cap. 4. and 6. (d) Ibid. cap. 4. (e) Ibid. cap. 6.

(1) Ortus, ut plures loquuntur, Sirmii familiâ obſcuriore; ut nonnullii, Daciâ Ripenſi. Ego autem legiſſe memini auctorem, qui eum Mœſi genitum prædicaret. Vopiſc. in Aurelian. cap. 3. (2) Idem, ibid.

[A] The place of his birth is not certainly known.] Vopiſcus having mentioned three opinions (1), adds, that it generally happens, that the country of thoſe, who are born meanly, is unknown. He gives this reaſon for it, that they tell us wrong upon that ſubject, that they may recommend themſelves to poſterity from the honour of the place of their birth. Evenit quidem, ut de eorum virorum genitali ſolo neſciatur, qui humiliori loco nati, plerique ſolum genitale confingunt, ut dent poſteritati de locorum ſplendore fulgorem (2). I am of opinion, that there is another thing, which has contributed much more to this; I mean the variety of places, which claim the honour of having produced illuſtrious men. They take advantage of the uncertainty of the fact; they are in hopes, that they cannot be ſolidly confuted; and therefore they aſſert without any proof and out of mere vanity, that theſe great men were born in ſuch or ſuch a place. Hence aroſe the diſputes concerning Homer's country (3). I agree with Vopiſcus, that the grand point is, not to know where the great Princes were born, but how they governed: Nec tamen magnorum principum virtutibus ſumma ſciendi eſt, ubi quiſque ſit genitus; ſed qualis in republicâ fuerit. However as we are naturally very curious of knowing the time and place of the birth of great men, I think that an Hiſtorian is obliged to make all the enquiry poſſible for the ſatisfaction of his readers, and that we have a right to complain of the negligence of an infinite number of writers, who have not given themſelves this trouble.

(3) See the remark [A] of the article of ROTTERDAM.

[B] He kept up diſcipline with the greateſt ſeverity.] Let us add to this, that he had the happineſs of ſeeing, that this ſeverity did not provoke his ſoldiers, and render them refractory, but only kept them in awe and within the bounds of their duty. This was without doubt a happineſs; for Generals have ſometimes as much reaſon to fear the conſequences of too great a ſeverity, as thoſe of too great a lenity. Our Emperor found it very uſeful to puniſh vigorouſly and without any relaxation. Militibus ita timori fuit, ut ſub eo poſteaquam ſemel cum ingenti ſeveritate caſtrenſia peccata correxit, nemo peccaverit. Solus denique omnium militum, qui adulterium cum hoſpitis uxore commiſerat, ita punivit, ut duarum arborum capita inflecteret, & ad pedes militis deligaret, eademque ſubito demitteret, ut ſciſſus ille utrinque penderet. Quæ res ingentem timorem omnibus fecit (4). That is, "He was "ſo much feared by his ſoldiers, that under his com- "mand, after he had once puniſhed the crimes com- "mitted in his camp with great ſeverity, no body "ever ventured to offend again. In ſhort he alone "of all others gave the moſt remarkable inſtance "of rigour in puniſhing a guilty perſon, that we "can read of: a ſoldier of his had debauched his "landlord's wife, which crime he puniſhed by bend- "ing down the tops of two trees, and tying the ſol- "dier's feet to them, and then unlooſing the trees on "a ſudden, ſplit his body in two. Which puniſhment "ſtruck a prodigious terror upon the whole army." We find by this paſſage, that in puniſhing this ſoldier he made uſe of the ſame method, which Alexander did to puniſh the traytor Beſſus, who had murdered King Darius. There is nothing finer than the orders of Aurelian directing what the ſoldiers ought to do, and what not. St. John the Baptiſt could not have forbid them more things, if he had thought proper to have given them a particular direction (5). Aurelian would not have them touch any fruit, nor receive any ſalt, or wood, or oil, nor paſs the bounds of ſtrict chaſtity. Would not one imagine, that he had a deſign to introduce the diſcipline of Monks into the army? Hujus Epiſtola militaris eſt ad Vicarium "ſuum data hujuſmodi; Si vis tribunus eſſe, imo ſi vis "vivere, manus militum contine. Nemo pullum alie- "num rapiat; ovem nemo contingat; uvam nullus "auferat; ſegetem nemo deterat; oleum, ſal, lignum, "nemo exigat: annonâ ſuâ contentus ſit. De prædâ "hoſtis, non de lacrymis provincialium, habeat; ar- "ma terſa ſint; ferramenta ſamiata . . . . alter alteri "quaſi ſervus obſequatur: à medicis gratis curentur; "aruſpicibus nil dent; in hoſpitiis caſtè agant; qui "litem fecerit, vapulet (6)." That is: His military Epiſtle (4) Vopiſc. in Aureliano, cap. 7. pag. 434. (5) St. Luke iii. 14. (6) Vopiſc. in Aureliano, cap. 7. pag. 434.

There was one very remarkable quality in him, which was, that he continued ſtill poor amidſt all the various poſts of importance which were conferred upon him [C]. He was ſo very fond of having his ſword drawn, that the ſoldiers gave him the ſurname of Sword-in-Hand, to diſtinguiſh him from another Captain of the ſame name with him [D]. He made ſuch a ſlaughter in his battles, that he killed eight and forty Sarmatians in one day; and they made uſe of the number a thouſand to repreſent the mortal blows which he had given the enemies (f). This thought was introduced in the common ſongs and ballads (g). In this point he equalled the honour of the firſt King of the Jews (h); and he merited it much more, for it is never ſaid that Saul had killed with his own hand the thouſand enemies which the ſongs aſcribed to him the ſlaughter of; but it was really underſtood ſo with regard to Aurelian. He was adopted by Ulpius Crinitus, one of the greateſt men of that time (i); the Emperor Valerian, who managed that affair (k), made him Lieutenant to this Crinitus (l), who was General of the frontiers of Illyrium and Thrace (m), and appointed him Conſul in the year 258. Theſe rewards and ſeveral others

(f) Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 6.
(g) Idem, ibid. and cap. 7.
(h) See the 1ſt book of Samuel, ch. xviii. ver. 7.
(i) Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 14.
(k) Idem, ibid. cap. 15.
(l) Ib. cap. 10.
(m) Ibid. cap. 13.

Epiſtle to his Lieutenant is as follows: "If you would "be a Tribune, nay if you would deſerve your life, "put a proper reſtraint upon the ſoldiers. Let none "of them take away another man's fowls, or ſheep, "or grapes; let none tread down the corn; let none "of them demand oil, or ſalt, or wood; but every "one be contented with his own allowance. Let "them get their booty from the enemy, and not "from the ſpoils of the people in the Provinces; let "their arms be kept clean and bright; and their "ſwords and ſpears ſharp. . . . . Let one aſſiſt another "as a ſervant, let the Phyſicians cure them for no-"thing, and the Soothſayers take nothing of them. "Let them live chaſtly in their quarters; and let "him, that begins a quarrel, be beaten." He was ſo rigid, that the Emperor Valerian, who had a ſingular eſteem for him, would not venture his ſon under his care; for he was apprehenſive, that this young Prince, who loved gaiety and mirth, would feel too ſenſibly the ſeverity of ſuch a maſter; and upon that account he choſe for him a Governor of leſs rigour. It was thus he anſwered Antoninus Gallus the Conſul, who thought it wrong to give this office to any other than Aurelian: "Culpas me familiaribus literis quod "Poſthumio filium meum Gallienum magis quam Au-"reliano commiſerim, quum utique & ſeveriori & puer "credendus fuerit & exercitus; nec tu id diutius judi-"cabis, ſi benè ſcieris quantæ ſit Aurelianus ſeverita-"tis. Nimius eſt, multus eſt, gravis eſt, & ad noſtra "jam non facit tempora. Teſtor autem omnes deos, me "etiam timuiſſe ne quid etiam erga filium meum ſeve-"rius, ſi quid ille feciſſet, ut eſt naturâ pronus ad lu-"dicra, ſævius cogitaret. Hæc Epiſtola indicat quan-"tæ fuerit ſeveritatis, ut illum Valerianus etiam ti-"muiſſe ſe dicat (7)." We muſt not forget his ſeverity towards his domeſtics. He ordered thoſe, who failed in their duty, to be ſcourged in his preſence, and he committed ſeveral of his ſervants into the hands of Juſtice, that they might be chaſtiſed for their faults. He put one of his maids to death, for having committed adultery with his man. Servos & miniſtros peccantes coram ſe cædi jubebat, ut plerique dicunt, cauſa tenendæ ſeveritatis; ut alii ſtudio credulitatis. Ancillam ſuam, quæ adulterium cum ſervo ſuo fecerat, capite punivit. Multos ſervos è familiâ propriâ, qui peccaverant, legibus audiendos judiciis publicis dedit (8). What reaſon had Valerian to ſay, that ſuch a man was too ſevere for the Age, in which he lived? Ad noſtra jam non facit tempora (9). He was fit only for the ſect of the Montaniſts. The Chriſtians of the following Ages would have thought him too rigid; and a great many modern Caſuiſts would have ſaid of his morals, what they ſay of thoſe of the Fathers, that they are too ſtrict, and that ſo harſh and corroſive a remedy is by no means agreeable to our diſeaſes. Where are the ſoldiers, or even the citizens, who trouble themſelves with animadverting upon the amours of their men and maids? They put them away, when they find them guilty; which is all the puniſhment they inflict on them. Nay ſometimes they are good-natur'd enough to marry them to each other. We may obſerve, that the Hiſtory mentions but one of Aurelian's maids, who was puniſhed for her lewdneſs. It is a ſign, that ſuch faults were very uncommon in his family; which is extremely ſurprizing, when one conſiders what happens every day, and that a General and an Emperor as he was muſt neceſſarily have a great number of ſlaves of both ſexes.

(7) Idem, ibid. cap. 8. pag. 439, 440.
(8) Idem, ibid. cap. 49. p. 585.
(9) Idem, ibid. cap. 8. pag. 439.

[C] He continued poor amidſt all the various poſts of importance, which were conferred upon him (10).] The Emperor his maſter gave a ſufficient teſtimony to this virtue, when he charged the public with the expence, which the Conſulſhip, that he had promiſed to Aurelian, required. Conſulatum cum eodem Ulpio Crinito in annum ſequentem à die undecimo Calend. Juniarum, in locum Gallieni & Valeriani, ſperare te convenit ſumptu publico. Levanda eſt enim paupertas eorum hominum, qui diu reipublicæ viventes pauperes ſunt, & nullorum magis (11). The Hiſtorian, who mentions this, produces the Letter, which the Emperor wrote to the Prefect of Rome, to let him know what he deſired ſhould be given to the new Conſul. Aureliano, cui conſulatum detulimus ob PAUPERTATEM, qua ille magnus eſt cæteris major, dabis ad editionem Circenſium Antonianos trecentos &c. (12). Some Writers have ſaid that the poverty of Aurelian obliged Valerian to give orders, that Ulpius Crinitus ſhould adopt him: Memini me in quodam libro Græco legiſſe . . . . . mandatum eſſe Crinito à Valeriano, ut Aurelianus adoptaretur, idcirco præcipuè quod pauper eſſet (13). We may obſerve, that when he was Emperor, he never departed from the rules of mediocrity in ſerving his friends. He acted thus perhaps from the habit, which he had gained of renouncing wealth, and from the opinion which he had, that a moderate ſhare of riches was ſufficient for a great man. Perhaps too he was unwilling to give umbrage to the people by too extravagant a profuſion; for ſubjects are never pleaſed to ſee a Prince heap riches and favours upon his friends without any bounds. Vopiſcus tells us, that this Emperor was willing to keep a medium, which would ſecure them from the inconveniences of poverty without expoſing them to envy. Amicos ſuos honeſte ditavit & modice, ut miſerias paupertatis effugerent, & divitiarum invidiam patrimonii moderatione vitarent (14). It is added, that he ſuffered no perſon to go dreſt in ſilk, which he ſet an example of himſelf, and obliged his own wife to the ſame law; for when ſhe aſked him to grant her at leaſt one ſuit, he replied, God forbid, that you ſhould buy thread, which would coſt as much as gold. It appears, that at that time a pound of ſilk was worth a pound of gold. Veſtem holoſericam neque ipſe in veſtiario ſuo habuit, neque alteri utendam dedit. Et quum ab eo uxor ſua peteret, ut unico pallio blatteo ſerico uteretur, ille reſpondit, Abſit ut auro fila penſentur; libra enim auri tunc libra ſerici fuit (15). See Mr. de Tillemont, who finds ſomething of inconſiſtency between this fact and ſome particulars related by the ſame Hiſtorian or others, with regard to the luxury of this Emperor (16). But we muſt not omit to mention, that he did not cloath his ſervants more magnificently after he was raiſed to the throne than before (17), and that he permitted the Senators to have the ſame liveries with himſelf (18).

(10) See the particular account of them in Vopiſcus, cap. 10.
(11) Idem, in cap. 2. pag. 445.
(12) Idem, cap. 12.
(13) Idem, cap. 15.
(14) Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 14. pag. 539.
(15) Idem, ibid. pag. 540.
(16) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 3. p. 1074, 1075.
(17) Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 1.
(18) Idem, ibid. cap. 49.

[D] The ſoldiers gave him the ſurname of Sword-in-hand, to diſtinguiſh him from another Captain of the ſame name.] Such a diſtinction as this is the greateſt gratification imaginable to the pride of a brave Warriour. Let us give the words of Vopiſcus himſelf: Gladii exerendi cupidus. Nam quum eſſent in exercitu duo Aureliani tribuni, hic & alius, qui cum Valeriano captus eſt, huic ſignum exercitus appoſuerat manum ad ferrum, ut ſi forte quæreretur quis Aurelianus aliquid vel feciſſet vel geſſiſſet, ſuggeretur, Aurelianus manu ad ferrum, atque cognoſceretur (19).

(19) Idem, ibid. cap. 6. pag. 426.

others were attended with all the agreeable circumſtances imaginable, if we conſider the commendations and marks of eſteem which were uſed as a preface to the Emperor's declarations [E]. We do not find that Aurelian made any figure under the Emperor Gallienus; but under Claudius he was honoured with the firſt poſts in the Empire, and commanded the armies with ſo much glory, that after the death of that Emperor all the Legions agreed to place him upon the throne (n). This happened in the year 270. He went a little after to Rome, and having eſtabliſhed his authority there, marched towards Pannonia, where the Goths had made an irruption (o). He gave them battle, and obliged them to repaſs the Danube, and ſue for peace. After this, being informed that the Marcomanni, Juthungi (p), and ſeveral other nations, had formed a reſolution to carry the war into Italy, he marched againſt them, and conquered them near the Danube in a great battle. He ſlew a great many more of them as they were endeavouring to repaſs that river, and prevented the reſt from returning to their own country, and ſhut them up in the Roman territories. The want of proviſions, and an hundred other inconveniences, which forced them to deſire peace, yet could not reduce them to ſuch a ſubmiſſive temper as might be agreeable to him. Their Deputies ſpoke in a very haughty manner, ſo that he ſent them back with a great deal of diſdain; for as he imagined that he had cut off this army from any retreat, he thought they could never have any opportunity of eſcaping. But he was miſtaken in this; the enemies diſengaged themſelves, and having got before him entered Italy, and made great devaſtations about Milan. He could not follow them with the neceſſary expedition, for his army was much heavier than theirs. They ſurprized and defeated him near Placentia (q), and if they had underſtood the art of war as well as he, they would have been able to ruin the Empire after ſuch an advantage which they had gained; but as they knew not how to make uſe of it, and did not march cloſe and firm, he defeated them in ſeveral engagements, and reduced them to (n) Ibid. cap. 17.

(o) Zoſim. lib. 1. pag. 654, 655.

(p) They were ſituated the neareſt to Rhetia and Italy.

(q) Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 21.

[E] The commendations of him ſerved as a Preface to the Declarations of the Emperor.] I ſhall report them, becauſe they contain an account of the important ſervices, which Aurelian had done to the Empire. Valerianus Auguſtus Ceionio Albino Præfecto urbi. Vellemus quidem ſingulis quibuſque devotiſſimis Reipub. viris multo majora deferre compendia quam eorum dignitas poſtulat, maxime ubi honorem vita commendat. Debet enim quid præter dignitatem pretium eſſe meritorum. Sed facit rigor publicus, ut accipere de provinciarum oblationibus ultra ordinis ſui gradum nemo plus poſſit. Aurelianum fortiſſimum virum ad inſpicienda & ordinanda caſtra omnia deſtinavimus; cui tantum à nobis atque ab omni Republicâ, communi totius exercitus confeſſione debetur, ut digna illi vix aliqua vel nimis magna ſunt munera. Quid enim in illo non clarum? quid non Corvinis & Scipionibus conferendum? Ille liberator Illyrii, ille Galliarum reſtitutor, ille Dux magni totius exempli. Et tamen nihil præterea poſſum addere tanto viro ad muneris gratiam quam patitur ſobria & benè gerenda Reſpublica. Quare ſinceritas tua, mi parens chariſſime, ſupradicto viro efficiet, quandiu Romæ fuerit, panes militares mundos ſedecim, &c. (20). That is: "Valerianus Auguſtus to Ceionius Albinus Prefect "of the city greeting. We ſhould be very glad to "give much greater rewards to all thoſe, who have "eminently ſerved the Commonwealth, than their "dignity demands, eſpecially when their lives add a "grace to their honour: for there ought to be ſome "other reward of their merits beſides the dignity "itſelf. But the public rigour requires, that no per"ſon ſhall receive of the revenues of the Provinces "above what is neceſſary to his rank and office. "We have appointed Aurelian, a man of diſtin"guiſh'd bravery, to take care of all our camps; he "has deſerved ſo well of us and of the whole Com"monwealth, by the general confeſſion of the army, "that ſcarce any rewards are great enough for his "ſervices. For what is there, that is not great and "noble in him? What is there, that cannot equal "him to the Corvinus's and Scipio's? He was the "Deliverer of Illyrium, he was the Reſtorer of Gaul, "he was a General of the moſt exemplary conduct. "And yet I can add nothing elſe to ſo great a man, "in order to recommend the office to him, but what "the regular and ſober adminiſtration of the Com"monwealth will permit. Therefore, my deareſt "couſin, I doubt not but your honeſty will take care "to furniſh him, as long as he ſhall continue at "Rome, with ſixteen good military loaves, &c." In this manner Valerian wrote to the Prefect of Rome; and to Aurelian himſelf he wrote as follows: Ego de te tantum, Deo favente, ſpero quantum de Trajano, ſi viveret, poſſet ſperare Respub. Neque enim minor eſt (21), in cujus locum fidemque te legi. Conſulatum cum eodem Ulpio Crinito in annum ſequentem à die undecimo Calend. Juniarum, in locum Gallieni & Valeriani, ſperare te convenit ſumptu publico. That is: "I expect as much "from you, thro' the favour of God, as the Com"monwealth would of Trajan himſelf, if he were "living. For the perſon, in whoſe place and truſt I "have choſen you, is not inferior to him. You muſt "expect to enter at the public charge upon the Con"ſulſhip with the ſame Ulpius Crinitus, on the ele"venth of the Calends of June, in the room of Gal"lienus and Valerian." We have likewiſe the following ſpeech, which Valerian addreſſed to him before the Army and the Court. Gratias tibi agit, Aureliane, Reſpublica, quod eam Gotthorum poteſtate liberaſti. Abundamus per te prædâ, abundamus gloriâ, & his omnibus, quibus Romana felicitas creſcit. Cape igitur tibi pro rebus geſtis tuis coronas murales quatuor, coronas vallares quinque, coronas navales duas, coronas civicas duas, haſtas puras decem, vexilla bicolora quatuor, tunicas ducales ruſſas quatuor, pallia proconſularia duo, togam prætextam, tunicam palmatam, togam pictam, ſubarmalem profundum, ſellam eboratam. Nam te conſulem hodie deſigno, ſcripturus ad ſenatum, ut tibi deputet ſcipionem, deputet etiam faſces. Hæc enim imperator non ſolet dare, ſed à ſenatu, quando ſit conſul, accipere (22). That is: "The Commonwealth, Au"relian, returns you thanks for reſcuing her from "the power of the Goths: By your valour we have "plenty of ſpoils, and enjoy the greateſt glory; and "every thing neceſſary to advance the Roman Feli"city. Receive therefore for your great actions four "mural crowns, five vallar crowns, two naval crowns, "two civic crowns, ten haſta pura's, four ſtandards "of two colours, four military tunics, two proconſu"lar cloaks, a toga prætexta, a tunica palmata, an "embroidered gown, a ſuit to wear under armour, "an ivory ſeat. For I appoint you Conſul this day, "and ſhall write to the Senate, that they may ſend "you the ſtaff and the faſces. For the Emperor does "not uſe to give theſe, but to receive them from the "Senate, when he is made Conſul."

(20) Idem, ibid. cap. 9. pag. 440.

(21) Caſaubon would have it read es, that is, that Valerian thought Aurelian equal to Crinitus. This ſeems to be the true ſenſe.

(22) Vopiſc. cap. 13. pag. 449, 450.

The firſt of theſe three paſſages of Vopiſcus contains a remarkable particular, which does not agree with the common notions of the diſorders of the Empire. It is generally imagined, that after the ſoldiers had accuſtomed themſelves to create and murder their Emperors, there was nothing but oppreſſion and tyranny in the Roman Provinces. This cannot be always true; for we ſee here, that Valerian managed the public expences, in order to eaſe the Provinces, with more care, than is obſerved now in Chriſtian Kingdoms.

to nothing (r). It was during this war that the books of the Sibylls were conſulted at Rome: it is proper to relate ſome circumſtances, which will ſhew the religion of Aurelian, and the irreligion of his flatterers [F]. It is probable he purſued the enemy as far as Germany; and he was obliged to ſtop ſome time to repel the Vandals who had paſſed the Danube. He overcame them, and obliged them to deſire peace, which he was very glad to grant them (s). He returned to Rome full of rage, on account of the ſeditions which had been raiſed, and puniſhed the promoters of them with extreme cruelty (t). This was his predominant vice; and it occaſioned a great many not to rank him among the good Princes; and as Diocleſian uſed to ſay, he was more fit to command an army than to be an Emperor [G]. We muſt obſerve however, that his ſanguinary diſpoſition did not prevent him from being beloved by the people. His liberality, and the care that he took to maintain plenty, and to puniſh miſdemeanours, made them forget his cruelty [H]. He undertook an expedition into the Eaſt againſt Zenobia (u), after he had puniſhed the ſeditious, and regulated the diſorders at Rome (x). He concluded this war, having taken that brave Princeſs captive, with prodigious expedition, though he met with in his way a great many enemies to fight, and many cities to be reduced. We have ſeen in another place (y) what hindered him from ruining that of Tyre. He expoſed his perſon ſo much, while he beſieged Zenobia in the city of Palmyra, that he was wounded with an arrow (z). He defeated the Perſians, who came to the aſſiſtance of the beſieged, and gained prodigious honour by his conqueſt of all the dominions

(r) Taken from Mr. de Tillemont's Hiſt. des Empereurs, tom. 3. p. 1030, & ſeq. He quotes Dexippus chiefly. See likewiſe his notes.

(s) See Tillemont, ibid.

(t) See Remark [H].

(u) In 272.

(x) Vopiſc. cap. 22.

(y) In the Remark [E] of the Article APOLLONIUS TYANÆUS.

(z) Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 26.

[F] There are ſome circumſtances, which will ſhew us the Religion of Aurelian, and the Irreligion of his flatterers.] The conſternation at Rome was very great, when they received the news, that the Marcomanni had entered Italy, and made prodigious devaſtations there (23). Seditions were raiſed in the midſt of this agitation; upon which account Ulpius Syllanus, Chief of the Senate, propoſed to conſult the Sibyll's Books; but there were ſome Senators, who oppoſed this motion by reaſon, that under ſo valiant an Emperor as Aurelian, there was no neceſſity of informing themſelves concerning the will of the Gods. This difference of opinion delaying the conſultation of the Sibyll's writings, Aurelian was obliged to interpoſe. He wrote therefore to the Senate, that he was ſurprized they ſhould heſitate upon an affair of that nature, as if they were deliberating in one of the churches of the Chriſtians, and not in a temple of all the Gods. Miror vos, patres ſancti, tamdiu de aperiendis Sibyllinis dubitaſſe libris, perinde quaſi in Chriſtianorum Eccleſia, non in templo Deorum omnium tractaretis (24). He preſſed them very ſtrongly, he aſſured them that he would ſupply all the neceſſary expences, and that he had given orders to his Treaſurer for that purpoſe; "for, continues he, it is no diſgrace to conquer by the "divine aſſiſtance: it was thus, that our anceſtors "ended and begun many of their wars." Neque enim indecorum eſt Diis juvantibus vincere: ſic apud majores noſtros multa finita ſunt bella, ſic cæpta (25). Syllanus had reaſon therefore to ſay to the flatterers of Aurelian, that this great man honoured the Gods, and placed his confidence in them; and that their aſſiſtance was never any diſgrace to men of valour. Meminiſtis P. C. me in hoc ordine ſæpe dixiſſe jam tum, quum primum nuntiatum eſt Marcomannos erupiſſe, conſulenda Sibyllæ decreta, utendum Apollinis beneficiis, inſerviendum Deorum immortalium præceptis: recuſaſſe verò quoſdam, & cum ingenti calumnia recuſaſſe, quum adulando dicerent tantam principis eſſe virtutem ut opus non ſit Deos conſuli, perinde quaſi & ipſe vir magnus non Deos colat, non de Diis immortalibus ſperet. Quid plura? audivimus literas, quibus rogavit opem Deorum, quæ nunquam cuiquam turpis eſt, ut vir fortiſſimus adjuvaretur (26). After the receipt of Aurelian's Letter there was no longer delay: the Senate ordered the Sibyll's Books to be conſulted; which brought after it a long train of devotions (27). We may obſerve by the way how much ſome perſons approved of Ajax's maxim (28). We have here a ſett of flatterers, who imagine, that there is no occaſion to have recourſe to the aſſiſtance of Heaven, but when we have a diſtruſt in the valour and prudence of the Princes of the world. I ſhall give two proofs, that Aurelian was not of this opinion: Credo adjuturos Rom. Remp. Deos, qui nunquam noſtris conatibus defuerunt (29). That is: "I believe that the Gods, who have never been "wanting to our endeavours, will aſſiſt the Roman "Commonwealth." This is what he wrote during the perplexity he was in, occaſioned by the long reſiſtance of Zenobia. He acknowledges in another Letter, that his victories were the gift of the Gods. Unde apparet nullam mihi à Diis immortalibus datam ſine difficultate victoriam (30). It is true, he adds, that they had always granted them to him after a thouſand difficulties. This is the fate of every thing; it is not virtue only, that is to be obtained by the ſweat of one's brows, but it is the property of all other good things; Sic Diis placitum: Such is the pleaſure of God.

(23) Idem, cap. 18.

(24) Idem, ibid. cap. 20. p. 463.

(25) Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 20. pag. 464.

(26) Idem, cap. 19. p. 459, 460.

(27) Idem, cap. 20.

(28) See the Remark [E] of the Article AJAX the ſon of Telamon.

(29) Idem, cap. 26.

(30) Idem, cap. 38.

Τῆς δ' ἀρετῆς ἱδρῶτα θεοὶ προπάροιθεν ἔθηκαν
Ἀθάνατοι, μακρὸς δὲ καὶ ὄρθιος οἶμος ἐπ' αὐτὴν, Καὶ τρηχὺς τὸ πρῶτον (31).

(31) Heſiod. Oper. & Dies, ver. 287.

"—— Th' immortal Gods have made
"Labour the means of virtue; and the way
"To gain that prize, at firſt is difficult."

There are no free-gifts in that ſenſe; and we muſt own, that this heavenly diſpoſal of things has the marks of great goodneſs; for we feel a much more exquiſite ſatisfaction from the acquiſition of thoſe good things, which have coſt us a great deal of labour.

[G] His cruelty has occaſioned a great many not to rank him among the good Princes; and as Diocleſian uſed to ſay, he was more fit to command an army, than to be an Emperor.] Vopiſcus aſſures us of theſe particulars. Et Aurelianum quidem, ſays he (32), multi neque inter bonos, neque inter malos principes ponunt, idcirco quod ei clementia, imperatorum dos prima, defuerit. Verconius Herennianus præfectus prætorio Diocletiani, teſte Aſclepiodoto, ſæpe dicebat, Diocletianum frequenter dixiſſe, quum Maximiani aſperitatem reprehenderet, Aurelianum magis ducem eſſe debuiſſe, quam principem. Nam ejus nimia ferocitas ei diſplicebat. Theſe expreſſions of Diocletian ſhew that he was a man of judgment; for he uſed to ſay, that there was nothing more difficult than to govern well (33), and he knew perfectly the reaſons of that difficulty. You may find them in Vopiſcus (34), an Author, who remarks, that in the great number of Roman Emperors, there were reckoned but few good Princes (35); and he commends the expreſſion of a Jeſter, who uſed to ſay, that all the good Princes might be painted in a ring: Vides quæſo quam pauci ſint principes boni, ut benè dictum ſit à quodam mimico ſcurrâ Claudii, hujus temporibus, In uno annulo bonos principes poſſe perſcribi atque depingi (36).

(32) Vopiſc. cap. 44. p. 532, 533.

(33) Idem, ibid. cap. 43.

(34) Ibid.

(35) Idem, cap. 42.

(36) Idem, ibid. pag. 529.

[H] His liberality, and the care, which he took to maintain plenty &c. . . . . made them forget his cruelty.] The manner, in which he puniſhed the ſeditions, that had been raiſed at Rome during his abſence, was carried ſo much beyond the bounds of a lawful and neceſſary ſeverity, that it was a blemiſh to his reputation, and render'd him very odious: Magnum illud, & quod jam fuerat, & quod non fruſtra ſperatum eſt, infamiæ triſtioris ictu contaminavit imperium. . . . . Timeri cæpit princeps optimus, non amari, quum alii dicerent, perfodiendum talem principem, non optandum; alii bonum quidem medicum, ſed mala dominions of Zenobia (aa). Upon his return towards the Weſt, he was informed that the Palmyrenians had revolted, which news obliged him to return to Syria, and he arrived at Antioch before it was known that he was coming (bb). He chaſtiſed Palmyra with an exceſſive cruelty, for he put all to the ſword (cc). He was at Carræ in Meſopotamia, when he heard of the revolt of the Egyptians. He marched againſt them with his uſual good fortune and diligence. He defeated their Chief, took him priſoner, and put him to death; and ſo reduced Egypt in a very ſhort time (dd). His inclination to reunite to the Empire, Gaul, Spain and Britain, which had ſubmitted to Tetricus, induced him to return into the Weſt. He gained a battle near Chalons upon the Marne, which determined the whole diſpute, eſpecially as Tetricus had ſurrendered himſelf to him during the fight (ee). He returned to Rome and triumphed over Zenobia and Tetricus with an extraordinary pomp (ff). He marched back to Gaul, and being informed that the Barbarians were entered into the country of the Vindelici (gg), he went thither with great expedition, and put a ſtop to the danger. He marched thence to Illyrium, and being of opinion that he could not maintain Dacia, which Trajan had made a Province of beyond the Danube, and had been loſt under Gallienus, he drew off his troops and the inhabitants from thence, and gave the latter a part of Mæſia and Dardania, which he formed into a new Province (hh). He had in Thrace a fine army, which he reſolved to march againſt the Perſians after winter, when he was killed by one of his Generals (ii). This was done in January 275. We know but in general the great actions of his life; but if we had a more exact and particular account of them, ſuch as we have now of conqueſts and battles, we could not ſufficiently admire him, and we ſhould ſee the reaſonableneſs of Junius Tiberianus's complaint [I]; for in ſhort Aurelian was a man, who transferred a war from the Eaſt to the Weſt with the ſame eaſe, as it (aa) See in Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 3. pag. 1035, the catalogue of the people who ſent him preſents. See likewiſe below quotation (61).

(bb) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 3. p. 1056.

(cc) See the note [L].

(dd) Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 32.

(ee) See Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 3. p. 1058, 1059.

(ff) See the deſcription of it in Vopiſcus, chap. 33, & ſeq.

(gg) It is partly the country now called Bavaria and Suabia.

(hh) Which was likewiſe called Dacia, or New Dacia. See the proofs of this in Mr. Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 3. p. 1067.

(ii) Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 35.

mala ratione curantem (37). This hatred of him did not continue long amongſt the people: his diſtributions of bread, and fleſh (38), and oil (39), with ſeveral other favours, which they enjoyed under his Government, made them converts to him. The people were then juſt in the ſame diſpoſition, as they were in Juvenal's time; they formed no other deſires than for bread and public ſhews; and nothing was more chearful than they, if their belly was but full.

(37) Idem, cap. 21. pag. 467.

(38) Idem, cap. 35.

(39) Idem, cap. 48.

——— Jam pridem ex quo ſuffragia nulli
Vendimus, effugit curas. Nam qui dabat olim
Imperium, faſces, legiones, omnia, nunc ſe
Continet, atque duas tantum res anxius optat, Panem, & Circenſes (40).

(40) Juven. Sat. 10. ver. 77.

" ——— Since now no longer votes are ſold,
" The people's free from care; that mighty people,
" Whoſe voice once Conſuls, Kings, and Generals
" made,
" Now ſunk in ſlav'ry, wiſh for nothing more
" Than bread and public ſhews."

It was by this means that this Emperor ingratiated himſelf with the multitude. Read the Letter, which he wrote to an Overſeer of the proviſions. Aurelianus Auguſtus Flavio Arabiano Præfecto annonæ. Inter cætera, quibus Diis faventibus Romanam Rempub. juvimus, nihil mihi eſt magnificentius, quam quod additamento unciæ omnè annonarum urbicarum genus juvi; quod ut eſſet perpetuum, navicularios Niliacos apud Ægyptum novos, & Romæ amnicos poſui. Tiberinas extruxi ripas: vadum alvei tumentis effodi, Diis & perennitati vota conſtitui, almam Cererem conſecravi. Nunc tuum eſt officium, Arabiane jucundiſſime, elaborare, ne meæ diſpoſitiones in irritum veniant. Neque enim populo Rom. ſaturo quicquam poteſt eſſe lætius (41). He had a deſign to eſtabliſh perpetual diſtributions of wine, and had taken meaſures for that purpoſe (42). It is ſaid, that his Præfect of the Prætorium prevented him from executing it, by telling him, that if he gave wine to the people, he muſt of neceſſity give them fowls and geeſe too. Si & vinum populo Romano damus, ſupereſt ut & pullos & anſeres demus (43). Such largeſſes as theſe are capable of making them forget the effuſion of ſome men's blood. Tho' Aurelian had put to death his ſiſter's ſon or daughter, or both of them, for trifling reaſons (44), tho' he had applied the puniſhment of death in a very unjuſt manner (45); yet all this was not able to extinguiſh the people's affection for him, whom he ſupplied with all the advantages of proviſion and fine cloaths (46). Beſides his ſeverity had put an end to many diſorders, which were odious to the populace. He deſtroyed the informers, extortioners, public bloodſuckers, and others of that brood. " Quicquid ſane ſcelerum " fuit, quicquid malæ conſcientiæ, vel artium funeſta- " rum, quicquid denique factionum Aurelianus toto " penitus orbe purgavit. . . . (47)." Item quadruplatores ac delatores ingenti ſeveritate perſequutus eſt: tabulas publicas ad privatorum ſecuritatem exuri in foro Trajano ſemel juſſit. Amneſtia etiam ſub ea delictorum publicorum decreta eſt de exemplo Athenienſium: cujus rei etiam Tullius in Philippicis meminit. Fures provinciales repetundarum ac peculatûs reos ultra militarem modum eſt perſequutus, ut eos ingentibus ſuppliciis cruciatibuſque puniret (48). He enlarged the circuit of Rome, and reſtored to the Empire its ancient boundaries. The people were ſoon ſtruck with this ſhew of grandeur. He began a reformation of ſeveral abuſes, and limited the number of Eunuchs, becauſe they were raiſed to a very great price (50). He prohibited the having concubines of a free condition (51). It was in ſhort a ſatisfaction to the Roman people, to ſee, that this Emperor had made himſelf feared by the Senate: perhaps that body had aſſumed a little too much to themſelves; however that be, I imagine, they were pleaſed to find, that the Senators were obliged to take care of their conduct under ſuch a maſter, like ſcholars under the diſcipline of a ſchool-maſter: Populus autem Romanus eum amavit, Senatus & timuit (52). Senatus mortem ejus gravitèr tulit, gravius tamen populus Romanus, qui vulgò dicebat Aurelianum Pædagogum eſſe Senatorum (53). That is: " The Roman " people loved him, and the Senate feared him. The " Senate was ſorry for his death, but the Roman " people much more ſo, who generally called him " the Pedagogue of the Senate."

(47) Idem, cap. 37.

(48) Idem, cap. 39. pag. 522, 523.

(49) Idem, cap. 39.

(50) Idem, ibid.

(51) Idem, ibid.

(52) Idem, cap. ult.

(53) Idem, cap. 37.

[I] If we had a more exact and particular account of his great actions, we ſhould ſee the reaſonableneſs of Junius Tiberianus's complaint.] How is it, ſays he, that a Therſites, a Simon, and the other monſters of antiquity are known to us, and will be known to our poſterity; and yet ſhall they know nothing of Aurelian, an illuſtrious Prince, a very ſevere Emperor, who reſtored the whole world to the Roman name? Heavens grant, that we be not guilty of ſo much ſtupidity! Upon that account he engaged Flavius Vopiſcus to undertake the Hiſtory of that Emperor, and promiſed him all the Memoirs which the Library of Trajan could furniſh him with. I ſhall give the very words of this Hiſtorian: Quæſivit a me (Junius Tiberianus) quis vitam Aureliani in literas retuliſſet? Cui ego quum reſpondiſſem, neminem a me Latinorum, Græcorum aliquos lectitatos, dolorem gemitus ſui vir ſanctus per hæc verba profudit: Ergo Therſitem, Sinonem, cæteraque illa prodigia vetuſtatis, & nos benè ſcimus, & poſteri frequentabunt: divum Aurelianum, clariſſimum Principem, ſeveriſſimum Imperatorem, per quem totus Romano nomini orbis eſt reſtitutus, poſteri neſciant?

(41) Vopiſc. cap. 47. p. 576, 577.

(42) Idem, cap. 48.

(43) Idem, cap. 48. pag. 578.

(44) Idem, cap. 36 and 39.

(45) See Julian's Cæſars, and Mr. Spanheim's notes upon them, pag. 107.

(46) Vopiſc. cap. 48.

it is now carried from Alſace to Flanders. He was extremely regretted, and the moſt magnificent monuments were erected to his honour. He was deified [K], and had a temple built to him. We may obſerve, that there was no Deity to whom he teſtified more reverence than to the Sun [L]. He left but one daughter, whoſe grandſon was living in Diocleſian's time (kk). He was a Senator venerable for his virtue, and had been Proconſul of Cilicia. We may conſider as a falſity what Abulpharagius ſays, that Aurelian upon his making peace with Sapores King of Perſia, gave him his daughter in marriage (ll). It is pretended likewiſe that he ſent him Greek Phyſicians to inſtruct the Perſians in Hippocrates's method of Phyſic (mm). We may obſerve, that Phyſicians were a ſet of men whom he never made uſe of in his ſickneſs; his only remedy was abſtinence (nn). It was happy for the Chriſtians, that a Prince of ſo cruel a diſpoſition, never attempted to deſtroy them. I own that one of the perſecutions of the church is placed under his reign; but there are ſome Hiſtorians who make no mention of it, and thoſe (kk) Idem, cap. 42. pag. 528.

(ll) Tillem. Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 3. pag. 1182.

(mm) Abulpharagius quoted by Tillem. ibid.

(nn) Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 50.

ant? Deus avertat hanc amentiam. Et tamen, ſi benè novi, ephemeridas illius viri ſcriptus habemus, etiam bella charactere hiſtorico digeſto, quæ velim accipias, & per ordinem ſcribas, additis quæ ad vitam pertinent. Quæ omnia ex libris linteis, in quibus ipſe quotidiana ſua ſcribi præceperat, pro tua ſedulitate condiſces. Curabo autem ut tibi ex Ulpiâ Bibliothecâ & libri lintei proferantur. Tu velim Aurelianum ità ut eſt, quatenus potes, in literas mittas (54). We may obſerve that Vopiſcus writes in this manner about thirty years after Aurelian's death; which is an inſtance of the ignorance or negligence of the Latins at that time. None of them had then publiſhed any thing concerning the great actions of this Prince, who was the reſtorer of the Empire, Orbis Reſtitutor, as he is ſtiled in an antient medal. He apprehended ſuch a diſgrace, when he took care to have the courſe of his exploits ſet down every day in writing (55).

(54) Vopiſc. cap. 1. pag. 416.

(55) This appears from the words of Vopiſcus quoted above.

[K] He was very much regretted . . . . . he was deified.] Even thoſe perſons who were the Authors of his death, erected a noble monument for him, and dedicated a temple to him (56): for they diſcovered, that they had been engaged in the conſpiracy againſt him by a horrid piece of fraud; which was thus. He had threatned Mneſtheus his Secretary: who, giving up himſelf for loſt, as he knew that this Emperor's menaces were always put in execution (57), reſolved to prevent it, and made ſeveral perſons believe, that Aurelian had determined their death. He ſhewed them a liſt, in which his own name was, and adviſed them to take proper meaſures to ſecure themſelves. They were all perſons who had either incurred his diſpleaſure, or elſe from the merit of their ſervices had reaſon to ſuppoſe they were in his favour, and ſo at the bottom had nothing to fear from him (58). All of them engaged in a conſpiracy againſt his life, which they put in execution. But having detected afterwards the treachery of the Secretary, they were the moſt zealous in doing honour to Aurelian. Mneſtheus was thrown to the wild beaſts, and they ordered the memory of this puniſhment to be preſerved upon the Emperor's tomb (59). The ſoldiers refuſed to confer the Empire upon any one of the conſpirators, and deſired the Senate to chooſe another Emperor, and to deify Aurelian (60). The Senate would not take upon them the choice of an Emperor; but with reſpect to the divine honours which the army demanded for Aurelian, they were decreed without any delay. Tacitus (61), who gave his opinion firſt in the Senate, made a fine ſpeech, which deſerves to be ſet down here, as it contains an handſome abridgment of his moſt eminent actions, and ſeveral thoughts, which are very curious. Rectè atque ordine conſuluiſſent Dii immortales, P. C. ſi boni ferro inviolabiles extitiſſent, ut longiorem ducerent vitam; neque contra eos aliqua eſſet poteſtas iis, qui neces infandas triſtiſſima mente concipiunt. Viveret enim princeps noſter Aurelianus, quo neque utilior fuit quiſquam. Reſpirare certè poſt infelicitatem Valeriani, poſt Gallieni mala, imperante Claudio cæperat noſtra Reſpublica; at eadem reddita fuerat Aureliano toto penitus orbe vincente. Ille nobis Gallias dedit; ille Italiam liberavit; ille Vindelicis jugum Barbaricæ ſervitutis amovit. Illo vivente Illyricum reſtitutum eſt, redditæ Romanis legibus Thraciæ. Ille (proh pudor) Orientem fœmineo preſſum jugo in noſtra jura reſtituit, ille Perſas inſultantes adhuc Valeriani nece, fudit, fugavit, oppreſſit. Illum Saraceni, Blemyes, Axomitæ, Bactriani, Seres, Hiberi, Albani, Armenii, populi etiam Indorum, veluti præſentem penè venerati ſunt Deum. Illius donis, quæ a Barbaris gentibus meruit, refertum eſt Capitolium: quindecim millia librarum auri ex ejus liberalitate unum tenet templum, omnia in urbe fana ejus micant donis. Quare P. C. vel Deos ipſos jure convenio, qui talem principem interire paſſi ſunt, niſi forte ſecum cum eſſe maluerunt. Decerno igitur divinos honores; id quod vos omnes exiſtimo eſſe facturos. Nam de imperatore diligendo ad eundem exercitum cenſeo eſſe referendum. Etenim in tali genere ſententiæ niſi fiat quod dicitur, & electi periculum erit, & eligentis invidia. Probata eſt Sententia Taciti (62). That is, "The immortal Gods would "have done well, O Conſcript Fathers, to have made "good men invulnerable, that their lives might have "been extended, and ſecured from the power of "thoſe who conceive wicked deſigns againſt them. "Then we ſhould have had our Emperor Aurelian "alive, who was one of the beſt men in the world. "Our Commonwealth began to revive, after the unfortunate reigns of Valerian and Gallienus, under "the government of Claudius, but it was abſolutely "reſtored by Aurelian, who was victorious in every "part of the world. He gave us Gaul; he freed "Italy; he reſcued the Vindelici from the oppreſſion "of the Barbarians; under his care Illyricum was "reſtored, and Thrace recovered to the Roman Empire. He reduced the Eaſt, which laboured under "the diſhonourable yoke of a woman, to our command; he defeated and humbled the Perſians, who "were grown inſolent upon Valerian's death. The "Saracens, Blemyes, Axomitæ, Bactrians, Seres, "Hiberi, Albanians, Armenians and Indians, revered him almoſt as a preſent Deity. The Capitol is full of the ſpoils which he gained from barbarous nations; one temple poſſeſſes fifteen thouſand "pounds of Gold by his liberality, and all the other "temples of the city are adorned with his gifts. "Therefore, Conſcript Fathers, I may juſtly expoſtulate with the Gods, who have ſuffered ſuch "a man to die, unleſs they choſe to take him to "themſelves. I decree then divine honours to him, "which I believe every one of you will readily agree "to. For I think the choice of another Emperor is "to be referred to the army; becauſe unleſs that be "done in this caſe, the perſon choſen will be in danger, and thoſe who chooſe him be expoſed to envy. "This opinion of Tacitus was approved of." The ſame Tacitus being choſen Emperor a few months after (63), began his reign with ordering four ſtatues to be erected to Aurelian, one of gold in the Capitol, and three of ſilver in other places, and that every perſon ſhould have a picture of this great Prince. The three ſilver ſtatues were dedicated, but not that in the Capitol. In eadem oratione Aureliano ſtatuam auream ponendam in Capitolio decrevit; item ſtatuam argenteam in Curia, item in templo Solis, item in foro Trajani. Sed aurea non eſt poſita: dedicata autem ſunt ſolæ argenteæ. In eadem oratione cavit, ut ſi quis argento publicè privatumque æs miſcuiſſet, ſi quis auro argentum, ſi quis æri plumbum, capital eſſet cum bonorum proſcriptione . . . . . Addidit, ut Aurelianum omnes pictum haberent (64).

(56) Vopiſc. cap. 37.

(57) Qui ſciret Aurelianum, neque fruſtra minari ſolere, neque ſi minaretur, ignoſcere. idem, cap. 36.

(58) Mixtis iis, quibus Aurelianus verè iraſcebatur, cum iis, de quibus nihil aſperum cogitabat. Vopiſc. cap. 36.

(59) Idem, cap. 37.

(60) Idem, cap. 41.

(61) He was choſen Emperor a few months after.

(62) Vopiſc. cap. 41. pag. 526, 527.

(63) It was by the Senate; for the army, to whom the Senate left the choice of a new Emperor, ſtill referred it to the Senate, who at laſt undertook it.

(64) Vopiſc. in Tacito, cap. 9. pag. 608.

[L] There was no Deity, to whom he teſtified more reverence, than to the Sun.] I preſume his firſt education was the cauſe of this; for it is probable his mother, who was a Prieſteſs of the Sun, inſpired him from thoſe who ſpeak of it, agree that it was of very ſhort continuance (oo). I muſt not conclude this article without obſerving a diſtinction which Vopiſcus makes, and which few perſons are capable of making [M]: Such was the end of Aurelian, ſays he (pp), a Prince more neceſſary than good. What is reported by Angeloni concerning ſeveral pieces of marble, which were found in the reign of Pope Urban VIII, while they were levelling the place, where Aurelian had built a temple upon Mount Quirinal (qq), may juſtly give us a grand idea of the magnificence of that edifice.

(oo) See Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 3. pag. 1085, & ſeq.

(pp) Hic finis Aureliano fuit, principi magis neceſſario quam bono. Vopiſc. in Aurel. cap. 37.

(qq) Franceſco Angeloni, Hiſtoria Auguſta da Giulio Ceſare in fino a Conſtantino il Magno, illuſtrata con la Verita delle antiche Medaglie, pag. 332.

from his infancy with a particular devotion for this God (65). However that be, we find, that when he returned his thanks to Valerian, who had appointed him Conſul, he made uſe of theſe expreſſions, Dii faciant, & Deus certus Sol, ut & Senatus de me ſic judicet (66): i. e. "May the Gods, and eſpecially the "Sun, an undoubted Deity, grant, that the Senate "likewiſe may have the ſame opinion of me." A learned man (67) pretends, that he ſpoke thus in a Letter (68), as if the other Gods were doubtful, except the Sun only. In the battle, which he won near Emeſſa over the forces of Zenobia, it is ſaid that he was aſſiſted by a Deity, who encouraged his ſoldiers, and cauſed the foot to ſupport the horſe, who were ready to give ground (69). Upon his entry into Emeſſa as Conqueror, he went to the Temple of the Sun; Statim ad Templum Heliogabali tetendit, quaſi communi officio vota ſoluturus; and found there the ſame figure of a God, who had been favourable to him in the battle. Upon this account he built ſeveral temples in that place (70), and afterwards cauſed a temple to be dedicated to the Sun at Rome (71). He commanded likewiſe the temple of that God to be rebuilt in Palmyra. I ſhall give the very orders, which he diſpatched for that purpoſe, becauſe they will ſhew us at the ſame time the cruelty of this Emperor, and his devotion for the Sun. Aurelianus Auguſtus Ceionio Baſſo. Non oportet tot ulterius progredi militum gladios. Jam ſatis Palmyrenorum cæſum atque conciſum eſt. Mulieribus non pepercimus, infantes occidimus, ſenes jugulavimus, ruſticos interemimus; cui terras, cui urbem relinquemus? Parcendum eſt iis qui remanſerunt. Credimus enim tam paucos tam multorum ſuppliciis eſſe correctos. Templum ſane ſolis, quod apud Palmyram aquilifer legionis tertiæ cum vexilliferis & draconario & cornicinibus atque liticinibus diripuerunt, ad eam formam volo quæ fuit, reddi. Habes trecentas auri libras à Zenobiæ capſulis; habes argenti mille octingenta pondo. De Palmyrenorum domis habes gemmas regias. Ex his omnibus fac coheneſtari templum: mihi & Diis immortalibus gratiſſimum feceris. Ego ad Senatum ſcribam, petens ut mittat pontificem, qui dedicet templum (72). That is: "Aurelianus Auguſtus to Ceionius Baſſus "Greeting. It is not fit that the ſwords of my ſoldiers "ſhould proceed any further. A ſufficient number "of the Palmyrenians have been ſlain. We have "not ſpared the women; we have killed the infants, "and old men, and peaſants; to whom then ſhall "we afterwards leave the lands and the city? We "muſt ſpare thoſe, who remain: for we believe that "ſuch a few will be corrected by the puniſhment of "ſo many. As for the Temple of the Sun at Palmyra, which the Standard-bearer of the third Legion with his Enſigns, and colours, and trumpets, "and fifes plundered, I would have it reſtored to its "original form. You have three hundred pounds "from Zenobia's cabinets, and a thouſand eight hundred pounds of ſilver; and the royal jewels from "the ſpoils of the Palmyrenians. With theſe riches "I would have you adorn the Temple; which will "be very acceptable to me and to the immortal "Gods. I ſhall write to the Senate, to deſire them "to ſend a Prieſt to dedicate the Temple."

(65) Idem in Aurelian. cap. 4.

(66) Idem, ibid. cap. 14.

(67) Spanheim, Not. in Cæſar. Julian. pag. 109.

(68) Vopiſcus repreſents him as ſpeaking in this manner.

(69) Vopiſc. cap. 25.

(70) Illic templa fundavit donariis ingentibus poſitis. Idem, cap. 30.

(71) Idem, ibid. cap. 35.

(72) Idem, cap. 31. pag. 489.

[M] Vopiſcus has made a diſtinction, ... which few perſons are capable of making.] The defects of Aurelian were uſeful: the State had occaſion for them; but in Vopiſcus's opinion it does not follow from thence, that he was a good Emperor. This expreſſion ſhews, that the Author was a perſon, who did not confound things. A vaſt number of people know nothing of this diſtinction. They conſider ſimply and abſolutely that as a good and juſt Government, which has prevented or put a ſtop to any great evil; and if they can imagine with themſelves, that a Government is unjuſt, they regard it as ſimply and abſolutely as bad, without any reſpect to the neceſſary advantages, which the public reaps from it.

AUREOLUS (PETER) a Franciſcan Friar, and afterwards Archbiſhop of Aix, was one of the moſt ſubtile and celebrated Divines of his age. He flouriſhed about the end of the thirteenth Century, and in the beginning of the fourteenth. He was born at Verberie upon the Oiſe, and his name was Oriol (a); but as he is known only by the Latiniz'd name which was given him, I place him here, without following Moreri's example, who refers us from Aureolus to Oriol. We might more eaſily excuſe this, if we could find under the article ORIOL all that we might reaſonably expect from an Hiſtorian, who quotes the life of this illuſtrious Archbiſhop of Aix (b); but here we are diſappointed. I am not able to remedy this defect, for I do not think, that in all the United Provinces there is one perſon who can ſupply me with the book in which this life of Aureolus is publiſhed. All that I can ſay is reduced to theſe few particulars; Aureolus was Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Paris (c); he had the title of Doctor facundus (d), the Eloquent Doctor, given him. He was Provincial of Aquitain, when he was made Archbiſhop of Aix (e), and lived but a ſhort time after he was raiſed to this high dignity [A]. It is ſaid, that he was promoted to a Cardinalſhip. He was a man of a ſubtile genius, but too fond of diſtinguiſhing himſelf by new opinions [B]. It

(a) Labbe, Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 2. pag. 183.

(b) Plac'd, as he tells us, before Oriol's Commentaries upon the Maſter of the Sentences, printed at Roan in 1595.

(c) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 2. p. 183.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Bellarm. de Script. Eccleſiaſt. pag. 365.

[A] He lived but a ſhort time after he was raiſed to the dignity of Archbiſhop of Aix.] The Archbiſhoprick was given him in 1321, and we find that James de Concos de Cabrairez a Dominican was inſtalled in the ſame Archbiſhoprick the 10th of July 1322 (1); ſo that the 27th of April, in which Aureolus died (2), muſt at the lateſt be in the year 1322. We ſee the negligence of that Age; they ſatisfied themſelves even with reſpect to an Archbiſhop with marking only the day on which he died, without ever mentioning the date of the year.

(1) Labbe, Diſſert. de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 2. pag. 184.

(2) Idem, ibid.

[B] He was too fond of diſtinguiſhing himſelf by new opinions.] This is the characteriſtic of a very dangerous ſpirit; it is a rock very much to be feared; we have ſcarce ever ſeen, that thoſe, who have genius and learning enough to oppoſe ſtrongly the common received opinions, have judgment enough to ſtop where they ſhould, and to diſcern what has no occaſion to be reformed. In the following paſſage we have a juſt character of ſuch men, amongſt whom our Aureolus is particularly named. Ex hac claſſe, inſignia ingenia duo, Durandus & Aureolus, minus benè audiunt, quod ingeniis quibus valebant plurimum indulſerunt in pleriſque; & novas cudere ac comminiſci opiniones, communem tramitem ſine cauſa deſerendo non dubitârint. Eſtque haud dubiè argumentum judicii minus exquiſiti, nec ſatis maturi vel emuncti, ferri facilè, & abſque urgenti ratione, extra viam, ita ut quamvis

It is pretended that he maintained the impoſſibility of the creation [C]. The Dominicans had in him a formidable adverſary, and employed one of their beſt pens [D] to confute him with a great deal of ſpirit and vigour. I ſhall ſay ſomething of his writings [E]. The vit res de qua agitur, ad ſcholæ tricas merè pertineat, nec inde diſpendium ullum doctrinæ fidei vel ſanis ac puris moribus ſit timendum, tamen conſultiſſimum ſit, quando manifeſta ratio non urget, ab anteriorum placitis non diſcedere (3). We muſt confeſs, however, that ſuch innovating genius's (4), and even thoſe, which are a little reſtleſs and unfixed, are ſometimes neceſſary; for without them could we poſſibly make any conſiderable progreſs? Should we not be tempted to continue in indolence under pretence that every thing is diſcovered already, and that we ought to be content with the opinions of our Fathers, as well as with their Earth and Sun? The diſputes and diſturbances raiſed by men of ambitious, bold, and raſh tempers, are not always a real abſolute evil; they may be as great an evil as you pleaſe, but there are ſome advantages riſing from them with regard to the ſciences and the cultivation of the mind. We may ſay this even of civil wars. A very honeſt Gentleman obſerved this with reſpect to thoſe, who laid France waſte in the 16th Century. He pretends that they refined the genius, or the language of ſome perſons; that they rectified the judgment of others, and ſerved as a bath to cleanſe ſome, and as a curry-comb to rub off the filth of others. Here are his own words; his thoughts and expreſſions are ſo juſt, that they deſerve to be particularly ſet down. Ut ſæpe res adverſæ inexpectatis bonis locum faciunt, ita in hac publicâ, & omnium maxima calamitate res autor dari poteſt, quibuſdam ingenium evaſiſſe limatius, acumen perſpicacius, judicium reſecatius, os mundius, ſcripta purgatiora, prorſus ut agnoſcere liceat ærumnarum procellas, quibus æſtuavimus, his eſſe balneus, quæ ſordes eluerint, aliis ſtrigilem, quæ ſquammam deterſit, quibuſdam uredinem, quæ abſumpſit quicquid luxurians & inutile. Denique ſi quis verè æſtimet, nunc demum intelligemus, eam, quæ Reipublicæ tempeſtas fuit, privatim & pauculis eſſe cotem, qua acuitur, & jaculam qua accenditur quicquid in ſingulis eſt optimum (5). Indeed the public would readily be without ſuch ſevere purgations, or curry-combs, or files, or whetſtones, as they may be called; it were much better to continue ſick, than to be cured by a remedy ſo terribly ſevere. However that be, we have a Doctor here, who values himſelf upon being of a different opinion from every body in his Commentary upon the Maſter of the Sentences; but on the other hand, he was ſingle in his opinion; every one was proud to attack him; he was compared to Iſhmael. Quem (Petrum Aureolum) *Antoninus ait, * ita ſcripſiſſe in librum Sententiarum, ut quia manus ejus contra omnes, qui jam antea ſcripſerant, etiam manus omnium contra eum fuerint* (6).

(3) Theoph. Raynaudus, Erotem. de malis ac bonis lib. num. 430. pag. 250.

(4) I would not be underſtood to mean thoſe, who endeavour after neceſſary reformations of things.

(5) Carolus Paſchalius de optimo genere Elocutionis, pag. 124.

* Ant. tit. 24. cap. 8. parag. 2.

(6) Spondanus ad ann. 1337, num. 10. p. 460.

[C] It is pretended, that he maintained the Impoſſibility of the Creation.] The proofs, which I have in this affair, are very ſmall; for I can only acquaint the reader, that Theophilus Raynaud, after he has rejected ſome reaſons of Averroes as very weak, adds that the arguments, with which Aureolus had ill employed his genius to ſhew that the Creation is impoſſible, are reduced to the ſame. Eodem recidunt argumenta, quibus Aureolus apud Capreolum in 2. d. 1. q. 2. in argumentis contra quartam, parum feliciter ingenium exercuit, ut probaret creationem eſſe impoſſibilem (7). We may obſerve, that he never read Aureolus, and that he knew no more of his opinion, than what is related by his antagoniſt Capreolus. This puts a new neceſſity upon me to grope in the dark; but I think I am not miſtaken in the conjecture, which I am going to advance. I ſuppoſe that Aureolus did not ſimply and abſolutely deny, that the Creation was poſſible; for this would have been to ſtart an opinion directly contrary to the Roman Faith. He only maintains, that for ſuch and ſuch reaſons he ſhould have thought it impoſſible for any Being to be made of nothing, if faith had not told him, that we muſt underſtand the words, which the Scripture makes uſe of concerning the firſt Formation of the world, in the proper ſenſe of creation. Having recovered himſelf with this ſhield, he might ſafely employ all the ſtrength of his genius to prove the Impoſſibility of the Creation: he ventured only a philoſophical diſpute, in which he had no reaſon to fear the want of querks and ſubtilties to defend himſelf, I am ſure, that thoſe, who ſhall have in their ſtudy a copy of Capreolus, when they read this, will be curious enough to conſult him, that they may ſee whether this great antagoniſt of Aureolus has faithfully repreſented the ſtate of the queſtion. There are a great many perſons, who upon ſuch an occaſion would ſatisfy themſelves with telling us only, that they are confuting a certain Doctor, who has maintained that the Creation is impoſſible, and with exaggerating the pernicious conſequences of ſuch a notion, without acquainting us that ſome Doctor ſecured the intereſts of orthodoxy, and ſubmits to the authority of tradition the moſt ſubtile arguments, which the light of nature can ſuggeſt to him. I know that Aureolus upon another occaſion has governed himſelf in the ſame manner as I am ſuppoſing he did with regard to the Creation; which adds a greater probability to my conjecture. He tells us, that nothing but the authority of the Saints could induce him to believe that Tranſubſtantiation is a real change of the whole bread into the whole Body of our Saviour. I have read this in a work of Dr. Allix. Petrus Aureolus Romanæ Eccleſiæ Cardinalis hoc profitetur: Propter ſolas authoritates Sanctorum teneo, quod Tranſubſtantiatio eſt verus tranſitus & converſio totius panis in totum corpus Domini. in 4. diſt. 11. q. 1. n. 2 (8).

(7) Theoph. Raynaud, in Theol. Naturali, Diſt. 8. num. 334. pag. 1039.

(8) Petrus Allix. Præfat. Hiſtorica de Dogmate Tranſubſtantiationis, pag. 66.

[D] The Dominicans employed one of their beſt pens to confute him.] It was the ſame Capreolus, whom I have mentioned above. Conſult his Commentary upon the Maſter of the Sentences. He preſſed him with a great deal of vehemence, and attacked with all his force Aureolus's Commentary upon the ſame Maſter. Quæ (Commentaria Aureoli) in ſuis in eaſdem ſententias Commentariis ſæpius excuſſit excogitavitque Joannes Capreolus (9). He inſinuates, that the falſe interpretations, which Aureolus made uſe of, and which ſerved as a foundation for his horrid inferences, were not always the reſult of his ignorance, but ſprung partly from his prejudices and paſſion. I am informed of this only by Father Baron, who expreſſes himſelf thus: Memini me Capreolum neſcio quo ex quæſtionibus in primum Sentent. loco legere, ſoluto quodam argumento Aureoli, quod ad grande aliquod impium, & abſurdum ex falſâ interpretatione noſtræ ſententiæ rem deduxerat, hæc modeſtè adjunxiſſe Capreolum; ex noſtrâ reſponſione patet hanc objectionem Aureoli profectam eſſe ex perverſo intellectu, quicquid ſit de affectu (10). We may obſerve, that Conſtantius Sarnanus, a Franciſcan Monk and Cardinal wrote a Book, in which he pretends to reconcile Aureolus's opinions with thoſe of Capreolus (11). He attempts to ſhew likewiſe the agreement between St. Thomas Aquinas's doctrines and thoſe of Scotus (12). It was in this manner that attempts have been to ſhew a correſpondence between Plato and Ariſtotle. This is mere trifling with the readers, or indeed expoſing thoſe, whom they endeavour to reconcile, to ridicule, without intending it. Such an agreement is diſhonourable to the parties, and there would be ſome reaſon to apprehend ſevere reproaches from them, for undertaking the office of a mediator, if the heads of the diſpute ſhould ever return into the world. They would expoſtulate in this manner: What, do you pretend, that there was only a diſpute about words in this point; and that we agree together in the main of the doctrines without our perceiving it, ſo poſſeſſed were we with prejudice, which hindered us from underſtanding what we ſaid? This is a direct Satyr upon us; we'll accept of no reconciliation upon ſuch ſhocking terms as theſe. Away with your projects for reuniting us; we had rather have a perpetual conteſt with each other, than ſee it concluded by ſo ſcandalous an imputation upon our ſenſe and learning. It is remarkable, that there are ſome occaſions, where the warmeſt controverſies have riſen only from the parties miſunderſtanding each other; but I am of opinion that this is not the caſe of the doctrines of St. Thomas Aquinas and Scotus, and conſequently of the difference, which there is between the Scotiſt Aureolus, and the Thomiſt Capreolus.

(9) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 2. p. 184.

(10) Vincent. Baron. Apologetic. lib. 1. Sect. 2. pag. 240.

(11) Oldoini, Athen. Roman. pag. 176.

(12) Idem, ibid.

[E] I ſhall ſay ſomething of his writings.] Thoſe, who have mentioned them, have been ſo very negligent, gent, that they have not obſerved any diſtinction either between the writings, which remain of him, and thoſe which are loſt, or between the works, which have been printed, and thoſe, which were never publiſhed. Father Labbe (13), who complains of this negligence which is too common to Bibliographers, promiſed to repair very amply; but he died without publiſhing that large volume, of which the Diſſertation, which I have quoted, was only a forerunner (14). He obſerves that the Breviarium Bibliorum of Aureolus, five Epitome univerſæ ſacræ ſcripturæ juxta literalem ſenſum, was printed at Venice in 1571, and at Paris in 1585 (15), by the care of Sthephen Nouellet, Doctor of Sorbonne, and that his Commentaries upon the four Books of Sentences were printed at Rome, in folio in 1595, and dedicated to Pope Clement VIII, by Cardinal Conſtantius Sarhanus (16). He rejects what Father Maracci tells us in his Bibliotheca Mariana, that the treatiſe of Aureolus de Conceptione immaculata B. Virginis was printed at Toulouſe in 1314: he ſays, that perhaps this writing was written that year, or printed in 1514.

The reader will find in the remark [A] the time of his death.

(13) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 2. pag. 184.

(14) In the Preface to his Diſſertation de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt.

(15) Oldoini in his Athenæum Romanum, pag. 532. puts ann. 1581.

(16) Oldoini ſays the ſame thing, pag. 533 of his Athenæum Romanum.

I ſhall make a few ſhort notes upon all this. I. The Catalogue of the Oxford Library mentions the Epitome totius S. Scripturæ, printed at Straſbourg in 1514. Father Labbe did not know that edition; Geſner likewiſe knew nothing of it: the Epitome of Geſner publiſhed in 1583, mentions no book of Aureolus, which had been printed; and we may obſerve, that he very erroneouſly diſtinguiſhes our Peter Aureolus from Petrus de Verberia dictus Aureoli. II. It is a miſtake, that the Commentaries upon the four Books of Sentences were printed at Rome in 1595. Bellarmin aſſures us, that he had ſeen only the Commentary upon the firſt of thoſe four Books, and this Commentary was printed at Rome in 1596 (17). The Catalogue of the Oxford Library, and that of the Archbiſhop of Reims's Library, place in that year the edition of Aureolus's Commentary upon the firſt Book of the Sentences, and in the year 1605 the edition of his Commentary upon the three following Books with the Quodlibeta. All theſe make two volumes in folio, printed at Rome, the former in 1596 at the Vatican; the latter by Lanetti in 1605. I am ſurprized, that Bellarmin knew nothing of the impreſſion of the laſt volume. This is ſomewhat more ſtrange, than to find in Moreri that we have ſeveral editions of Aureolus's Commentaries upon the Maſter of the Sentences, but that of Rome in 1595 is the moſt correct. How could he ſhew us theſe ſeveral editions? Would he have dated that of Rome, as he has done, if he had known what I have remark'd above? III. I muſt obſerve, that Father Labbe has been too civil to Father Maracci, who imagined that there were books printed in 1314. Does not every body know, that it was never in uſe in Europe till about the middle of the fifteenth Century? What then did the Jeſuit Oldoini dream of, when he pretended to have ſeen Aureolus's treatiſe de Conceptione Virginis Mariæ, printed at Toulouſe in 1314? De Conceptione Virginis Mariæ, & Librum, qui habetur MS. Toloſæ in Collegio Fuxenſi, & excuſum vidimus Toloſæ anno 1314 (18).

(17) Bellarmin. de Script. Eccleſiaſt. pag. 365.

(18) Oldoini, Athen. Romanum, pag. 533.

AURIEGE, or rather Ariege [A], a river of France, has its ſource from the mountains which ſerve as boundaries to the county of Foix towards Rouſſillon. It paſſes by Taraſcon, Foix, Parmies, Barilles, Bonac (a), Saverdun, Sainte-Gabelle, Haute-Rive, and falls into the Garonne at Portet about a league above Toulouſe, after it has received on the right the waters of the river Lers, and on the left thoſe of Arget, and of the Leze [B]. The Ariege is rapid and full of fiſh, and the water of it very good to drink; but it is not navigable but from Haute-Rive. Du Bartas praiſes it extremely [C]. See (a) It is a Lordſhip, which was erected into a Marquiſate for the late Mr. Duſſon, elder brother to Mr. de Bonrepaux, Ambaſſador of France to the Court of Denmark, and afterwards to Holland.

[A] ARIEGE.] It is called by this name in the country, thro' which it paſſes. It is named Aregia in the old Maps, and Areia in a manuſcript Martyrology in the Monaſtery of Moiſſac. We find in this manuſcript the Paſſion of St. Antonine, who ſuffered martyrdom at Pamie's, and we are aſſured that the barque, in which his body was laid, entered by this river into the Garonne. Per fluvium, qui Areia dicitur, ad Garonnam uſque perveniens fluvium navicula (in qua corpus Antonini Mart. à Gentilibus necati) inde alium, qui Tarnis dicitur, inveniens fluvium, inde retrogrado curſu per Tarnin intravit in Avarionis alveum (1). Hadrian Valeſius, from whom I have extracted this, has criticiſed upon thoſe, who call it Auriege, and been very ſevere upon Papyrius Maſſo, who called it Aurigera. Fluvius eſt vulgò dictus Ariege, quibuſdam corrupte l'Auriege; à Maſſono (2) priſci ejus fluvii nominis ignaro Aurigera novo ac ridiculo nomine nuncupatus (3). Mr. Baudrand is of opinion, that the true Latin name of this river is Alburacis (4). I wiſh he had quoted ſome good author for it. Mr. Sanſon calls it Lauriegne in a Map, which he publiſhed in 1675 (5). Moſt of the proper names there are ſo diſguiſed, that it is to be ſuppoſed they were the errors of the Engraver. Moreri imagined very pleaſantly, that the Auriege or Lauriege are two names, that are uſed. He forgot the true one, and never conſidered that the two names, which he mentioned, are the ſame, the firſt without an article, and the latter with one. His miſtake is juſt ſuch an one, as it would be to ſay of the river, which paſſes thro' Paris, that it is called Seine or La Seine. I know that a great many Authors laugh at a Writer, who corrects their errors of this kind, and boaſt that they are above ſuch trifles as theſe: but they are a vain ſett of men, who would conceal their ignorance, or indolence, or want of taſte, or inaccuracy, under a ſpecious maſk. If we were to mention a city or river only occaſionally in a work of reaſoning, the faults, which theſe Gentlemen call trifles, would be excuſable. But the caſe is not ſo, when they happen in the principal ſubject of a Book. That, which is only an inconſiderable nicety in the writing of a Divine, would ſometimes be a capital error in a Geographer, or the Author of a Dictionary. I have recollected that Papyrius Maſſo calls it la Riege. See the remark [A] of the article GARONNE.

(1) Hadrian. Valeſ. in Notitiâ Galliæ, pag. 26.

(2) Papyr. Maſſo, in Deſcript. Fluminum Galliæ pag. 470.

(3) Valeſii Notitia Galliæ, pag. 26.

(4) See his Geography, pag. 33, 88, and 128.

(5) That of the Pyrenean Mountains.

[B] After it has received on the right the waters of the river Lers, it receives on the left thoſe of Arget and Leze.] Moreri deſerves here a ſhort animadverſion: he ſays that the Auriege, having receiv'd the Lers, the Arget, and the Leze, joins the Garonne. This plainly ſignifies, that the mouth of the Lers is above the mouth of the Arget, and that the mouth of the Leze is between the other two. Nothing is more falſe than this. The Arget falls into the Ariege near Foix, and there are eight or nine Gaſcogne leagues between Foix and Sainte Gabelle, near which is the mouth of the Lers. Lertius verò in Aurigeram labitur prope Templum S. Gauvillæ (6). The Leze has its entrance three or four leagues below that of Lers. Coulon might have informed Moreri concerning the order of theſe mouths. Note, he obſerves, that the Auriege is called by the Latins AURIGERA (7), and Larget ARGENTIGERA (8), and that the one carries gold, and the other ſilver (9). He took this remark perhaps from Olhagarai; for he has told us what follows: And what ſhall we ſay of the Lers with its flux and reflux (10)? And of the Auriege and Arget, rivers with gold and ſilver banks? Does not this make it probable, that there are treaſures hid in the bowels of theſe mountains (11)?

(6) Papyrii Maſſoni, Deſcriptio Flum. Galliæ, pag. 470.

(7) Coulon Rivieres de France, tom. 1. p. 483.

(8) He had called it twice before l'Argot, which is the true Orthography.

(9) Obſerve that Bertrand Helias, Hiſtor. Comitum Fuxenſium, lib. 1. relates ſeveral curious circumſtances concerning this gold. Papyrius Maſſo, Deſcrip. Flum. Gall. pag. 412. gives us his words.

(10) See concerning this wonderful Phenomenon the 3d day of the 1ſt week of du Bartas, pag. 288.

(11) Pierre Olhagarai, preface to the Hiſtoire de Foix, Bearn, & Navarre.

[C] Du Bartas praiſes it extremely.] Here is the third Sonnet of his nine Pyrenean Muſes, preſented to the King of Navarre (12).

Fleuve d'or & de flot & de nom & de ſable,
Riche in grains, en paſtel, en fruits, en vins, en bois,
Auriege au viſte cours clair ornement de Foix,
Qui rend par ton tribut Garonne navigable,
Fille de ſi grand Mont, qui cache, eſpouvantable,
Son front dedans le ciel, qui chenu tous les Mois.
Depuis le bord du ſu juſq'au bord Eſcoſſois,

(12) Du Bartas, in his Appendix to his 1ſt Week, pag. 934.

See likewiſe the paſſage of Bertrand Helias, quoted by Papyrius Maſſo (b).

(b) Papyr. Maſſoni Deſcript. Flum. Galliæ, pag. 412.

Ne void autre plus grand à ſa grandeur ſemblable ;
Clair flot, je te ſeroy par un diſcours facond,
Plus riche que Pactol, plus que le Nil fecond :
Plus loin que l'Ocean on orroit tes eaux bruire :
Fier, on t' egaleroit aux fleuves les plus grands ;
On te verroit au ciel comme le Po reluire,
Si je voycy tes bords repurges de brigans (13).

(13) Since Du Bartas's time things have been changed much for the better in that point.

See likewiſe the ſeventh Sonnet, where you'll find this in the beginning :

François, arreſte toy, ne paſſe la campagne,
Que nature mura de Rochers d'un coſté,
Que l'Auriege entrefend d'un cours precipité ;
Campagne qui n'a point en beauté de campagne (14).

(24) Du Bartas, Appendix de la 1 Semaine, pag. 936.

AURISPA (JOHN) born at Noto in Sicily (a), was one of the moſt learned men of the fifteenth Century. He underſtood the Greek and Latin tongues ; was a good Orator, and wrote finely, conſidering the age, both in proſe and verſe. It is ſaid, that he was honoured with the poetical crown in Italy. He was Secretary to Pope Nicholas V, who gave him conſiderable marks of his favour, by preſenting him with two rich Abbeys [A]. He carried on a long correſpondence of letters with Philelphus ; and we find his name mentioned with commendation in Laurentius Valla, Anthony Panormita, and ſeveral other illuſtrious Authors. He retired to Ferrara, and lived there to a great age, honoured with the eſteem of the Lords of that country [B] ; I mean with an eſteem which was of advantage to him in every reſpect, for he received from their liberality not only what was ſufficient to ſupport him, but even to raiſe himſelf a conſiderable fortune (b). What he wrote is now very difficult to be found [C].

(a) This city is called Netum in Latin.

(b) Taken from the Elogia Siculorum qui Literis floruerunt, written by the Jeſuit Jerom Raguza, pag. 147, & ſeq.

[A] Pope Nicholas V. . . preſented him with two rich Abbeys.] He gave him that of St. Philip de Grandi (1) the 31ſt of May 1449, and that of St. Mary de la Roccade (2) in 1451. Auriſpa had a law-ſuit for this latter benefice with a man, who had been preſented to it by Alphonſus King of Naples. See Rocchus Pirrus p. 225 of his Notitia of the Church of Syracuſe (3).

(1) It is at Meſſina.

(2) It is at Lentini in Sicily.

(3) Taken from Jerom Raguza, pag. 148, 149. Elogiorum Siculorum.

[B] He retired to Ferrara, and lived there . . . . . honoured with the eſteem of the Lords of that country.] I prove all this by a paſſage of Giraldus. Joannes Auriſpa, Siculus, ſays he (4), Orator in aliquo Poetarum ordine reponi poteſt, quippe qui Græcè & Latinè probe doctus eſt ; carmina tamen ejus, quæ ipſe legi, neſcio quid Sicularum gerrarum habere videntur : fuit enim eo tempore, quo nondum exquiſitæ literæ in lucem redierunt. Vixit autem Ferrariæ ad ſummam ſenectutem, in pretio habitus à noſtris principibus, qui & eum locupletem reddiderunt : ab hoc ferunt Ciſtarellam familiam originem duxiſſe.

(4) Lilius Gregor. Gyrald. de Poet. ſuorum temporum, Dial. 1. pag. 531. See likewiſe Geſner in Bibliothec. fol. 386 verſo.

[C] What he wrote is now very difficult to be found.] Here are the Books which are aſcribed to him : A Tranſlation of Archimedes, a Verſion of Hierocles's Commentary upon the golden Verſes of Pythagoras, and another of Philiſcus's Treatiſe of Conſolation to Cicero. The Epitome of Geſner mentions theſe three works, without telling us whether they were ever printed. We know, that Auriſpa's Hierocles was printed at Baſil by Henry Peter in 8vo 1543 (5). Geſner quotes a paſſage from the Preface, by which it appears, that this Tranſlation was made when the Author was already eighty years old (6). There was in Gabriel Naude's Library a manuſcript intitled, Comparatio de Præſidentia Hannibalis Carthaginenſis, Alexandri Magni, & Scipionis Majoris Romani, apud Inferos, ex Græco in Latinum converſa ab Auriſpa Oratore ad Baptiſtam Senatorii & Equeſtris Ordinis Civem Romanum (7).

(5) See Geſner, Biblioth. fol. 231 verſo.

(6) Geſner, Biblioth. fol. 231 verſo.

(7) Labbe, Nova Biblioth. MSS. Librorum, pag. 231. edit. an. 1653.

AUROGALLUS (MATTHEW) a learned man of the ſixteenth Century, and Profeſſor of three Languages in the Univerſity of Wittemberg (a), was born in Bohemia. He was curious in collecting a great number of good books of the Antients, and he was not contented with valuing them, as a great many others do, who ſeek only to raiſe themſelves a name by their vaſt Libraries, but he was charmed with reading them. I have ſeen an Epiſtle Dedicatory (b), in which he was deſired to publiſh Ætius the Phyſician, nineteen books of Natural Hiſtory written by an unknown Author, the Hymns of Callimachus, the Orations of the ten Athenian Orators, and a great many Greek manuſcripts, which were brought from the Eaſt to Bohemia by the Baron Bohuſlas of Haſſenſteyn, and fell into his hands, Cognationis & ſtudiorum hæreditario jure. It ſeems that we may infer from theſe Latin words, that he was a relation of that Baron. We have ſome books of his [A]. He died in 1543 (c), and had been of great ſervice to Luther in his tranſlation of the Bible.

(a) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of Parthenius, de amatoriis Affectibus, by Janus Cornarius, Medicus Zuiccavienſis, dated the 1ſt of April 1530.

(b) That which is mentioned in the preceding quotation.

(c) Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſtor. Konig is miſtaken in putting 1533, and quoting Micrælius.

[A] We have ſome Books of him.] I cannot tell whether we have any others beſides his Compendium Hebrææ Chaldææque Grammatices, printed at Wittemberg in 8vo in 1525, and de Hebræis Urbium, Regionum, Populorum, Fluminum, Montium, & aliorum locorum Nominibus Liber è veteri inſtrumento congeſtus, printed at Wittemberg in 1526, and at Baſil in 1539, in 8vo (1). This ſecond edition had been enlarged by the Author.

(1) Epit. Biblioth. Geſneri.

AUSONIUS, in Latin Decius, or rather Decimus Magnus Auſonius, one of the moſt excellent Poets of the fourth Century, was of Bourdeaux (a), and ſon to a famous Phyſician [A]. He was educated with a prodigious deal of care ; the whole family intereſted themſelves, (a) Auſon. in Præfat. ad Synagrium.

[A] He was ſon to a famous Phyſician.] Whoſe name was JULIUS AUSONIUS. He was born at Bazas, and ſettled himſelf at Bourdeaux (1). His wife's name was Æmilia Æonia, the daughter of Cecilius Argicius Arborius, who fled into Aquitain, after a proſcription, which had deprived him of all the eſtate, which he had in his own country (2). This Arborius having fixed in the city Aquæ Tarbellorum (3), married there a Lady, who had no fortune, and whoſe name was Æmilia Corinthia Maura. By this marriage he had one ſon and three daughters. The ſon is the ſame Æmilius Magnus Arborius, who taught Rhetoric at Toulouſe, and had a very particular care of the education of our Poet (4). One of the daughters was married to Julius Auſonius, and had four ſons, of whom the Poet Auſonius was the ſecond. The reader will find in his Parentalia, or in his Epicedion in Patrem the proofs of all theſe particulars, and what follows. This Julius Auſonius was a perſon of great merit, and if he was like the picture, which his ſon has left

(1) Auſon. in Præfat. ad Synagr. & in Epiced. Parent.

(2) The Province, which is now called Burgundy.

(3) Scaliger ſays that it is the city of Acqs on the Adour.

(4) Auſon. in Profeſſ. cap. 16. pag. 176.

themſelves in it (b), either becauſe his genius was very promiſing, or that the ſcheme of his nativity made them imagine that he would be raiſed to great honours [B]. He made a wonderful progreſs in polite Learning, and at the age of thirty years was choſen to teach Grammar at Bourdeaux (c). He was promoted ſome time after to the Profeſſorſhip of Rhetoric (d). He raiſed himſelf ſo great a reputation in that employment, that he was ſent for to court to be Preceptor of Gratian the ſon of the Emperor Valentinian. He made himſelf very agreeable both to his ſcholar, and his ſcholar's father; and he received ſuch rewards and honours, as ſhew him to be an inſtance of the truth of the maxim, which Juvenal lays down, that when fortune pleaſes a man may be raiſed from a Rhetorician left of him, he was one of the remains of the Golden Age. He maintained in all his conduct the greateſt uniformity imaginable. He offered gratis the aſſiſtance of his art to every one, who aſked it. He endeavoured to anſwer fully the good opinion, which was conceived of him: but never thought favourably of what he did:

(b) See his Poems intitled Parentalia.

(c) Auſon. in Præfat. ad Synagrium.

(d) Auſon. in Profeſſor. num. 24. pag. 187.

Judicium de me ſtudii præſtare bonorum:
Ipſe mihi, nunquam, judice me, placui (5).

(5) Auſon. in Epiced. p. 298.

He had an averſion to Law-ſuits; he never encreaſed nor leſſened his eſtate; he was never either a witneſs, or an informer againſt any perſon's life (6); he was without envy or ambition; he conſidered ſwearing and lying as both equally bad; he never engaged in any conſpiracy or plot, or cabal; he religiouſly obſerved the ſacred laws of friendſhip; he placed happineſs not in poſſeſſing what one would have, but in not wiſhing for what fortune had not given him:

(6) Indice me nullas, ſed neque teſte petit. Auſon. in Epiced. pag. 298.

Felicem ſcivi, non qui, quod vellet, haberet;
Sed qui per fatum non data non cuperet (7).

(7) Auſon. in Epiced. pag. 299.

He never endeavoured to penetrate into the ſecrets of another; he never raiſed falſe rumours againſt the reputation of his neighbour; and when he heard any true ſtories to the diſadvantage of others, he concealed them:

Non occurſator, non garrulus, obvia cernens,
Valvis & velo condita non adii.
Famam, quæ poſſet vitam lacerare bonorum,
Non finxi, & veram ſi ſcierim, tacui (8).

(8) Idem, ibid.

He never thought, that to have been abſolutely free from faults was a thing that deſerved praiſe; and he preferred good morals before the laws; that is, I preſume, he did a good action, becauſe it was good, and not merely in obedience to the laws:

Deliquiſſe nihil nunquam laudem eſſe putavi,
Atque bonos mores legibus antetuli (9).

(9) Idem, ibid.

He preſerved inviolably his conjugal faith for forty five years during which he was married (10); and if he had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing what he wiſh'd for accompliſhed, it was not thro' the extraordinary indulgence of fate, but becauſe he had confined his wiſhes within a very narrow compaſs:

(10) Idem, ibid. pag. 300.

Non quia Fatorum nimia indulgentia; ſed quod
Tam moderata illi vota fuere viro (11).

(11) Idem in Parent. cap. 1. pag. 110.

He has been compared to the ancient Sages of Greece, and he imitated them in the moſt difficult point of all, which was to practiſe what they taught: he was more ſollicitous to lead the life of a Philoſopher, than to talk like one:

Quem ſua contendit ſeptem ſapientibus ætas:
Quorum doctrinam moribus explicuit:
Viveret ut potius, quam diceret arte Sophorum,
Quanquam & facundo non rudis ingenio (12).

(12) Idem, ibid.

Yet he was eloquent enough in Greek, tho' not in Latin.

Sermone impromptus Latio, verum Attica Lingua
Suffecit culti vocibus eloquii (13).

(13) Idem in Epiced. p. 298.

We are not to wonder, that after his death he was honoured with this Elogium: There was no perſon, who imitated him; nor any one, whom he imitated.

Inde & perfunctæ manet hæc reverentia vitæ,
Ætas noſtra illi quod dedit hunc titulum:
Ut nullum Auſonius, quem ſectaretur, habebat;
Sic nullum, qui ſe nunc imitetur, habet (14).

(14) Idem in Parental. cap. 1. pag. 110.

We may obſerve, that he had the honour of ſeveral eminent offices, without the trouble of exerciſing them; and that he died at the age of ninety years, without having felt any decay. He walk'd without a ſtaff, and had his ſenſes entire.

Curia me duplex, & uterque Senatus habebat Muneris exſortem, nomine participem (15).
. . . . . .

(15) Idem in Epiced. pag. 298.

Ipſe nec affectans, nec detractator honorum,
Præfectus magni nuncupor Illyrici (16).
. . . . . .

(16) Idem, ibid. pag. 302.

Nonaginta annos baculo fine, corpore toto
Exegi, cunctis integer officiis (17).
. . . .

(17) Ibid. pag. 303.

He wrote in Latin ſeveral Books of Phyſic, which are mentioned by Vindicianus (18), and Marcellus (19) with commendation. Scaliger aſſerts that he was Phyſician to the Emperor Valentinian, and even before his ſon was choſen Preceptor to Gratian (20); but I can find no proof of this in Auſonius.

(18) See Scaliger in Vita Auſonii.

(19) Marcell. in Epiſt. præfixâ lib. de Medica, and cap. 25. juſd. libri.

(20) Scaliger in vitâ Auſonii.

[B] The ſcheme of his nativity made them imagine, that he would be raiſed to great honours.] Cæcilius Argicius Arborius, his grandfather by his mother's ſide, underſtood Aſtrology, and had caſt this ſcheme of nativity, which he concealed; but it was at laſt diſcovered by his daughter. Auſonius himſelf acquaints us with theſe particulars:

Tu cœli numeros, & conſcia ſidera fati
Callebas, ſtudium diſſimulanter agens.
Non ignota tibi noſtræ quoque formula vitæ;
Signatis quam tu condideras tabulis;
Prodita non unquam, ſed matris cura retexit
Sedula, quam timidi cura tegebat avi (21).

(21) Auſon. in Parent. cap. 9. pag. 117.

He adds, that Arborius, tho' he was expoſed from time to time to the preſſures of ill fortune, and afflicted for his ſon, who died at the age of thirty, comforted himſelf under his diſgraces with the hopes, which the ſtars gave him of his grandſon's being raiſed to honour.

Dicebas ſed te ſolatia longa ſovere,
Quod mea præcipuus fata maneret honos.
Et modo conciliis animarum mixte piarum,
Fata tui certe nota nepotis habes.
Sentis quod quæſtor, quod te præfectus, & idem
Conſul, honorifico munere commemoro (22).

(22) Idem, ibid. pag. 118.

We may obſerve, that he ſuppoſes the ſoul of his grandfather was not ignorant in the manſions of the Bleſſed of the accompliſhment of the nativity, and of the ſeveral dignities, which our Poet had obtained at the Emperor's Court. He is leſs orthodox in another place; for he doubts whether any part of us ſurvives after death:

Et nunc, ſive aliquid poſt fata extrema ſuperſit,
Vivis adhuc, ævi quod periit meminens:
Sive nihil ſupereſt, nec habent longa otia ſenſus,
Tu tibi vixiſti; nos tua fama juvat (23).

(23) Idem in Profeſſor. cap. 1. in fine pag. 148.

I cannot tell, whether thoſe, who aſſert that our Poet was a Pagan, have ever quoted this paſſage, as a proof of their opinion.

cian to the dignity of a Conſul (e). He was really made Conſul by the Emperor Gratian in the year 379 (f), after he had filled other very conſiderable poſts; for beſides the dignity of Queſtor, which he had been honoured with during the life of the Emperor Valentinian, he had been made Prefect of the Prætorium in Italy and Gaul, after the death of that Prince (g). The Oration of Thanks which he ſpoke to the Emperor Gratian, for his promotion to the Conſulſhip, is an excellent piece. We cannot tell certainly the time of his death, but it is undoubted, that he was ſtill living in 388, and even in 392, and that he lived a long time [C]. He married a Lady who died young, and who was of a good family (h). He had ſeveral children by her, and never married again. He was very much eſteemed by the Emperor Theodoſius, and ſome are of opinion that the latter conferred upon him the quality of a Patrician (i). They found this upon a letter, which is to be found at the beginning of Auſonius's works in moſt of the editions. There can be nothing more obliging than that letter. Some Critics think it to be ſuppoſititious; but they cannot deny but this Emperor had a great value for Auſonius's Poems, and adviſed him to publiſh them; for this appears from a Preface which is inconteſtably of that Poet's. There is a prodigious inequality in his works, whether his Muſes were a little uncertain, or whether there are inſerted amongſt his Poems ſome pieces, which he had only given a rough ſketch of, or whether ſome particular reaſons obliged him to publiſh verſes, which he had not time to correct and poliſh. To ſpeak in general, there is ſome harſhneſs both in his manners and his ſtyle; but this is rather the defect of the age than of his genius. The beſt judges eaſily gueſs, that if he had lived in Auguſtus's time, his verſes would have equalled the moſt perfect of that age, ſince there appears ſo much delicacy and ſpirit in ſome of his writings. Though he is generally ſuppoſed to have been a Chriſtian, there are ſome ingenious Authors who believe that he was not ſo [D]; they (e) Si fortuna volet, fies de Rhetore Conſul. Juvenal. Sat. 7. ver. 197.

(f) And not in the year 382, as we are told by Vinetus in his notes upon Auſonius's Gratiarum Actio.

(g) See remark [F].

(h) Auſon. in Parental. cap. 9.

(i) Albertus Petrus Rubenius, Diſſert. de Vitâ Fl. Mallii Theodori, pag. 81,

[C] It is undoubted, that he was ſtill living in 388, and even in 392, and that he lived a long time.] He ſpeaks (24) of the puniſhment of the Tyrant Maximus, whom Theodoſius put to death in the year 388 (25). Baronius proves that Paulinus dedicated himſelf to a monaſtic life in his retirement at Nola in the year 394 (26). It was but a few years after the devout life, which he had led in Spain, and which Auſonius blamed him for. This is what proves this Poet to have been living in 392, from whence it follows, that he lived a long time, for he was already in years, when he was made Conſul in 379 (27). Add to this, that the difference of age between him and his father was very ſmall (28); now he ſurvived his father, who died at ninety years of age.

(24) In Claris Urbibus, cap. 7. pag. 237.

(25) And not in 391, as Vinetus affirms in his notes upon this paſſage of Auſonius. He is more exact in the Life of Auſonius, where he puts the year 388.

(26) Baron. Annal. ad ann. 394. num. 72. pag. 804.

(27) Auſon. in Gratiar. Actione, pag. 709.

(28) Auſon. Epiſt. 1.

[D] There are ſome ingenious Authors, who believe that he was not a Chriſtian.] Voſſius is of that number. Poeta fuit gentilis, ſays he (29), quemadmodum ex Paulino liquet; ut quæ Chriſtum celebrant perperam illi ſint tributa. That is: "He was an Heathen Poet, "as appears from Paulinus; ſo that the Poems in "praiſe of Chriſt are falſly aſcribed to him." Father Briet aſſerts the ſame; he only gives a different turn to the expreſſions of Voſſius. Ex Paulino certum eſt eum Ethnicum fuiſſe, quare opera Chriſtiana huic adjudicari ſolita, ſine dubio alterius ſunt (30). That is: "It is "plain from Paulinus, that he was a Pagan; and "therefore the Chriſtian pieces, which are com-"monly aſcribed to him, belong undoubtedly to ſome "other Author." Mr. Borrichius goes ſtill further; for he affirms, that Auſonius was frequently cenſured by Paulinus on account of his being a Pagan, Religione Ethnicus, EOQUE à PAULLINO amico, ſed Chriſtianis ſacris dedito, identidem objurgatus . . . . . (31). PAULLINUS diſcipulus Auſonii, quem colebat ut præceptorem, ſed ut averſum à Chriſtiana religione ſubinde increpabat, quemadmodum ex opere ipſius liquidum eſt (32). All this ſhews, that even great Authors ſpare themſelves the trouble of conſulting the originals, and ſtop at the teſtimony of the firſt comer. Thoſe, who have recourſe to the works of St. Paulinus, find nothing to induce them to believe, that Auſonius profeſſed Paganiſm; and becauſe they do not read, that he ever uſed any earneſt exhortations to this Poet to be baptized, they conclude that he profeſſed the Chriſtian Religion. But they have ſtronger aſſurance of this from theſe expreſs words, which they meet with there;

(29) Voſſ. de Poetis Lat. pag. 55.

(30) Brietius, de Poet. Latin. lib. 4. pag. 50.

(31) Borrich. Diſſertat. de Poetis, pag. 73.

(32) Idem, ibid. pag. 74.

Non reor hoc SANCTO ſic diſplicuiſſe PARENTI (33),
Mentis ut errorem credat, ſic vivere Chriſto (34).

(33) That is to ſay, Auſonius.

(34) Paulinus in Epiſtola before ad Auſonium in fine.

Thus the reading of St. Paulinus's works proves quite the contrary of what Voſſius and ſome others aſſert; and ſhews, that Auſonius was a Chriſtian, as Lilius Gyraldus very well obſerved. Chriſtianus quidem Auſonius fuit, ut ex ejus verſibus, & item Paulini ejus diſcipuli facile colligitur (35). There is no foundation then to take away from this Poet what is found in honour of Jeſus Chriſt in the collection of his Poems. Nay it is certain, that tho' we ſhould give up his Carmen Paſchale, and his excellent Poem, which begins with (35) Gyraldus, Hiſt. Poet. Dialog. 10. p. 514.

Omnipotens, ſolo mentis mihi cognite cultu, as ſome Critics would deprive him of the Oratio Paſchalis, verſibus Rophalicis, yet we ſhould find enough in his writings to confute thoſe, who ſay he was a Pagan. We ſee therefore how neceſſary it is to depend upon ſome of the moderns more than others, when we do not care to take the pains of recurring to the originals. If Voſſius had applied himſelf to Baronius, he would have eſcaped the error, which he has committed, and prevented others, who copied him, from falling into it. He could never have imagined, after he had read Baronius, that St. Paullinus gives us the leaſt proof of the pretended Paganiſm of the Poet Auſonius; for that learned Cardinal mentions the reſpectful anſwer of St. Paulinus, and ſhews that Auſonius's thoughts upon his friend's retirement were not different from thoſe, which Chriſtians attach'd to this world entertain every day, when they ſee a young man of quality renounce every earthly gratification and advantage to dedicate himſelf to a monaſtic life (36). He pretends, that Auſonius judged, that the humour of a Miſanthrope, or a diſtemper like Bellerophon's, urged Paulinus to retire from the world, and to renounce the Muſes (37).

(36) Baron. ad ann. 394. num. 84.

Triſtis, egens, deſerta colat, tacituſque pererret
Alpini convexa jugi, ceu dicitur olim
Mentis inops, cœtus hominum, & veſtigia vitans,
Avia perluſtraſſe vagus loca Bellerophontis (38).

(37) I expreſs my ſelf thus, becauſe though Paulinus has given this ſenſe to Auſonius's words, there is reaſon to believe that it is not the true one, and that we muſt underſtand here an imprecation againſt him, who adviſed Paulinus not to anſwer Auſonius's Letters.

(38) Auſon. Epiſt. 25. pag. 697, 698.

A thouſand Chriſtians might paſs the ſame judgment; ſo that this is an impertinent proof of Paganiſm. Arniſæus, and the French Author, whom he quotes, without doubt were Chriſtians, and yet they judged juſt as Auſonius did of the love of ſolitude: they plainly intimate, that they thought the retirement of the founders of monaſteries was to be aſcribed to a melancholy humour. Medici inter ſigna morbi melancholici referunt, ſi quis quærat ſolitudinem, aut ſi quem triſtis agat mœror; torvave ſeverum fronte, vel à lætis ſociorum cœtibus arceat; & Gallicus quidam non inconcinnus ſcriptor ejus ordinis fuiſſe cenſet Franciſcum, Dominicum, aliosque Eremitas, aut Anachoretas, qui contra naturæ præſcriptum politicis ſocietatibus ſe ſubtraxerunt in eremos, inſtar Endymionum, ſeſe abdiderunt, & quo melancholica ingenia maxime afficiebantur, novum vitæ genus, affectatæ religionis pallio veſtitum, condiderunt (39). Baronius they found this opinion either upon ſome looſe verſes, compoſed by him [E], or upon nius has not forgotten to obſerve that Auſonius was educated by two Nuns, who were his aunts (40). This is a proof that he was of a Chriſtian family. Now at that time Chriſtianity being triumphant, and Paganiſm expoſed to diſgrace and perſecution, it ſcarce ever happened, that a Chriſtian turned Pagan. Since Auſonius therefore was brought up from his infancy in the Chriſtian Religion, we muſt conclude, that he profeſſed it all the reſt of his life; for nothing is more abſurd than the thought of Giſelin. He tells us, that Claudian and Auſonius, being influenced by the authority and eloquence of Symmachus, abjured the Chriſtian Faith, and plunged themſelves into idolatry (41). He pretends to prove this by the teſtimony of St. Auguſtin, and from the ſtrict friendſhip, which Symmachus profeſſed to them in his Letters. The Jeſuit, who confutes this, ſhews that St. Auguſtin, without any mention of Auſonius, ſays only that Claudian was attach'd to Paganiſm (42); which is no manner of intimation that he was ever a Chriſtian, and as for Auſonius, he is juſtified both from the ſilence of the Emperor Gratian and St. Paulinus, and their kindneſs to him. To this we may add, that the reaſon taken from Symmachus's friendſhip with him is the weakeſt imaginable; it was not the conformity of their Religion, which united them, but the love, which they both had for polite Literature.

(39) Arniſæus, Relectionum Politicar. pag. 9.

It muſt be owned, that Mr. Baillet embraces the opinion of thoſe, who pretend that Auſonius was a Pagan, if we thoroughly conſider his words: "Theſe "are faults, which he ought to have atoned for by "ſome good qualities, and by maxims and ſentiments of morality, as the beſt Poets of antiquity "took care to do before him. But as he lived a-"mongſt Chriſtians, he was perhaps apprehenſive of "being confounded with them, if they had found in "him ſentiments, which were too much like theirs "in point of morals (43)." It is certain, that we find in Auſonius's works the fineſt maxims of morality, and particularly the Apothegms of the ancient Wiſe-men of Greece. What can be imagined more moral than his deſcription of a Good Man, Vir Bonus (44)?

[E] He compoſed ſeveral looſe verſes.] Scaliger the Father thought ſome of Auſonius's Epigrams ſo obſcene, that nothing but the fire was capable of purging them. Nonnulla (Epigrammata) adeo fœda atque deteſtanda, ut neque ſcriptore neque auditore digna, non in ſpongiam incumbere merita ſint, ſed ſolis flammis expiari poſſe videantur (45). I am ſurprized that he ſaid nothing of the obſcenities of the Cento Nuptialis, which have moſt provoked the indignation of ſeveral other Authors. Here is a fine paſſage of Mr. Baillet: "It were to be wiſhed at leaſt that they had deſtroyed "the wretched Cento, which is a vile piece, which "he patched up out of half verſes from Virgil, upon a ſubject that is purely amorous. It is with a "great deal of juſtice that the Univerſity of Paris complained forty years ago of the abuſe, which this Poet "was guilty of, in making Virgil ſpeak after a ſhameful and indecent manner, who of all the ancient "Poets has been moſt commended for his chaſtity *. "And Father Briet the Jeſuit has carried his zeal "much farther †, when he repreſents to us this action of Auſonius as a crime, that deſerved puniſhment, judging that there was no leſs impudence "and effrontry than impurity and infamy in a man, "who was capable of committing ſuch a piece of infidelity, and that there was ſomething rather diabolical than human in this pernicious art of perverting "things, that is, of changing them from good to "bad, in order to enſnare the innocence and purity "of the youth (46)." As a great many perſons would be glad to read Father Briet's own words, I ſhall copy them as follows: Centones ejus Virgiliani non tantum impuriſſimi ſunt, ſed & impudentiſſimi, quibus caſtiſſimos verſus libidinoſæ affixit materiæ, opere, quod plus dæmonem quam hominem ſaperet, adoleſcentium pudicitiæ inſidiantem. Auſonius compoſed this piece at the deſire of the Emperor Valentinian, who had written ſuch an one himſelf. He excuſed himſelf upon that Order, and obſerves, that a Prince can never uſe a more abſolute manner of commanding a thing, than to deſire it. He was very much embarraſſed; for by writing a bad Poem he expoſed himſelf to cenſure for having groſly ſacrificed his reputation to flattery; and by making a better Poem than the Emperor's, he run the riſque of being counted an inſolent perſon, who had the preſumption to attempt to ſhine to more advantage than his maſter. He affirms, I, that he kept ſuch a middle way, that without pretending to excel Valentinian, yet his Poem was not inferior to that Emperor's performance: II, that he had the good fortune to pleaſe him, and having taken care not to ſurpaſs him he did not incur the diſgrace, which his victory might have involved him in. This is the language of a perfect Courtier; but that we may do the Poet all the juſtice, which the delicacy of his wit and expreſſion deſerves, let us hear his own words. Piget Virgiliani carminis dignitatem tam joculari debonеſtaſſe materiâ; ſed quid facerem? juſſum erat. Quodque eſt POTENTISSIMUM IMPERANDI GENUS, rogabat qui jubere poterat, S. imperator Valentinianus, vir meo judicio eruditus; qui nuptias quondam ejuſmodi ludo deſcripſerat, aptis equidem verſibus & compoſitione feſtivâ. Experiri deinde volens, quantum noſtra contentione præcelleret, ſimile nos de eodem concinnare præcepit. Quam ſcrupuloſum hoc mihi fuerit, intellige. Neque anteferri volebam, neque poſthaberi; quum aliorum quoque judicio detegenda eſſet adulatio inepta, ſi cederem; inſolentia, ſi ut æmulus eminerem. Suſcepi igitur ſimilis recuſanti, feliciterque & obnoxius gratiam tenui, nec victor offendi (47). If it was true, that the Cento Nuptialis of the Emperor Valentinian was not inferior to that of Auſonius, it appears that he underſtood Poetry very well, and as he was a man of gravity and exemplary chaſtity in other reſpects, he might ſerve very much to juſtify Auſonius. Omni pudicitiæ cultu domi caſtus & foris, nullo contagio conſcientiæ violatus obſcenæ, nihil inceſtum; hancque ob cauſam tanquam retinaculis petulantiam frænârat aulæ regalis (48). Such a great example is a clear proof, that perſons of the greateſt ſtrictneſs and modeſty may ſometimes give way to pieces of wit and invention, wherein the deſcription of the chief ceremonies of a marriage are a little too looſe and obſcene; for there is no doubt that this Poem of the Emperor Valentinian was very luſcious. The ſubject required it; it was an affair of marriage, and he had indulged himſelf in mirth and pleaſantry in writing of it. Nuptias ejuſmodi ludo deſcripſerat (Valentianus) aptis equidem verſibus, & compoſitione feſtivâ (49). i. e. "The Empe-"ror Valentinian had given a deſcription of marri-"age in ſuch a ludicrous way, in a ſuitable kind of "verſe, and compoſed with a great deal of humour." We may be ſure that this Emperor's verſes were as erotic or amorous as thoſe of the Emperor Gallienus (50). We muſt own therefore, that Auſonius had ſome excuſe for compoſing his Cento Nuptialis, that he did it only in imitation and at the requeſt of his maſter, who was an Emperor of the greateſt gravity and chaſtity that ever was, and beſides that a follower of the pureſt doctrine of Chriſtianity (51), ſo that if he had not practiſed the doctrine of toleration (52), we might conclude that he wanted no qualification agreeable to the moſt orthodox Monarchs. I remark this only to ſhew, that thoſe who place Auſonius among the Pagan Poets, under pretence that he wrote ſo laſcivious a Poem as the Cento Nuptialis, have not examined things with ſufficient care. He is blameable for it without doubt; I do not pretend to excuſe him. I only ſay, that this is not a proof of his being a Pagan, or ſufficient to raiſe any juſt ſuſpicions of his not being a very orthodox Chriſtian; which I prove from the circumſtances, that is from the character of the Emperor, who commanded him to compoſe this piece, and who approved of it. How many Chriſtian Poets are there, whoſe works are more looſe than this Cento Nuptialis? We muſt degrade a great many from the character of Chriſtians, if we regulate this affair upon the maxim of Gyraldus. Chriſtianus quidem Auſonius fuit . . . . ſed petulantior tamen & laſcivior quam ut inter Chriſtianos numerari dignus ſit (53). i. e. "Auſonius was a Chriſtian indeed . . . . but too "wanton and laſcivious to deſerve to be ranked a-"mongſt Chriſtians." Without going ſo far as Italy, do not we find amongſt the works of a Poet of the Hague an Epithalamium, which with reſpect to

(40) Baron. ad ann. 394. num. 85, See Remark [F] num. 7.

(41) Victor. Giſelinus in Scholiis ad 2 Librum Prudentii contra Symmachum, apud Theophil. Raynaud Hoploth. Sect. 2. Serie 1. cap. 14. pag. 56.

(42) Theophil. Raynaudus, Hoploth Sect. 2. Serie 1. cap. 14. pag. 56.

(43) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poetes, tom. 2. pag. 470.

(44) Pag. 529.

(45) Jul. Cæſar. Scaliger. Poet. lib. 6. cap. 5. pag. 761.

* Reponſe del' Univerſite a l'Apologie du P. Nic. Cauſin, p. 358.

† Philip. Briet. de Poet. Latin. lib. 4. p. 50.

(46) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poetes, tom. 2. pag. 470, 471.

(47) Auſon. in Præfat. Cent. Nupt. pag. 500, 501.

(48) Amm. Marc. l. 30. c. 9.

(49) Auſon. in Præfat. Cent. Nuptial. p. 500, 501.

(50) See above in the article of ARODEN note [A] pag. 338.

(51) See Monſr. Flechier in his Life of Theodoſius pag. 52.

(52) Amm. Marcell. lib. 30. cap. 19. and Valeſius upon the place.

(53) Gyrald. Hiſt. Poet. Dialog. 10. p. 514.

on the manner, in which he condemns the ſolitude of Paulinus, or the intimacy which was between the Pagan Symmachus and him, they are greatly miſtaken. And yet theſe are the moſt ſpecious reaſons which have been alledged. Ritterſhuſius conſidered this friendſhip of theirs as a great prodigy (k). The errors of Scaliger [F], and the chief editions of Auſonius [G] will be the ſubject of two remarks below, and I ſhall not to obſcenities is not inferior to the Cento of Auſonius (34)? I addreſs this chiefly to Ritterſhuſius, who has repreſented Auſonius's conduct in this point as a monſter; I mean, that a Poet, who was a Chriſtian both in profeſſion and manners, ſhould write in a wanton way: Illud imprimis apud me monſtri inſtar habet, hominem Chriſtianum, &, ut apparet, non nomine tantum, ſed & pectore & moribus, adeo ſæpe laſciva atque improba ſcribere potuiſſe, ut niſi nomen Auſonii eſſet adſcriptum, Bilbilitanum poetam te legere putes (55). He will not accept of the excuſe of the Author from the purity of his morals, Laſciva eſt nobis pagina, vita proba eſt. I ſhall give a particular account of that excuſe in another article (56). We may obſerve, that Auſonius was ſo much perſuaded, that he ſhould be blamed for it, that he endeavours to juſtify himſelf in the beginning, and middle, and end of this little Poem. We have ſeen what he ſays at the beginning, we ſhall ſee in another place (57) what he ſays at the end. We have now only to remark what he ſays in the middle of it. We find then, that after he has deſcribed very handſomly the nuptial feaſt, the bride and bridegroom's walking, the marriage preſents, the wiſhes of the company, and repreſented in very decent terms the firſt diſcourſe of the married couple, he ſtops there, and acquaints his readers, that what remains for him to ſay not being covered with a veil, they have no right to proceed any further. Hactenus caſtis auribus audiendum myſterium nuptiale, ambitu loquendi, & circumitione velavi. Verum quoniam & feſcenninos amat celebritas nuptialis, verborumque petulantiam notus vetere inſtituto ludus admittit, cætera quoque cubiculi & lectuli operta prodentur, ab eodem auctore collecta, ut bis erubeſcamus, qui & Virgilium faciamus impudentem. Vos, ſi placet, hic jam legendi modum ponite; cætera curioſis relinquite (58). He had reaſon to ſay, that what he calls Imminutio (59) would be deſcribed in very looſe terms. Moreri has been the moſt indulgent to him of all: There are ſome pieces, ſays he, which Auſonius wrote in his youth, wherein he gives way too much to the liberty of the age he lived in. This cenſure is not the leaſt ſevere, and goes upon a falſe ſuppoſition; for it is certain that Auſonius was not young, when he compoſed the Cento Nuptialis. I ſay nothing of the verſes, which he wrote upon a beautiful ſlave named Biſſula, who had been adjudged to him as his part of the booty, after a great victory, which was gained in Germany in 368; for we cannot tell to what degree of licence he carried that ſubject; the verſes are loſt, and we can only conjecture, that they were free, ſince he deſires ſuch readers only, as had drank hard:

(k) Ritterſhuſius, in Epiſt. ad Solom. Pantherum.

. . . . . Admoneo, ante bibas.
Jejunis nil ſcribo; meum poſt pocula ſi quis
Legerit, hic ſapiet (60).

This agrees by no means with what remains of that Poem, we ſee nothing immodeſt either in the expreſſion or ſentiments, ſo that we muſt conclude, that moſt of the pieces, which compoſed it, are loſt. A Commentator has proved the ſame thing by another reaſon, without any mention of this. He obſerves, that this Poem is too ſhort at preſent to have the Prefaces before it, which we find there; and conſequently, it was much longer, when the Author finiſhed it, than we have it now. However that be, Auſonius, who at that time was not in the fire of his youth, deſcribed in all probability very freely the charms of his ſlave; who appeared ſo agreeable to him from the firſt day, that he gave her immediately her liberty (62).

[F] Here are ſome errors of Scaliger.] I. He thought, that Auſonius was raiſed to the poſt of Præfect of the Prætorium during the life of the Emperor Valentinian (63). This is a miſtake; Auſonius declared that he owed this poſt to the Emperor Gratian. Tot gradus nomine Comitis propter tua incrementa congeſti ex tuo merito, te ac patre principibus, quæſtura communis, & tui tantum præfectura beneficii (64). II. Scaliger imagined without any ground, that there was an error in the Theodoſian Code in the paſſage, where Auxonius Præfect of the Prætorium is mentioned (65). He would have it read Auſonius, and not Auxonius. But he would not have propoſed ſuch a correction, if he had obſerved, that the perſon mentioned in that paſſage of the Theodoſian Code, died the year 371, and that Auſonius was Conſul in 379, and lived a great many years after. III. He would have all the laws addreſſed to Antonius the Præfect of the Prætorium corrected, and that we ſhould read Auſonius and not Antonius. This is a miſtake; for it is certain, that Auſonius was honoured with the poſt of Præfect of the Prætorium of Italy in 376, five months after the death of the Emperor Valentinian, and that his ſon Heſperius was made his collegue (66). We find likewiſe that Antonius was made Præfect of the Prætorium in Gaul about the ſame time. Things continued in the ſame ſituation the year following. Auſonius and his ſon executed that office in Italy, and Antonius in Gaul; but in the year 378 Antonius had the office of Præfect of the Prætorium in Italy, and Auſonius and his ſon executed the ſame office in Gaul, which they did not reſign till 380. We have proofs of all theſe particulars in the Author, which I quote in the margin (67). IV. Scaliger thought that Auſonius ſpoke of himſelf in theſe two verſes:

Aut Italum populos, Aquilonigenaſque Britannos
Præfecturarum titulo, tenuere ſecundo (68).

This is a great error: the Poem, in which theſe two verſes are, was compoſed during the life of the Emperor Valentinian (69): now Auſonius was not Præfect of the Prætorium till after the death of that Emperor (70). V. We are not to believe what Scaliger affirms, that Auſonius, after his Conſulſhip, executed the office of Proconſul of Aſia, and that of Vicar of the Dioceſe of Africa (71). We find indeed one Auxonius, who was Vicar of the Dioceſe of Aſia in the year 365, and another Auxonius, who was Proconſul of Aſia in the year 381 (72); but what does this ſignify to Scaliger's opinion? VI. He miſtakes the uncle for the grandfather in theſe words: Hoc tanto viro naſcitur Burdegalæ Decius Magnus Auſonius nomine avi materni, cognomine patris (73). Auſonius's grandfather by mother's ſide was named Cæcilius Argicius Arborius; he left one ſon, whoſe name was Æmilius Magnus Arborius. Scaliger's miſtake therefore is very plain. VII. He ſays that Hilaria and Julia Cataphronia, who had made a vow of virginity, were Auſonius's aunts by the mother's ſide (74). This is only true with regard to Æmilia Hilaria; for Julia Cataphronia the Nun was his aunt by the father's ſide (75).

[G] . . . . And the chief editions of Auſonius.] Geſner and his Abbreviators aſſert, that Aldus was the firſt, who publiſhed this Poet. They do not mention in what year; but if they mean the edition of Venice in 1517, it is plain they are miſtaken; for beſides that Aldus was not then living, Mr. Van Beughem aſſures us, that Auſonius was printed at Milan in 1490 (76), and afterwards at Venice in 1496, with a Preface of George Merula (77). The Baſil Edition of 1523 by Valentin Curio is well known; that of Lewis Mircus at Lyons printed by John de Tournes in 1557 is much better than the former editions: it is mentioned by the Bibliographers; but I do not find that they ſpeak of that, which Ducheri publiſhed, in commendation of which Nicholas Bourbon wrote four verſes, which are printed on the reverſe of the title-page in the Lyons Edition by Sebaſtian Gryphius in 1549.

(54) See the xx Baſium, or Epithalamium of Joannes Secundus, pag. 103.

(55) Conradus Ritterſhuſius, Epiſt. ad Solom. Pantherum.

(56) See remark [D] of the article VAYER.

(57) See the ſame remark.

(58) Auſon. in Centone Nupt. pag. 513, 514.

(59) That is to ſay the deflowering of the Virgin.

(60) Auſon. in Biſſulâ, p. 340.

(61) See Tollius's Auſonius, pag. 342.

(62) Auſon. in Biſſulâ, p. 341.

(63) Scaliger. Auſon. Lection. lib. 1. cap. 2. and lib. 5. cap. 17. apud Alb. Petrum Rubenium, in Vitâ Mallii Theodori, pag. 16.

(64) Auſon. Gratiar. Actione, pag. 702, 703.

(65) Cod. Theodoſ. Lege 2 de Patrociniis Virorum. See Valeſ. in Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 29. cap. 1. pag. 549.

(66) Auſon. Grat. Act. pag. 705.

(67) See Rubenius in Vitâ Mallii Theodori, pag. 17, & ſeq.

(68) Auſon. in Moſellâ, verſ. 407. pag. 419.

(69) This appears from the 450th verſe.

(70) See Rubenius in Vitâ Mallii Theodori, p. 23.

(71) Scalig. in Vitâ Auſonii.

(72) Ruben. in Vitâ Mallii Theodori, pag. 24.

(73) Scaliger. in Vitâ Auſonii.

(74) Idem, ibid.

(75) Auſon. in Parent. num. 26. pag. 140.

(76) Beughem in Incunab. Typographiæ, apud Joh. Albert. Fabricium, Biblioth. Lat. pag. 177.

(77) There is a copy of this edition in the Library of Mr. de Thou. It is a folio, and perhaps of Aldus.

not omit the miſtake of Trithemius, who pretended that Auſonius was Biſhop of Bourdeaux [H].

1549. I ſay nothing of the edition of Plantin in 1568, with the Notes of Theodorus Pulmannus. That of Joſeph Scaliger at Lyons by Anthony Gryphius in 1575, illuſtrated with a very learned Commentary under the title of Auſoniarum Lectionum, eclipſed the former editions. Every body knows, that Elias Vinetus is one of the Commentators, who laboured moſt upon the works of our Poet. He was Profeſſor of polite Learning at Bourdeaux, and being deſired by ſeveral perſons of that city to publiſh an edition of their illuſtrious countryman, he complied with their requeſt; but he found not one manuſcript of Auſonius in the Libraries of Bourdeaux, and all that he could poſſibly do, was to compare the ſeveral editions together. He reſtored and corrected divers paſſages, and while the Commentaries, in which he was to give an account of his criticiſms, were preparing for the preſs, he cauſed the works of Auſonius to be printed, as he had corrected them. James Goupil his friend had the care of this edition, which is that of Paris in 1551. Vinetus ſome years after recovered a manuſcript, which had been found near Lyons, and which furniſhed him with a great deal of light; and as this leſſened his excuſes amongſt thoſe, who preſſed him to publiſh his Notes, he cauſed the Poem de claris Urbibus to be printed at Poitiers with his Commentary upon it in 1565. He ſent a perfect copy of the works of Auſonius to Anthony Gryphius, who had deſired it of him, and who promiſed to print it immediately; but this edition not appearing, he was adviſed to make uſe of the printing-houſe, which had been ſet up at Bourdeaux during theſe tranſactions. He gave therefore another copy to Simon Millanges, who began to print it at Bourdeaux in February 1575, and finiſhed it in the beginning of the ſummer of the ſame year. He received at the ſame time the edition of Gryphius; and becauſe Millanges wanted paper, Vinetus's Commentary could not be put to the preſs. It was not printed till four years after the edition, which Millanges had publiſhed of Auſonius's works (78). Upon this account, if we would ſpeak exactly, we ſhould not ſay, that the beſt edition of Auſonius is that publiſhed at Bourdeaux in 1575 with the Commentaries of Elias Vinetus. Præ reliquis vero laudanda luculenta Auſonii editio cum Commentariis viri docti Eliæ Vineti vulgata Burdigalæ A. 1575; & poſt ejus obitum A. 1590, 4 (79); for once again theſe Commentaries were not publiſhed till 1580. Moreri has been exact in this point: he is only miſtaken in ſaying, that Vinetus was of Xaintes; the word Santo ſignifies here nothing but a perſon of Xaintonge. The Library of the Archbiſhop of Reims mentions (80) an Auſonius printed by Millanges at Bourdeaux in 1575 with the Commentaries of Elias Vinetus. I imagine that this error ariſes from applying to all the pieces bound together the date 1575, which belongs only to the works of Auſonius, which are at the beginning of the volume. Monſr. Borrichius was miſtaken in ſaying, I, that the edition of Vinetus is one of the beſt: II, that Vinetus wrote a Comment upon Auſonius's Poem de Urbibus (81). Does not ſuch a manner of ſpeaking intimate that he did not write a Commentary upon the other Poems of Auſonius? The beſt edition of this Poet is that of Amſterdam in 1671; but I have already obſerved (82), that the title very falſly promiſes, that all the Notes of Mariangelus Accurſius were inſerted in it intire. I ſhall give a Supplement to all this in the article of (HUGOLIN) MARTELLIUS at the end of the remark [A]. As I have not the book of Father Lacarry (83), I am obliged to content myſelf with what I find in the Journal des Savans. "The double Præfecture of Auſonius, which "gave Scaliger ſo much trouble, is treated of there very "clearly. We find, that in the year 378 Auſonius "was Præfect of the Prætorium in Gaul and Italy "with his ſon Heſperius; but he was not Præfect of "Italy till about the month of July, when one Antonius was made Præfect of the Prætorium in Italy, "as it is mentioned in the Code. Thus the Præfecture "of Auſonius and Heſperius in Italy was interrupted "by Antonius; but he reaſſumed it with his ſon "in 379, and continued in that of Gaul with him "without any interruption during the year 378 and "379 (84)." This Hypotheſis, and this Chronology are by no means agreeable to the opinion of Rubenius, which I have related. If I had Father Lacarry's Book, I might perhaps judge, which of them has explained this matter with moſt exactneſs.

[H] Trithemius pretended that Auſonius was Biſhop of Bourdeaux.] He aſſures us, that this Biſhop was very learned in the Scriptures, and equally valuable for his piety and learning; and that he flouriſhed under Maximus in the year 310, and exerted himſelf very nobly with St. Martin, St. Ambroſe, and St. Jerom in the Synod, which that Emperor cauſed to be held at Treves. Here is a heap of fables. Vinetus obſerves, that ſome Perſons had aſſerted, that Auſonius was canonized: he tells us likewiſe, that the inhabitants of Angoulême honoured one Auſonius, who, they ſaid, was their firſt Biſhop, as one of their chief ſaints; and he thinks it is not impoſſible, but that the Poet Auſonius having been choſen Biſhop by the people of Angoulême, might accept of that Biſhoprick (85). A manuſcript chronicle of Angoulême tells us, that Auſonius, the diſciple of St. Martial, a Biſhop of Angoulême, ſuffered martyrdom when the Vandals ravaged Gaul (86). Monſ. de Hauteſerre confutes this by reaſon that a diſciple of St. Martial could not poſſibly be living at the beginning of the fourth Century at the time of the irruption of the Vandals (87). However that be, we ſee how very different accounts are given of our Poet Auſonius. Some Authors tell us that he was no Chriſtian, while others place him in the liſt of canonized Saints.

(78) Taken from the Preface of Elias Vinetus.

(79) Joh. Albert. Fabricius, Bibliothec. Latin. pag. 177.

(80) Pag. 394.

(81) Auſonii Editio ſelectior eſt Joſephi Scaligeri & Eliæ Vineti. Borrichius de Poet. Lat. pag. 73.

(82) Below in the quotation (b) in the article of (MARIANGELUS) ACCURSIUS.

(83) Intitled, Hiſtoria Galliarum ſub Præfectis Prætorio Galliarum.

(84) Journal des Savans of the 12th of Auguſt 1675, pag. 225. Holland edit.

(35) Elias Vinetus in Vitâ Auſonii.

(86) Alteſerra, Rerum Aquitanicarum, lib. 5. cap. 8. p. 339.

(87) Idem, ibid.

AUSTRIA (DON JUAN of) natural ſon to the Emperor Charles V, was born at Ratiſbon the 24th of February 1545. A young Lady of Ratiſbon, whoſe name was BARBARA BLOMBERG (a), was willing to paſs for his mother [A], to take off from thoſe, who had given life to the child, the ſhame that would have been unavoidable, if the public had known the name of the real mother. The child was carried into Spain before

(a) See the Article of her.

[A] BARBARA BLOMBERG was willing to paſs for his mother.] Famianus Strada tells us, that Cardinal de la Cueva had diſcovered that ſecret to him (1). This Cardinal learned it of the Infanta Clara Eugenia, to whom Philip II, who concealed nothing from her, had intruſted it with. Philip II always teſtified in public that Barbara Blomberg was Don Juan's mother: Eodemque loco habitam a Philippo Rege ſcenæ pariter inſerviente (2). The ſacrifice, which this Lady was willing to make of her own reputation to that of a great Princeſs, is not near ſo conſiderable as is imagined; it is eſteemed a ſhame to paſs for the miſtreſs of a private man; but how many Ladies are there, who value themſelves upon being the miſtreſſes of Kings and Emperors? I have obſerved, that ſhe made this ſacrifice in favour of a great Princeſs: it is Strada who acquaints me with this particular; Joannem Auſtriacum, non ex Barbarâ Blombergâ, uti creditum ad eam diem, ſed ex longe illuſtriori ac PLANE PRINCIPE fœminâ procreatum; cujus ut famæ parceretur prætentum fuiſſe aliam à Carolo Cæſare. The ſame Hiſtorian obſerves, that Don Juan, who was twice deceived in his mother, was never undeceived in that point. He thought himſelf at firſt the ſon of Magdalen Ulloa, and afterwards of Barbara Blomberg. However ſucceſsful and vigilant he was in diſcovering the moſt ſecret intrigues of the enemy, he could never unravel this domeſtic myſtery. Habet profecto

(1) Strada de Bello Belgic. Decad. 1. lib. 10. pag. 626.

(2) Idem, ibid.

before he was a year old [B]. The Emperor gave the commiſſion to Lewis Quixada, whom he had found by many proofs to be very capable of retaining a ſecret (b). He gave him orders to have the child brought up by Magdalen Ulloa his wife, without any perſons being able to gueſs who was the father. Quixada ſerved his maſter in this affair with all the fidelity imaginable; for he not only concealed the ſecret from every perſon with the utmoſt caution, but he took an extraordinary care of Don Juan's education. Charles, when he was near his death, diſcovered to his ſon Philip, that he was the father of the young Lord, who was brought up by Quixada at Villagarſia, and charged him to acknowledge him as his brother for the future, and to treat him in a manner ſuitable to his quality. Philip did not put this command in execution till about two years after [C], but he did it then with a good grace. He had Don Juan educated with Don Carlos and Alexander Farneſe. Theſe three Princes were almoſt of the ſame age, but Don Juan had the greateſt advantage both in perſon and genius. Philip was diſpleaſed to find in him a reluctance to enter into the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate, which his father had deſigned him for. But he was much more ſo at a wild undertaking of this young Lord, who, without the King's leave, had taken a journey to Barcelona, attended with a conſiderable number of Gentlemen, in order to go to the war at Malta. The letters which he received from the King before he had embarked, made him break off this voyage. He obeyed the King's order, and returned with ſuch expedition, that he pacified a little Philip's anger, and he abſolutely regained his favour by being the firſt who diſcovered to him the deſigns of Don Carlos. There had been but very little friendſhip between profecto unde minus ſibi de ſuâ ſagacitate placeat humanum ingenium, quando tantus princeps, atque intima quæque vel in hoſte rimari ſolitus, domi ſuæ, ſuorumque ignarus adeò vixerit obieritque, ut bis in matre deceptus, ſemper alienam coluerit, nunquam ſuam (3). I am ſurprized that Father Strada ſays nothing of a third perſon, who paſſed for the mother of Don Juan. The Author of a learned diſſertation, which was printed in 1688 (4), ſpeaks with great commendation of Catherine de Cardonne, born at Naples in 1519. She went to Spain with the Princeſs of Salerno her couſin in 1559, and gained by her virtue and piety ſo much the eſteem of Philip II, that he commanded Ruy Gomez, Prince of Evely, Governor of Don Carlos and Don Juan, to take care of that Lady. Ruy Gomez took her to his houſe, and finding her a perſon of admirable prudence, he deſired her to undertake the government of his family, and to ſhare with him the education of two Princes. She executed this charge with all the care imaginable. Don Juan always honoured her as his mother. The Author of the Diſſertation makes a remark upon that word. We muſt not proceed any further, ſays he (5), without juſtifying this Saint from an horrible calumny, which ſome have founded upon the abuſe of this word, and have intimated, that ſhe was the TRUE MOTHER of John of Auſtria. Strada of Rosberg ſeems to have occaſion for that ſuppoſition in his genealogy of the Houſe of Auſtria, where he mentions the mother of that Prince under the ſingle name of Catherine. But a life ſo chaſte and ſo mortified, as that which Catherine de Cardonne had led from her very infancy, could not poſſibly admit of ſuch a ſuſpicion concerning her. There are ſeveral other reaſons added to this, to juſtify Catherine de Cardonne, and the remark is concluded in theſe words. It was another perſon of much more illuſtrious rank, (who was mother of John of Auſtria), and one whom our Saint (6) had even known, as the Hiſtorian of her life obſerves, but who, for very conſiderable reaſons, was never diſcovered. I ſhall add to this a paſſage from Mr. Varillas. The ſecret of the birth of John of Auſtria, ſays he (7), was never abſolutely diſcovered, and whether the high quality of his true mother required all the precautions which were made uſe of, or whether there was more care taken to avoid the ſcandal than the ſin, it is certain that Charles V diſcovered to Quixada only who John of Auſtria was, and ordered him to let him paſs for his ſon, till his Imperial Majeſty told Philip II, when he reſigned up his dominions to him, that he had a natural brother. This reſerve of Mr. Varillas is more commendable than the liberty which is taken in the ſecond edition of the Menagiana, of ſaying in expreſs terms, that Don John of Auſtria was born of his father's own ſiſter. This is told upon occaſion of an excellent ſaying of Charles V. He is reported to have ſaid, upon his tearing an unjuſt privilege which he had ſigned, I had rather ſpoil my ſignature, than injure my conſcience. Upon which we have this gloſs in the ſecond edition of the Menagiana, pag. 422. Here is a tender conſcience for a man who had acted the knave all his life long, and who, if we are to credit ſcandal, made no ſcruple of lying with his own ſiſter, while Barbara Blomberg was made uſe of to cover this infamous commerce between them, and called herſelf the mother of Don John of Auſtria.

(b) Quem expertus erat arcanorum celantiſſimum. Strada, Dec. 1. lib. 10. pag. 612.

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 627.

(4) Diſſertation ſur l'Hemine de Vin & ſur la Livre de Pain de St. Benoit.

(5) Pag. 186.

(6) That is, Catherine de Cardonne. Her Hiſtory is in the Hiſtoire Generale des Carmes dechauſſez 1 Part, liv. v. See the Diſſertat. ſur l'Hemine. p. 182.

(7) Varillas, Hiſtoire de Francois I, lib. 13. pag. 589.

[B] He was carried into Spain before he was a year old.] Brantome tells us another ſtory, which I ſhall relate in the remarks of the article BLOMBERG, and which is not to be believed to the prejudice of Father Strada.

[C] Charles V diſcovered to Philip II, that Don Juan was his ſon, and charged him to acknowledge him as his brother; .... which command he did not put in execution till about two years after.] The application of an Hiſtorian to the principal point is the occaſion, that he does not always perceive the errors of his calculation. Thus for inſtance here is Strada, who aſſures us, that Don Juan was born the 24th of February 1545; that his father died the 21ſt of September 1558; that Philip acknowledg'd Don Juan two years after his father's death; that he had him brought up with Don Carlos his ſon; and that theſe two Princes had not yet attained the fifteenth year of their age, annum quartum decimum nondum ſupergreſſi. If Strada had minded his calculation well, he would have found above fifteen years compleat. It cannot be ſaid that the year 1547 was that of his birth. I confeſs that Moreri aſſerts it; but this cannot be Strada's opinion, ſince he places the death of Don Juan on the 1ſt of October 1578, and tells us that he was then three and thirty years old. So that there is no error of the preſs in the number 1545. The Author of the Diſſertation upon the Hemina (8) places the birth of this natural ſon of Charles on the 14th of February 1545, and his death about the firſt of October 1578 in the army near Namur; and he criticizes upon the Genealogy of the Houſe of Auſtria, which tells us that he died at Bruges in the 25th year of his age. He finds fault likewiſe with Father Strada for having placed the death of Don Juan in December; but we read expreſly in Strada Kalendis Octobris (9), the Kalends of October. Mr. Varillas is not to be depended upon, when he tells us, that Philip II ſuffered eleven years to paſs without executing his father's orders, and that John of Auſtria was twenty years old, when his Catholic Majeſty thought proper to acknowledge him for his brother (10). He would have been four and twenty years old according to this calculation. Let us recollect that he was ſent Generaliſſimo to the Kingdom of Grenada in the year 1569 (11). It muſt follow then, according to Mr. Varillas, that Philip II began to acknowledge him for the natural ſon of Charles V by conferring upon him that important office. They muſt know little of that King, who can aſcribe to him ſuch a precipitate piece of conduct.

(8) Pag. 187.

(9) Strada, Decad. 1. lib. 10. pag. 611.

(10) Varillas, Hiſtoire de François I, lib. 2. pag. 389.

(11) Moreri ſays 1570.

between those two young Princes [D]. Don Juan was a little after sent to the Kingdom of Grenada against the Moors, and signalized himself in that war. He was declared Generalissimo of the League against the Turks, in which post he gained the famous battle of Lepanto in the year 1571; after which he took the city of Tunis and that of Biserta, and returned in triumph to Italy, being followed by Amidas King of Tunis, whom he had taken prisoner: he had left a garrison in Tunis contrary to Philip's orders, and by the Pope's interposition there was already a talk of conferring upon him the title of King of Tunis. The King of Spain was by no means pleased with all these successes of his; the idea which he formed of this young Prince's ambition gave him a great deal of uneasiness (c). He sent him to command in the Low-Countries, but gave him orders to make peace there; he was displeased to find him at the head of an army. With these prepossessions against him, he easily credited all the rumours which might render his brother's conduct suspected; and some tell us, that to aggravate this division between them, there was means found to acquaint him, that Don Juan was going to marry Queen Elizabeth (d). Let us observe, to cut the story short, that Escovedo, Secretary to Don Juan, having been sent to Madrid by his master, to sollicit the succours which he had expected a long while, was killed there [E]. Don Juan upon this thought himself in high disgrace; the chagrin of seeing himself sacrificed to the contempt of his enemies, by the impossibility which he was reduced to of supporting himself against them [F], occasioned a sickness of which he died the first of October 1578 (e). It was even supposed that he was poisoned [G]. He recommended to King Philip his pretended mother, and his pretended brother by the mother's side, and his servants; but he durst not order that his two natural daughters (f) [H] should be mentioned to him.

(c) Quod Philippo suspicionem intendit elatum victoriarum cursu juvenem non diu laturum privatam fortunam, & regna nunc rogare aliquando invasurum. Strada, de Bello Belgico, Decad. 1. lib. 10. pag. 617.

(d) See remark [F].

(e) Majoribus indies pressus angustiis ac desertus, uti palam querebatur, a Rege, traditusque hostium ludibrio, ingent animi speique princeps.. ex mœrore contabuit. Strada, Decad. 1. lib. 9. pag. 619.

(f) Taken from Strada, lib. 10. Decad. 1.

We

[D] He was the first, who discovered the designs of Don Carlos. There had been but little friendship between those two young Princes.] I shall relate a story, which we find in Brantome. It is said that Don Carlos "having discovered something of importance "to Don John, he revealed it to the King of Spain, "who always loved him the better for it, tho' he "was afterwards very ill rewarded: upon which "Don Carlos hated him so much, that they ge- "nerally quarrelled together, and he once called him "bastard and son of a whore; to which Don John "replied, Si yo lo soy; mas yo tengo padre mejor que "vos: Yes, it is true I am so, but my father was "much superior to yours; and thus they were ready to "come to blows about it (12)."

(12) Brantome, Vies des Capitaines étrangers, tom. 2. p. 117, 118.

[E] Escovedo, his Secretary, having been sent to Madrid . . . . was killed there.] Mr. le Laboureur says, that he had read some Memoirs written by Mr. de Peiresc, which affirm that Escovedo was killed after his master's death; and that Mr. Du Vair, who was acquainted with this particular in a familiar conversation with Antonio Perez, told it to Mr. de Peiresc (13). This deserves to be examined. We shall perhaps give an article of Escovedo, in which we shall treat of this more largely, whether it was before or after Don Juan's death, that the designs, which he and the Duke of Guise were concerting, were discovered to the Court of Spain. Philip II was not so much in the wrong as is imagined, and Don Juan was capable in time of giving him much more trouble, than the Dutch. He was no better man with regard to his King, than the Duke of Guise. But it is true, the jealous humour of Philip, and his mysterious politics, very frequently inspired those of his family with these rebellious thoughts. Multi fallere docuerunt, dum timent falli, & aliis jus peccandi suspicando fecerunt (14). That is: "Many persons have taught others to de- "ceive them, while they have been apprehensive of "being deceived; and have given them a right to "injure them by their own suspicions."

(13) Additions aux Memoires de Castelnau, tom. 2. pag. 889.

(14) Seneca, Epist. 3.

[F] He saw himself sacrificed to the contempt of his enemies, by the impossibility which he was reduced to of supporting himself against them.] We see by this, that the King of Spain, as great a Politician as he was, chose rather to lose the Low-Countries, than not to gratify his jealousy and the other secret passions which tormented his soul. It is to this that the Dutch owe their liberty as much or more, than to their own excellent and wise conduct. There are few grand affairs, which do not succeed as much at least by the faults of one party, as by the prudence of the other. It was by no means difficult to draw Philip II into the snare, when his jealousies were discovered. Strada imagines, that the Prince of Orange wrote to one of his friends at Paris concerning the marriage of Don Juan with the Queen of England, and the promise, which the bridegroom had made of granting liberty of conscience to those of the new Religion; and all this, with a direct design to inflame the suspicions of King Philip: he thought, that such a piece of news would immediately be known to the Spanish Embassador. Quin ad hanc quoque suspicionem Regi confirmandam haud sanè dubitaverim aspexisse Orangium, scriptis ad amicum literis in Galliam, quibus Joan. Austriaci atque Angliæ Reginæ conjugium significabat, addebatque pro suâ in eam rem operâ, spem sibi ab Austriaco factam liberæ per Belgium Religionis. Id, quod à Varga, Hispano apud Gallum oratore in arcana quæque intento, sollicite admonitum ferunt Philippum Regem (15).

(15) Strada, de Bello Belgic. Dec. 1. l. 10. p. 618.

[G] It was believed . . . . that he was poisoned.] You will find here the words of Strada, and of Brantome, Ex mœrore contabuit, says Strada (16): An verò ad hoc quo satis extingui potuit, venenum aliua cujusquam dolo subjectum fuerit (namque in defuncti corpore extitisse non obscura veneni vestigia affirmant qui viderunt) equidem nihil ipse statuerim. This poor Prince, says Brantome (17), did not long enjoy this great glory and praise, for he, who had so much sought to die in the rude field of Mars, went to die in a soft and easy bed, as if he had been some minion of Venus, and not a son of Mars. He died of a contagious distemper, which it is said he catched of the Marchioness of Avré, whom he was in love with; but every body did not agree to this story, even in Spain; for it is reported, that he was poisoned with perfumed buskins.

(16) Idem, ibid. pag. 619.

(17) Brantome, Vies des Capit. étrangers, pag. 140.

[H] He durst not recommend his two natural daughters to Philip.] Don Juan, who was the finest Prince of his time, was likewise a person of great gallantry and civility. Judge whether he was not a man of success in his intrigues. He had a daughter at Madrid, and another at Naples. That at Madrid was named Anne; and her mother was a Lady of the first quality and a perfect beauty. Ex Mariâ Mendoziâ splendidissimi generis formæque elegantissimæ puellâ (18). The same Lady, who had nursed Don Juan (19), brought up this child till she was seven years of age; and then put her into a Nunnery. Philip II took her from thence, and sent her to Burgos, where she was made perpetual Superior of the Benedictine Nuns. The other daughter of Don Juan was named Joan; her mother was a young Lady of Sorrento, whose name was Diana Phalanga; and after the child had been brought up till she was seven years old by Margaret Duchess of Parma her father's sister, she was placed amongst the Nuns of St. Claire at Naples, and having continued twenty years there she was married at last to the Prince of Butero. These two daughters of Don Juan died almost on the same day, in February 1630. He had them brought up so privately, that he did not doubt but that the King was ignorant of the whole

(18) Strada, Decad. 1. lib. 10. pag. 624.

(19) Catherine Ulloa, wife to Don Lewis Quixada.

We find his Elogium amongſt thoſe of ſeveral other warriors, in a book written by Primo Damaſchino, and printed at Rome in the year 1680, under the title of La Spadà d'Orione ſtellata nel Cielo di Marte. But if the reader would ſee a detail of the complaints which were made againſt his conduct, with ſeveral of his letters which were intercepted, he may read the Summary Diſcourſe of the juſt cauſes and reaſons, which have obliged the States-General of the Low-Countries to provide for their defence againſt Don John of Auſtria. This is a very curious manifeſto. It was printed at Antwerp by William Sylvius, printer to the King in the year 1577. See likewiſe the manifeſto which Prince John Caſimire, Count Palatin of the Rhine, publiſhed the year following to juſtify his expedition. He had it printed at Neuſtad in High-Dutch and Latin. There was in the ſeventeenth Century another DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA [I], who appeared in the world with great applauſe. He was ſon to Philip IV by an Actreſs [K].

ſecret; and he had never intruſted it with his great friend the Prince of Parma, who knew nothing of theſe natural daughters of his, but from his mother the Ducheſs, a little before Don Juan's death. Eas Regi incompertas crederet; quippe occultè adeò cautèque educatas, ut Alexander ipſe ſecretorum ejus plane omnium particeps filiarum alteram ignoraret; alteram non ab Auſtriaco, ſed à Margaritâ matre haud pridem nôſſet (20). The Author of the Life of this Prince, printed at Amſterdam in 1690, will have it, that Don John entruſted his dear nephew Prince Alexander Farneſe with the ſecret of his intrigue with the beautiful Mendoza, and of his daughter Anne, becauſe as they lived then in the ſame Court of Spain they obſerved each other's conduct, and becauſe they were too intimate friends, to conceal their affairs from each other. But as he was well perſuaded, that the diſcovery of a fault is a fault, he had kept, ſays the Author, his amour with Diana ſecret (21). This is contradicting Strada without any reaſon or proof; and alledging a reaſon of his ſilence, which proves too much.

(20) Strada, Dec. 1. lib. 10. pag. 624.

(21) Vie de Dom Juan d'Autriche, pag. 146.

[I] There was in the 17th Century another DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA.] He was natural ſon to Philip IV King of Spain, and was born in the year 1629 (22). He was legitimated in 1642; and there was no perſon, who paid his compliments of congratulation to Philip IV upon that occaſion with ſo much zeal, as the Apoſtolical Nuncio James Panzirollus (23). The King's affection for this child was the moſt tender imaginable. He declared him his Generaliſſimo both at ſea and land in the war againſt Portugal in 1642; and ſome years after he ſent him into Italy againſt the rebels at Naples (24). This laſt expedition proving very ſucceſsful, induced the King to give Don Juan a commiſſion to reduce the revolted Catalans to their duty. He ſent him afterwards to command in the Low-Countries. This employment did not contribute much to Don Juan's glory. The honour, which he had gained by raiſing the ſiege of Valenciennes, was deſtroyed by the ill ſucceſs, which attended him in other places, and eſpecially by the loſs of the battle of the Downs, which was ſoon followed by the loſs of Dunkirk. He was no leſs unfortunate in the war in Portugal after the peace made at the Pyrenees; for the army, which he commanded, was entirely defeated; upon which he fell into diſgrace, and received an order from the King his father to retire to Conſuegra (25). He had no ſhare in the Government after the death of that Prince; the whole authority was in the hands of the Queen Mother and the Jeſuit Nidhard. They wanted to remove him under the ſpecious pretence of ſending him into the Low-Countries in order to oppoſe the arms of France; but he diſcovered the contrivance, and would not go, pretending himſelf ſick. The Court being diſpleaſed at this conduct of his obliged him to retire to Conſuegra (26). He was not unmindful of his intereſts in that retirement, and managed the diſpoſitions of thoſe, to whom Father Nidhard's credit was odious, in ſo effectual a manner, that this Jeſuit was forced at laſt to give way. He left Spain to go to Rome, and from that time the affairs of Don John went on much better, till at laſt he was ſent for again to Court (27), and obtained the chief direction of the Government. He died the 17th of September 1679 after a ſickneſs of three and twenty days (28). There were ſome perſons, who ſaid, that he was poiſoned. Vi ſono perſone, che aſſicurano che foſſe un colpo uſcito dalla mano della Reg. Mad. e del Cardinal Nitardi, coll. aſſiſtenza de' ſuoi Partigiani (29). Others ſaid, that he conceived ſo much chagrin at the King's marriage with the Duke of Orlean's daughter, that he died of it; and yet, according to the opinion of the Public, he had been the chief promoter of that marriage (30). I remember to have read in a Gazette of the year 1678, that the Marquis of Agropoli, who was ſuſpected of having written a Comedy againſt Don Juan, was baniſhed to Oran.

(22) Vita di Don Giovanni d'Auſtria, p. 4. Geneva edit. in 1686.

(23) Ibid. p. 7.

(24) Ibid. p. 37.

(25) Ibid. pag. 284.

(26) Ibid. pag. 288.

(27) About the end of the year 1676.

(28) Vita di Don Giovanni d'Auſtria, pag. 628.

(29) Ibid. pag. 629.

(30) See Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for July 1686, pag. 827.

[K] . . . . Son to Philip IV, by an Actreſs.] Every body knows that Philip IV was extremely given to women. He ſhewed this inclination very early, and he had a Governor, who was ſo far from ſupporting him in ſuch a ſlippery path, that he contributed to his fall. It was the Conde Olivarez, who was likewiſe ſubject to this paſſion; and upon that account, as well as the better to ſecure to himſelf the adminiſtration of affairs, he fomented the looſe temper of this young Prince; he hoped, that under the reign of his pupil, he ſhould have the greateſt poſts in the Kingdom, and he foreſaw that he might exerciſe them with the moſt abſolute authority, if the King ſhould indulge himſelf in a voluptuous and effeminate manner of life; and beſides that his own irregularities would have a more free courſe under a maſter, whom he ſhould only imitate. This management had the ſucceſs he wiſh'd for. Philip IV, at the age of ſixteen years, aſcended the Throne in 1621, and left the care of affairs to the Conde Olivarez, who omitted nothing to encourage the King in his indolence. He invented new pleaſures; he ſent for to Madrid the beſt company of Actors, which Spain could furniſh. They performed before the King in 1627. There was one of the Actreſſes, whoſe name was Calderona, who pleaſed him exceedingly. She was not very handſome, but ſhe had a great many charms, and an extremely ſweet voice. The King had no ſooner ſeen her upon the ſtage, but he was ſtruck with her, and ordered her to be brought into his chamber; he only wanted, he ſaid, to hear her ſpeak nearer him. As ſoon as the Conde Duke heard of this, he managed the interview, and had the Actreſs introduced into his Majeſty's chamber in the night. She did not go away till the next morning, and left the King ſo charmed with her, that he declared her his favourite. She was then but ſixteen years of age. After that time their meetings were very frequent; ſhe proved with child, and was brought to bed of our Don Juan. But after her delivery ſhe broke off this commerce (31), and ſhut herſelf up in a Convent, where ſhe took the habit of a Nun, with the benediction of the Pope's Nuncio (32).

(31) Non volle poi la Calderona accopiarſi piu col Rè. Vita di Don Giovanni d'Auſtria, p. 5.

(32) John Baptiſta Pamphilio, who was afterwards Pope Innocent X. Vita di Don Giovanni d'Auſtria, p. 2, & ſeq.

AUTON (JOHN D') Gentleman of Xaintonge (a), Abbot of Angle (b), of the Order of St. Auguſtin, lived in the Reign of Lewis XII. He was retained in the ſervice of the court, and had a particular order to write the Hiſtory of that King (c), which he executed, and it was publiſhed at Paris in the year 1615 in 4to, by Theodore Godefroi. It extends only from the year 1506 to 1508 (d). We find there even the verſes which the Author dedicated to that King (e).

(a) Baudier, Hiſtoire du Cardinal d'Amboiſe, pag. 44.

(b) Du Cheſne, Bibliotheque des Hiſtoriens de France, pag. 65.

(c) Baudier, Hiſtoire du Cardinal d'Amboiſe, pag. 44.

(d) Du Cheſne, Biblioth. pag. 65.

(e) Sorel, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 329.

AYLMER

☞ AYLMER [A] (JOHN), Biſhop of London in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was born of a good family [B] at Aylmer-Hall in the pariſh of Tilney in Norfolk, about the year 1521 (a). Tho' he took his degrees of Divinity in Oxford, yet he had his firſt education at Cambridge, but in what College, is uncertain (b). Grey, Marquis of Dorſet, and afterwards Duke of Suffolk, conceived a good opinion of him, when he was very young, and entertained him as his ſcholar, and gave him an Exhibition at the Univerſity. Mr. Wood (c) ſuppoſes, that he took his degrees in Arts at Cambridge; after which the Marquis took him into his family, and made him tutor to his children, among whom was the Lady Jane Gray, who was afterwards made Queen. She made a prodigious progreſs in the Greek language and all parts of polite literature under Mr. Aylmer's inſtruction [C], who diſtinguiſhed himſelf very early among the beſt and politeſt Writers of that age [D]. Nor did he confine his ſtudies to ſecular learning only, but applied himſelf likewiſe to Divinity; and having the Duke of Suffolk and the Earl of Huntingdon for his patrons in the reign of King Edward VI, he was the only Preacher in Leiceſterſhire for ſome time, and had a great ſhare in bringing over the people of that county to the Proteſtant Religion (d). In the beginning of the year 1553 he was made Archdeacon of Stow in the Dioceſe in Lincoln, in the room of Chriſtopher Maſſingberd, who died on the 8th of March that year, as Wood informs us (e), or of Dr. Draicot, according to Mr. Strype (f). This dignity qualified him to ſit in the Convocation in the firſt year of Queen Mary, where he diſputed in defence of the Proteſtant Religion [E]. But he was ſoon after obliged to retire beyond ſea, where he employed himſelf in the inſtruction of

(a) Strype's Life of Biſhop Aylmer, pag. 2, 3. edit. London in 8vo 1701.

(b) Idem, p. 3.

(c) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. pag. 712. edit. 2. London 1721.

(d) Strype, pag. 8, 9.

(e) Ubi ſupra.

(f) Pag. 9.

[A] Aylmer.] This name is variouſly written, Ailmar, Ailemare, Elmer, and Ælmer, with the Saxon Diphthong, (and ſo he wrote it himſelf,) contracted from the Saxon name Adelmar or Ethelmar; for the name is undoubtedly Saxon; and in the Catalogue of the Biſhops of Sherbern in the Saxon times about the year 1009, we have one of the ſame name (1).

(1) Strype's Life of Biſhop Aylmer, p. 1, 2.

[B] Born of a good family.] This family was very ancient, and ſettled in Norfolk and Suffolk (2). Mr. Strype tells us (3), that he finds ſeveral perſons of that family in the city of Norwich about the year 1500. His elder brother was Sir Robert Aylmer of Aylmer-Hall, whoſe Anceſtor was High-Sheriff of the county of Norfolk in the time of King Edward II (4).

(2) Idem, p. 2.
(3) Pag. 192.
(4) Idem, p. 3.

[C] She made a prodigious progreſs . . . . . under Mr. Aylmer's inſtruction.] She gained ſuch a knowledge of the Greek tongue, that ſhe read Plato and Demoſthenes with the greateſt eaſe and pleaſure, and we are informed by Mr. Aſcham in his Schoolmaſter (5), that he viſited her at Broadgate in Leiceſterſhire, her father's ſeat, where he found her reading Plato's Phædon in Greek, while the reſt of the family were hunting in the park. Upon his aſking her how ſhe came to have ſuch an exquiſite reliſh and pleaſure in learning, contrary to the uſual cuſtom of her ſex, ſhe replied in this manner: One of the greateſt benefits, that ever God gave me is, that he ſent me ſo ſharp and ſevere parents, and ſo gentle a ſchoolmaſter. For when I am in preſence either of father or mother, whether I ſpeak, keep ſilence, ſit, ſtand, or go, eat, drink, be merry or ſad, be ſewing, playing, dancing, or doing any thing elſe, I muſt do it as it were in ſuch weight, meaſure, and number, even ſo perfectly as God made the world, or elſe I am ſo ſharply taunted, ſo cruelly threatned, yea preſently ſometimes with pinches, nipps, and bobbs, and other ways, (which I will not name for the honour I bear them,) ſo without meaſure miſordered, that I think myſelf in hell, till time cometh that I muſt go to Mr. Aylmer, who teacheth me ſo gently, ſo pleaſantly, with ſuch fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing whiles I am with him. And when I am called from him, I fall on weeping; becauſe whatſoever I do elſe but learning, is full of grief, trouble, fear, and wholly miſliking to me. And thus my book hath been ſo much my pleaſure, and bringeth daily to me more pleaſure and more, that in reſpect of it all other pleaſures in very deed be but trifles and troubles unto me. Mr. Aylmer inſtructed this Lady likewiſe in piety, and made her firm in the profeſſion of the Proteſtant Religion (6).

(5) Edit. 1571. pag. 11.

(6) Strype, p. 4.

[D] Diſtinguiſhed him very early among the beſt and politeſt Writers of that Age.] We have ſome account of his reſidence in the noble family abovementioned in an old Book intitled The Jewel of Joy, written by Thomas Becon in the reign of King Edward VI. This Author being in danger on account of his Religion in the latter end of Henry VIII's reign, was obliged to conceal himſelf by travelling Northwards; and coming into Leiceſterſhire, where the Marquis of Dorſet's ſeat was, he met with Mr. Aylmer, who received him with great civility, and of whom he gives this character, that he was excellently well learned both in Latin and Greek; and added, that with him alone in that county he had familiarity. Mr. Strype likewiſe obſerves (7), that he was ranked among the beſt ſcholars and greateſt genius's of thoſe times; ſuch as Sir John Cheke, Haddon, Smith, and Aſcham; the laſt of whom being Tutor to the Lady Elizabeth, afterwards Queen, and therefore often at Court, Mr. Aylmer and he contracted a very intimate acquaintance. And in a letter which Mr. Aſcham wrote in the ſtrongeſt terms of friendſhip from Augſburgh, when he was Secretary to Sir Richard Moriſon Embaſſador in Germany, he deſires two things of his friend Aylmer; one of which was, that he would engage the Lady Jane Grey to write him a Greek letter, as ſhe had promiſed, and another to the famous John Sturmius of Straſburgh; the other requeſt, or rather exhortation, was, that they both ſhould continue their preſent courſe of life of reading and ſtudy; for then, ſaid he, how free, how agreeable, how like Philoſophers ſhould we live? What ſhould prevent us from enjoying all thoſe advantages, which Cicero in the concluſion of his third book De Finibus aſcribes to this manner of life? Nothing could occur to us in both the languages, nor in all the records of time paſt and preſent, but we ſhould collect thence matter to render life the moſt delightful imaginable.

(7) Pag. 7.

[E] He diſputed in defence of the Proteſtant Religion.] He ſhewed upon this occaſion his ſkill in the Greek language to great advantage. For when Cheny, another of the Proteſtant Diſputants, had quoted a paſſage out of Theodoret, to prove that the ſubſtance of bread remained after the conſecration, that the elements were the ſame after the bleſſing of them as they were before, and that they did not loſe their former ſubſtance and form; where that Writer uſes the word οὐσία ſubſtance; Dr. Moreman, a Member of that Synod, to evade this allegation, affirmed that οὐσία was a word that implied accident as well as ſubſtance, and Accidental Subſtance, as he called it. But Mr. Aylmer ſhewed with great ſtrength, that οὐσία could not poſſibly ſignify accidens in the paſſage, which had been quoted; which was very evident from the other two words uſed by Theodoret in the ſame place, εἶδος and χῆμα, which ſignify ſhape and form. He proved likewiſe out of the ſame Author, that οὐσία in Greek could not be taken in ſo general a ſenſe, as Dr. Moreman would inſinuate. This he demonſtrated in the Acts of the ſecond Seſſion of the Convocation. And two days after, when Dr. Moreman had endeavoured to refute what he had urged, he confirmed his aſſertion by proofs from the Greek language; which confounded his antagoniſt in ſuch a manner, that he deſired a day to conſider them (8). There happened another remarkable paſſage in this Convocation, which was, that when Dr. Pern had declared his opinion againſt Tranſubſtantiation, and confirmed the arguments and authorities of Mr. Aylmer, Dr. Weſton the Prolocutor expreſſed his of youth, and aſſiſting in and compoſing works of Learning and Religion [F]. Upon his return in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf as one of the eight managers of the diſputation held at Weſtminſter againſt an equal number of Popiſh Biſhops (g). In 1562 he was made Archdeacon of Lincoln, and was preſent at the famous Synod held the ſame year, when the doctrine and diſcipline of the Church, and the reformation from Popery were eſtabliſhed (b). He continued a long while without any other conſiderable preferment, though he was often nominated by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to ſome vacant Biſhoprick [G]. However he was appointed one of the Queen's Juſtices of the Peace for the County, and one of her Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners (i). October the 10th 1573 he was made Bachelor and Doctor of Divinity the ſame day in the Univerſity of Oxford (k). The year following he was choſen by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to write an anſwer to a Latin book written againſt the government of the Church of England [H]. In 1576 he was preferred to the Biſhoprick of (g) Idem, pag. 17.

(8) Idem, pag. 221, 222. Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſt. vol. 2. B. 5.

(b) Idem, pag. 18.

(i) Idem. pag. 21.

(k) Wood, Faſti, pag. 109.

his ſurprize that he ſhould urge that, becauſe he had ſubſcribed to the contrary but the Friday before. Upon this Mr. Aylmer told the Prolocutor, that he had no right to reprove any man, ſince the Houſe was free, and every perſon had a liberty of ſpeaking his conſcience; and he himſelf had promiſed the day before, that notwithſtanding the ſubſcription of any man, he ſhould have the liberty of delaring his opinion (9).

(9) Strype, pag. 222, 223.

[F] Obliged to retire beyond Sea, where he employed himſelf in the inſtruction of youth, and aſſiſting in and compoſing works of learning and religion.] Dr. Fuller tells us (10), that when he fled from perſecution in this reign, he was wonderfully ſaved from the ſearchers of the ſhip by a Merchant, who put him into a great wine-but, which had a partition in the middle, ſo that Mr. Aylmer ſat in the hinder part, whilſt the ſearchers drank wine, which they ſaw drawn out of the head or other end of it. He reſided firſt at Straſburgh, and afterwards at Zurich in Helvetia; where he proſecuted his ſtudies and heard the Lectures of Dr. Peter Martyr, who had been not long before the King's Profeſſor of Divinity at Oxford. While Mr. Aylmer continued here, he undertook the inſtruction of ſeveral young Gentlemen in learning and religion. Mr. Strype (11) is of opinion, that it was he who publiſhed at Straſburgh the Lady Jane Grey's Letter to Harding, her father's chaplain; and when Mr. John Fox, who was now collecting materials for his Martyrology, enquired of him what he had to communicate of that excellent Lady, he mentioned this Letter to him, which he told Mr. Fox he would find to be pionſly, and prudently, and perhaps learnedly written. Nam & pie & prudenter, fortaſſe etiam docte ſcriptam dices. He was greatly aſſiſtant to that writer in two of the works, which he was engaged in, the former of which was his Hiſtory of the Engliſh Martyrs in Latin, and the latter his Latin Tranſlation of Archbiſhop Cranmer's Vindication of his Book of the Sacrament againſt Dr. Gardiner Biſhop of Wincheſter. But this Tranſlation was never printed. We muſt not omit to mention the good ſervice, which Mr. Aylmer intended for the Engliſh at Francfort. For obſerving a conſiderable number of Scholars and Students there, he thought it would be of great uſe to have ſome learned Profeſſor of Divinity among them; and determined upon Peter Martyr, who was then at Straſburgh. Upon this he engaged Mr. Fox and ſeveral other men of eminence to write a letter to him with the propoſal of a very honourable ſtipend. But this did not take effect (12). During his exile Mr. Aylmer took the opportunity of viſiting the Univerſities of Italy and Germany, and conferring with many of the moſt learned men there. At Jena, an Univerſity erected by the Duke of Saxony, he was offered the Hebrew Profeſſorſhip (13).

(10) Worthies, in Norfolk.

(11) Pag. 11.

(12) Pag. 15.

(13) Pag. 16.

[G] He continued a long while without any other conſiderable preferment, tho' he was often nominated by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to ſome vacant Biſhoprick.] Mr. Strype obſerves (14), that the Archbiſhop had enemies at Court, who generally oppoſed what he recommended and adviſed. But there were many conjectures, why our Divine continued without higher preferment. The party, who were averſe to the Biſhops, and diſliked the form of worſhip eſtabliſhed by Law, made his Book againſt Knox, which we ſhall mention below, one of the cauſes of the neglect of him; becauſe perhaps they imagined that he had in that treatiſe too much advanced the power and authority of Princes, which Knox had too much depreſſed. To this purpoſe we may underſtand that expreſſion of one Norton a Miniſter in a letter to Dr. Whitgift written in the year 1572; in which adviſing the latter to forbear anſwering Mr. Cartwright the Puritan's Book, that Proteſtants might not give an opportunity to the enemies of Religion by falling into controverſies among themſelves; and inſinuating that his ſecret intention in writing in this conteſt was the view of preferment, he obſerves to him, that Mr. Aylmer's unſeaſonable paradox in truth hath hurt the Church, and yet not advanced his preferment ſo much as he hoped. But Dr. Whitgift, in his Anſwer to Norton's Letter, gave a better interpretation both of himſelf and Mr. Aylmer, and their intentions in writing, and ſays, that Mr. Elmer's doctrine was neither unſeaſonable, nor yet a paradox, but a common true received opinion, grounded on the expreſs words of the Scripture, and received without doubt of all learned Writers, both old and new, and in moſt ſeaſonable time taught, mens minds and hearts being ſo far from due obedience, and ſo inclinable to the contrary. And I am ſo fully ſatisfied concerning our Divine, that he had all the advancement, that he look'd for. And that it was great lack of charity to judge men to do that for advancement; which they did of conſcience and duty (15). Mr. Strype tells us afterwards (16), that one of the reaſons of his being neglected ſo long, was that in his Harborough of Princes above-mentioned, he declaimed againſt the ſplendor and wealth of the Church, and ſpoke with ſome ſeeming ſeverity of the civil authority of Biſhops. This made many perſons conclude, that he was not well affected to that Order itſelf. But in reality he was no enemy to the function, but only to the tyranny, which had been exerciſed by the Biſhops under the Papal Uſurpation. In 1569, when Grindal Biſhop of London was to be removed to York, the Archbiſhop endeavoured to procure our Divine to ſucceed him, and recommended him on that account to the Earl of Leiceſter, the favourite of the Queen. But he imagined, that the Queen would object againſt this preferment, as too great a ſtep from an Archdeacon to one of the moſt conſiderable Biſhopricks in England. However when Mr. Aylmer's name was mentioned at Court, the Archbiſhop took occaſion to give the Secretary his judgment of him, that he was a very proper perſon to ſucceed in London, which was a See extremely troubled with Papiſts, and therefore required a man of his activity, ſpirit and reſolution. But all this did not take effect, and Dr. Sandys Biſhop of Worceſter was tranſlated to London.

(14) Pag, 19.

(15) Pag. 20, 21.

(16) Pag. 24, 25.

[H] Choſen by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to write an Anſwer to a Latin Book, written againſt the Government of the Church of England.] This Latin piece was intitled de Diſciplina, and was ſent by the Archbiſhop to Mr. Aylmer, in order that he might write a confutation of it. But tho' he kept the book a long time, yet he refuſed to do it, and wrote to the Archbiſhop, that he could not undertake that deſign. This perhaps may be aſcribed to his diſcontent. However the Archbiſhop procured it to be anſwered by another hand. Dr. Grindal likewiſe, who was then Archbiſhop of York, conſider'd our Divine as the fitteſt perſon for ſuch a work, but concluded, that he would not take pains, which was probably occaſioned by his other employments (17).

(17) Pag. 22.

of London [I] in the room of Dr. Sandys, tranſlated to the Archbiſhoprick of York, with whom he had ſoon after a warm conteſt [K]. He was conſecrated on the 24th of March (l), and began his primary Viſitation the 17th of December 1577, and urged the ſubſcription, which was refuſed by ſome of the Miniſters, who treated the Subſcribers with very reproachful language, and called them diſſemblers, and compared them to Arians, Priſcillians, and Anabaptiſts (m). He was very aſſiduous in preaching [L]; and careful in his Ordination of Miniſters [M]; and in his endeavours to reſtrain both the Papiſts and Puritans, with regard to the former of whom he wrote his advice to the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh [N]. He took great care with regard to the plague, which

(l) Strype, pag. 28.

(m) Idem, pag. 29.

[I] In 1576 he was preferred to the Biſhopric of London.] Dr. Sandys his predeceſſor, in his farewel-Sermon at St. Paul's-Croſs, gave him the following character: My hope is, that the Lord hath provided one of choice to be placed over you, a man to undertake this great charge ſo well enabled for ſtrength, courage, great wiſdom, skill in government, knowledge, as in many other things, ſo eſpecially in the heavenly myſteries of God, that I doubt not but my departure ſhall turn very much to your advantage (17).

(17) Pag. 25.

[K] With whom he ſoon after had a warm conteſt.] They had formerly been very intimate friends and fellow-exiles. But Dr. Aylmer, who ſucceeded Dr. Sandys in the See of London, required as his due the whole revenue and benefits of the Biſhopric for the laſt half year, from Michaelmas to Lady-day, though the latter had continued Biſhop of London the greateſt part of that time before his removal to York. Both of them appealed to the Lord Treaſurer (18). Archbiſhop Sandys charged Dr. Aylmer with ingratitude, and with coloured covetouſneſs and an envious heart covered with the coat of diſſimulation; which, as Mr. Strype obſerves (19), were words, in which the Archbiſhop was too much led by his paſſion. However it is certain, that he had been inſtrumental in the advancement of Dr. Aylmer, recommending him to the Queen as a perſon well qualified for that See (20).

(18) Pag. 25, 26.

(19) Pag. 27.

(20) Pag. 28.

[L] He was very aſſiduous in preaching.] He preached very frequently in his Cathedral, and was maſter of an admirable talent of captivating the attention of his audience. But once perceiving thoſe about him not ſo attentive as they ought to have been to what he was teaching, he begun to read out of the Hebrew Bible. This immediately awakened his hearers, who looked up at him, as amazed, that he ſhould entertain them to ſo little purpoſe in an unknown language. But when he perceived them all thoroughly awake and attentive, he proceeded in his Sermon, after he had admoniſhed them how much it reflected on their good ſenſe, that in matters of mere novelty, and when they underſtood not a word, they ſhould ſo carefully attend, and yet be ſo very negligent in regarding thoſe points, which were of the moſt real importance to them imaginable. At another ſolemn audience in the Parliament time at St. Paul's-Croſs, where a great number of the Nobility and Perſons of Quality were preſent, in order to excite them to a proper regard for piety and religion, he propoſed to them the example of Sir Thomas More, a man for his zeal to be honoured, ſaid the Biſhop, though for his religion to be abhorred. He obſerved to them, that this great man would often put on a ſurplice, and aſſiſt the Prieſt in performing divine ſervice. But one day the Duke of Norfolk came to him at Chelſey, while Sir Thomas was Lord Chancellor, about ſome particular affairs, and being informed that he was at Church, went thither. In the end of the ſervice the Duke and he met, and after ſaluting each other, the Duke ſaid, What? my Lord Chancellor become a Pariſh Clark? What will the King's Majeſty ſay to this Geere, when he ſhall underſtand that his Lord Chancellor of England, a ſpecial perſon in the Realm, and in the higheſt room of honour in the land next the Prince, is become a Pariſh Clark? Sir Thomas replied, that he believed that his Highneſs would be ſo far from being diſpleaſed with him upon that account, that on the contrary, when he ſhall hear, ſaid he, of the care which I had to ſerve both his maſter and mine, he will the rather take me for a faithful ſervant. This paſſage the Biſhop applied to the preſent occaſion, that when the Parliament was ſitting and conſulting about the affairs of the Nation, their firſt care ſhould be to ſerve God themſelves, and ſhew a due regard to his honour (21).

(21) Pag. 30, 31, 32.

[M] Careful in his Ordination of his Miniſters.] He was very ſollicitous to ſupply the church with Miniſters, who were perſons of learning and character, and who being diſperſed about the Nation might preach and inſtruct the ignorant people. But there was great want of ſuch men. For many of the old Incumbents and Curates were perſons fitter to ſport with the timbrel and pipe, than to take in their hands the Book of the Lord, as the Preacher at the Biſhop's firſt Ordination expreſſed it. A great number of theſe men were deprived, and conſequently many churches left deſtitute. Therefore on Aſcenſion Day, May 16th 1577 there was a great Ordination of Miniſters at Fulham by this Biſhop, and this was his firſt Ordination. He appointed Mr. Keltridge, formerly of Trinity College in Cambridge, an eminent Preacher, to make a ſermon upon the occaſion. His text was from 1 Tim. iii. 1, 2, 3. It is a true ſaying, if a man deſire the office of a Biſhop, he deſireth a good work. A Biſhop therefore muſt be unreprovable &c. He afterwards publiſhed this Sermon, and dedicated it to the Biſhop. He addreſſed himſelf to his Lordſhip againſt the vicious old Popiſh Clergy, who were yet in the Church, but undermining it, humbly craving of his honour, whom God in his eternal counſel had placed over them, the Levites, to rub and raze out all the ſtock of Jezebel, to pluck up and deface them, who had no title to the true Prieſthood, to rid the Kingdom of thoſe headleſs fellows, who having of a long time ſerved Peor, and offered up the firſt-fruits of their youth to Acheron, were then compelled to lie grovelling in the Church of God and in the darkneſs wherein they had loitered, and choak'd up the people with chaff and ſuperſtition, &c. He exhorted thoſe, who were then ordained, that for ſupply of preaching in the Kingdom, they would ſcatter themſelves thro' every angle and quarter of this realm in ſeveral congregations, that all Countries might hear their voice, and every part thereof might glorify the Lord. He deſired them likewiſe, nay charged them in the Lord Chriſt, that they would not be of divers minds, but that they would teach one God, and one Chriſt, whom he had ſent; ſowing abroad no new and fantaſtical opinions, nor ſcattering deviliſh and old hereſies, nor inventing ſtrange and fond novelties, thruſting upon the ſilly ſouls innovations and fables, which appertained not to edification, brought in at that time by the ſchiſmatics of the times, and then troubling the Commonwealth. At this Ordination ſixteen were made Deacons, and ten Prieſts, after due examination of them by William Lane and William Cotton his Chaplains (22).

(22) Pag. 32, 33, 34.

[N] With regard to the former of whom [the Papiſts] he wrote his Advice to the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh.] He had diſcovered in 1577 a Popiſh Prieſt, whoſe name was Meredith, who had endeavoured to draw off the Queen's ſubjects from their allegiance to her. He found likewiſe that there were attempts made by the Prieſts to reconcile the Engliſh Papiſts to the King of Spain's deſigns againſt England, and to induce them to aſſiſt him whenever he ſhould invade the Kingdom. He informed therefore the Lord Treaſurer, that it appeared from ſome perſons, who were brought before him and the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners, that ſeveral conſpiracies and dangerous attempts were in agitation; and ſuggeſted to him what meaſures he thought were proper to be taken. I ſpeak to your Lordſhip, ſaid he, as one chiefly careful for the State, or to uſe more ſeverity than hitherto hath been uſed; or elſe we ſhall ſmart for it. For as ſure as God liveth, they look for an invaſion, or elſe they would not fall away as they do. For the Papiſts, who which raged at London in 1578 [O]. Upon the publication of the Jeſuit Campian's Ten Reaſons, he conſulted upon the proper meaſures of obviating the effects of it [P]. He met likewiſe with no ſmall difficulty with regard to the Puritans [Q], and was particularly alarmed by Stubb's Diſcovery of a Gaping Gulph, written againſt the Queen's marriage before outwardly complied with the laws, began now to withdraw themſelves from the Church, and refuſe the Oaths of Supremacy; and others, who were not well ſettled in their opinions, upon the ſuggeſtions of the Papiſts abandoned the Proteſtant Religion. Our Biſhop likewiſe adviſed the ſame Lord, that under ſuch dangerous circumſtances the Heads of the Papiſts, whom he called their chief Captains, ſhould be cloſely confined in priſon, as Sir Thomas Fitz-Hubert, Townley, and others, who were now at liberty, or only under ſome eaſy reſtraint. He obſerved alſo, that it was improper, that Fecknam, late Abbot of Weſtminſter, Watſon, late Biſhop of Lincoln, and Young, another active Popiſh Dignitary under Queen Mary, ſhould continue in the Fleet and Marſhalſea, where they might by their converſation and advice engage others in ill deſigns. He adviſed therefore, that they ſhould be placed again, as they had been before, with three of the Biſhops, as Winchester, Lincoln, Chicheſter, or Ely; and obſerved, that for his own part, if he were out of his firſt-fruits, he would readily take one of them (23).

(23) Pag. 34-38.

[O] He took great care with regard to the plague, which raged at London in 1578.] His principal attention was directed to two things, to preſerve the lives of his Clergy, and yet to make proviſion, that the infected might be viſited, and have the proper aſſiſtances with reſpect to Religion. He ſummoned therefore the London Clergy before him, in the preſence of Dr. Nowel Dean of St. Paul's, Mullins and Walker Archdeacons, and Stanhope Chancellor, in order to elect and appoint out of the Clergy viſitors of the ſick; and all the reſt were to be ſpared by reaſon of the danger of the infection. Mr. Strype tells us (24), that the forwardneſs of many Miniſters to undertake this office was remarkable; ſome for covetouſneſs, and others for vain-glory, others to ſupply their wants, ſuch as were in debt, and others becauſe they were without employment. But the Miniſters generally diſlik'd this motion, thinking it a part of their duty to ſuffer with their flock, and to ſubmit to God's will in the diſcharge of their function. The Biſhop likewiſe ordered books containing Directions for preventing the rage of the peſtilence to be printed and diſpers'd.

(24) Pag. 44.

[P] He conſulted upon the proper meaſures of obviating the effects of it.] Campian's Book was written in a very elegant ſtyle, and dedicated to the ſcholars of both Univerſities, in vindication of what he had done in returning to the Romiſh Religion, and caſting the vileſt imputations upon the Proteſtant Faith. It was privately diſperſed in the Univerſities; which gave great diſturbance to the Government. The Lord Treaſurer Burleigh thought it neceſſary to have a good Anſwer to it publiſhed, and eſteemed our Biſhop a very proper perſon for ſuch a deſign, upon one conſideration particularly, which was on account of the reproaches, which the Jeſuit caſt upon the firſt Reformers, in whoſe times the Biſhop had lived, and with ſome of whom, as well as their conduct, he was well acquainted. The Biſhop had heard of the Book, and ſent to Oxford and other places for it, but could not procure it. And this was partly his excuſe for not anſwering it, beſides the indiſpoſition, under which he laboured at that time. However he let the Lord Treaſurer know, that if he could get the Book, he would do what his health would permit; adding, that with regard to what Campian had written concerning thoſe great men, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves by introducing the Reformation, he preſumed that his reproaches upon them were only collected from the apoſtate Staphilus, and were for the moſt part not to be found in their writings. However he acknowledged, that there were ſome leſſer errors in their works, which is a common caſe of all Writers. Some things were ſpoken by Luther and Calvin in too ſtrong and hyperbolical a manner, particularly with regard to the Sacrament and Predeſtination. He obſerved then, that this Jeſuit and Staphilus might ſoon be anſwered in this point, if they would but look in the end of the Maſter of the Sentences, where they might find under the title of Errorum Pariſiis condemnatorum, that their Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and Gratian among the ſchoolmen, and Tertullian, Cyprian, Auguſtin, Jerom, and others among the Fathers, were condemned, and even ſaid errâſſe contra fidem, to have erred againſt the faith. And yet the reſt of their doctrine was conſidered as Catholic, and not the whole condemned for a few of their errors. He then adviſed the Treaſurer, that a Letter ſhould be ſent from the Lords of the Council to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury or himſelf to enjoin the Deans, Archdeacons, and Doctors, to make ſome collections for that purpoſe; ſince thoſe, who had no great employment in the affairs of the Church, had leiſure ſufficient for ſuch a deſign. Wherefore elſe, added he, have they their livings? He gave the Lord Treaſurer a liſt of thoſe perſons, who were proper for that work; ſome of whom were to collect materials, and others to compile the book from thoſe collections. Mr. Strype obſerves (25), that it is to be regretted, that this deſign was not purſued and brought to perfection. For by this means a good Hiſtory of the Reformation of Religion and of the Doctrines of it, might have been publiſhed by thoſe, who lived in or near thoſe times. But perhaps it was not thought convenient, that Campian's Book ſhould have ſo much honour done to it, as to be anſwered in ſuch a ſolemn manner. However Dr. Whitaker, Profeſſor of Divinity at Cambridge, and others, wrote a confutation of it. But when the Treaſurer had ſoon after ſent to the Biſhop Campian's Book, and deſired him again, as his health would permit, to conſider it, and to engage ſome perſons in an anſwer to it; he gave that Nobleman his ſentiments of it to this purpoſe: that with regard to his collections of ſtrange opinions and expreſſions from ſome of the Reformers, in his chapter intitled Paradoxa, he thought that, upon the ſuppoſition of the Author's having truly repreſented them, none of our Church deſigned to defend Luther's Hyperbola, or every thing, which was written by Calvin or Beza; for quiſque ſuo ſenſu abundet. That we read them as St. Auſtin read Cyprian, and as he would be read himſelf, that where he differed from the canonical Scripture, he ſhould not be allowed. He obſerved likewiſe, that if we ſhould make a collection of the Popiſh Writers and Schoolmen, we ſhould find many things equally exceptionable in them. Sed in nullius juramus verba magiſtri. we have learned to ſwear to the dictates of no maſter, but Chriſt. Then he ſhewed what little regard was to be paid to Campian's quotations from Scripture, ſince in the very firſt text that he cited he uſed the Septuagint Tranſlation, which was entirely different from the original. He remark'd farther, that a favourable interpretation was due to Writers and Speakers; otherwiſe what ſhould we ſay of Gregory Nazianzen, who expreſſes himſelf thus; Ita nos Deos fecit Chriſtus, ut ille factus homo eſt; with many other paſſages of that kind in Lactantius and others? He aſſures his Lordſhip that he would find Campian's writings to be the arrogant vanities of a Porphyrius or a Julian, who were baſe apoſtates from Chriſtianity. In ſhort, that if it were not for the toil of his eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, he could readily have employed himſelf in the confutation of that Jeſuit's Book; but according as his health would permit, he would examine it, and engage ſome others in an anſwer (26).

(25) Pag. 51.

(26) Pag. 52, 53.

[Q] He met likewiſe with no ſmall difficulty with regard to the Puritans.] Theſe perſons, as Mr. Strype obſerves (27), were enemies to the Church on account of the Eccleſiaſtical Government of it, which they thought to be antichriſtian, becauſe uſed in the Popiſh Church. Theſe, ſays that Author, were now commonly known by the name of Puritans and Preciſians; whom the Biſhop had indeed little kindneſs for, and they as little for him. "In the year 1577, continues Mr. Strype, "he met with ſeveral perſons of a contrary way to "the Papiſts; of whom he informed the Lord Trea- "ſurer, that in reſpect of their hindering unity and "quietneſs, they were not much leſs harmleſs than "they; marriage with the Duke of Anjou, brother to the King of France. This occaſioned him to ſummon the London Clergy, and to urge a ſtrict conformity to the orders of the Church [R]. He gave his advice alſo to the Lord Burleigh, Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge, concerning the juſt methods of preventing the growth of Puritaniſm there (n). In May 1579 he was brought before the Council, and openly reproved by the Lord Treaſurer for felling his woods (o); which obliged him to write a paper in defence of himſelf (p). However he was prohibited to ſell any more of them (q). He was engaged at the ſame time in a ſuit againſt Archbiſhop Sandys for dilapidations, and at laſt obtained a ſentence in his favour in 1584 (r). An earthquake, which happened at London the 6th of April 1580, occaſioned him to compoſe a form of prayers for his Dioceſe.

(27) Pag. 55.

(n) Idem, pag. 68.
(o) Idem, pag. 71.
(p) Idem, pag. 72, 73.
(q) Idem, pag. 74.
(r) Idem, pag. 75, 76, 77.

" they; namely Chark, Chapman, Field and Wil" cox. Theſe he had before him; but the two latter
" ſhewed themſelves obſtinate, and eſpecially Field;
" who notwithſtanding the Archbiſhop's Inhibition
" had entred into houſes, and taught, as he ſaid, God
" knows what." His advice concerning thoſe men was, that they might be profitably employed in Lancaſhire, Staffordſhire, Shropſhire, and ſuch other barbarous countries, to draw the people from Papiſm and groſs ignorance. And that tho' they went a little too far, yet he ſuppoſed it would be leſs labour to draw them back, than now it was to hale them forward. And that ſome letters of friendly requeſt might be ſent thither for ſome contribution to be made by the Towns and Gentlemen for ſome competent ſtipend to relieve them. And he thought this might grow greatly to the profit of the Church. And therefore communicated this counſel to the Lord Treaſurer, and prayed him at his leiſure to think on it. Yet he declared, that he ſaid all this, not becauſe he lik'd them, but becauſe he would have his cure rid of them (28). Some years before a Book had been publiſhed under the title of An Admonition to the Parliament, the main deſign of which was to deſtroy the Church, as it was then eſtabliſhed in the public worſhip by the Book of Common-Prayer, and in the government of it by Biſhops and other eccleſiaſtical Officers. To give the reader an idea of it we ſhall give a few paſſages extracted from it, as we find them in a late Book intitled, A Vindication of the Government, Doctrine, and Worſhip of the Church of England eſtabliſhed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth againſt the injurious reflection of Mr. Neale in his Hiſtory of the Puritans (29).

(28) Pag. 56.
(29) See pag. iii, & ſeq.

" Let us all, ſays the Preface to the Admonition, with " more earneſt prayer than we are wont, earneſtly re" commend it to God his bleſſing; and namely, that it
" will pleaſe him by his Spirit, to enlighten the heart
" of our moſt gracious Sovereign, and the reſt in au" thority, to the benefit of his ſmall flock, and the " overthrow of their proud enemies, that Godlineſs may
" by them proceed in peace." And that we might not be at a loſs, as the Author of the Vindication obſerves, to know who theſe proud enemies are, that they deſire to be overthrown, they deſcribe them very diſtinctly; " Certain men, whoſe credit is great, and
" whoſe friends are many, we mean the Lordly Lords,
" Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Suffragans, Deans, Univerſity-
" Doctors, and Batchelors of Divinity, Archdeacons,
" Chancellors, and the reſt of that proud generation,
" whoſe Kingdom muſt go down, hold they never ſo
" hard; becauſe their tyrannous Lordſhip cannot ſtand
" with Chriſt's Kingdom." In the Admonition itſelf they addreſſed the Parliament in the following manner: Now, becauſe many men ſee not all things, and the world in this reſpect is marvelouſly blinded; it has been thought good to prefer to your godly conſiderations a true Platform of a Church reformed, to the end that it being laid before your eyes, to behold the great unlikeneſs betwixt it and this our Engliſh Church, you may learn either with perfect hatred to deteſt the one, or elſe to be without excuſe before the Majeſty of our God. " You muſt, ſay they to the Parliament, diſ-
" place thoſe ignorant and unable Miniſters already " plac'd, and in their rooms appoint ſuch as both can " and will by God's aſſiſtance feed the flock. . . . .
" Overthrow without hope of reſtitution the Court of " Faculties . . . remove Homilies, Articles, Injunctions,
" and that preſcript Order of ſervice made out of the
" Maſs-Book." And that none might preſume to violate their Injunctions, they deſired them to have them enforced by wholeſome ſeverities. To redreſs theſe, your Wiſdoms have to remove, as before, ignorant Miniſters . . . to enjoin Deacons and Midwives not to meddle in Miniſters matters; if they do, to ſee them ſharply puniſhed. This Admonition therefore gave great offence to the Queen; and Anſwers were written to it by ſeveral perſons, eſpecially by Dr. Whitgift, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury. A ſevere Proclamation was iſſued out in 1573 for the better obſervation of the Common-Prayer and Orders of the Church, and for the ſuppreſſing of that Book. However one Thomas Woodcock a young Stationer in 1578 ventured to ſell ſeveral of them; upon which Biſhop Aylmer committed him to Newgate. But being ſollicited to diſcharge him, he anſwered, that he neither could nor would do any thing without the Lord Treaſurer's conſent, or by his Letters or Warrant. This was thought a little rigorous in him; whereas, as Mr. Strype obſerves (30), he could not of his own authority diſcharge a criminal, whom he had committed, without inflicting due puniſhment, unleſs it were by an order from above; eſpecially in the caſe of ſuch as diſperſed or ſold this Admonition, which tended to excite the moſt dangerous diſorders.

(30) Pag. 57.

[R] To ſummon the London Clergy, and to urge a ſtrict conformity to the Orders of the Canon.] They were called to the Biſhop's Palace; where forty of them appeared. The Biſhop then in the preſence of the Dean of St. Paul's, who aſſiſted him, told them that the occaſion of his ſudden calling for them was to admoniſh them of two things chiefly. The former was of one Andreas Jacobus a Dutchman, and, as it ſeems, a Miniſter of the Foreigners Church at London, who was a Lutheran or Ubiquitary, and maintained the real Preſence, and had raiſed great conteſts among the foreign Preachers. He warned the Clergy to be cautious of paying any regard to his doctrines, ſince he had excited prodigious differences among the Proteſtants in Germany. He proceeded then to the other reaſon, which indeed was the principal one, why he called them together at that time, which was upon the account of Stubbs's Book, and of the Animoſities, which it had occaſioned. For people were highly offended at the Duke of Anjou's being at Court, and perhaps uſing his Religion there. And many of the Preachers themſelves had treated upon that ſubject and other matters of State in their pulpits. He then aſſured them of the Queen's firmneſs to the Proteſtant Religion; and adviſed the Miniſters not to interpoſe in the affairs of State, but to ſtudy peace, and promote it in their ſeveral charges. Theſe diſturbances about the Queen's marriage being chiefly moved by thoſe, who were enemies to the Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions, a ſtricter hand was held over them and the City-Miniſters. For beſides this Summons, they were four times more called together by order from the Court to the Biſhop, that a diligent inſpection might be made into their behaviour, and ſeveral rules might be preſcribed them in their miniſtry. The next citation therefore of the London Miniſters was November 10th following at St. Sepulchre's Church; where a great many perſons were ſworn to make enquiry upon theſe articles: 1. For the true and faithful obſervation of the Book of public Prayers, 2. If any Preachers meddled with matters of State in their public or private doctrine; or intermeddled with alterations of States and Kingdoms. 3. If any uſed to preach who were not licenſed thereunto. For that ſuch who had not Licences, were to preach. 4. To enquire after private Conventicles, Preachers, and Faſts. 5. If there were any alterations from the Book of Common Prayer, and to enquire, who and how many gathered to private preaching. 6. To make diligent ſearch after vagrant Preachers and Popiſh Prieſts (31). In January 1579 ſeveral other articles were ordered to be enquired of by the Parſons, Vicars and Curates,

(31) Strype, pag. 63, 64, 65.

Dioceſe (s). Auguſt the 16th following, he began the viſitation of his Dioceſe, and in November following divers articles were exhibited by the Archdeacon to be enquired of within the Archdeaconry of London [S]. In January 1581 he cited the Miniſters of London twice before him [T]. He had a warm conteſt with the Lord Rich a Puritan, who ſupported one Mr. Wright as his Preacher. This cauſe was brought before the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, upon which the Lord Rich was committed to the Marſhalſea, and Mr. Wright to the Fleet; who at laſt offered a ſubſcription to his allowance of the Miniſtry and Liturgy of the Church of England. The ſame year he propoſed a very uſeful ſcheme in London, that a number of learned Preachers ſhould be appointed to preach on ſet times before great Aſſemblies, particularly at St. Paul's Croſs; for the encouragement of which certain contributions were to be made and ſettled on them by the City (t). He made uſe of his power likewiſe to promote conformity to the Church [U], which expoſed him to ſevere reproaches. He began now to be uneaſy in his Dioceſe of London, and uſed all his endeavours to obtain a removal to the Biſhoprick of Ely or Winchеſter, but without ſucceſs [W]. He was again diſturbed by falſe informations againſt him

(s) Idem, pag. 78, 79, 80.

(t) Idem, pag. 87.

Miniſters and Church Wardens of every Pariſh within the Archdeaconry of London, according to a commandment ſent from the Lords of the Privy Council. Mr. Strype is of opinion (32), that theſe articles were of the Biſhop's compoſing, but that he procured the Privy Council to own them and ſend them as theirs, in order to give them the greater ſtrength and authority. For the better execution of the Council's Letters, it was ordered the Clergy at this meeting after this manner, that from henceforth you do not admit any man to preach or to read any Lectures in any of your churches, but ſuch as you do know; that do alſo in their own perſons miniſter the Sacraments of Baptiſm and of the holy Communion, according to the order preſcribed in the book of Common Prayer. In purſuance of theſe articles, February 6th following there was another call of the London Clergy by virtue of the Council's Letters; and on the firſt of March they were ſummoned again. (33) "Thus cloſe, ſays Mr. Strype, was the matter of "conformity this year purſued; and that becauſe of "the dangerous ſchiſm that was now a breeding; "and the apprehenſion of the great evils, that muſt "needs enſue upon that; while the Common Prayer "was by ſome in part, and by others wholly laid "aſide, and the Sacraments of the Church diſuſed, or "ſhifted off to be performed by others, that were "hired or procured. All which conſiderations made "both the Biſhop and the Queen herſelf ſomewhat "vigorous in the ſuppreſſing theſe men."

(32) Pag. 66.

(33) Pag. 67, 68.

[S] Divers articles were exhibited by the Archdeacon to be enquired of within the Archdeaconry of London.] Theſe articles chiefly related to the Laity, Sectaries, and Papiſts; and were as follow (34): 1. Whether there be any in your Pariſh, that do refuſe to conform themſelves in matters of Religion, and to come to their Pariſh-Church, and refuſe the Communion. And what be their names, and of what condition and eſtate. 2. How long they have refuſed ſo to do. 3. How many of their wives, children, ſervants, or others, ſojourning or abiding in their houſes, do likewiſe refuſe ſo to do. And what be their names and ſurnames. And how long they have ſo done. 4. For what cauſe they have refuſed ſo to do. 5. Of what yearly living in England, or other value of ſubſtance in goods are theſe principal perſons thought to be in truth and indeed, and not as they be ſtinted in the Subſidy-Book. 6. Whether any one or more of them have been now already committed to any priſon for ſuch recuſancy. Memorandum, This inquiſition not to extend to any other than ſuch as do obſtinately refuſe to come to their Pariſh-Church, and there to receive the Communion. Mr. Strype obſerves (35), that this enquiry ſeems to have been appointed upon the intelligence of the encreaſe of the Papiſts; for theſe crafty Emiſſaries of Rome took this opportunity to reconcile as many as they could to the pretended unity of the Church, while the eyes of the State were chiefly upon the diſſenting brethren, of whom it had a great jealouſy about this time.

(34) Idem, pag. 81.

(35) Pag. 81.

[T] In January 1581 he cited the Miniſters of London twice before him.] The firſt citation was to enquire what ſons of Engliſh Gentlemen and others, or what ſervants were then beyond ſea, and for what purpoſe they went, whether as ſcholars, or factors, or otherwiſe. And the 29th of the ſame month there was another citation of them into the Conſiſtory by the Biſhop and the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion; and theſe injunctions and enquiries were given them. I. No invectives to be uſed of or againſt eſtates. This related to the foreign Kingdoms as well as our own, becauſe ſeveral Preachers took great freedom in ſpeaking of France and Spain. II. None to refuſe the wearing the ſurplice. III. That there be no diminiſhing or altering the ſervice. IV. Enquiry to be made, who did not celebrate the ſacraments together with their preaching, doing the one, but wholly omitting the other. V. Alſo who made alteration in the rites required to be uſed in baptiſm. VI. Who did not catechiſe the youth. VII. The ſeventh article related to contentious Preachers, who ſcandalouſly gave others the name of Dumb Dogs. VIII. The laſt related to ſuch as utterly refuſed to read the Homilies. The Biſhop at this Aſſembly ſhewed himſelf warm and reſolute, and ſaid that he would ſeverely puniſh the offenders in theſe points, or he would lie in the duſt for it (36).

(36) Pag. 83.

[U] He made uſe of his power likewiſe to promote conformity to the Church.] He complained that ſeveral of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners abſented themſelves, whenever any affair of importance, but of an invidious nature, was enquired into; which was a great diſcouragement to thoſe few, who were preſent. He therefore informed the Lord Treaſurer of it, and adviſed that Dr. Clerke Dean of the Arches, who was very active, might be encouraged by his Lordſhip or the Queen, eſpecially ſince he had but little favour from the Court; and that others might be admoniſhed by his letters on account of their abſence. He propoſed likewiſe, that ſeveral other men of abilities and reſolution might be added to them. The Commiſſioners at their laſt ſitting had made an order, that the Archdeacons, Commiſſaries, and Officials, ſhould ſend their Apparitors from place to place every Sunday to ſee what conformity was uſed in every pariſh, and give an account of it. Theſe proceedings the Biſhop deſired the Lord Treaſurer to impart to the Queen for her ſatisfaction, and to know further her pleaſure in that point. In December 1581 the Treaſurer ſent Dr. Lewis Maſter of the Requeſts to the Biſhop to adviſe him not to meddle with a great many matters by virtue of the Commiſſion, but ſuch only as related to religion. This prudent direction was kindly received by the Biſhop, who immediately returned his thanks to his Lordſhip. He was the great ſupport of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion. And indeed, ſays Mr. Strype (37), by his diligence and patience he was a great inſtrument, in obedience to the Queen, to quell and take down thoſe men, who ſet themſelves againſt the Eccleſiaſtical order, notwithſtanding all their endeavours and intereſt at Court againſt him. Which he remembred to the Lord Treaſurer as a good office that he had done, for which the Queen he reckoned ought to favour him, and not to give ear to every information given againſt him and the Commiſſioners; but to conſider into what peaceable tranquillity God by his poor ſervice, as he ſaid, had brought not only London and the whole Dioceſs, but alſo the moſt part of England, ſince he came to that place. Whereby he had, as he thought in his conſcience, rather deſerved her gracious favour than diſcouragement. For on the other ſide he expreſſed how he was hated like a dog, and was called the Oppreſſor of the Children of God.

(37) Pag. 95, 96.

[W] Endeavoured to the utmoſt to obtain a removal to the Biſhoprick of Ely or Winchеſter; but without ſucceſs.] him for felling of his woods, but eſcaped the force of them [X]. In 1583 he performed his triennial Viſitation, in which he diſcovered a frequent and ſcandalous practice in his Dioceſe of commutation of penance, which he endeavoured to reform [Y]. His committing of Mr. Thomas Cartwright, the great Leader of the Puritans at that time, to priſon, expoſed him to the diſpleaſure of the Queen [Z], with whom he had likewiſe a diſpute concerning a Vicarage (u). In 1585 he compoſed a prayer on account of the unſeaſonable wet weather, which he recommended to be uſed in private families, as well as in public (w). In ſummer 1586 he performed his next triennial Viſitation; but at Malden in Eſſex a public inſult was intended to be offered him [AA]. In January following his (u) Pag. 119, 120.

(w) Pag. 123.

ceſs.] He ſaw evidently how many troubles he muſt continually be expoſed to, while he remained in the See of London, and how obnoxious he was to the inconvenience of ſlanderous tongues and malicious informations, which meet with too much regard at Court. The labour and attendance likewiſe of the Commiſſion was too great a burden for him in his old age. He had been endeavouring to procure a removal to another Dioceſe ever ſince the year 1579, for then he very earneſtly ſollicited the Lord Treaſurer to obtain a tranſlation for him to Ely or Wincheſter. He obtained the grant of the former from the Queen at the Lord Treaſurer's requeſt: and therefore upon the death of Dr. Cox the late Biſhop of that See in 1581, he wrote a letter to the Treaſurer to promote his removal, in which he told him, that he would not ſeek the place as he did, but that he found in himſelf ſome imperfection of body and mind, being then Homo Sexagenarius, and that within a ſhort time he ſhould never anſwer her Majeſty's expectation nor his own conſcience in that place of ſervice, which hitherto had been ſo tedious, that he hoped her Majeſty even of juſtice would recompenſe him, though not with gain, yet with eaſe in theſe his crooked years. About this time the Queen was inclined to remove him to Worceſter, and in his room to have preferred Dr. Richard Bancroft, Archbiſhop Whitgift's Chaplain, an active man, and of great ſervice in the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion. But this deſign was laid aſide, and our Biſhop continued in vain to ſollicit a removal in the years 1582, 1583, and 1585 (39).

(39) Strype, p. 97--101.

[X] Diſturbed by falſe informations againſt him for felling his woods; but eſcaped the force of them.] Theſe informations were made to the Council or the Star-Chamber againſt him. But he was diſcharged from them, and the Lord Treaſurer ſupported his cauſe in the ſtrongeſt manner. The Biſhop was ſo confident of his own innocence in this affair, that he deſired the Treaſurer that he might have the liberty of anſwering any perſon who ſhould appear againſt him, and he did not doubt of clearing himſelf to the general ſatisfaction (40). There was likewiſe a report ſpread abroad of his cutting down the elms about his palace at Fulham. But how falſe this was all the Court knew, and the Queen herſelf could witneſs, who had lately lodged at the palace there, and diſliked nothing but that the proſpect from her lodgings was intercepted by the thickneſs of the trees. Dr. Pern, Dean of Ely, being at a great man's table, and hearing the Biſhop ſeverely reproached for felling his elms at Fulham, aſked an antient Lawyer of the company how long they had been cut down, who replied, about half a year ago; upon which the Dean obſerved that they muſt have grown in a ſurprizing manner, ſince he had been there within four days paſt, and they ſeemed then to be two hundred years old. He took occaſion upon this to mention what the Queen had complained of, that the proſpect was hindered by the trees. It appears from hence that the common ſtory related by Martin Mar-Prelate and Sir John Harington is falſe; that one Madox ſhould tell the Biſhop that his name was Elmar, but it might properly be Mar-Elm, ſince he had marred all the Elms in Fulham (41).

(40) Pag. 101.

(41) Idem, pag. 103, 104.

[Y] Diſcovered a frequent and ſcandalous practice in his Dioceſe of commutation of penance, which he endeavoured to reform.] This was practiſed by Chancellors, Commiſſaries, Officials, Regiſters, and even the Apparitors. Theſe commutations were ſo numerous, and ſometimes ſo ſtrange, that the Biſhop apprehended it would open a paſſage to a general inundation of vice, eſpecially with regard to the rich, who might be as criminal as they pleaſed when they might ſave themſelves from puniſhment by money. And this was done, notwithſtanding a late Convocation had expreſly ordered, that no commutation of penance ſhould be allowed without the knowledge of the Biſhop of the Dioceſe. The higheſt Eccleſiaſtical Courts were not free from ſcandal in that point. The Biſhop, who was then at Hadham in Hertfordſhire upon his viſitation, informed the Lord Treaſurer of this, and in order to rectify this abuſe, deſired him, together with the Council, to direct their letters to the High Commiſſioners Eccleſiaſtical; that whereas in the Convocation at the laſt Parliament order had been taken by the Biſhops, that no commutation of penance ſhould be made without the Biſhop's knowledge, their Lordſhips pleaſure was, that the Commiſſioners ſhould examine all manner of Eccleſiaſtical offences, what and how many penances they had commuted and changed within ſix or ſeven years paſt. The profits ariſing from the refunding of ſuch ſums as had been given, the Biſhop propoſed ſhould be applied to the reparation of St. Paul's Cathedral, which would help to make good a good piece of it. And beſides by this means all Eccleſiaſtical officers would be more preciſe in bargaining for ſin, and all ſinners would be more afraid of puniſhment, God's name would be leſs diſhonoured, and the chief of the Clergy, which were therein moſt blamed, ſhould be hoped ſhew themſelves of all others to have leaſt gain, or elſe let them bear the burthen of their deſerts. Thus honeſtly and diſcreetly, ſays Mr. Strype (42), did our Biſhop adviſe for the cure of this corruption of diſcipline. But it is not known what effect this ſcheme had.

(42) Pag. 108.

[Z] His committing of Mr. Thomas Cartwright ... to priſon, expoſed him to the diſpleaſure of the Queen.] Mr. Cartwright, according to Mr. Strype (43), was a man of a bold ſpirit and a running pen. He had writ ſome books againſt the Hierarchy eſtabliſhed by law in the Engliſh Church, whereby he had given great offence, and made himſelf obnoxious to the Laws. Our Biſhop had lately ſeized and committed him to priſon, which, according to his cuſtom, he acquainted the Lords with by the Clark of the Council. He had made uſe of the Queen's warrant, who was incenſed againſt Mr. Cartwright, in ſeizing him, in order to ſecure himſelf and the Commiſſion from any imputation; and he informed the Lords, that he had done it by her Majeſty's order. But the Queen was extremely offended that he had made uſe of her name to the Lords. The Biſhop was prodigiouſly ſurprized and uneaſy at this, and expoſtulated with the Lord Treaſurer in the following manner: I underſtand myſelf to be in ſome diſpleaſure with her Majeſty about Mr. Cartwright, becauſe I ſent word to your Lordſhip by the Clark of the Council, that I committed him by her Majeſty's commandment. Alas! my Lord, in what a dilemma ſtood I, that if I had not ſhowed that warrant, I ſhould have had all your diſpleaſures, which I was not able to bear; and uſing it for my ſhield (being not forbidden by her Majeſty) I am blamed for not taking upon me a matter, wherein ſhe herſelf would not be ſeen? Well, I leave it to God and to your wiſdom to conſider in what a dangerous place of ſervice I am. But God whom I ſerve, and in whoſe hands the hearts of Princes are as the rivers of water, can and will turn all to the beſt, and ſtir up ſuch honourable friends as you are to appeaſe her Highneſs's indignation.

(43) Pag. 116.

(45) Strype 127, 128.

[AA] A public inſult was intended to be offered him.] He obſerved in a Letter to a great friend of his at Court, that at Malden he had like to have taſted of the four fruits of the new Reformers, and eſpecially of ſuch as were mercenary; by which he means thoſe, who were retained to preach in divers places, beſides the ordinary Miniſters. Mr. Strype tells us (44), that "a certain (46) Idem 158.

(44) Pag. 125, 126.

his ſon Dr. Theophilus Aylmer, whom he had made Archdeacon of London, cited the Clergy before him, to whom he enjoined ſeveral particulars [BB]. In 1587 our Biſhop ſate in the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion upon the caſe of Mr. Robert Cawdry, who had been preſented by the Lord Burleigh to the living of South Loughnam or Luffenham in Rutlandſhire, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his oppoſition to the Church of England; ſo that he was at laſt degraded and depoſed from the Miniſtry; however he was offered to be reſtored upon ſubſcription, but refuſed it (x). In 1588 he ſuſpended Mr. Henry Smith, Lecturer of St. Clement's, for preaching againſt the Common Prayer and refuſing to ſubſcribe (y). The year following he viſited his Dioceſe [CC]. In 1591 he ſent for Mr. Cartwright from the Fleet, and expoſtulated with him in a very ſtrong manner [DD]. His care of the Church, and his regard for thoſe of his friends, who were men of diſtinguiſhed merit, obliged him ſometimes to recommend them to vacant Biſhoprics. And therefore in the year 1592, upon the vacancy of the See of Oxford, he wrote to the Lord Treaſurer in favour of Dr. John Bullingham, Biſhop of Gloceſter, and Dr. Cole, who had been his fellow-

(x) Pag. 129-148.

(y) Pag. 154.

" certain fellow, to be hired by ſome young heads of " the town, Tradeſmen there, was to have come in- " to the Church, beſmeared like a fool, and to have " taken the Biſhop's cap off from his head, and hav- " ing twirled it about his finger, to have caſt and toſ- " ſed it to and fro among them in the midſt of the " people. By ſome means this came to his knowledge, " and was ſeaſonably prevented. Which if it had " not, there was no doubt but a dangerous tumult " would have riſen, and as the Biſhop feared, not " without blood. The Biſhop examined the matter, " and having found out the chief deviſers of it com- " mitted them to priſon. The Bailiff and the reſt " were much diſmayed at it. The Biſhop did adviſe " hereupon, that her Majeſty, or ſome of the Lords " of the Council, would ſhew ſome countenance of " miſliking of ſo dangerous a device, as the fruits " of thoſe mens preachings, who diſobeyed the Book " and other Orders. Whereby, as by the Biſhop's " preſent proceedings they began to yield, ſo the Bi- " ſhop doubted not then to find them and all others " in that corner very tractable."

[BB] His ſon Dr. Theophilus Aylmer . . cited the Clergy before him, to whom he enjoined ſeverat particulars.] He intended this meeting chiefly for thoſe Miniſters who were not Preachers, but of the inferior rank; and therefore they were enjoyned; I. that every perſon ſhould have a Bible in Engliſh and Latin. II. That every perſon ſhould have Bullinger's Decads. III. That each perſon ſhould have his paper book, and write in it the quantity of one ſermon every week. IV. This book to be ſhewn quarterly unto a certain grave man appointed to examine how they had profited; and he to deliver them to the Archdeacon. V. The examinants to uſe theſe beginners with favour. VI. Every non-preaching Miniſter to be taxed at four purchaſed ſermons every year; that is, to procure at his own coſt a Preacher to preach a ſermon in his Church once a quarter. VII. A licenſed Preacher to preach ſixteen times in the year. In March following, the Archdeacon ſummoned the Clergy again, that is, the Preachers and more learned of them, enjoining them, I. To obſerve carefully the Book of Common Prayer. II. To catechiſe youth on Sundays and Holydays. And this was now allowed to Curates to do, in certain queſtions and anſwers ſet forth by the Biſhop. III. Every man to ſhew his Letters of Orders and Licence to preach immediately. IV. Several, who had taken the Degrees of Maſters of Art or Bachelors of Art, were enjoined to procure the Biſhop's Licence to preach. This and the former citation of the Clergy were in order to encreaſe the number of Preachers, according to a Mandate from the Archbiſhop to the Biſhops (45).

(45) Strype, p. 127, 128.

[CC] The year following he viſited his Dioceſe.] This viſitation was held by him at London Auguſt 30th 1589. Among other Injunctions the Clergy were required, I. To give God public thanks for the French King's victory. II. That they be ready with furniture according to the proportion aſſigned them: that is, with arms for the Queen's defence, who was now in daily apprehenſion of the Spaniards ſince their defeat the laſt Summer (46).

(46) Idem, pag. 158.

[DD] He ſent for Mr. Cartwright from the Fleet, and expoſtulated with him in a very ſtrong manner.] Mr. Cartwright had been ſummoned up in 1590 from Warwick into the Star-chamber, together with Edmund Snape and ſeveral other Puritan Miniſters, for ſetting up a new diſcipline and a new form of worſhip, and ſubſcribing their hands to ſupport it. This therefore was interpreted an oppoſition and diſobedience to the eſtabliſhed laws. In May 1591 he was ſent for by the Biſhop to appear before him and ſome others of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, and brought into the chamber of the Biſhop's houſe, who in a long ſpeech directed himſelf to him, and charged him firſt with abuſing the Privy Council by informing them of diſeaſes, which he was not troubled with. For Cartwright had lately ſollicited them for his liberty from the Fleet on account of his gout and ſciatica; which it ſeems was more in pretence than truth. Secondly, that as he had abuſed the Council, ſo he with others had abuſed her Majeſty in a ſupplication, by ſuggeſting that the oath, which was tendered to them, was not according to law, and that it was given generally without limitation; by which he meant the oath, which the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners offered to thoſe, who came before them. That he had confeſſed twice or thrice before that time, that a man might be ſaved in obſerving the orders of the Church eſtabliſhed by the laws of the Land; and in conſequence of this he charged him with the vanity and fruitleſneſs of a further reformation. He added likewiſe that in the greateſt matters, which he and others contended for, they were of the ſame opinion, that the Papiſts were; as he ſaid appeared partly from the anſwers of ſome of his party, who were a few days before at Lambeth before the Archbiſhop and the Commiſſioners there. Whereas the agreement, which there was between the Papiſts and the Biſhops, which the Puritans were ſo ready to lay to their charge, was at moſt but in ſome ſmall ceremonies, and theſe but indifferent till eſtabliſhed by law (47). Mr. Strype in his Appendix (48) mentions ſeveral other particulars of the conference between the Biſhop with the other Commiſſioners and Mr. Cartwright, who refuſing to take the oath, the Biſhop commanded an Act of it to be entered. The principal articles charged againſt Mr. Cartwright and the other Puritan Miniſters in the Bill of Complaint againſt them, were as follow (49): That there had been of late ſet forth by ſome ſeditious people a Government of the Church by Doctors, Paſtors, Elders, and Deacons, and ſuch like; with a new Form of Common-Prayer and Adminiſtration of the Sacraments and Diſcipline of the Church, compriſed in a book intitled, Diſciplina Eccleſiæ ſacro Dei verbo deſcripta, and other books and pamphlets of like nature. That the defendants had unlawfully and ſeditiouſly aſſembled themſelves together concerning the premiſes; and had in thoſe [Aſſemblies] treated of and concluded upon ſundry ſeditious articles, in allowance of the ſame books and of the matters therein contained. Unto which articles the defendants had in ſome of thoſe Aſſemblies ſubmitted themſelves and ſubſcribed and put part in execution. For which miſdemeanors they had been called in queſtion before the High-Commiſſioners; where they refuſed to take the oath miniſtred to them, to anſwer to ſuch articles as they were to be examined of on her Majeſty's behalf concerning the ſame. Of all which a Bill had been exhibited by direction from the Lords into the Star-chamber againſt the defendants. In which Bill was alſo contained, that they under colour and pretence of diſcipline and charity did derive to themſelves power to deal in all manner of cauſes whatſoever; and had moved and perſuaded ſundry of her Majeſty's ſubjects, to refuſe to take any oath to anſwer to any matter, that might concern any the unlawful doings and proceedings of them, their brethren and teachers.

(47) Idem, pag. 160, 161.

(48) Pag. 310, & ſeq.

(49) Idem, pag. 319, 320.

fellow-exile in the reign of Queen Mary (z). Being now broken with age he was desirous to resign his Bishopric to Dr. Bancroft, a man in high esteem with the Queen [EE]; but the latter refused it. In 1592 March the 18th he was present at his son's Visitation of his Archdeaconry, in order to assist him with his advice; and the next year was his own last Visitation of his Diocese (aa). He died at Fulham the 3d of June 1594, being 73 years of age, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral before the Chapel of St. George, and had a Monument with an Inscription [FF] erected to him. He married Judith Bures or Buers, of a good family in Suffolk (bb), by whom he had several children [GG]. He kept a very noble house, having eighty servants in his family (cc). Several imputations were cast upon him; but Mr. Strype has shewn that they were the mere effects of malice (dd). He was particularly charged with a breach of the Sabbath and Swearing (HH). But in the midst of all his enemies, he had many friends of the highest Quality and Character, and among the rest the great Lord Treasurer Burleigh (ee). His abilities in Learning appeared from the share which he had in the debates in Queen Mary's Convocation, and his book intitled The Harborough [II]. He was an excellent Logician and Historian, and well skilled in the Hebrew Tongue. He understood the Civil Law, Divinity, and the antient Writers, and was

(z) Pag. 167, 168.

(aa) Pag. 170.

(bb) Pag. 174.

(cc) Pag. 193.

(dd) Pag. 196--206.

(ee) Pag. 219, 220.

[EE] He was desirous to resign his Bishoprick to Dr. Bancroft, a man in high esteem with the Queen.] He offered him three times this year a resignation upon certain conditions; perhaps, says Mr. Strype (50), in respect of the dilapidations, to allow him such a sum in satisfaction. For the Bishop seemed to foresee a considerable burthen like to fall upon his estate on that account; and so thought it his best way to compound it in his life time. But Bancroft refused. "But questionless Bishop Aylmer's main inducement in labouring Bancroft's succession to the See of London, was, that "he knew him to be a person long used in the Ecclesiastical Commission, and strait for the observation of the rites and prescriptions of the Church established against such as would have trampled upon "them. Therefore it was but the day before our "Bishop died, that he signified how sorry he was, "that he had not written to the Queen, and commended his last suit unto her Highness, viz. to have "Bancroft his successor."

(50) Pag. 169.

[FF] A monument with an inscription.] It was as follows: Hic jacet certissimam expectans Resurrectionem suæ carnis D. Johannes Aylmer D. Episcopus Londini. Qui obiit diem suum An. Dom. 1594. Ætat. suæ 73.

Ter senos annos præsul; semel exul, & idem
Bis pugil in causâ Religionis erat.

That is: "Here lies the Body of Dr. JOHN AYLMER "Lord Bishop of London, in expectation of a sure "Resurrection. He died in the year of our Lord "1594 in the 73d year of his age. He was eighteen "years Bishop, once an Exile, and twice a Champion "in the cause of Religion."

[GG] By whom he had several children.] He had seven sons: Samuel, who was High-Sheriff of Suffolk in the reign of King Charles I (51); Theophilus, who was Archdeacon of London, and Rector of Much-Hadham in Hertfordshire, and died in January 1625 (52); John, who was knighted, and stiled Sir John Aylmer of Rigby in the county of Lincoln Knight (53); Zachary, Nathaniel; Tobel, who was godson to Archbishop Whitgift, and Edmund (54). His daughters were Judith, who married William Linch of Kent; Elizabeth, who married Sir John Foliot of Pirton in Worcestershire Knight. He had a third daughter (or one of the former by a second marriage), who married Dr. Squire, who had good preferments in the Church, but was a man of a very indifferent character (55).

(51) Idem, pag. 174, 175.

(52) Idem, pag. 176-184.

(53) Idem, pag. 184.

(54) Idem, pag. 185.

(55) Idem, pag. 280, & seq.

[HH] He was particularly charged with breach of the Sabbath and Swearing.] The former charge was founded upon his playing at bowls on Sunday; and the latter, because he used to say sometimes By my faith. With regard to the former, Mr. Strype tells us (56), that this was a recreation, which he delighted in, and used for the diversion of his cares, and preservation of his health at Fulham, according as he had leisure. This exercise he used on Sundays in the afternoon after evening-prayer. And herein he would be so eager, that he sometimes had such expressions in his game, as exposed him to the censure of many, especially of his enemies. "But the Bishop, continues the Historian, thus either "justified or accused himself; that he never with-"drew himself from service or sermon on the Lord's "Days. That Christ the best Expositor of the Sab-"bath said, that the Sabbath was made for man, and "not man for the Sabbath. That man might have "his meat dressed for his health upon the Sabbath; "and why might he not have some convenient exercise "of his body for the health thereof on that day? "Indeed it was the general custom in those days, "both in Geneva and in all other places, where Protestants inhabited, after the service of the Lord's "Day was over, to refresh themselves with bowling, "walking abroad, and other innocent recreations; "and the Bishop followed that, which in his travels "abroad he had seen ordinarily practised among "them." And with respect to his using the word By my faith sometimes in his asseverations, the Bishop pleaded, that if it were an oath, he would amend it; but he was apprehensive of no more in that phrase of speech By my faith, than In very truth, Bona fide, assuredly, or as Amen imports (57).

(56) Pag. 294.

(57) Pag. 215, 216.

[II] His book intitled The Harborough.] The whole title of it is as follows: An HARBOROWE for faithfull and trewe subjects, against the late blowne Blaste, concerning the Government of Women. Wherein be confuted all such reasons, as a stranger of late made in that Behalfe: With a brief Exhortation to Obedience. He wrote this while he was in exile, and just before he returned to England. It was printed at Strasburg in 1559, soon after Queen Elizabeth came to the crown. It was composed in the name and for the vindication of the English Protestants against a Book written by John Knox the Scot, intitled A Blast against the Government of Women; wherein he insisted strongly upon the unlawfulness of women's government, and urged the right of fighting against and dethroning of Princes, if they opposed and persecuted Religion. Mr. Aylmer endeavours in this book to remove the imputation of such principles from the Protestants to the Papists; and from hence took occasion to declaim against the Popish Bishops in these words: Come off, ye Bishops; away with your superfluities; yield up your thousands; be content with hundreds, as they be in other Reformed Churches, where be as great learned men as you are. Let your portion be Priest-like, not Prince-like. Let the Queen have the rest of your temporalities and other lands to maintain these wars [against the French,] which you procured [meaning the Popish Clergy in compliance with King Philip] and your Mistress [Queen Mary] left her embroiled in. And with the rest to build and found schools throughout the realm. That every Parish-Church may have his Preacher; every City his Superintendent, to live honestly and not pompously. Which will never be unless your lands be dispersed and bestowed upon many, which now feed and fat but one. Remember that Abimelech, (when David in his banishment would have dined with him,) kept such hospitality, that he had no bread in his house to give him but the shew-bread. Where was all his superfluity to keep your pretended hospitality? For that is the cause that you alledge, why you must have thousands, as tho' you were commanded to keep hospitality rather with a thousand than with an hundred. It appears from hence that our Divine was no friend to the wealth and grandeur of the Popish Bishops, who were then in power, and had opposed the Reformation. But his expressions were so general against all Bishops, that they were afterwards objected to him and the rest of the Protestant Bishops by the enemies of Episcopacy; and he himself was obliged to make an apology for them.

was an admirable Preacher [KK]. He was very curious with regard to the collecting of books. We ſhall mention ſome of his ſentiments upon different ſubjects [LL]. He had a ſtrong averſion to Popery; and was from the beginning an hearty embracer of the Proteſtant Religion (ff). He was very exact in the diſcharge of his Epiſcopal Function, and inflexible to any ſollicitations or bribes (gg). He was regular in his devotions (hh); and punctual in his Triennial Viſitations of his Clergy. And becauſe his preſence might be of advantage to the promoting of ſobriety of manners, and obedience to the Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitution, he would often make a longer ſtay in ſeveral parts of his Dioceſe, to ſee abuſes rectified, to hear complaints, to give his counſel and advice, to obſerve the behaviour of his Clergy, to preach himſelf, and to keep hoſpitality (ii). In the Ordination of Miniſters he was extremely careful to admit none to Orders, but thoſe, whom he had examined

(ff) Pag. 277.
(gg) Pag. 280.
(hh) Pag. 281.
(ii) Ibid. and pag. 282.

them. Martin Mar-prelate deſired Biſhop Aylmer to reſolve him, that in caſe his Prophecy of Mr. Aylmer came to paſs in his days, who then ſhould be Biſhop of London (58). Mr. Aylmer dedicated his Book to the Earl of Bedford and the Lord Dudley. Mr. Strype tells us (59), that it was written with as cloſe and logical reaſoning and good arguing, as I have met with compoſed in that Age, and void of that manner of abuſive treating of the adverſary too common in controverſial Writers, (eſpecially of that time,) dealing in gentle and humane words with the perſon he undertook to confute. And his expoſitions of Scripture throughout the Book, which are divers and ſundry, are very ſound and learned; a piece of learning more rare among Divines then, when the original languages and the Jewiſh hiſtory were leſs known. He reduces the arguments of Knox's Book into theſe ſix ſyllogiſms: 1. That whatſoever is againſt nature, the ſame in a Commonwealth is not tolerable. But the government of women is againſt nature. Ergo it is not tolerable. 2. Whatſoever is forbidden by Scripture is not lawful. But a woman to rule is forbidden by Scripture. Ergo it is not lawful. 3. If a woman may not ſpeak in a congregation, much leſs may ſhe rule. But ſhe may not ſpeak in the congregation, Ergo ſhe may not rule. 4. What the civil law forbiddeth, that is not lawful. But the rule of a woman the civil law forbiddeth. Ergo it is not lawful. 5. Seeing there followeth more inconvenience of the rule of women than of men's government, therefore it is not to be born in a Commonwealth. 6. The Doctors and Canoniſts forbid it. Ergo it cannot be good. Theſe arguments our Author confuted, and in the concluſion of his Book treated of three things with a peculiar regard to the new Queen: I. Of the duty of ſubjects to her. II. Of the good hope that her people might conceive of her. III. Of the fruit of doing or balking their duty to her. He publiſhed this Book without his name, that he might write with the greater freedom, and appear to ſay of the Queen what he thought and knew, without ſuſpicion of flattery or hope of reward (60).

(58) Idem, pag. 226, 227, 228.
(59) Pag. 231.
(60) Idem, pag. 224-240.

[KK] An admirable Preacher.] He preached very frequently and ſucceſsfully both in Leiceſterſhire, where in King Edward's time he was the only Preacher, and in Lincolnſhire, where he was Archdeacon, and afterwards in London and at Court, eſpecially when invaſions and wars were apprehended, for he had a manner of preaching, which inſpired his hearers with ſpirit and reſolution (61). He could not ſuffer flattery in a Preacher, and eſteemed learning, integrity, zeal and wiſdom to be neceſſary in his character. He ſaid, that thoſe that were Preachers muſt be no milkſops, no white livered Gentlemen, that for the frowning and cloudy countenance of every man in authority will leave his tackle, and cry peccavi. They muſt be of ſuch a nature as the Poet Terence ſaid of Crito; In vultu gravitas, in verbis fides, to have gravity in his countenance, and faithfulneſs in his ſpeech. That they ſhould not be afraid to rebuke the proudeſt, no, not Kings and Queens, ſo far forth as the two tables reach. That they ſtoop not to every man's beck, nor ſtudy to pleaſe men more than God. If hereſies ariſe, they muſt have their tools ready to meet with the adverſary and to overthrow him. Which he could never have, unleſs he had travailed in many Sciences, heard, and read much, &c... And again, in ſuch as are occupied in the Pulpit are required theſe things, that they be meet to teach, to reprove, and convince. In teaching is required gravity, learning and eloquence; in reproving carriage and ſound judgment; and in convincing arts, memory, and much ſcience (62).

(61) Pag. 263.
(62) Idem, pag. 264, 265.

[LL] Some of his ſentiments upon different ſubjects.] We have mentioned in note [II] his opinion concerning the Biſhops lands and revenues, and the uſes, which they ought to be applied to. This was a principle maintained by many perſons, who favoured the Reformation from the times that Henry VIII ſeized the lands of the Abbies, when the pretence was, that thoſe revenues would be employed in the beſt manner, and particularly in maintaining the expence of wars without taxing the ſubject, in promoting learning by eſtabliſhing a great many ſchools, and erecting new Biſhopricks. But the Courtiers ſoon diverted the King from theſe good deſigns, and procured thoſe eſtates to themſelves. Our Biſhop therefore changed his opinion, and thought the Biſhops had as much right to retain their antient revenues, as the Laity had to conſume them in the gratification of their own pleaſures. And when that paſſage of his Harborough was objected to him, he replied as St. Paul did in another caſe, Cum eſſem parvulus, loquebar cum parvulis, ſapiebam ut parvulus; i. e. "When I was a child, I "ſpake as a child, I thought as a child (63)." His opinion of the proper government of England was as follows: The Regiment of England is not a mere Monarchy, as ſome for lack of conſideration think; nor a mere Oligarchy, nor Democratie; but a mixt rule of all theſe; wherein each of theſe have or ſhould have like authority. The image whereof, and not the image but the thing indeed, is to be ſeen in the Parliament Houſe, wherein you ſhall find theſe three eſtates, the King or Queen, which repreſenteth the Monarchy; the Noblemen, which be the Ariſtocratie; and the Burgeſſes and Knights the Democratie. The very ſame had Lacedæmonia, the nobleſt and beſt governed city that ever was. They had their Kings, their Senate, and Hippagretes, which were for the people. As in Lacedæmonia none of theſe could make or break laws, orders for war or peace, or do any thing without the other; the King nothing without the Senate and Commons; nor either of them or both without the King; albeit the Senate and Ephori had greater authority than the King had. In like manner, if the Parliament uſe their privileges, the King can ordain nothing without them. If he do, it is his fault in uſurping it, and their folly in permitting it. Wherefore thoſe, that in King Henry's days would not grant him, that Proclamations ſhould have the force of a Statute, were good Fathers of the Country, and worthy commendation in defending their liberty (64). He expreſſed his judgment concerning the Queen's marriage, whether it was more proper to marry one within her own Kingdom, or ſome foreign Prince, in this manner: "That if all things anſwered, it was "better joyning at home than chooſing abroad. As "if he be no baſe or mean perſon, if he love and "fear God, if he be of the ſame Religion, endued "with good and commendable qualities of wiſdom, "juſtice, manhood, temperance, gifts of languages, "knowledge of countries, pitiful, merciful, conſtant, "ſober, no hearer of flatterers, continent, not prodigal but liberal, no extorter, &c. ſuch an one, if "God ſhould allot any Queen, were to be preferred "to any abroad. Unleſs all theſe might be found in "a ſtranger, and thereto joined Nobility, and Anti-"entneſs of Lineage, and the Nation being ſuch as "uſed not to rule cruelly, but rather fatherly than "lordly." It is eaſy to perceive what foreign Prince he excluded by theſe words, namely King Philip of Spain, who had already made his addreſſes to Queen Elizabeth, which ſhe had prudently declined (65). He uſed to ſay, that as an eye full of tears is the more unable to ſee, ſo the mind full of ſorrow is leſs able to

(63) Idem, pag. 268, 269.
(64) See Strype, pag. 269, 270.
(65) Idem, pag. 272.

examined in various points of Divinity, in Latin, and before ſeveral perſons (kk). His natural temper was very quick and warm; and his converſation lively and facetious [MM], and very free. He was a man of great reſolution and courage [NN]. His ſtature was low. To conclude his character, he had all the advantages, which both proſperity and adverſity can contribute to render a man wiſe and good. After the eaſe and reputation which he had enjoyed at Court and in the family of a great Nobleman, he was caſt into exile; and afterwards, when he was reſtored to wealth and honour, it was ſo deeply mixed with care and ſorrow, that he could readily have reſigned them for the tranquillity of a private life (ll).

(kk) Ibid.

(ll) Pag. 296, 297.

to judge; that good example is often much better than a great deal of preaching (66); and that miracles are not the work but the impediment of nature (67). He divided women into two ſorts; ſome of them wiſer, better learned, diſcreeter, more conſtant, than a number of men; but the other he deſcribed in theſe words; fond, fooliſh, wanton, flibbergibbs, tatlers, triflers, wavering, witleſs, without counſel, feeble, careleſs, raſh, proud, dainty, nice, tale-bearers, eves-droppers, rumour-raiſers, evil-tongued, worſe-minded, and in every wiſe doltified with the dregs of the Devil's dunghill (68).

(66) Idem, pag. 274.

(67) Idem, pag. 275.

(68) Idem, pag. 276.

[MM] Facetious.] He frequently enlivened his diſcourſes with an agreeable turn of wit and humour. When Knox endeavoured to prove the unlawfulneſs of women's government from this paſſage of Iſaiah, I will take from you your honourable Senators and your wiſe Counſellors, and I will give you boys and women to reign over you; he confuted it by obſerving, that it was not meant of boys in age, but in manners, not of women in ſex, but in weakneſs of underſtanding; and then added that this argument was drawn from a miſunderſtanding of the word: As the Vicar of Trumpington, ſaid he, underſtood Eli, Eli, Lamaſabacthani, when he read the Paſſion upon Palm-Sunday. For when he came to this place he ſtopped, and called upon the Church-Wardens, and ſaid; Neighbours, this Gear muſt be amended. Here is Eli twice in the book. I aſſure you, if my Lord of Eli come this way and ſee it, he will have the book. Therefore by mine advice we ſhall ſcrape it out, and put in our own Town's name, viz. Trumpington, Trumpington, Lamaſabacthani. They conſented, and he did ſo. So they, ſays Mr. Aylmer, who uſe this place for a weapon againſt this matter, do fault in Homonymia, not conſidering that words have proper ſignifications and tranſlations (69).

(69) Idem, pag. 288, 289.

[NN] Of great reſolution and courage.] He gave an odd inſtance of his courage before the Queen. In December 1578 her Majeſty had been extremely afflicted with the tooth-ach, ſo that ſhe had no intermiſſion day or night, and could not poſſibly take any reſt. She was adviſed to have the tooth drawn, but was very averſe to it, being apprehenſive of the acute pain that would attend it. Biſhop Aylmer being preſent endeavoured to perſuade her, that it was not ſo exquiſite as ſhe imagined, and to convince her of it, told her that ſhe ſhould have a ſenſible experiment of it in himſelf, though he was an old man, and had not many teeth to ſpare; and immediately deſired the Surgeon to draw one of his teeth (perhaps, ſays Mr. Strype (70), a decayed one) in her Majeſty's preſence. This encouraged her to ſubmit to the operation. T.

(70) Pag. 294.

AYRAULT (PETER), in Latin Ærodius, Lieutenant-Criminel in the Preſidial of Angers, was born there in the year 1536. He performed his Humanity Studies, and his courſe of Philoſophy at Paris: after which he went to ſtudy Law at Toulouſe; from thence he went to Bourges for the advantage of the public Lectures of Duarenus, Cujas, and Doneau, three of the moſt excellent Civilians of that age. Having taken the Degree of Bachelor at Bourges, he returned to his own country, where he read public Lectures upon the Civil Law, and pleaded ſeveral cauſes. He was then 22 years of age. He returned to Paris ſome time after, and became one of the moſt famous Advocates in the Parliament [A]. He publiſhed there in 1563 the Declamations of Quintilian, which he corrected in a variety of places, and illuſtrated with notes. The year following he publiſhed in the ſame city a treatiſe concerning the power of Redemption, written by Francis Grimaudet, the King's Advocate at Angers, and wrote a preface to it concerning the nature, variety, and change of Laws. In 1567 he publiſhed a book intitled, Decretorum Rerumve apud diverſos populos & omni antiquitate judicatarum libri duo. . . . . Accedit Tractatus de origine & auctoritate rerum judicatarum. That is, "An account of Decrees and Caſes, which have been judg-" ed amongſt divers Nations from all antiquity, in two books. . . . . To which is added, " A Diſcourſe concerning the origin and authority of Caſes which have been judged." He made great additions to it in the other editions [B]. He left Paris the year following in order

[A] He became one of the moſt celebrated Advocates in Parliament.] Anthony Loiſel in his Dialogue upon the Advocates in the Parliament of Paris, places our Ayrault amongſt the moſt famous of that profeſſion, and even gives him the preference of Bodin. It is true, he obſerves that Bodin had no ſucceſs at the Bar. His words are theſe: Mr. Peter Ayrault had likewiſe the poſt given him of Lieutenant-Criminel at Angers, where he was born, and retired thither at the end of the General Seſſions of Poictiers in the year 1567, tho' he was an excellent and learned Pleader, and was much ſuperior in that point to Mr. John Bodin of Angers, how great ſoever the learning of the latter was; for he never ſucceeded in pleading at the Bar (1). There were ſome of the Pleadings of Peter Ayrault printed at Paris in 1568 (2). They were printed at Roan in 1614 with Notes and Additions by a young Lawyer. Mr. Menage, who acquaints us with this (3), might have added, that they were printed at Paris in 1598 in 8vo, with ſeveral other little pieces of Ayrault. The Curates of Paris choſe him in 1564 to plead their cauſe againſt the Jeſuits; however he did not plead it; and this was probably occaſioned by this, that it was not found proper to ſeparate the intereſts of the Curates from thoſe of the Biſhop of Paris. This is the conjecture of the Sieur de Boulai (4). However that be, his pleading was publiſhed, as I have obſerved in the marginal note (2).

(1) Loiſel apud Menag. in Teſtim. de P. Ærodio, ejus Vitæ præfixis, pag. 26.

(2) There are 22 pleadings. The 20th is that which he drew up for the Curates of Paris againſt the Jeſuits in 1564.

(3) In Vita Petri Ærodii, pag. 26.

(4) In Hiſtoria Academ. Pariſienſ. tom. 6. pag. 966. apud Menag. in Teſtim. de P. Ærodio, pag. 17.

[B] He made great additions to his Book in the other editions.] The ſecond edition was printed at Paris in 1573 in 8vo, and contains ſix Books. The third is in folio, and is entitled, Rerum ab omni antiquitate judicatarum Pandectæ, i. e. "Pandects of caſes, which " have been judged from all antiquity." This was printed likewiſe at Paris in 1588. After the Author's death the ſame Pandects were printed at Paris in 1615 with a little tract de Patrio Jure. He had revis'd and corrected them. Mr. Menage promiſed (5) a new edition of them, which was to be illuſtrated with little marginal notes, to ſhew from whence Ayrault took his examples. That work is a very learned one; Continet enim res ab omni antiquitate apud Indos, Græcos, Romanos, Francos, alios judicatas (6); "for it con-" tains caſes, which have been judged from all anti-" quity amongſt the Indians, Greeks, Romans, French, " and other Nations." His piece in French, de l'Ordre

(5) In Vita Petri Ærodii, p. 28.

(6) Ibid. p. 27.

der to take upon him the office of Lieutenant-Criminel in his own country. And he executed it with ſuch exactneſs, that like a new Caſſius he was called the Rock of the Accuſed. During the confuſion occaſioned by the League, he executed in the interim [C] the office of Preſident in the ſame Court, and diſcharged it with the ſame integrity, as he had done the other. The city of Angers teſtified their eſteem of him ſeveral ways, and eſpecially by conferring upon him the office of Perpetual Echevin. He had a great diſpute with Philip Gourreau, Maſter of the Requeſts, his countryman; and he publiſhed an apologetical Letter againſt him in 1577 (a). He was firm to the right party in oppoſition to the League; and he was obliged to be ſo, not only by the place, that he held at the Preſidial, but likewiſe by his poſt of Maſter of Requeſts to the Duke of Anjou, which he held in conjunction with Baudouin the Civilian, before that Prince came to the Crown. The ſpeech, which he made to that Prince upon his entrance into Angers the 7th of January 1570 was printed with a Diſcourſe [D] addreſſed to him, in which he compliments him upon his victories, and the reſtoration of the Univerſity of Angers. This Diſcourſe turns chiefly upon Baudouin's having dedicated to that Prince two antient Panegyrics, that of Eumenius to Conſtantius, and that of Pacatus to Theodoſius. The Diſcourſe, which he publiſhed in the year 1589 upon the death of Henry III, and the ſcandal, which the Church received from it, ſhews his attachment to the party of that Monarch. He did not put his own name to it, nor that of the Printer's. Thuanus ſpeaks of it with great commendation (b). There was found amongſt the Author's papers a Latin Verſion, which he had made of it. He wrote at the ſame time a Diſcourſe, in which he exhorted Henry IV to turn Catholic; but of all his Works, that which made him moſt known amongſt foreigners, eſpecially Proteſtants, was his Treatiſe upon the power of Fathers [E]. He wrote it during the proceſs, which he carried on againſt the Jeſuits, on account of his eldeſt ſon, who had taken upon him the habit of their Order (c). He had ſent him to their College at Paris, in order to qualify him for ſucceeding himſelf ſome time or other; but he ſoon had the melancholy news, that they had perſuaded him to enter into their Society. He complained of this to the Parliament of Paris (d); and when he found that they had ſent him away privately, he preſented a Petition to the Pope, and procured Letters from Henry III to the Cardinal d'Eſt, Protector of the affairs of France, and to the Marquis of Piſani, Ambaſſador from that Kingdom (e); in which Letters the King demanded very poſitively, that they ſhould follicit an order

(a) There were two editions of it in the ſame year at Angers, the ſecond much larger than the firſt. This piece is in Latin.

(b) Thuani, Hiſtor. lib. 95.

(c) See the following Article.

(d) On the 19th of May 1586.

(e) They are dated the 18th of June 1586.

& Inſtruction judiciaire dont les anciens Grecs & Romains ont uſé en accuſations publiques, conferé à l'uſage de noſtre France; i. e. "Of the judicial Manner and "Forms, which the ancient Greeks and Romans "uſed in their public accuſations, compared to the "preſent uſage of France," is a very fine and curious work. It was firſt printed at Paris in 1575 in 8vo. The ſecond edition, which was likewiſe printed at Paris in 1588 in 4to, was enlarged with two Books. The third had the addition of another Book, at Paris 1598 in 4to (7). So that this work contained four Books. The fourth Book, which treats of their proceedings with regard to dead bodies, and their aſhes, and memory, and with regard to beaſts, inanimate things, and contumax, was printed ſeparately at Paris in 1591 in 8vo. I have omitted to mention, that his treatiſe de Decretis Rebuſve apud diverſos populos ab omni antiquitate judicatis, was printed at Francfort in 1580, after the firſt edition. The Authors of the Abridgment of Geſner knew nothing of this Peter Ayrault but from this edition of Germany. They were miſtaken in ſuppoſing his name was Paul.

(7) It is thus we muſt render theſe words of Mr. Menage. Quem poſtea anno 1588, duobus libris, & anno 1589 tribus auctiorem in eadem urbe publicavit. Vita Petri Ærodii, pag. 17.

[C] During that interval.] Mr. Menage extends this interval to two years: Et præturæ munere per biennium functus Ærodius eſt (8); and yet he tells us, that he was not named to that office till the eleventh of May 1589; and that Henry the Great ſubſtituted another at the beginning of the year 1590, ineunte anno 1590 (9).

(8) Ibid. pag. 24.

(9) Ibid. pag. 23.

[D] His Speech was printed with the Diſcourſe &c.] Mr. Menage is not right in the time, when theſe two pieces were printed: he tells us it was in the year 1577, and that the Prince, whom he commends, was then King of Poland and Duke of Anjou. That intimates very clearly, that he was not then King of France; whereas the Duke of Anjou was crowned at Rheims in February 1575, and was conſidered as King of France, from the very day that Charles IX died (10). We may be aſſured, that the Speech and Diſcourſe in queſtion were publiſhed in 1570, and conſequently, that the Prince, who is commended in them, was not at that time King of Poland.

(10) On the 30th of May 1574.

[E] The treatiſe of the Power of Fathers.] The Author wrote this in French and Latin. One of his countrymen, named Jacob Frubert, tranſlated it into Italian (11). Let us ſee what Mr. Menage ſays.

(11) Menag. Vita P. Ærodii, pag. 28.

Egit cum fugitivo filio tanquam cum abſente reo, hoc eſt annotatione & programmate:

Qualis populeâ mœrens philomela ſub umbra
Amiſſos queritur fœtus (12),

(12) Virgil. Georg. lib. 4. ver. 511.

Et quæ ſequuntur; notum enim tibi carmen eſt; talis Petrus Ærodius amiſſum filium inſolabiliter in ſcriptis ſuis queritur. Vide quæſo . . . . quos ipſe queſtus fundat in libro tertio Ordinis Judiciarii, modo fratrem Johannem Ærodium, modo Renatum filium compellans. Quis verò tam ferus ac ferreus eſt, qui cum querelas ejus legat in libello ejus illo aureo, & tot laudibus à Stephano Paſcaſio celebrato (13), quem de Patrio Jure ad fugitivum filium contra Jeſuitas ſcripſit, à gemitu & lacrimis temperare poſſit? . . . At non ſolus Ærodius fatum ſuum gemuit, ingemuere & alii: lege Stephani Paſcaſii & Johannis Bodini (14) ea de re ad Petrum Ærodium Epiſtolas. Lege Antonii Arnaldi Advocati Pariſienſis. . . . Orationem pulcherrimam, habitam in Senatu Pariſienſi contra Jeſuitas, anno MDLXXXXIV (15). That is, "He treated his ſon as a guilty perſon, who is abſent, that is, in a judicial way;

(13) See the 10th Letter of the 11th book of Paſquier's Letters.

(14) Mr. Menage produces the Letter of Bodin, pag. 242.

(15) Menag. Vita Ærodii, pag. 37.

"So, cloſe in poplar ſhades, her children gone,
"The Mother Nightingale laments alone.

"And what follows, for you know the Poem; in "ſuch a melancholy manner does he bewail the loſs "of his ſon in his writings. See how he complains "in his third Book of the Forms and Judiciary Methods &c. where he ſometimes addreſſes himſelf to "his brother John Ayrault, and ſometimes to his ſon "René. Who is there of ſo inſenſible a temper, that "upon reading his complaints in his excellent work "de Patrio Jure addreſſed to his fugitive ſon againſt "the Jeſuits, and ſo highly extolled by Stephen Pâquier, can refrain from tears? . . . . Nor did he "complain alone; for others were ſharers with him "in the ſame diſtreſs. Read the Letters of Stephen "Pâquier and John Bodin to him upon this ſubject. "Read the fine Oration of Anthony Arnaud, an Advocate of Paris, pronounced in the Parliament of "Paris againſt the Jeſuits, in the year 1594." Mr. Menage in his Remarks has given an account of what Anthony order from the Pope, for the liberty of that young Gentleman, but all this was to no purpoſe. The Treatiſe of the power of Fathers, which he addreſſed three years after to this diſobedient ſon, was likewiſe ineffectual. Tho' Ayrault had other ſons, yet he was extremely chagrin'd for the loſs of this. He married at Paris in 1564 Anne des Jardins, daughter of John des Jardins, Phyſician to Francis I, by whom he had fifteen children [F], ten of whom were living when he died at Angers the 21ſt of July 1601, aged 65 years (f). I have taken this Article from Mr. Menage (g).

(f) Sammarthanus is miſtaken in his Elogium upon Peter Ayrault, when he tells us, that he was but ſixty three years old.

(g) Ex Vita Petri Ærodii ab Ægidio ejus ex filiâ nepote ſcripta, & typis Pariſiis, anno 1675, in 4to.

Anthony Arnaud ſpoke upon this ſubject, and what was anſwered by Peter Barni, Attorney of the Jeſuits in the College of Clermont. The anſwer comes to this purpoſe, that the Jeſuits would not receive René Ayrault in France, tho' he was then at leaſt eighteen years old; ſo that he went without their knowledge into GERMANY, where he was admitted into their Society (16). See the remark [A] of the following article.

(16) Ibid. pag. 251.

[F] He had fifteen children.] We deſign a particular article for his eldeſt ſon. PETER AYRAULT, his ſecond ſon, ſucceeded his father in his virtues and in his poſt, and was Preſident in the Seneſchal's Juriſdiction of Angers, Counſellor of the City, and Mayor. He procured in 1603 a Profeſſorſhip in Law in the Univerſity of Angers for William Barclay. The Speech, which he made to Mary de Medicis, mother of Lewis XIII, at Angers, the 16th of October 1619, may be ſeen in the ſixth tome of the Mercure François. He was deputed to the Aſſembly des Notables, which was appointed at Roan in 1617. He left iſſue behind him JOHN AYRAULT, his brother, was an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. WILLIAM AYRAULT, their brother, a Monk of the Order of St. Benedict, and a Doctor of Sorbonne, had a great friendſhip and intimacy with Lewis Servin, Advocate-General of the Parliament of Paris. GUYONNE AYRAULT one of their ſiſters, married William Menage, the King's Advocate in the Preſidial of Angers. From this marriage was born the late Mr. Menage, one of the moſt learned men in France (17).

(17) Ex Vitâ P. Ærodii. See the quotation (g) of this Article.

AYRAULT (RENE), eldeſt ſon of the preceding Author, was the occaſion of great trouble to his father. He was born at Paris the eleventh of November 1567, and was placed under the care and inſtruction of the Jeſuits (a). Peter Ayrault at that time had a great affection and eſteem for that ſociety (b), and would then have refuſed to plead the cauſe of the Curates of Paris againſt them, tho' he had undertaken it in the year 1564. He, perceiving in his eldeſt ſon a very lively genius, a ſtrong memory, and other excellent qualifications, deſired very earneſtly the Provincial of the Jeſuits, and the Rector of the College of Clermont, when he put his ſon into their hands, that they would by no means ſollicit him to enter into their Society. He told them, that he had other ſons to devote to the Church; but that he deſigned this to ſucceed him in his own poſt, and to be the ſupport of the family. They promiſed him every thing that he deſired. However the great abilities of this young Gentleman made the Jeſuits wiſh to have a perſon of his importance in their Society; ſo that after he had ſtudied two years in Rhetoric under Father James Sirmond, they gave him the habit of their Order in 1586. His father, without whoſe advice all this was tranſacted, made a great noiſe upon it. He accuſed them of ſtealing his ſon, and called upon them to reſtore him. They anſwered, that they knew nothing of him. Ayrault procured an Order, and obtained a Decree from the Parliament, which commanded the Jeſuits of the College of Clermont not to admit René Ayrault into their Order, and to notify to the other Colleges that prohibition. They paid no regard to this Decree; they conveyed the youth from one place to another; they changed his name, and ſent him into Lorrain, Germany, and Italy [A]. Henry III applied to the Pope by his Ambaſſador and the Protector of his intereſts; Ayrault wrote to his Holineſs; who ordered the liſt of all the Jeſuits in the world to be ſhewn to him; but René Ayrault, being veiled under a fictitious name, did not appear in that liſt (c). Three years being ſpent in vain in this ſearch, the father had recourſe to his pen, and wrote a book concerning the power of Fathers, which he addreſſed to his ſon René (d). René wrote an anſwer to it, but his Superiors thought it not proper to publiſh it. They choſe rather, that Richeome, the Provincial of the Jeſuits at Paris, ſhould confute the book of Peter Ayrault [B]. The adventures of René were as follow. He entered into their Society at Treves the twelfth of June 1586; he went from thence to Fulde, where he renewed his Studies in Rhetoric. He paſſed over Germany, and was there taken priſoner by the Proteſtants. Thence he went to Rome, and ſtudied Philoſophy one Year under Mutius Vitelleſchi (e). He continued the ſame Studies the year following at Milan, and compleated them at Dijon (f). Having taught the Claſſes in the ſame city for four years with a great deal of ſucceſs, he left it in 1594, when the Jeſuits were baniſhed from ſeveral cities of the Kingdom, and went to Piedmont, where he taught for two years. After this he came to Avignon, where (a) Menag. Vita P. Ærodii, pag. 245.

(b) Quos tum ipſe & amabat, & magni faciebat: quin & eos vocari Andegavum, & ibi ſedem habere aliquando voluit. i. e. "He loved "and eſteemed "them at that "time; nay he "was once de-"ſirous to have "them ſent for "and fixed at "Angers. Vita Ærodii, pag. 35. See likewiſe p. 245, where he quotes Ayrault in his 3d book of his Ordre Judiciaire.

(c) See the text of the preceding Article towards the end.

(d) See the remark [E] of the preceding Article.

(e) He was General of the Jeſuits.

(f) At that time the courſe of Philoſophy continued three years.

[A] Into Lorrain, Germany, and Italy.] Anthony Arnaud in his Pleading in the year 1594, declares, that the Jeſuits having drawn aſide René Ayrault, when he was but fourteen years old, kept him in Italy and Spain. It does not appear that he was ever in Spain (1); and he was almoſt nineteen years of age, when he took the habit of the Order.

(1) Hiſpaniam quoque petiiſſe falſo creditum eſt. Menag. Vita P. Ærodii, pag. 37.

[B] They choſe rather, that Richeome . . . . ſhould confute the work of Peter Ayrault.] His Anſwer was not printed, no more than that of René Ayrault. Quia indecorum viſum eſt adverſus parentes ſcribere filios, prohibitus eſt à Rectoribus ſuis Reſponſionem vulgare. Igitur id aggreſſus eſt Ludovicus Richeomus . . . quod me docuit privata ipſius Renati Ærodii ad ipſum Richeomum Epiſtola, cujus exemplar, quæ ſua eſt humanitas, miſit ad me Roma Petrus Poſſinus Preſbyter Societatis Jeſu doctiſſimus, idemque Jeſuiticæ Hiſtoriæ Scriptor celeberrimus. Sed neque Reſponſionem ſuam vulgavit Richeomus; qua de cauſa neſcio (2). i. e. "Becauſe it "ſeemed indecent that a ſon ſhould write againſt his "father, he was forbidden by his Superiors to pub-"liſh his Anſwer. Upon which Lewis Richeome un-"dertook to write a Reply; as I underſtand from a "private Letter of René Ayrault himſelf to Richeome, "a copy of which was ſent me from Rome by Peter "Poſſinus, a very learned Prieſt of the Society of Je-"ſus, and the famous Writer of the Hiſtory of that "Order. But Richeome likewiſe never publiſhed his "Anſwer, for what reaſon, I cannot tell."

(2) Menag. Vita P. Ærodii, pag. 39.

where he ſtudied two years. Then he returned to Rome, and from thence was ſent to Milan to teach Rhetoric; which he did for ſeveral years, and then came back into France; where he paſſed through the moſt illuſtrious employments of his Order. He taught Philoſophy; he preach'd, and was Preſident of the College. He was Rector at Rheims, Dijon, Sens, Dole, and Bezançon; Aſſiſtant of the Provincial, and Procurator of the Province of Champagne, and afterwards of that of Lyons at Reme. He died at laſt at la Fleche the 18th of December 1644 (g). His father by a ſolemn writing paſſed before a Notary and witneſſes deprived him of his paternal Bleſſing in the year 1593; but he did not continue his reſentment to his death, for there was found among his papers a writing, in which he gave him his Bleſſing [C].

(g) Ex Vitâ Ærodii. See the quotation of the preceding Article.

[C] His father left a writing, in which he gave him his bleſſing.] It was ſigned by his own hand, and contained what follows: God grant his peace, his love, and his grace to my ſon René Ayrault. I give him my bleſſing, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. And I pardon him every thing, in which he has offended me. And I pray God to aſſiſt him with his bleſſed holy Spirit, whatever ſtate of life or vocation he ſhall undertake (3).

(3) Menag. Vita Ærodii, p. 257.

AZOTUS, a city of Paleſtine, near the Sea, one of the five Lordſhips of the Philiſtins (a). It was there that they kept the chief of their idols, which they called Dagon, and which fell down and was broken before the Ark, that had been taken by them from the Jews, and placed in the Temple of this Idol (b). It does not appear that the Jews ever ſubdued this place till the reign of Uzziah King of Judah (c) [A]. It was taken from them by Tartan, General of the Army of Sargon King of Aſſyria, as we learn from Iſaiah (d), who lived at that time. It was beſieged ſome time after by Pſammitichus King of Egypt, and it was one of the longeſt ſieges, which was ever heard of; for it was nine and twenty years before the city was taken (e). It is probable that it was deſtroyed by the Egyptians, ſince the Prophet Jeremiah ſpeaks of it only as the remains of a city (f). It was of conſiderable importance during the war of the Maccabees; and the taking of this city was not one of the leaſt exploits of Jonathan. The enemies, whom he had defeated, fled, and ſhut themſelves up in the Temple of Dagon. He ordered it to be ſet on fire, ſo that they were deſtroyed in the ſame flames, which conſumed the temple and the city (g). We read in the Acts of the Apoſtles, that St. Philip, after he had baptized the Eunuch of Queen Candace was caught by the Spirit of the Lord, and found at Azotus [B]. Profane Authors ſpeak of this place as of the Mart of the Arabians (h); and it is certain that the inhabitants muſt have made a conſiderable figure, ſince Strabo has ranked them among the four Nations, who were mixed with the Celoſyrians and with the Phœnicians, the two principal people, according to him, who poſſeſſed Syria (i). Stephanus Byzantinus aſſerts, that Azotus was founded by one of theſe fugitives, who removed from the Red-Sea to Paleſtine, and gave his wife's name to the city, which he built. This name ſignifies a She-Goat. Mr. Bochart rejects this whole account (k). St. Jerom tells us, that in his time Azotus was ſtill a conſiderable city [C].

(a) Joſhua xiii. 3. where the Geneva tranſlation calls it Aſdod.

(b) 1ſt Book of Samuel, ch. v.

(c) 2d Book of Chronicles, ch. xxvi. ver. 6.

(d) Chap. xx. ver. 1.

(e) Herodot. lib. 2. cap. 157.

(f) Jerem. xxv. 20.

(g) 1ſt Book of Maccabees, ch. x. ver. 83, & ſeq.

(h) Pompon. Mela. lib. 1. cap. 10.

(i) Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 515. See likewiſe, pag. 522.

(k) Bochart, Geograph. Sacra, lib. 2. cap. 12.

[A] It does not appear that the Jews ſubdued it before the reign of Uzziah.] If you examine ever ſo much the 11th and 15th chapters of the Book of Joſua, which Moreri refers you to, you will not find that Joſua ever ſubdued the city of Azotus. It is not more true that the Tribe of Judah conquered it in the time of the Judges: the Author who aſſerts this, and quotes the firſt chapter of the Book of Judges (1), was abſolutely miſtaken. What deceived him, or Moreri, or the Author, whom he followed, is, that in the 15th chapter of Joſua we find this city in the Diviſion of the Tribe of Juda. But we muſt obſerve, that they placed among theſe Diviſions what had been already ſubdu'd, and what would be ſo ſome time or other. It appears plainly from the third chapter of Judges, that the five Governments of the Philiſtins, and conſequently of Azotus, were not ſubdued by Joſua. God himſelf, when he repreſents, that this Conqueror was too old to finiſh that war, places amongſt the countries which remained to be conquered theſe five Governments (2). This ſhews us another error of Moreri. Joſua, ſays he, ſubdued it firſt to the Hebrews about the year of the World 2586, and it was afterwards one of the five Lordſhips of the Philiſtins. Was it not ſo before Joſua's time, by the teſtimony of God himſelf?

(1) Chriſtoph. Heidmannus, in Palæſtinâ, pag. 90.

(2) Joſua xiii. 3.

[B] Was found at Azotus (3).] Moreri aſſerts, that St. Philip was caught up in this city. If he had read the 8th chapter of the Acts, which he quotes, he would not have ventured to affirm ſuch a thing.

(3) Acts viii. 40.

[C] St. Jerom tells us, that in his time Azotus was ſtill a conſiderable city (4).] His words are as follow: Uſque hodie inſigne oppidum Palæſtinæ. Mr. Baudrand affirms, that tho' it had been anciently an Epiſcopal city under the Archbiſhoprick of Ceſarea, yet it became afterwards a ſimple municipium in St. Jerom's time. Olim Epiſcopalis ſub Archiepiſcopo Cæſarienſi, poſtea municipium tempore S. Hieronymi (5). That Gentleman will give me leave to tell him, that he ſeems to have reverſed the true order of things in this point. For what ſhould occaſion the ruin of the Biſhoprick of Azotus between the time of the erection of it, and that, in which St. Jerom lived?

(4) Hieronym. de Locis Hebraic.

(5) Baudrand. Lexicon. Geographicum.

SUPPLEMENT

SUPPLEMENT to the Letter (A).

AGAMEDES ſon of Ergenus King of the Orchomenians (a), and brother of the celebrated Trophonius [A], was with his brother famous for the building of Temples and ſtately Palaces (b). Cicero (c) and Plutarch (d) tell us, that when the two brothers had finiſhed the Temple of Apollo, which they built at Delphi, they went and worſhipped the God in it, and requeſted of him that he would grant them whatever was beſt for men. Apollo anſwered that within three days (e) he would grant their requeſt, and in the mean time he commanded them to be merry. When the three days were paſt they were both found dead; Apollo the wiſeſt of the Gods intimating thereby, that death was the beſt preſent he could make to man [B]. It is pity that a ſtory, which may furniſh Orators and Preachers with very fine reflections, ſhould be contradicted (a) Orchomenus mons is a mountain in Theſſaly, whence a town which lies in or near Theſſaly is called Orchomenum. There is alſo a town of that name in Bæotia, of which I think Erginus was King.

(b) Pauſanias in Bæoticis, p. m. 599.

(c) In Tuſcul. Quæſt. lib. 1. verſus finem.

(d) In Conſol. ad Apoll. in oper. tom. 2. pag. 109. ed. Pariſ. 1624.

(e) According to Tully, or within ſeven days, according to Plutarch.

[A] Brother to the celebrated Trophonius.] This is what moſt writers aſſert, and even Pauſanias himſelf; tho' he adds that ſome think that Trophonius was the ſon of Apollo; and he takes this opinion to be the moſt probable, becauſe Trophonius gave oracles like Apollo himſelf (1).

(1) See Pauſanias in Bæoticis, pag. 599.

[B] Death was the beſt preſent he could make to man.] This has been the opinion of ſeveral wiſe men among the Heathens and among the Chriſtians. And indeed if we conſider to how many evils and miſeries men are ſubject from the moment they are born to the end of their life, we ſhall conclude that the ſooner they die, and are delivered out of this vale of anguiſh, the better it is for them; for, as has been very truly ſaid by the Author of the book of Job (2), Man that is born of a woman has but a ſhort time to live and is full of miſery, or, as the words may be tranſlated, becauſe he is full of miſery; ſo that it is the effect of a wiſe Providence that man, miſerable as he is, ſhould not live long. Death indeed may ſeem an evil to thoſe who are happy in this world. But theſe are very few if compared to thoſe who are miſerable. It is true, ſome perſons think that there is leſs evil than good in this world, and this they pretend to prove by obſerving that there is no man upon earth, tho' ever ſo miſerable, but ſtill deſires to live (3). But here I beg leave to aſk, do they mean, that taking all together, the happineſs of thoſe that are happy, and the miſery of thoſe that are unhappy, the ſcale will turn on the ſide of happineſs? Or do they mean that in the ſame perſon all things conſidered and compared happineſs ſurpaſſes miſery? In the firſt caſe, what comfort is it to me, that there are more happy than unhappy perſons, if I am among the latter? or what is to me, that there is upon the whole more happineſs than miſery in the world, if I have nothing but misfortunes for my ſhare? As to the ſecond propoſition, that upon the whole every perſon enjoys more happineſs than he ſuffers miſery, I doubt very much whether experience will confirm it, I don't ſay in every particular perſon, but even in any conſiderable number of men? As for the fear of death and the great love all men have for this life, it does not follow from thence that they find by experience this life to be attended with more good than evil: For the beſt Chriſtians, who are perſuaded that after death they ſhall enjoy an inexpreſſible bliſs, are yet as weak as other people with regard to death; they would put it off, if they could, even when a decrepit old age, and a complication of evils have tied them down to their beds. Shall we ſay of them that they thus fear death, becauſe they know this world affords more pleaſure and happineſs than heaven can do? If they judged thus, they would be worſe than Heathens and Infidels. We muſt ſay therefore, that tho' they are perſuaded there is infinitely more happineſs in heaven than upon earth, yet they are afraid of death, and have a great love for this life. Hence we muſt conclude that the fear, which the generality of mankind have for death, and their love for this life, does not prove that they have found by experience, there is more good than evil in this world. How ſhall we then ſolve this queſtion? Indeed I think it cannot be ſolved, becauſe every perſon judges according as he is happy or unhappy, or at leaſt as he thinks himſelf ſo. A man who has every thing at command, and can ſatisfy his paſſions at his pleaſure, and who beſides is of a ſtrong conſtitution and enjoys a good health, will be apt to judge, that there is more good than evil in this world. On the contrary, a man who muſt toil for his ſupport, who can never enjoy his wiſhes, who by his continual labours impairs his health and ruins his conſtitution, will be apt to ſay that there is more miſery than happineſs upon earth. Further, we are not proper judges of other people's happineſs or miſery; this depends very much upon the ſituation of their mind, and the circumſtances they are in. The ſame thing may be accounted a good by one perſon, and an evil by another; nay to the ſame perſon it may appear good at one time and bad at another, according as that perſon is differently diſpoſed, or as his circumſtances are altered. Since then the fear of death and the love of life are no proofs that men enjoy more happineſs than miſery; and ſince we are not proper judges of what is good or evil for other people, it is impoſſible for us to determine whether there be more good than evil in this world; nor conſequently whether death be always the beſt thing that can befal a man. Only thus much we may venture to ſay; When a man is more miſerable than happy, death is good for him; and let him be ever ſo happy, death cannot be an evil for him, abſtractedly from the conſideration of the other life; ſince it puts him in a ſtate of inſenſibility, in which he cannot be conſcious of what he has loſt. And ſuppoſing another life, death muſt ſtill be for the virtuous the moſt happy event, which they can wiſh for, ſince it makes them enjoy a perfect bliſs. Why then are all or moſt men afraid to die? It is becauſe they don't conſider what death is, and becauſe all their thoughts are bent towards the pleaſures of this world. Hence this unconquerable fear of death, which is ſtill encreas'd by education and by the examples we have continually before our eyes. " Death, ſays Montagne, " is repreſented to men in a frightful manner, they " ſhun it like a bug-bear; and becauſe it is mentioned in laſt Wills and Teſtaments, do not expect " they will make their Will, till the Phyſician has " pronounced their ſentence. And God knows with " how much judgment they can go about it, filled as " they then are with grief and terror. Becauſe that " little word death was too harſh for the Romans ears, " and ſeemed of an ill omen, they attempted to ſoften it, and turn it into periphraſes; and inſtead of " ſaying of a man, he is dead, they uſed to ſay, he " left off living, he has lived. If they did but mention leſs, tho' paſt, they were ſatisfied. It is from " them we have borrowed this way of ſpeaking, the " late Sir John D." The reader will perhaps be pleaſed to find here Montagne's own words, of which it is not an eaſy matter to preſerve the ſpirit in a tranſlation. On fait peur a nos gens de nommer la mort, & la pluſpart s'en ſeignent comme du nom du diable. Et parce qu'il s'en fait mention aux teſtamens, ne vous attendez pas qu'ils y mettent la main, que le medecin ne leur ait donné l'extreme ſentence. Et Dieu ſait lors entre la douleur & la frayeur, de quel bon jugement il vous le partiſſent. Parceque cette ſyllable frappoient trop rudement leurs oreilles, & que cette voix leur ſembloit malencontreuſe, les Romains avoient appris de l'amolir, on l'étendre en periphraſes; au lieu de dire il eſt mort; contradicted by one of the beſt Writers of Antiquity, I mean Pauſanias, who gives us a quite different account of Agamedes's and Trophonius's death. He tells us (f), that they built a Treaſury for Hyrieus a King of Thebes [C], and left in the wall of it a ſtone looſe in ſuch a manner that it could eaſily be taken down; Agamedes and Trophonius uſed in the night time to take down the looſe ſtone, and ſo to get into the Treaſury, where they took as much money as they pleaſed. Hyrieus finding continually ſome money wanting, tho' it was well locked up, and he alone had the keys, was amazed at it; ſo that to find out the thieves, he made a kind of a trap or net in the bags or veſſels in which his money was, in ſuch a manner, that as ſoon as any one attempted to take the money, his hand was ſo well faſtened that it could not get free. Agamedes according to cuſtom coming one day to take money was catched in the net. Trophonius fearing leſt Agamedes being put to the rack ſhould diſcover the whole myſtery, immediately cut off his head. He was himſelf ſome time after ſwallowed up by an earthquake. This account is very different from that, which we have given from Tully and Plutarch; and yet Moreri, tho' he quotes Pauſanias, does not ſay a word of what we have juſt now related [D]. He is alſo guilty in this place of another miſtake [E]. Agamedes and Trophonius made a very ſumptuous bed for Amphytrio and Alcmena, which was ſhewn at Thebes, as a great curioſity (g). They were both prayed to and worſhipped with ſacrifices (h).

(2) Chap. xiv. ver. 1.

(3) See Nouvell. de la Rep. Lettres, for May 1703. pag. 563, 564.

(f) In Bœoticis, pag. 599.

(g) Pauſanias, ibid. pag. 558.

(h) Idem, ibid. pag. 603.

mort; il a ceſſé de vivre, diſent ils, il a vécu. Pourveu que a ſort vie, ſoit elle paſſée, ils ſe conſolent. Nous en avons emprunte nôtre feu Maître Jean (4). Now ſince death is no evil, and for the beſt part of mankind is the greateſt good they could wiſh for, it may be aſked what kind of death is the moſt deſirable? We may anſwer with Cæſar, the moſt unexpected and moſt ſudden (5). A ſudden death prevents thoſe fears and terrors, which uſually ſeize us at the approach of our laſt hour, and which are always encreaſed by the lamentations and tears of our friends and relations, who ſurrounding our death-bed ſeem to contend how to make us more ſenſible of what we are going to loſe by leaving this world; not to mention the pains and agonies, which always accompany a lingering death. A ſudden exit delivers us from all theſe dreadful circumſtances, which make death be really a King of Terrors. It may be objected that a ſudden death may be dangerous to our ſalvation, ſince it prevents that repentance, which is neceſſary to obtain God's mercy and pardon for our ſins. But they, who make that objection, ſhew, they are but very little acquainted with the genius of the Chriſtian Religion; ſince according to the Goſpel we ſhall not be judged by the manner, in which we die, but by that in which we have lived. A virtuous man has no need for a death-bed repentance; and the deepeſt ſorrow in the laſt moments of life will never atone for the crimes of a wicked life. If to obtain eternal ſalvation it was ſufficient to repent at the approach of death, no man, tho' ever ſo wicked, could be damned; ſince it is impoſſible for the moſt profligate perſon, not to repent, when he conſiders, that his crimes will make him miſerable for ever.

(4) Eſſays de Montagne, liv. 1. chap. 19. p. m. 52.

(5) Apud eund. ibid. lib. 2. cap. 13. p. m. 580.

[C] Hyrieus King of Thebes.] Moreri (6) and Geſner (7) ſay he was a countryman of Bœotia, and that having received Jupiter, Mercury, and Neptunus hoſpitably in his houſe, they promiſed him for a reward that whatever he would aſk ſhould be granted to him. He anſwered that he deſired nothing more than to have a ſon, though he did not care to marry. The three Gods to grant his requeſt, made water in the hide of a bull, which Hyrieus had ſacrificed to Jupiter, and ten months after a ſon was procreated out of it, and was called Urion, from οὖρος, which ſignifies urine; and that name was afterwards changed into Orion. But Hyginus, from whom this ſtory is borrowed, ſays Hyrieus was a King of Thebes (8).

(6) In HYRIEE.

(7) In Onomaſtico, where he calls him HYREUS.

(8) Hyginus, Fabul. cxcv. & Ejuſdem Poeticon Aſtronomicon, lib. ii. Conſtel. xxxiv. & in utrumque locum vide Notas Thomæ Munkeri, in Mythographis Latinis, tom. i.

[D] Moreri, tho' he quotes Pauſanias, does not ſay a word of what we have juſt related.] This is a great omiſſion; but the manner in which Moreri expreſſes himſelf is ſtill more inaccurate. Having related the ſudden death of Agamedes and Trophonius, he ſays, Pauſanias adds that they built in Arcadia the famous temple dedicated to Neptunus. This way of ſpeaking miſleads the reader, and makes him believe that Pauſanias alſo relates the ſudden death of theſe two perſons; tho' he relates their death in a quite different manner, as we have obſerved.

[E] He (Moreri) is alſo guilty in this place of another miſtake.] I. He tells us that any perſon, who was ſo bold as to enter into Neptune's temple without the God's expreſs command, met with certain death; and he quotes Pauſanias for this, tho' that Author only tells us, that the builders of that temple had ſhut the entrance of it only with a woollen net (μίτῳ διατείνασιν ἱρεοῦν) becauſe the fear of the Deity was then ſtrong enough to keep men in awe, or perhaps becauſe there was in this net a ſecret power to prevent people from entring into the temple. II. He ſays that Pauſanias ſpeaks of the miraculous birth of theſe two perſons, tho' that Author does not mention any miracle on this occaſion. III. He declares that Pauſanias thinks they were brothers, tho' he expreſly tells us he is inclined to believe Trophonius was the ſon of Apollo (9).

(9) See Pauſanias in Bœoticis, p. m. 599.

☞ ALLIX (PETER), a famous French Divine, was born in the year 1641 at Alençon in Normandy, where his Father was a Miniſter of great reputation. Mr. Allix firſt ſtudied under his father, and went afterwards to the Univerſities of Saumur and Sedan. He was ordained a Miniſter at St. Agobille in Champaign, the Proteſtants of that town having deſired him for their Paſtor. A year or two after he was choſen one of the Miniſters of the Church of Paris (a) which met at Charenton, a village about ſix miles diſtant from that capital. Though we are not able to determine preciſely the time, when Mr. Allix was made a Miniſter of Charenton, yet we may affirm that he was not then much above thirty years of age; for we find that he preached a ſermon there December the 2d 1675, which being a faſt day (b), a ſtranger would not have been admitted to preach on ſo ſolemn an occaſion; and therefore Mr. Allix muſt have been then a Miniſter of that place. His being choſen ſo young by the largeſt and moſt conſiderable congregation of the Proteſtants in France, ſhews in how much eſteem he was already amongſt them; for they would never have choſen a young man, if he had not been able to maintain the Proteſtant Religion againſt the perpetual cavils of the Papiſts, and to ſecure thoſe, committed to his care, from being inſnared by them, at a time when the Popiſh Clergy uſed all poſſible arts and policy, to draw the Proteſtants over to their Religion. It was neceſſary therefore, that there ſhould be learned and prudent Paſtors in every Proteſtant Congregation, and eſpecially in that, which being near the Court was for that very reaſon the moſt expoſed to the various attacks of the enemy. Mr. Allix had given very early proofs of his learning and abilities; for in the

(a) From the MS. Memoirs communicated to us by the Doctor's family.

(b) 12 Sermons de P. A. Miniſtre du St. Evangile, 2d ed. Rotterd. 1685, 12°, in the Index.

the year 1660 (being then but nineteen years old) he publiſhed his Theſes Theologicæ de ultimo Judicio. He publiſhed afterwards, even during his ſtay at Paris, ſeveral other books, which we ſhall mention hereunder [A]. When he was a Miniſter of Charenton he undertook in conjunction with the celebrated Mr. Claude a new tranſlation of the Bible into French, which gave his enemies a pretence to aſperſe his character, as tho' he had been a Socinian (c); but he has fully proved by his latter works how little ground there was for ſuch a charge, as will appear by the account we ſhall give of them hereafter. In the year 1682 the Roman Catholick Clergy of France publiſhed a Paſtoral Advice (d), directed to the Proteſtants of that Kingdom [B], entreating them to declare the reaſons for which they had ſeparated from the Church of Rome. Mr. Allix thought it his duty on this occaſion to exhort his flock in an excellent Sermon (e) to ſtudy the grounds of their Religion, that they might be able to give an account of their faith. He likewiſe laid before them the reaſons for which their Anceſtors thought they were obliged to ſeparate from the Church of Rome. I believe he was ſtill in France when he publiſhed Reflexions Critiques & Théologiques ſur la Controverſe de l'Egliſe: i. e. "Critical and Theological Reflections on the Controverſy concern-"ing the Church." There is an edition of this work printed in 1686, but I believe it is not the firſt. Mr. Bayle has quoted a paſſage out of it, and made ſome obſervations upon it, which deſerve to be communicated to the reader [C]; becauſe he corrects a miſtake, which is common to a great many Proteſtants, who believe that the Doctrine of the Merit of Good Works is conſtantly received in the Church of Rome, and has received the ſanction of the Council of Trent. When the learned Emeric Bigot publiſhed at Paris in 1680 Palladius's

(c) Luicius's Hiſtor. Diction. in Dutch, Hague 1724, fol. Art. ALLIX.

(d) Advertiſement Paſtoral.

(e) It is the firſt in the vol. quoted above, and was delivered at Charenton Octob. the 11th, 1682, ſoon after the Paſtoral Advice had been publiſhed.

[A] Several other books which we ſhall mention hereunder.] Diſſertatio de Sanguine Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti, ad Epiſtolam 146 S. Auguſtini, quâ num adhuc exiſtat, inquiritur; i. e. "A Diſſertation concerning "the Blood of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, upon the 146th "Epiſtle of St. Auguſtin, &c." Diſſertatio de Tertulliani vita & Scriptis; i. e. "A Diſſertation concern-"ing the Life and Writings of Tertullian." Réponſe à la Diſſertation, qui eſt à la fin du Livre de Mr. Arnaud, touchant le Livre du Corps & du Sang du Seigneur, publiée ſous le nom de Bertram, & touchant l'Autorité de Jean Scot, ou Erigéne, avec quelques argumentations * importantes, faites à la Réponſe au livre de Mr. Arnaud, par L'Auteur même. i. e. "An An-"ſwer to the Diſſertation, which is at the end of "Mr. Arnaud's book, concerning the treatiſe of the "Body and Blood of our Saviour, publiſhed under the "name of John Scotus, or Erigenes; with ſome con-"ſiderable additions made to the anſwer to Mr. Ar-"naud's book, by the Author himſelf;" printed in France, in 4to, 1671. As we have not ſeen theſe pieces, we cannot give a more particular account of them; nor can we ſay whether theſe, with the other pieces mentioned in the text of this Article, to the quotation (f), be all that Dr. Allix publiſhed during his ſtay in France. We imagine that he wrote ſome other, to which he did not put his name, which is the reaſon why we are not able to give the titles of them. We have been informed, that upon the ſhutting up of the Church of Charenton, Mr. Allix preached there the laſt Sermon, which was printed by itſelf, and in which were ſome very remarkable paſſages concerning the neceſſity of publick worſhip; but after all our endeavours to procure that Sermon, we have not been able to obtain it.

* Thus it is written in the Manuſcript communicated to us; perhaps it ſhould be augmentations.

[B] A Paſtoral advice directed to the Proteſtants of France.] This Paſtoral Advice was only deſigned to enſnare the Proteſtants. They were aſked to give an account of the reaſons for which they had ſeparated from the Church, but the intent of this queſtion was, that they ſhould acknowledge their ſeparation to be ill-grounded. It was therefore neceſſary that the Proteſtants ſhould be armed againſt the cavils of their adverſaries; and this Dr. Allix intended in the Sermon we have mentioned. As we could not procure the Paſtoral Advice itſelf, we hope the readers will be pleaſed to find here what Mr. Bayle has ſaid of it. It will give them ſome notion of the craft and policy of the French Roman Catholick Clergy. I own, ſays Mr. Bayle (1), that the Paſtoral Advice which the Clergy has directed to their erring brethren, is written in ſuch a manner, that it ſeems to breathe nothing but love and charity; it is mild, compaſſionate, pacifick, and flattering. They even promiſe us that the execution of their deſign (2) will be attended with moderation and juſtice. The event will ſhew us the intent of this new attack. If we may judge of it, by the Spirit that ran thro' their former advices, it is a device, a ſnare intended to deſtroy us. Theſe fine diſcourſes, ſo meek, ſo charitable, ſo civil, are deſigned only to impoſe on future Ages, when theſe publick writings will be read, and the particular actions that followed them remain unknown. The Clergy alſo think that ſuch an advice will give them room to boaſt, that they have employed the moſt proper methods to conquer our obſtinacy; and if we are not prevailed upon to renounce our pretended errors, they may juſtly pronounce us obſtinate hereticks, and conſequently unworthy the toleration, which the King has granted us till this time: for the ſtubbornneſs of the hereticks is ſtill more puniſhable than their very hereſies. This is not much unlike the ſpirit, by which Pliny the younger acted, when he put the Chriſtians to death, without knowing what it was to be a Chriſtian, thinking they were ſufficiently guilty, ſince they were obſtinate (3). Some Proteſtants found fault with Mr. Bayle, for having ſaid, that the Paſtoral Advice was mild and compaſſionate; where were his eyes, ſaid they, when he wrote thoſe words? How came he not to ſee in the Paſtoral Advice the dreadful misfortunes, with which we are threatned in the concluſion of it (4)? The words alluded to here are theſe, Et quemadmodum hic error veſter noviſſimus erit pejor priore, ſic erunt noviſſima veſtra pejora prioribus; which the French Clergy tranſlated in the following manner, Et parceque cette derniere erreur ſera plus criminelle en vous, que toutes les autres, vous devez vous attendre à des malheurs incomparablement plus epouvantables, & plus funeſtes que tous ceux que vous ont attirez juſqu'à preſent vôtre revolte & vôtre ſchiſme. That is, "And "as this laſt error will be more criminal in you, "than all your former errors, ſo you muſt expect that "your future miſeries will be incomparably more dread-"ful and fatal to you, than all the misfortunes, which "your revolt and your ſchiſm have already drawn upon "you (5)." The obvious ſenſe of theſe words is, that if the Proteſtants would not yield to the Advice of the Clergy, and return into the pale of the Church, they were to expect a much heavier perſecution, than that which they had already ſuffered. But as theſe words might alſo be underſtood of puniſhments in another life, Mr. Bayle ſays, he thought it was more agreeable to Chriſtian civility, and alſo more prudent in him to take them in this latter ſenſe, that the Authors of this piece might not complain, he had miſrepreſented the meaning of their Advice (6). However as the event has made it appear, that the obvious ſenſe of the words was that of the Author's, it was abſolutely neceſſary that able and pious Miniſters, ſuch as Dr. Allix, ſhould not only arm their flocks againſt the cavils and fallacious arguments of the Popiſh Clergy, but alſo inſpire them with courage and patience to undergo the evils, with which they were threatned.

(1) Critique Generale de l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme, Lect. 8. § 6. tom. 1. pag. 136. 4th edit. 1714, 12°.

(2) Of reuniting the Proteſtants to the Church.

(3) Neque enim dubitabam, qualecunque eſſet, quod faterentur, pervicaciam certe, & obſtinationem debere puniri. Plin. lib. 10. Epiſt. 97.

(4) Bayle, Nouvel. Lett. de l'Auteur de la Critique Let. 12. § 2. tom. 3. pag. 369.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Idem, ibid. pag. 371, &c.

[C] Mr. Bayle has quoted a paſſage out of this Book, and made ſome obſervations upon it.] Here follow Dr. Allix's words; "It is certain, ſays he (7), that there "are ſome errors in the Church of Rome, which the "members of that Church did before the Reformation, "and do ſtill renounce, when they are upon the point "of death. For inſtance, they taught and do ſtill "teach

(7) Allix, Reflexions Critiques & Theologiques ſur la Controverſe de l'Egliſe, pag. 230, 231. edit. 1686.

ladius's Life of St. Chryſoſtom, in Greek and Latin, he was reſolved to add to it that Father's Letter to the Monk Cæſarius; and accordingly it was printed, but he was obliged to ſuppreſs it [D], in order to obtain a licence for the publication of his book; ſo that there are but a very few copies of Palladius's Life of Chryſoſtom, in which that Letter is found. The Proteſtants hearing of this did not fail to boaſt of it, as tho' this Letter had been ſuppreſſed only becauſe it contained ſome paſſages againſt Tranſubſtantiation. One of them printed in England a book intitled, S. Anaſtaſii Sinaïtæ Anagogicarum contemplationum in Hexameron liber XII. hactenus deſideratus; cui præmiſſa eſt expoſtulatio de S. Johannis Chryſoſtomi Epiſtola ad Cæſarium Monachum adverſus Apollinarii Hæreſin, a Pariſienſibus aliquot Theologis non ita pridem ſuppreſſa. Londini 1682, 4to. That is, "The twelfth book of "Anaſtaſius the Sinaite's Contemplations on the ſix days Creation, not publiſhed before; to "which is prefixed a complaint concerning Chryſoſtom's Letter to Cæſarius having lately "been ſuppreſſed by ſome of the Paris Divines." Some perſons thought at firſt that this complaint was written by Mr. Juſtel, but it is certain that Mr. Allix was the author of it (f). Upon the repeal of the Edict of Nantes, on the 22d of October 1685, all the Miniſters of Charenton were obliged to leave Paris in four and twenty hours, and the Kingdom in a fortnight. Mr. Allix retired immediately to St. Denys, where he found much difficulty to obtain a paſs in order to go out of France with his wife (g) and three children. Very advantageous terms were propoſed to him, in order to draw him to the Roman Catholic Religion, but he refuſed them all, and retired into England, where he arrived that ſame year, and obtained from King James II a Patent for eſtabliſhing in the City of London a French Church conformable to that of England. This was the only preferment he obtained before the Revolution. In the year 1686 he publiſhed Determinatio Fr. Joannis Pariſienſis Prædicatoris de modo exiſtendi Corporis Chriſti in Sacramento Altaris alio quam ſit ille, quem tenet Eccleſia; nunc primum edita ex MS. Codice S. Victoris Pariſ. Cui præfixa eſt Præfatio Hiſtorica de dogmate Tranſubſtantiationis. i. e. "Friar John of Paris the Dominican's "Determination of the manner in which the body of Chriſt is preſent at the Sacrament "of the Altar, different from that held by the Church. To which is prefixed an Hiſ-"torical Preface concerning Tranſubſtantiation." London, printed for Cailloüe, 1686, in 8vo. This Treatiſe of John of Paris had never been printed before; a French Roman Catholick Gentleman had it copied from the manuſcript, which is repoſited in the Abbey of St. Victor at Paris, and ſent it to Mr. Allix, who publiſhed it with an Hiſtorical

(f) Bayle, Nouv. de la Rep. des Lett. 1686. Juin, p. 686.

(g) Her name was Margaret, ſhe was the daughter of John Roger, an eminent Merchant at Paris, and had been married to our Author in 1678.

"teach the doctrine of the merit of good works, and "of human ſatisfactions: but theſe doctrines are ab-"jured by dying perſons in the following profeſſion. "The Prieſt. Do you believe that you cannot obtain the "heavenly glory, by your own merit, but only by the "power and merit of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt's Paſſion? "The ſick perſon's anſwer. I do believe it. The Prieſt. "Do you believe that our Lord Jeſus Chriſt died for "our ſalvation, and that no one can be ſaved by his own "merit, nor by any other means, but by the merit of "Chriſt's Paſſion? The ſick perſon. I do believe "it. The Prieſt. If God ſhould judge you according "to your ſins, you muſt tell him; O Lord God, I put "the Death of Jeſus Chriſt my Lord between me and thy "judgment; and tho' I deſerve everlaſting death becauſe "of my ſins, yet I have recourſe to the merit of Jeſus "Chriſt's Paſſion, inſtead of the merit, which I miſerable "wretch ought to have, and which I want." Mr. Bayle's obſervations on this paſſage are as follow: "You "will no doubt wonder, ſays he (8), that the Miniſter "of Charenton quotes no ritual, nor any other book, "which contains what he relates, and you deſire me "to ſupply this defect, if I can. Being willing to "comply with your requeſt, I refer you to Cardinal "Hoſius, who will tell you (9), that Anſelm Archbi-"ſhop of Canterbury is ſaid to have preſcribed a "form of queſtions and anſwers for dying perſons, "which does not much differ from that, quoted by "Dr. Allix. Hoſius adds (10), that this form has "been inſerted in a book intitled, Hortulus animæ, "and he quotes the queſtions and anſwers, which he "has read in the Sacerdotale Romanum; they are ex-"actly the ſame with theſe mentioned above. This "paſſage of Cardinal Hoſius excited Dr. Calixtus's "curioſity, and engaged him to ſearch old books, in "hopes of finding ſuch kind of forms in them.—If "you read the collections he made on this ſubject, "you will find there (11) the Form of Anſelm, that "of the Formula Raymundi, a work printed at Co-"logne in 1498. Calixtus will alſo inform you, that "the Agenda Eccleſiaſtica printed at Paris in 1512, to "be diſtributed to the inhabitants of the Dioceſe of "Sleſwic, and the Agenda Moguntina, printed the next "year, contain the ſame queſtions and anſwers, as "the Sacerdotale Romanum, and that they are alſo "found (12) in a book printed A. 1627, and intitled, "Rituale Monaſticum, Juſtorumque infirmantibus, moribundis, nec non vitæ functis perſolvendorum ratio, ex optimis quibuſque Romano præcipue, & antiquiori Benedictino depromptum; and in (13) the Ordo baptiſandi cum modo viſitandi juxta ritum ſanctæ Romanæ Eccleſiæ, reprinted at Venice in 1575. I do not "know, whether the learned Author, who would not "take the trouble of quoting any of thoſe rituals, "pretended, that the doctrine of the Merit of good "Works has been and is ſtill taught in the Church "of Rome as an article, which every body is obliged "to believe. If this was his meaning, he will give "me leave to ſay that he is very much miſtaken. "The doctrine of the Merit of good Works, is a ſub-"ject, which belongs to the ſchool, and is a diſputa-"ble point; it has been denied by very famous Doc-"tors (14); and the Fathers of the Council of "Trent finding the Schoolmen were divided on this "ſubject, expreſſed their decree concerning it with ſo "much caution, that it condemns neither party (15).

(8) Reponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial, tom. 2. ch. 122. p. m. 576, &c.

(9) Hoſius, Confeſſ. Fidei. cap. 73. pag. 291.

(10) Idem, ibid. pag. 292.

(11) Calixtus de Arte nova, pag. 423, & ſeq.

(12) Ib. p. 435. See alſo the laſt part of the Epitome Conf. Cathol. of John Gherard. pag. 771.

(13) Calixt. ibid. pag. 427.

(14) This has been fully proved by George Calixtus, ubi ſupra, p. 290, &c. and in the Epitome Confeſſ. of John Gherard. ubi ſupra, pag. 766, & ſeq.

(15) See Calixtus, ubi ſupra, pag. 419, 420.

[D] It (Chryſoſtom's Letter) was printed, but Mr. Bigot was obliged to ſuppreſs it.] Here follow ſome reflections of Mr. Bayle upon this fact, which the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find. He informs us (16), that Dr. Boileau, brother to the famous Poet of that name, publiſhed a new edition of Ratramnus, or Bertram's treatiſe concerning the Body and Blood of our Saviour, and added ſome remarks to it, in order to ſhew that this Author was orthodox, that is, held no other opinions than thoſe of the Church of Rome. Now ſince our Author like Ratramnus may be explained in ſuch a manner, as to make him favour Tranſubſtantiation, the policy of the Paris Divines, who obliged Mr. Bigot to ſuppreſs St. Chryſoſtom's Letter, appears unintelligible; for it had been much better for them, to oblige Mr. Boileau, who diſcovers Tranſubſtantiation in Ratramnus, to find it alſo in that famous letter, rather than to diſcover in ſo public a manner, how much they dreaded the publication of that Letter.—Mr. Baillet intimates to us, that there are a great many Roman Catholicks, who think that it would have been much better to publiſh that Letter fairly, with an explication of the ſtumbling-block, I mean, the difficult paſſage it contains, than to ſuppreſs it;

(16) Repub. des Lett. 1686. Juin, pag. 682.

rical Preface (b), in which he proves with the clearest evidence, that the Doctrine of Transubstantiation is so far from having been constantly believed in the Church, that it was not so much as an article of faith before the Council of Trent [E]. The same Gentleman, who sent Mr. Allix a copy of John of Paris's work, wrote a book, in which he proved, that the Roman Catholicks ought not to require of the Protestants a belief of Transubstantiation, as of an article of faith, and sent it to Mr. Allix, desiring him to have it printed in England, which was done accordingly (i). That work deserves that we should give a short account of it [F], though it was only published by our Author. In the year 1687 he published Reflexions sur les cinq Livres de Moyse pour établir la Vérité de it; since that suppression is in a manner impossible, the passage in question having been published above a Century ago. He also observes, that the Protestants exclaim against such a conduct, calling it a cheat and an imposture, and have even printed a Complaint in England, which some persons ascribe to Mr. Justel (17). Here Mr. Baillet is mistaken, that Complaint, as we have said above, being written by Mr. Allix.

(b) Bayle, Nouv. de la Rep. les Lett. 1686. Oct. pag. 1226.

(i) Idem, ibid.

(17) Ibid. pag. 685, 686.

[E] Transubstantiation . . . . was not so much as an article of faith, before the Council of Trent.] This, says Mr. Bayle in the account he gives of Dr. Allix's Preface (18), is perhaps the greatest of all the absurdities, with which the doctrine of Transubstantiation abounds; for how can it be conceived, that a society, which boasts of having no other ground for her belief, but an uninterrupted series of doctrine drawn from the time of the Apostles down to the present, and which looks upon as a way that leads to error, whatever in the least deviates from this continued tradition, should yet have resolved towards the middle of the sixteenth Century, to propose a new article of faith? And if it be conceivable, that an assembly of grave Prelates should be bold enough to take such a resolution, how could they execute it? How could the whole body of the Church submit blindly to such an imposition, without perceiving, that the Council acted against their own principles? But after all, this will not appear very extraordinary to those, who have some knowledge of mankind. It would be a flat contradiction to affirm that man is a mere machine; yet it is certain that upon a thousand occasions, especially in matters of faith, men suffer themselves to be led as though they were mere mechanism. However that be, let us see what Mr. Allix offers in the Preface we have mentioned. He is so fully persuaded that every body will allow, that the ancient Church did not believe the whole substance of the bread and the wine in the Lord's Supper to be annihilated, that he contents himself with alledging the Letter of St. Chrysostom to Cæsarius, the first Dialogue of Theodoretus, and the book of Pope Gelasius De duabus Naturis. He afterwards treats of the three following points: 1. The success which attended the first Councils of Rome, in which Decrees were made concerning Transubstantiation under the Popes Nicholas II and Gregory VII. 2. The authority which Pope Innocent III had in this affair. 3. What had been taught by the Doctors of the Church since the affair of John of Paris. With regard to the first point, he examines the Formulary which the Popes Nicholas II and Gregory VII proposed to Berengarius in two Councils held at Rome, one in 1059, the other in 1078. Some persons have said, that Pope Gregory did not believe himself what he required of Berengarius. Mr. Allix does not insist upon this; but he quotes a manuscript in the Library of Lambeth; in which that Pope, after he had related several different opinions concerning the change of the bread and wine into the Body and Blood of our Saviour, leaves them all undetermined, and says expressly, that we have nothing clear and express concerning that substantial change or conversion. Yet he condemned Berengarius, who held it. Notwithstanding this decision of the Pope with regard to Berengarius, yet Mr. Allix shews by some direct passages from the famous Rupertus, who flourished a little after Pope Gregory VII, that at that time it was sufficient for a man to believe that the Body and Blood of Christ were in some manner present at the Altar, without being obliged to hold that the substance of the bread and wine were annihilated after consecration. With regard to the second point, Mr. Allix says, that Pope Innocent III being resolved to cut off the liberty which people took of explaining differently the corporal Presence of Jesus Christ, decreed in the Council of Lateran, held in 1215, that the bread was transubstantiated into the Body of our Lord. But as the Pope did not observe the ordinary forms, the Church did not receive his determination with the same submission, which she had for the Decrees of Councils. For even after his determination, several Divines maintained, that if an animal swallowed a consecrated host, it did not swallow the Body of Christ. Mr. Allix also shews, that the disputes which had risen concerning Christ's Presence at the sacrifice of the Altar, did still subsist even after Pope Innocent III's decision; whence it follows that his decision was not universally received. It is surprizing, says Mr. Bayle (19) that Mr. Allix, who knows so many other things, should have been able to gain such a prodigious knowledge of the Schoolmen. With regard to the third point, the Author quotes a great many passages, by which it appears, that the opinion of the annihilation of the bread and the wine in the Lord's Supper has been confuted or maintained, according as it was the fashion amongst the learned to do either. He also shews that neither the decisions of the Council of Constance against Wicliff, nor those of the Council of Florence did settle people's minds on this subject, nor were they able to do it, because their authority was reciprocally called in question by the Italians and the French; the latter refusing to acknowledge the Council of Florence for a general one, and the former scornfully stiling the Councils of Constance and Basil mere Conciliabula. Besides, it is not true that the Council of Florence determined the doctrine of Transubstantiation; it was Pope Eugenius, who decreed it in his Instruction to the Armenians dated November the 21st, 1438, four months after the breaking up of the Council. Hence it is, that the Schoolmen, who wrote since that time, establish Transubstantiation only upon Tradition, or upon the Decrees of the Council of Lateran. One would think, that at least since the Council of Trent the Roman Catholick Doctors ought to know where to fix; and yet even since that Council there have been some who maintained opinions very different from Transubstantiation: Mr. Allix refers us on this occasion to Forbes, who has quoted those Authors; and adds that F. Barnes has maintained in his books, that even at this time Transubstantiation was not an article of faith.

(18) Rep. des Let. Dec. 1686. p. 1417, &c.

(19) Ibid. pag. 1423.

[F] That work deserves that we give a short account of it.] The Author of that book was a very eminent man, but more illustrious still by his great learning, than by his rank: this is all we know of him, because, if he had been more particularly described, it would have served only to expose him to the fury of those, who employ all possible means to destroy such persons of their own party, as dare to acknowledge truth. He begins his book with observing, that the Assembly of the French Clergy held at Paris in 1682, having directed a pastoral Letter to the Protestants, desiring them to return into the pale of the Church, laid it down as a maxim, that the true method to know, whether any doctrine belonged to the faith or not, was to examine, whether such a doctrine had constantly been believed as an article of faith. He adds, that this maxim has been delivered to us by Vincentius Lirinensis above eleven hundred years ago, and had been inserted as a fundamental principle by Pope Pius IV in the profession of faith, which he caused to be added to the Council of Trent, and in which he requires every Doctor to swear, that he will explain the holy Scripture only according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers. This maxim, continues the Author, has been received as a rule of faith by the reformed Church of England, and by several Protestants, whom he names, and whose authorities Gesselius has quoted de la Religion Chrêtienne; that is, "Reflections upon the five Books of Moſes, to eſtabliſh "the truth of the Chriſtian Religion." London 1687, 8vo. Two years after he publiſhed the ſecond volume with this title: Reflexions ſur les Livres de l'Ecriture ſainte, pour établir la verité de la Religion Chrêtienne; that is, "Reflections upon the Books of the ho- "ly Scripture, to eſtabliſh the truth of the Chriſtian Religion." Tom. II. Amſterdam, 1689, 8vo. We ſhall give ſome account of this Work in the note [G]. After the Revolution his merit began to be rewarded; for through the intereſt of Biſhop Burnet Mr. Allix was in the year 1690 choſen Canon and Treaſurer of Saliſbury, whither he went then to reſide. About that time the two Univerſities conferred upon him the Degree of Doctor of Divinity ad honores, and the whole Clergy of England entreated him to write a general Hiſtory of the Councils. The Parliament was likewiſe ſo well perſuaded of his abilities for ſuch a taſk, that this auguſt Aſſembly voted, that all the papers neceſſary for the printing of that Hiſtory might be brought over from Holland free from all duty. Yet this great undertaking in the Preface to his Hiſtory of the memorable things which happened from the creation of the world to the year 1125. From all this the Author concludes, that the true way to know, whether Tranſubſtantiation be an article of faith, is not to ſhew, that the Council of Trent decided it, and that of Lateran ſuppoſed it; but that it is contained in the Scriptures, and underſtood in that ſenſe by the unanimous conſent of all the Doctors and Councils that went before us. He then tells us his only deſign is, 1. To enquire who are thoſe Catholick Doctors, who believed that the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation is not ancient. 2. To examine whether what theſe Doctors have written be true, and whether we can really produce ſufficient authorities for this aſſertion, viz. that the Ancients did not believe Tranſubſtantiation. With regard to the firſt of theſe heads, he proves by the confeſſion of Suarez, Peter Lombard, Scotus, the Cardinals d'Ailli, and Cuſanus, of Eraſmus, Alfonſus de Caſtro, Tonſtal Biſhop of Durham, Caſſander, Charles du Moulin, John Vribarne, and Mr. de Marca, that the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation has been neither univerſally nor conſtantly received in the Church. But leſt people ſhould think that all theſe great men were miſtaken in what they confeſſed, the Author proceeds to the ſecond head of his diviſion; and obſerves firſt, that there are ſeveral Doctors of his Communion, who are agreed that the holy Scripture does not contain clearly that doctrine; ſecondly, that neither the Jews nor the Heathens, who made ſo many objections againſt the Chriſtian Myſteries, ever made any againſt the ſhocking difficulties, with which the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation is ſurrounded. He then examines what has been the opinion of every Century upon this ſubject, and he finds every where very ſtrong proofs againſt Tranſubſtantiation. It was not difficult for him to collect paſſages upon this ſubject; he found the taſk already performed by the Proteſtant writers; but he does not employ theſe paſſages exactly to the ſame purpoſe as they do; he contents himſelf with ſhewing, by ſhort obſervations, that the bread ſtill ſubſiſts after conſecration. He does not attack the doctrine of Chriſt's real preſence in the Sacrament, nor does he entangle himſelf in the wild labyrinths of this intricate diſpute. He concludes his book by an humble addreſs to the Biſhops, not to tire to the utmoſt the patience of the poor Proteſtants, who in order to obey the King's commands have already yielded beyond what their conſcience could allow, but will by no means reſolve to make a particular profeſſion of Tranſubſtantiation, ſince it appears they oppoſe it conſcientiouſly, as being contrary to the very rule, which has been propoſed to them by the Biſhops. Some perſons, who will hardly believe this to be the language of a Roman Catholick, will be apt to think, that the manuſcript has been altered before it was ſent to the preſs. But the Editors aſſure us in the Preface, that they have exactly followed the Author's manuſcript, as they can prove it not only by his letters which they have, but alſo by the original itſelf, which he ſent to one of his friends to have it printed (20). The title of the book is as follows. Traité d'un Auteur de la Communion Romaine, touchant la Tranſubſtantiation, ou il fait voir, que ſelon les Principes de ſon Egliſe, ce dogme ne peut être un Article de Foy. That is, "A Treatiſe written by the Author of "the Roman Catholick Religion, wherein he ſhews, "that according to the principles of his Church, that "doctrine cannot be an Article of Faith." London, 1686, in 12mo.

(20) Bayle, Repub. des Lett. 1687. Fevrier, pag. 121, &c.

[G] Some account of his reflections &c.] It would be too prolix to give a juſt abſtract of theſe two volumes; and therefore we ſhall only mention a few obſervations, which will render the reader capable of judging of Dr. Allix's performance. He undertakes firſt to prove the truth of the facts related in the five Books of Moſes, for which purpoſe he makes ſeveral very good obſervations upon the character of Moſes, to ſhew that he deſerves to be credited. And as it may be aſked, how Moſes came to know theſe facts, which happened long before he was born, the Author has not recourſe to an immediate revelation, but ſhews that the memory of thoſe facts may very well have been preſerved by an unqueſtionable tradition; I ſay unqueſtionable, becauſe it had paſſed through ſo few hands that it could not have been altered nor corrupted. And indeed, we find that the Books of Geneſis and Exodus are written in a very different manner. In the latter Moſes often uſes this expreſſion, the Lord ſaid to me, and he mentions the time when, and place where, God ſpoke to him; but he uſes no ſuch phraſes in Geneſis: and beſides, he is very ſhort upon what paſſed long before his time, the Hiſtory of 156 years taking up only eight chapters; whereas he is more prolix, when he ſpeaks of later events, and for that reaſon better known; which ſhews that he followed tradition, tho' under the direction of the Holy Ghoſt (21). Another deſign of Dr. Allix in his Reflections, is to ſhew that the Meſſiah was known and promiſed in all the ages of the Church. To prove this, he obſerves, that moſt of the actions mentioned in the Scriptures relate to the Meſſiah. It was with a view to the Meſſiah, that Eve ſaid, when ſhe brought forth Cain, I have gotten a man from the Lord (22), and Cain thinking the promiſe of the bleſſed ſeed muſt relate to him, and ſeeing that his brother Abel was a Prieſt of the Lord, killed him, becauſe he could not bear that another ſhould come and trouble him in the poſſeſſion he enjoyed, as applying to himſelf the firſt oracle and promiſe of God. Lamech indulged himſelf in polygamy for the ſame reaſon, thinking that by multiplying his poſterity he ſhould ſooner ſee the Meſſiah born. Ham laughed at his father, becauſe he ſaw that the good old man not being able to beget any more children, was thereby uncapable of contributing towards the accompliſhment of the Prophecy, and the coming of the Meſſiah; and Noah curſed him in ſo terrible a manner, only becauſe his raillery was an impiety againſt God himſelf. Eſau's crime conſiſted in this, that by ſelling his birth-right, he thereby deprived himſelf of the right he had, of ſeeing the Meſſiah ariſe from his poſterity; &c. If this manner of reaſoning, ſays the Author of the Repub. des Lettres (23), ſurprizes the reader, he muſt ſuſpend his judgment till he has read the Book itſelf, in which it is found; and indeed Dr. Allix places his proofs in ſuch a light, that if he does not convince his reader of the truth of his obſervations, yet he gives him a ſtrong idea of his ability, ſkill and learning. The ſecond volume of theſe Reflections, which is upon the reſt of the books of the Old Teſtament, and thoſe of the New, is written with as much if not more judgment and ſtrength of reaſoning. We ſhall only obſerve, that it were to be wiſhed, it had been printed under the Author's eye, who would certainly have corrected a few inadvertencies, which dropt from his pen, and ſometimes weaken the force of his arguments, and leſſen the beauty of his Reflections (24).

(21) Rep. des Lett. 1687. Avril, 415, 416.

(22) Gen. iv. 1.

(23) Ubi ſupra, pag. 427.

(24) De Beauval, Hiſt. des Ouv. des Savans, 1688, Decemb. p. 372.

undertaking proved abortive [H]. Dr. Allix was beloved and eſteemed by all the learned men of his time. He had a great many friends, with ſome of whom he kept a conſtant correſpondence. He was extremely zealous for the intereſt of the Proteſtant Religion, and always ready to maintain its cauſe againſt the attacks of the Roman Catholicks. He had a ſtrong deſire to unite all the Proteſtants, and eſpecially the Lutherans with the Calviniſts, and frequently conſulted upon that ſubject with the Miniſters of Geneva, Holland, and Berlin. He was deeply ſkilled in almoſt every ſcience; his ſermons were very rational, and for that reaſon he had always a numerous audience. He underſtood very well the Hebrew, Syriac and Chaldaic Tongues; and being a man of extenſive reading and an excellent memory, he was in a manner a living library, and his converſation was as agreeable as inſtructive. This great man died after a lingring illneſs in Charter-houſe Square February the [H] This great undertaking miſcarried.] The Hiſtory was to contain ſeven volumes in folio, but the Bookſeller would not undertake the printing of them, till there were eight hundred books ſubſcribed for; and his not being able to procure ſo many ſubſcriptions, was the reaſon why the work was dropt. We do not hear, whether Dr. Allix left any manuſcripts or any materials for that work behind him, tho' in all probability he muſt have had a great many ready, before he could take upon him ſo arduous a work.

[I] A catalogue of his works ſince the Revolution with ſome remarks upon them.] We ſhall obſerve firſt, that immediately before the Revolution he wrote ſome pieces againſt Popery, as, A Diſcourſe concerning Penance; ſhewing how the doctrine of it in the Church of Rome makes void true repentance, 4to, 1688. An hiſtorical Diſcourſe concerning the neceſſity of the Miniſter's intention in adminiſtring the Sacraments, London, 4to, 1688. A Preparation for the Lord's Supper, 1688. He wrote alſo ſome other pieces, but what they were we could not be informed of. After the Revolution he publiſhed ſome treatiſes in defence of the titles of King William and Queen Mary, and alſo to induce the people to take the oaths; as for inſtance, An examination of the ſcruples of thoſe, who refuſe to take the oath of allegiance, London, 4to, 1689, and ſome others, the titles whereof we could not learn. In 1690 he publiſhed Some Remarks upon the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the ancient Churches of Piedmont, London, 4to. The occaſion of his writing theſe Remarks was as follows: Biſhop Boſſuet in his Hiſtory of the Variations of the Proteſtant Churches, had employed the eleventh book of that Hiſtory in diſgracing the character of the Albigenſes and Valdenſes, by accuſing them of having been Manichees, in order to deprive the Proteſtants of the uſe they make of theſe people's teſtimony againſt the Roman Catholicks. Dr. Allix thought it his duty to call that celebrated Author to an account, and to lay his diſingenuity and inſincerity open to the Publick. He does not undertake to write a compleat Hiſtory of the Churches of Piedmont, this having already been abundantly done by ſeveral learned men; but he undertakes to ſhew that theſe Churches are really ancient, and that they have kept themſelves free from all ſubjection to the See of Rome even from their firſt eſtabliſhment, which they carry as high as the time of the Apoſtles. Dr. Allix therefore ſhews that there was a conſtant ſucceſſion not only of the true Chriſtian doctrines, but alſo of the miniſtry in theſe Churches from the time of the Apoſtles to the thirteenth Century, when they became ſo famous by oppoſing bravely the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome. By this means he thinks he is able to anſwer the queſtion of thoſe, who require the Proteſtants to ſhew them a Church, in which their opinions were held before Luther, or at leaſt before the twelfth Century. The anſwer will be eaſy, that there was ſuch a Church in Piedmont, as Dr. Allix ſhews at large in this book, a curious account of which may be read in the work referred to in the margin (25). Two years after he publiſhed Remarks upon the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the ancient Churches of the Albigenſes, London, 1692, 4to. This book he wrote firſt in French, and had it afterwards tranſlated into Engliſh. The Albigenſes were ſituated in Gallia Narbonenſi, and in Aquitania, and Dr. Allix defends theſe Churches with as much zeal, judgment, and ſtrength of reaſon as he has done thoſe of Piedmont. This book as well as the laſt mentioned is full of curious hiſtorical facts, the choice of which ſhews the Author's good ſenſe, as the copiouſneſs of them is a proof of his extenſive reading; ſee the book mentioned in the margin (26). In 1695 he publiſhed Animadverſions on Mr. Hill's Book, entitled, A Vindication of the primitive Fathers againſt the Imputations of Gilbert, Lord Biſhop of Sarum. And ſome time after appeared in print another book of his, intitled, A Vindication of the Fathers &c. being an Anſwer to a Book intitled, The Judgment of the Fathers concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity, oppoſed to Dr. G. Bull's Defence of the Nicene Faith. The Author of the Book, which Dr. Allix undertook to anſwer, maintained that Juſtin the Martyr, who lived but an hundred and forty years after Chriſt, is the firſt Author of the opinion of our Saviour's Divinity, and conſequently of the doctrine of the Trinity. To ſupport this notion, he aſſerted, 1. That ſince the Jews have maintained that the Meſſiah was to be but a mere man, as appears by Juſtin's Dialogue againſt the Jew Tryphon, it follows neceſſarily from thence, that the Jewiſh Authors, quoted by Dr. Bull againſt the opinion of the Socinians, muſt have lived after the Goſpel was publiſhed. 2. That the Books of the Jews quoted againſt the Socinians, are nothing but pious frauds of ſome diſguiſed Chriſtians, who lived after Juſtin the Martyr, and this he believes is particularly true with regard to the Books of Philo Judæus, and the Book of Wiſdom. 3. That ſince the Jews could not ſpeak of the doctrine of the Trinity, nor of the Divinity of the Meſſiah, of which they had not the leaſt notion, it follows that whatever ſeems to favour theſe doctrines in their Books, muſt have been inſerted therein by ſome Chriſtians, who lived after Juſtin Martyr. 4. Laſtly, that if there be found either in the Scripture or in the writings of the ancient Jews, ſomething which favours thoſe doctrines, it comes probably from the Platoniſts, from whom the Jews and the Chriſtians have borrowed many ideas, which they have mingled with the Chriſtian doctrines, in order to draw the Heathens more eaſily to embrace the Goſpel (27). Theſe were the opinions, which Dr. Allix undertook to confute in his Vindication of the Fathers, and more fully ſtill, in his Judgment of the ancient Jewiſh Church, againſt the Unitarians, in the controverſy upon the Holy Trinity, and the Divinity of our Bleſſed Saviour, London, 8vo, 1699. In this treatiſe he endeavours to prove, that the ancient Jewiſh Church had in the main the ſame notions of the Trinity, and the Divinity of our Saviour, with the Chriſtian Church; tho' the notions of the former were leſs clear and diſtinct, than thoſe of the latter. The reader will expect perhaps, that this ſhould be proved by expreſs paſſages from the Old Teſtament; but this is not the method our Author choſe to follow. He ſays, that the notions of the ancient Jewiſh Church are to be look'd for in thoſe books, which are called Apocryphal, in the works of Philo, and in the Chaldaic Paraphraſes of the Old Teſtament. Theſe are the oldeſt and moſt certain Records of the ancient Traditions of the Jews. And if they be as old and as genuine as Dr. Allix pretends, it cannot be doubted, but they will be of great uſe to acquaint us with the opinions of the ancient Synagogue. Our Author therefore firſt endeavours to prove the antiquity and genuineneſs of theſe Books, and then to give us the ſenſe contained in them concerning the matter in diſpute (28). This work was ſoon after violently attacked in a Book intitled, The Doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and the manner of our Saviour's Divinity, as they are held in the Catholick Church, and the Church of England; with a diſcuſſion of two late famous Books on thoſe ſubjects, the Judgment of the Jewiſh Church, by Dr. P. A. and Bilibra, by Guil. Vorſtius. To which is added, an account of the Opinions and Books of Philo Judæus: more eſpecially concerning the Λογος or Word. In ſeveral letters to a Peer. By Stephen Nye,

(25) Acta Eruditor. anni 1691. Menſ. Junii, p. 254, &c.

(26) Ibid. ann. 1693, Menſ. April. pag. 169, &c.

(27) Nouvell. de la Rep. des Lett. 1699, Nov. pag. 519, 520.

(28) Ibid. pag. 520, &c. and Decemb. 693, &c.

the 20th 1717, being then about 76 years old, and was buried in St. Sepulchre's Church near Newgate. We ſhall give hereunder a catalogue of his Works ſince the Revolution, with ſome remarks upon them [I]. He left behind him a widow and five children, three ſons and two daughters. His eldeſt ſon is the preſent worthy Dean of Ely, Dr. Peter Allix, who having firſt been educated in the Charter-houſe, went to ſtudy at Cambridge, where he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He was afterwards one of the King's Chaplains in ordinary, and married Mrs. Parker ſiſter to the Honourable Sir Charles Wager. The materials for the greateſt part of this article have been communicated to us, which is the reaſon that we do not quote any printed book, for the facts we mention, except when we relate any thing that is not in the memoirs, which have been ſent to us.

(29) Hiſtoire des Ouv. des Savans, 1699, Avril, p. 147, &c. Repub. des Lettr. 1701, Decemb. p. 625, &c.

Rector of Hormead. London, 1701, 8vo. Mr. Nye treats Dr. Allix in a very ſevere manner, but ſays in his defence, that the Doctor had attack'd him firſt, and had aſcribed to him ſome books, which he did not write, and which contain opinions very different from his own. He charges Dr. Allix with being a Tritheiſt, becauſe he ſometimes ſpeaks of God in the plural number, and ſays, that the three Divine Perſons are three Beings, three uncreated Spirits. But if Dr. Allix's notion be Tritheiſtical, I do not know what to make of Mr. Nye's notions, except they be Sabellian. For if the three Perſons be but three diſtinctions, an eternal Spirit, a divine Self-knowledge begotten by that Spirit, and a divine Self-complacence, which neceſſarily proceeds from both, and not three Beings, it muſt be the ſame Being conſidered under different names, and in different circumſtances, which I think, is mere Sabellianiſm. How to find a medium between one Being only and three Beings, is a very difficult point; hic labor hoc opus eſt. Mr. Nye afterwards endeavours to ſhew that the Jews had not theſe notions, which Dr. Allix aſcribes to them, and that the authorities he quotes, are for the moſt part of no weight at all. Thoſe who are inclined to know more of that diſpute, may conſult their Books or the Authors we refer to in the margin (29). In 1701 Dr. Allix publiſhed The Book of Pſalms, with the Argument of each Pſalm, and a Preface giving ſome general rules for the interpretation of this ſacred Book, London, 1701. The Author gives to moſt of the Pſalms a ſenſe very different from that, which had been put upon them before; he finds prophecies every where, and exclaims againſt thoſe, who are for admitting a double ſenſe, that is, a literal and a myſtical one (30). The ſame year he publiſhed his treatiſe De Meſſiæ duplici Adventu Diſſertationes duæ adverſus Judæos. That is, "Of "the twofold Coming of Chriſt in two Diſſertations "againſt the Jews." It was the reſult of a diſpute he had with a learned Rabbi (31). The next year he printed with his Annotations, Nectarii Patriarchæ Hieroſolymitani Confutatio Imperii Papæ in Eccleſiam. That is, "A Refutation of the Pope's Empire over the "Church, by Nectarius, Patriarch of Conſtantino-"ple." Tranſlated out of Greek into Latin by Dr. Allix. In 1707 he publiſhed Diſſertatio de Jeſu Chriſti Domini noſtri anno & menſe natali, Lond. That is, "A Diſſertation concerning the month and year in "which our Lord Jeſus Chriſt was born." The ſame year he wrote two treatiſes, the firſt, A Confutation of the hopes of the Jews concerning the laſt Redemption; the ſecond, An Anſwer to Mr. Whiſton's late treatiſe on the Revelations, being an examination of the ſeveral Scripture Prophecies, which he has applied to the times after the coming of the Meſſiah. London, 1707. He alſo wrote ſeveral ſmall pieces againſt Mr. Whiſton's Arian Notions, and ſomething alſo againſt Mr. Dodwell, but we do not know the titles of theſe pieces. Perhaps he publiſhed ſome others, to which he did not put his name; which is the reaſon why we cannot at preſent give any account of them. P.

(30) Rep. des Let. 1701. Decemb. p. 688.

(31) Ibid. Sept. pag. 348.

☞AREUS ſon of Acrotatus, and grandſon of Cleomenes, ſucceeded the latter [A] in the Kingdom of Lacedæmon about the fourth year of the 117th Olympiad (a). His uncle Cleonymus diſputed the crown with him, but the Elders of the people, who, according to Polybius (b), had a great ſhare in the Government, preferred Areus before his uncle, at which the latter was ſo exaſperated, that notwithſtanding all the honours conferred upon him by his countrymen [B], he kept his reſentment, and was reſolved to be revenged. However, a great many years paſſed before he could accompliſh his deſign. At laſt the ſame year that Pyrrhus had made himſelf maſter of Macedonia, Cleonymus prevail'd with him to attack the Lacedæmonians [C]; and accordingly the next year, which was the 481ſt from the building of Rome (c), Pyrrhus marched againſt Lacedæmon (d). Areus was then abſent, being gone into the Iſland of Crete to the aſſiſtance of the Gortynians.

(a) According to Petav. Rat. Temp. tom. 1. pag. 1. lib. 4. cap. 3. pag. 127. The 4th year of the 117th Olympiad, is the 308th before Chriſt.

(b) Hiſt. lib. 6. cap. 43. p. 681, edit. Gronovii.

(c) 272 before Chriſt.

(d) Pauſan. in Att. pag. 23, 24. and in Lacon. p. 168, 169.

[A] Areus ſucceeded his grandfather.] Cleomenes had two ſons, Acrotatus, who was the eldeſt, and Cleonymus. Acrotatus dying before his father, there happened upon Cleomenes's death a conteſt between Areus the ſon of Acrotatus, and Cleonymus, both pretending to the Crown (1). Cleonymus was of a very proud and haughty temper, which rendered him very odious and ſuſpected to his fellow-citizens (2); this was probably the reaſon why the Lacedæmonians preferred his nephew before him.

(1) Pauſanias, in Lacon. p. m. 168.

(2) Plutarch. in Pyrrho, Oper. tom. 1. p. m. 400.

[B] The honours conferred upon him by his countrymen.] The Lacedæmonians to pacify him decreed ſeveral honours to him, and made him General of their Armies (3). He was ſent into Italy to aſſiſt the people of Tarentum againſt the Romans and the Lucani (4); and gained a victory over the latter. Thoſe of Tarentum having afterwards revolted againſt the Lacedæmonians, Cleonymus took their city in the ſecond year of the 119th Olympiad, the 451ſt of the building of Rome (5). The next year he came again into Italy with a fleet, and took the city of Thuriæ belonging to the Salentines, a people inhabiting part of Calabria: but he was ſoon obliged to leave it, and to retire to his veſſels, having been vanquiſhed by the Conſul C. Æmilius Paulus, whom the Romans ſent againſt him. Livy, who tells us this (6), adds, that he found in ſome Annals, that Junius Bubulcus the Dictator was ſent to aſſiſt the Salentines, and that Cleonymus had left Italy, before he could be obliged to fight againſt the Romans. However that be, the ſame Author tells us, that Cleonymus, whom he erroneouſly calls King, having for ſome time infeſted the Coaſt of Italy, was at laſt obliged to retire after a great loſs, having ſcarce the fifth part of his fleet left, and meeting with ill ſucceſs in all his undertakings on the coaſt of the Hadriatick Sea.

(3) Pauſanias, ubi ſupra.

(4) A people that inhabited part of Italy between the rivers Laus and Sybaris, now called Laino and Cochilo, in Calabria, a Province of the Kingdom of Naples.

(5) Diodor. Sic. lib. 20. apud Petav. Rat. Temp. tom. 1. pag. 1. lib. 4. cap. 3. p. m. 127.

(6) Lib. x. cap. 2. p. m. 234, 235.

[C] Cleonymus prevailed with him [Pyrrhus] to attack the Lacedæmonians.] The raiſing Areus to the throne was not the only cauſe of Cleonymus's reſentment; there was another cauſe, which exaſperated him ſtill more, particularly againſt the family of the King. The caſe, as related by Plutarch (7), is as follows. Cleonymus being already pretty much advanced in years, had married Chelidonis, a young and beautiful Lady, of Royal Blood. She fell in love with Acrotatus Areus's ſon, a very handſome youth, who was not ſo inſenſible, as to reject the Lady's addreſſes. Cleonymus was ſo much the more grieved at his wife's infidelity, as he had a very great love for her. It was this domeſtick ſorrow, together with the injury he thought was done him, when Areus was preferred before him, that at laſt obliged him to raiſe a powerful army againſt his own country.

(7) In Pyrrho, Oper. tom. 1. p. m. 401.

Gortynians (e). His abſence did in a manner ſave the city, becauſe Pyrrhus, thinking he ſhould not meet with much reſiſtance, did not at firſt attack it very briſkly, nor immediately upon his arrival, for fear that if he ſhould take it by ſtorm, his ſoldiers would entirely plunder and deſtroy it; upon which account he contented himſelf with pitching his camp round it. Cleonymus's friends at Lacedæmon did ſo little doubt of his ſucceſs, that they adorned his houſe, expecting that Pyrrhus would ſup there that very night. But they were extremely diſappointed in their hopes, when they ſaw the preparations made for a vigorous defence, the very women exerting themſelves to defend the city [D]. Acrotatus, Areus's ſon, gained a great reputation by his bravery and conduct on this occaſion [E]; and Areus arriving ſoon after from Crete with two thouſand men, Pyrrhus was at laſt obliged to raiſe the ſiege (f). Some time after [F] Areus accompanied with a body of volunteers went to aſſiſt the Athenians, who were warmly beſieged by Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedonia. Patroclus was alſo arrived from Egypt with a fleet to force Antigonus to raiſe the ſiege; but that King had ſo cloſely beſieged the city, and was ſo well fortified, that it was impoſſible for Areus and Patroclus to enter Athens, or to drive the Macedonians away. Patroclus adviſed Areus to engage in battle againſt the enemy, whilſt he ſhould attack them from another quarter; the Lacedæmonians were very ready to fight, not only on account of their ancient friendſhip and alliance with the Athenians, but alſo becauſe they flattered themſelves that they ſhould gain a great reputation and glory by that action, tho' they were to periſh in the attempt. But Areus finding that their ammunition was almoſt ſpent, declin'd the engagement, and return'd home with his troops, juſtly thinking it was more prudent to keep them for the defence of their own country, than to hazard their lives for the relief of their allies, when there was but little hopes of ſucceſs; for he could not much depend upon the troops which Patroclus had brought with him, becauſe they being for the moſt part ſeamen and Egyptians were not very proper for a land-fight (g). Areus having reigned about forty four years (h), was killed in an engagement near Corinth. His ſon Acrotatus ſucceeded him, who having been vanquiſhed in a battle by Ariſtodemus near Megalopolis, died there, leaving his wife pregnant. She was ſoon after delivered of a ſon, who was called Areus, as well as his grandfather, and choſen King under the guardianſhip of Leonidas, the ſon of Cleonymus. This young King dying of ſickneſs when he was but eight years old, Leonidas his guardian ſucceeded him (i). We muſt not omit to obſerve, that according to Joſephus, Areus the elder wrote a letter to Onias the High-Prieſt of the Jews [G].

AUDLEY

(e) Gortyna was an ancient city in the Iſland of Crete, but now entirely ruined.

(f) Plutarch. in Pyrrho, Oper. tom. 1. p. 401--403.

(g) Pauſan. in Lacon. p. m. 169.

(h) Petav. Rat. Temp. tom. 3. p m. 37.

(i) Plutarch. in Agide & Cleom. Oper. tom. 1. p. m. 796, 797.

[D] The very women exerted themſelves in defence of the city.] The Lacedæmonians reſolved at firſt, to ſend all the women into the Iſland of Crete; but they themſelves bravely oppoſed it. Archidamia, the grandmother of the famous King Agis, went into the Senate with a drawn ſword in her hand; and there, in the name of all the women, ſeverely upbraided the Senators with the ill opinion they had of them, becauſe they imagin'd, that they could enjoy any ſatisfaction from life after the overthrow of their country. This courage and bravery of the Ladies, made the Senators alter their intention; they reſolved to ſtand the ſiege; and in the night-time, the matrons and the virgins of the city, together with the old men, went to work, and made a ditch of ſix cubits in breadth, four in depth, and of about 1440 feet in length. The women themſelves made about the third part of that ditch. Whilſt they were thus labouring to put the city in a condition to be defended, they ordered the young men, and all thoſe that were able to bear arms, to go to reſt, that they might be capable to fight the next day. At break of day, they furniſhed the young men with arms, and exhorted them to exert themſelves with reſolution. In the mean time Chelidonis, the wife of Cleonymus, retired to a private place, and put a rope round her neck in order to ſtrangle herſelf in caſe the city was taken, rather than to fall into the hands of her huſband (8).

(8) Plutarch. ib. pag. 401, 402.

[E] Acrotatus acquired a great reputation by his bravery and conduct on this occaſion.] Ptolemy, Pyrrhus's ſon, had found means to approach the city with about two thouſand men, nay even to enter it, according to Juſtin (9); which Acrotatus perceiving, he went directly with three hundred men, who being encouraged by the cries of the old men and of the women, who were ſpectators of the battle, fought with ſo much courage, that they drove the enemy back, Ptolemy having been killed in the fight. Acrotatus, now victorious and triumphant, ſeemed, tho' covered with blood and duſt, more beautiful ſtill to the Lacedæmonians, who extolled Chelidonis's happineſs, for having ſuch a lover. A numerous troop of old men followed him, crying, "Go, Acrotatus, run into the arms of Chelido-"nis; nothing but a brave iſſue can ariſe from thy em-"braces for the ſervice of Sparta." The Greek paſſage in Plutarch is as follows, Ὦχται, Ἀκρότατε, καὶ δίφρε τὴν Χελιδόνιδα; μόνον παῖδας ἀγαθὰς τὰ Σπάρτα ποίει (10). The love of Chelidonis for Acrotatus would afford a man of Mr. Bayle's genius, a variety of entertaining reflections. We ſhall only obſerve two things: 1. It is not only in this Age that cowards are deſpiſed, and brave and valiant men eſteemed by the Ladies; Chelidonis's love for Acrotatus is a very ancient inſtance of that diſpoſition in the fair ſex. 2. Gallantry even in a married woman, however criminal it may be in itſelf, yet it did not appear ſo to the ancient Lacedæmonians, ſince they did not condemn Chelidonis's love for Acrotatus, but even encouraged him to the moſt familiar converſation with his dear miſtreſs, who did not ſeem to be aſhamed of her intrigues with him, imagining perhaps, that the old age and coldneſs of her huſband was a ſufficient excuſe for her conduct. Whether this polite and refined Age affords any women of her taſte and temper, is not proper for us to determine.

(10) Plutarch. ubi ſupra, pag. 402.

[F] Some time after &c.] It appears from Juſtin (11), that Antigonus did not beſiege Athens till after the death of Pyrrhus, that is, according to Archbiſhop Uſher (12), between the years of the Julian Period 4442, and 4450, that is, between the years 272 and 264 before the Chriſtian Æra. Thoſe therefore, who think that the naval victory, which Joſephus ſays (13) Demetrius gained over Antigonus, was won when the latter beſieged Athens, muſt be miſtaken, according to Uſher (14), who perhaps is himſelf miſtaken in taking for granted, what Joſephus relates concerning the ſeventy two Tranſlators of the Bible.

(11) Lib. 26. cap. 1, 2.

(12) Annal. ad Ann. Per. Jul. 4437, p. m. 268.

(13) Antiquit. lib. 12. cap. 2.

(14) Ubi ſupra.

[G] Areus wrote a letter to Onias, the High-Prieſt of the Jews.] Moreri ſays quite the contrary. "Onias, "the High-Prieſt of the Jews, ſays he, wrote a letter "to Areus;" and yet he quotes Joſephus, Ant. Lib. xii (15), where we find that letter, which is as follows. "Areus King of Lacedæmon, to Onias, greet-"ing. We have found by certain Regiſters, that the "Jews and the Lacedæmonians have the ſame origin, "being all deſcended from Abraham. Since there-"fore we are all brethren, and ought to have the ſame "intereſt, it is reaſonable, that you ſhould freely "make us know, what you deſire of us, and that we "ſhould

(15) Cap. 5.

☞AUDLEY (Sir THOMAS), deſcended from an ancient and illuſtrious family [A], applied himſelf to the Law, in which he made a conſiderable progreſs, and was made Serjeant at Law in the twelfth year of King Henry VIII's reign (a). "His reading upon the Statute "of Privileges commended him to the King's ſervice; his ſpeaking for the Prerogative in "Parliament brought him to the King's favour..... His Stewardſhip to the Duchy of "Suffolk raiſed him to the Attorneyſhip of that of Lancaſter (b). . . . In the black Parliament he was a Member by his own intereſt, and Speaker by the King's choice. Sir "Thomas Moor was to ſerve the Crown in the Lord's Houſe, and Sir Thomas Audley "was to ſucceed him in the Houſe of Commons. When the Abbey Lands were beſtowed "upon the King in groſs, and returned by him to the leading Lords and Commons in "retail, moſt of that Parliament looked for ſhares," and Sir Thomas's was none of the leaſt (c). When Sir Thomas Moor reſigned the Seals, May the 16th 1532, the King gave them to Audley, with the title only of Lord Keeper, till he was made Lord Chancellor the 26th of September following, according to Mr. de Rapin (d), who having conſulted Rymer's Fœdera, which he quotes *, is more to be depended upon than the Author of the Lives of the Lords Chancellors, who ſays (e), that the Seals were delivered to Audley the 6th of September in the 24th year of Henry VIII's reign; that is, in 1533, and that the 26th of January following he was made Lord Chancellor of England. David Lloyd muſt alſo be miſtaken, when he ſays (f), that Audley was not made Chancellor till after the death of Sir Thomas Moor. When that great man was called to an account and tried for his life, Sir Thomas Audley was one of thoſe commiſſioned to try him, and pronounced ſentence of death upon him (g). He was actually Speaker of the Houſe of Commons when the Great Seal was firſt delivered into his cuſtody; and while he was in that ſtation in the Seſſion of Parliament held in 1529, the Commons being very intent upon reforming divers abuſes in the Church, the Biſhops were much concerned at their proceedings, and eſpecially Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter, who ſaid in the Houſe of Lords, You ſee what Bills come daily from the Commons, all tending to the deſtruction of the Church. For God's ſake conſider what the Realm of Bohemia was, that the glory of it fell with the Church; the Commons cried nothing now, but down with the Church, and all this ſeemed to come to paſs for want of faith. The Commons were exaſperated at this, and deputed Audley their Speaker, with thirty of their Members, to wait on the King, complaining, "What a diſhonour "it was to his Majeſty, and the whole Kingdom, that they, who were choſen for the wiſeſt "men of all the Counties of England, ſhould be charged with want of faith; and that it "implied as much as if they were Infidels and no Chriſtians; and therefore they entreated "the King by the mouth of the Speaker, to call the Biſhop of Rocheſter to an account, "for what he had ſaid." The Biſhop excuſed himſelf as well as he could, by urging, that he meant that what the Bohemians did was done for want of faith; with which the Commons were not ſatisfied, and perhaps this had an influence afterwards upon that learned Prelate's fate (b). When Audley was made Lord Keeper the King knighted him, and afterwards created him Baron Audley, of Audley in Eſſex (i). "The King, ſays Mr. "Lloyd (k), might very well truſt him (Audley) with his conſcience, when he truſted "the King with his, owning no Doctrine but what was eſtabliſhed, ever judging the "Church and State wiſer than himſelf." He was one of the Lords who conducted Queen Anne Bullen to the Tower, "but he would not condemn her, rather eſcaping than refuſing "unwelcome employments, wherein he muſt either diſpleaſe his Maſter or himſelf. He "was tender but not wilful, waving ſuch ſervices dexterouſly, wherein he muſt oppoſe "his Maſter dangerouſly." Yet he, with Archbiſhop Cranmer, and ſome other Members of the Privy Council, were the firſt who acquainted the King with Queen Catherine Howard's amorous intrigues, tho' they were not ignorant of the danger to which they expoſed themſelves, if the charge had not been proved; but on the other hand it was no leſs dangerous to be ſilent (l). Audley was a ſecret favourer of the Reformation [B], and if "Cromwell

(a) The Lives of the Lords Chancellors, vol. 1. pag. 76.

(b) State Worthies, or the Statesmen and Favourites of England ſince the Reformation during the reigns of Henry VIII, and five of his Succeſſors, by David Lloyd, 2d edit. Lond. 8vo, pag. 72.

(c) Ibid. pag. 73.

(d) Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 5. p. 307.

* Acta Publ. tom. 14. pag. 433, 446.

(e) Ubi ſupra, pag. 75.

(f) State Worthies, pag. 74.

(g) Lives of the Chancell. pag. 76.

(b) Ibid. pag. 75, 76.

(i) Ibid. and pag. 77.

(k) State Worthies, pag. 75.

(l) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 411.

"ſhould do the like with regard to you. Demoteles "will deliver you this letter, which is written on a "ſquare ſheet, and ſealed with a ſeal, on which is en-"graved the figure of an eagle holding a ſnake be-"tween its pounces." How this kindred of the Lacedæmonians and the Jews can be proved, is not eaſy to gueſs. But the learned knew, that Joſephus himſelf is not much to be credited, when he does not follow the Old Teſtament; if he had told us where he found that letter of Areus, we might know, whether it is to be look'd upon as genuine or ſpurious; but it would be very imprudently done, to lay any ſtreſs upon a bare quotation of Joſephus.

P.

[A] Of an ancient and illuſtrious family.] This, I think, we may conclude from Mr. Lloyd's words (1), which are as follow: "Sir Thomas Audley's birth "was generous, his education more: Eſſex bred him "to that honour, which his anceſtors loſt." This ſeems to inſinuate, that he was originally from the county of Eſſex, and that his family had anciently enjoyed the ſame honours, to which Audley arrived. Tho' we ſhould be careful, how we draw inferences from Lloyd's affected ſtyle, which for that very reaſon is ſometimes dark and intricate. However Dr. Fuller in his Worthies expreſly tells us, that he was born in Eſſex.

(1) State Worthies, pag. 72.

[B] He was a ſecret favourer of the Reformation.] This appears by ſeveral facts. Firſt by the petition of the rebels in the North of England (2). One of the pretences of their rebellion was, that the King had renounced the Pope's authority; for they were very zealous for the Roman Catholick Religion. Now amongſt the conditions on which they propoſed to lay down their arms, one was that Cromwell and the Lord Chancellor ſhould be removed from the Council-Table, and not be admitted into the Parliament, that was ſhortly to meet (3). By which it appears that they look'd upon Audley and Cromwell as two perſons, who favoured the Proteſtants. Rapin mentions another fact. He tells us (4), that above five hundred perſons

(2) In 1536.

(3) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Anglet. tom. 5. pag. 369.

(4) Ibid. p. 388.

" Cromwell pulled down Popery with his power, Audley kept it down with his policy, " enjoining the preachers to detect the follies of that way, which is reckoned the wiſdom " of the world. He had a moderate way to ſecure the Privileges of Parliament, by free- " dom from arreſts; and the good-will of the citizens, by an order about debts (m)." He obtained the grant of the Priory of the Trinity, now called Duke's Place, in Aldgate Ward in London, which was the firſt that was diſſolved †. And Lord Herbert tells us in his Hiſtory of the Life and Reign of King Henry VIII *, that when the King ſuppreſſed the Priory of Chriſt-Church in London, he beſtowed the Church-plate and lands on Sir Thomas Audley, newly made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. He founded Magdalen College in Cambridge, and died poſſeſſed of the Great Seal on the 30th of April 1544, and was buried in the Church of Saffron-Walden in Eſſex, leaving a great eſtate to his daughter Margaret, afterwards married to Thomas Duke of Norfolk, from whom is lineally deſcended the preſent Earl of Suffolk (n). He was ſucceeded in the high poſt of Chancellor by Sir Thomas Wriotheſley, a man very zealous for the ancient, that is, for the Popiſh Religion. " Audley died as much in the King's favour as he lived: Patience " can weather out the moſt turbulent age, and a ſolid judgment the moſt intricate times. " The reſerved and quiet man is the moſt ſecure; activity may raiſe a man; warineſs keep " him up. If he had done nothing, he had not been ſeen; if he had done much, he had " not been ſuffered: between the two extremes Audley could do well (o)." We ſhall give hereunder a more particular account of his character [C], and his epitaph [D].

(m) State Worthies, pag. 75.

† See Fuller's Worthies, in Eſſex.

* See the Complete Hiſt. of England, vol. 2. pag. 162. edit. 1706.

(n) Lives of the Chancellors, pag. 77.

(o) State Worthies, pag. 75.

perſons having been impriſoned in the city of London in a few days, on account of Religion, Audley, who was no enemy to the Reformation, obtained their pardon from the King, by repreſenting to him, that againſt his intentions the Commiſſioners had laid ſnares before a great many of theſe perſons, to oblige them to diſcover their opinions, which in obedience to the laws, they were reſolved to keep ſecret. And beſides, ſince in the city of London only, they had found in a little time ſo many hereticks, it was eaſy to gueſs, what a vaſt number there would be found in the other parts of the Kingdom; and how dreadful muſt the conſequences be of ſo ſevere a perſecution, by which an infinite number of perſons of all ages and ſexes, would ſuffer death! Audley repreſented this to the King in the moſt lively and moving manner, ſo that all thoſe, who had been put into priſon, were pardoned. Another inſtance of his ſecret inclination for a Reformation is, in the words of Mr. Lloyd, that " he " at once gratified the preſent humour of the King, " and the conſtant temper of the people, in ſix Bills " againſt the Clergy. 1. Againſt the extortions of " their Courts. 2. The exactions of their corps and " mortuaries. 3. Their worldly occupations, as graz- " ing, tanning, &c. 4. Merchandize. 5. Their " non-reſidencies. 6. The pluralities of the ignorant, " and the mean ſalaries of the learned (5)." A man, who ſo openly declared againſt the Clergy, could not but favour thoſe, who laboured for a Reformation.

(5) State Worthies, pag. 74.

[C] We ſhall give his character hereunder.] " Chan- " cellor Audley, ſays Mr. Rapin (6), was a man of " ſound judgment. He was ſerviceable to the Re- " formers, whenever he could be ſo without any ha- " zard or danger to himſelf. But he was too much a " Courtier, to inſiſt upon what he judged reaſonable, " if the King did not approve it." This agrees well enough with what Lloyd ſays of him. " His ſoul, " ſays he, ennobled his body, and his body graced " his ſoul. The one quick, ſolid, apprehenſive, and " judicious; the other tall and majeſtick. King Henry " loved a man; and here was one, whoſe auſterity " was allayed with Debonairneſs, whoſe gravity was " ſweetened with pleaſantneſs, whoſe knowledge " was as large as his authority, whoſe wit was e- " qual with his wiſdom, whoſe memory was ſtrong, " and judgment ſolid (7). . . . He was always in fa- " vour with the Queens, who had no leſs intereſt in " the King's heart, than the Kingdom had in his " head. The age was uncertain, intereſt not ſo. Sir Tho- " mas was fixed on the one, above the alterations of the " other; underſtanding what was moſt convenient, at " a time, when there was nothing lawful. He was " well ſeen in the flexures and windings of affairs, at " the depth whereof other heads, not ſo ſteady, turn- " ed giddy. He had the arts of a Stateſman, and " the cloſeneſs of a Politician. Reſerved he was, but " no diſſembler. For if a man have that penetration " of judgment, as he can diſcern what things are " to be laid open, and what to be kept ſecret, and " what to be ſhewed with half-ſights, and to whom " and when, (which indeed are arts of ſtate, and arts " of life) to him an habit of diſſimulation is a hin- " derance, and a poorneſs. Audley, as an able man, " was always frank and open, but wary; knowing " how to ſtop and turn, within the compaſs of equity " and honeſty. He underſtood buſineſs well, and men " better, and knew King Henry's temper better than " himſelf, whom he ſurprized always to his own bent, " never moving any of his ſuits to him, but when " in haſte, and moſt commonly amuſing him with " other matter, untill he paſſed his requeſt. His ac- " tions were managed for applauſe, as well as ſervice: " for when made Sergeant, he was the firſt of eleven; " his entertaining day was the laſt of ſix; the King, " who paid for his dinner, was invited to it. He " watched the circumſtances of his actions, that they " might be taking, as well as their iſſue, that they " might be uſeful; and contrived that the beſt of his " publick actions ſhould come off with reputation. " He followed the moſt paſſable rather than the moſt " able men living, in a time, when active men were " more uſeful, than the virtuous (8)." Here follow a few verſes, in which his character ſeems to be pretty well deſcribed.

(6) Ubi ſupra, pag. 405, 406.

(7) State Worthies, p. 72.

(8) Ibid. p. 72, 73, 74.

Treaſure of arms and arts, in whom were ſet
The mace and books, the Court and College met;
Yet both ſo wove that in that mingled throng
They both comply, and neither neither wrong;
But pois'd and temper'd, each reſerv'd its ſeat;
Nor did the learning quench, but guide the heat.
The Courtier was not of the furious ſtrain,
The hand that acts, doth firſt conſult the brain.
Hence grew commerce betwixt advice and might,
The Scholar did direct the Courtier right.
And as our perfumes mixt do all conſpire,
And twiſt their curles above the hallowed fire,
Till in that harmony of ſweets combin'd,
We can nor muſk, nor ſingle amber finde;
But gums meet gums, and their delights ſo crowd
That they create one undiſtinguiſh'd cloud:
So to thy minde theſe rich ingredients preſt,
And were the mould and fabrick of thy breſt.
Learning and courage mixt, and temper'd ſo,
The ſtream could not decay nor overflow.
And in that equal tide thou didſt not bear
From courage raſhneſs; nor from learning, fear (9).

(9) Ibid. pag. 75, 76.

[D] His Epitaph.] It is engraven upon a braſs-plate over his tomb, and ſhews, that the Engliſh Poetry and Verſification at that time had not gained any degree of elegance; and is as follows;

The ſtroke of Deathes inevitable dart. Hath now alas of lyfe beraft the hart of Syr
Thomas Audely of the Garter Knight, late Chauncellour of Englond under our Prince of might. Henry the ight worthy high renown. And made by him Lord Audely of thys town.
the 6 April 1544.

P.

B.

BABELOT, Almoner to the Duke of Mompenſier, during the civil wars of France under Charles IX, diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much by his cruelty, that he has gained a very eminent place in Hiſtory. It will not therefore be accounted ſtrange, that we give an Article of him here. He was a Franciſcan Friar, who had quitted the monaſtery to follow "the army, from the implacable hatred with "which he was animated againſt the Calviniſts (a). His averſion to them made him act "ſo inconſiſtently with his character and profeſſion, that ſo far from ſaving the lives of "thoſe who were reduced by the fortune of arms to the mercy of Mompenſier, he "importuned him ſtrongly to have them put to death, and could not bear that any one "of them ſhould be pardoned [A]. This thirſt after the blood of the Calviniſts, which "could not be abated by the two firſt wars, encreaſed in the third, when the ſoldiers "of the Prince (b) being informed that Babelot had imprudently ſhut himſelf up in "Champigni (c), gave ſuch a vigorous aſſault, that they carried the place (d). The ſa- "tisfaction to find themſelves maſters of the perſon of him, whom they conſidered as "their executioner, induced them to be more favourable to the inhabitants of Champigni. "They pardoned them, and diſcharged all their reſentments upon Babelot. They hang'd "him upon a gibbet of an extraordinary height (e) [B]; and though they gave him "time to prepare himſelf for death, it was only that they might have leiſure to reproach "him for his cruelty. The revenge which the Duke of Mompenſier, who had an af- "fection for him, took upon the Calviniſts on account of his death, whenever chance or "weakneſs put any of them in his power, occaſioned for ſeveral weeks an unfair war (f) "between the two parties. The ſoldiers of Briſſac cut the throats of the garriſon of "Mirebeau, though it had capitulated in form, and Andelot treated that of St. Florent "in the ſame manner." Here is a man deſtin'd to be fatal to the Hugenots, ſince he was the cauſe even after his death that many of them were cut to pieces. Brantôme believed him capable of another ſort of crime, that is, that he inſpired his maſter with the brutal reſolution of cauſing the women to be raviſhed [C].

(a) I only copy Mr. Varillas's Hiſtoire de Charles IX, tom. 2. pag. 147.

(b) He means the Prince of Condé, the Head of the Proteſtants.

(c) A City of Poitou; it belonged to the Duke of Mompenſier.

(d) In 1568.

(e) It is a great chance if his brethren have not ranked him amongſt their Martyrs.

(f) That is, there was no quarter given.

BABYLAS,

[A] He importuned him ſtrongly to put the Calviniſts to death, and could not bear that any one of them ſhould be pardoned.] Brantôme deſerves to be heard on this point. When they brought to him, ſays he (1), ſpeaking of the Duke of Montpenſier, any priſoners, if there was a man amongſt them, he ſaid to him at firſt ſight only this; You are an Hugenot, friend; I recommend you to Monſr. Babelot. This Monſr. Babelot was a Franciſcan, a man of learning, who governed him very eaſily, and never ſtirr'd from him; the priſoner was immediately brought to him, and after Babelot had aſked him a few queſtions, he was preſently condemned to death and executed.

(1) Brant. Memoires, tom. 3. pag. 281.

[B] He was hang'd upon a gibbet of an extraordinary height.] This puts me in mind of Galba's uſage of a man, who endeavoured to evade the puniſhment of death by pleading his right as a Roman Citizen; upon which he ordered him to be fixed to a croſs, which was painted white, and much higher than the reſt. This was doing honour to the quality of the criminal, and furniſhing him with ſome little conſolation; but all this was only mockery. Tutorem, quod pupillum, cui ſubſtitutus hæres erat, veneno necâſſet, cruce affecit, implorantique leges & civem Romanum ſe teſtificanti, quaſi ſolatio & honore aliquo pœnam levaturus, mutari, multoque præter cæteras altiorem & dealbatam ſtatui crucem juſſit (2). I cannot tell what was the motive of thoſe, who choſe a more elevated gibbet for the Monk Babelot; perhaps they deſigned merely to excite the greater attention to the fantaſtic characters of that man, without any alluſion or reference to the cuſtom of antiquity. See Juſtin (3) concerning Maleus, a diſgrac'd General of the Carthaginians, qui filium cum ornatu ſuo in altiſſimam crucem in conſpectu urbis ſuffigi juſſit, that is, "who ordered his ſon to be faſten- "ed to a very high croſs with all his ornaments in "ſight of the whole city;" and Silius Italicus (4) concerning Regulus;

(2) Sueton. in Galbâ, cap. 9.

(3) Juſtin, lib. 18. cap. 7.

(4) Lib. 2. verſ. 343.

——— Vidi cum robore pendens
Italiam cruce ſublimis ſpectaret ab altâ.

Haman, in the Book of Eſther, had prepared for Mordecai a gibbet of fifty cubits high. Sometimes they erected their gibbets of a prodigious height, that the guilty perſon might be expoſed to the ſight of more people. See the Remark [C] of the article OTHO III. I ſhall only obſerve by the way, that thoſe, who compare this croſs of Galba with that, which Verres made uſe of againſt Gavius (5), are guilty of great inaccuracy; for all that there was remarkable in the latter, was that it was fixed, not in the place, where the inhabitants of Meſſina uſed to crucify their criminals, but on that ſide, which look'd towards Italy. It was in this manner that Verres inſulted over the perſon, who pleaded that he was a Roman Citizen: "he "ſhall look, ſays he, upon Italy and his own houſe from "the top of his croſs." Quid attinuit cum Mamertini more atque inſtituto ſuo crucem fixiſſent poſt urbem in viâ Pompejâ, te jubere in eâ parte figere, quæ ad fretum ſpectaret, & hoc addere, quod negare nullo modo potes, quod omnibus audientibus dixiſti palam, te idcirco illum locum deligere, ut ille, qui ſe civem Romanum eſſe diceret, ex cruce Italiam cernere ac domum ſuam proſpicere poſſet. It is this laſt circumſtance which Cicero chiefly urges (6), tho' Lactantius, who had no occaſion to make uſe of that for the deſign of his diſcourſe, only conſiders the indignity of the puniſhment in general (7).

(5) Torrentius has done ſo: ſee his Comment. in Suet. Galb. cap. 9. TORRENTIUS is miſtaken upon a paſſage of Cicero.

(6) Cicero in Verr. 7.

(7) Lactant. Inſtit. Divin. lib. 4. cap. 18.

[C] Brantôme believed him capable . . . of cauſing the women to be raviſhed.] The Duke of Mompenſier uſed to recommend his women priſoners to his Guidon, Viro benè vaſato & benè mutoniato, that is, a man of great proweſs in affairs of love. Brantôme gives a very free deſcription of this affair, and adds what follows: "This was the puniſhment of thoſe poor Hugenot La- "dies, invented by the Duke of Montpenſier, which "makes me think it was perhaps taken from Nice- "phorus (8) by Monſr. Babelot, where he tells us, that "the Emperor Theodoſius removed and aboliſhed a "cuſtom, which had long continued at Rome; and "which was this: If any woman was ſeized in adul- "tery, the Romans puniſhed her, not by reſtraining "of the crime, which ſhe had committed, but by "inflaming ſtill more her laſcivious temper: for "they ſhut her up in a narrow lodge, and then gave "her leave to gratify her wanton humour to the full "with every one that would come, and that was moſt "eminent

(8) He might better have quoted Socrates, lib. 5. cap. 18.

BABYLAS, one of the moſt celebrated Martyrs of the primitive Church, was made Biſhop of Antioch in the third Century under Gordian the Emperor (a). He governed his Church like a good and holy Prelate, and after he had worthily executed his function for about thirteen years, he obtained the crown of martyrdom about the year 251, during the perſecution of Decius. Some Authors tell us, that he was actually put to death for the Chriſtian faith (b); others, that he died in priſon (c). It is generally agreed that he deſired to be buried with his chains (d). It is reported that his relicks ſilenced an Oracle of Apollo. St. Chryſoſtom employed more than once all the force of his eloquence in celebrating the memory of St. Babylas; it is a pity he was not better informed concerning the facts which he advanced. He ſuppoſes, that this Martyr was put to death for having ſtopt a guilty Emperor from entering into the Church [A], and he ſpeaks of the crime of that Emperor as a man who had not at all conſulted Hiſtory [B]. He knew not even what is reported of the deference which that Emperor paid to the ſevere diſcipline of St. Babylas.

(a) Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 29.

(b) Chryſoſtom. tom. 1. pag. 641, 669.

(c) Martyrolog. Romanum, ad diem 24 Januar. Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 39.

(d) Chryſoſtom. tom. 1. p. 669. and Martyrolog. Romanum, ad diem 24 Januar.

" eminent for his debauchery and lewdneſs. Theſe abandoned whoring fellows furniſh'd themſelves with ſeveral little bells, when they went in to the Lady, that at every motion they might make a ringing, and not only give notice to thoſe, who paſſed by and liſten'd, what they were doing there; but likewiſe by this means and by the ſound of theſe bells ſhew that this puniſhment was attended with all the circumſtances of diſgrace and injury. What an infamy was this? and how much the women valued it? Indeed this was a terrible cuſtom, which that wiſe Emperor aboliſhed, as we are told by Nicephorus the Hiſtorian, from whom Mr. Babelot very probably took it, and had it put in practice by this brave Guidon (9)."

(9) Brant. Memoires, tom. 3. pag. 282, 283.

[A] St. Chryſoſtom . . . . ſuppoſed that this martyr was put to death for having ſtopt a guilty Emperor from entering into the Church.] There is no doubt but that Babylas died under the Emperor Decius. It muſt then be Decius, who was prevented from entring into the Church, if the ſtory of St. Chryſoſtom be true; but it does not appear that Decius ever was at Antioch during his whole reign. Baronius affirms without proof that Decius went into Syria in the year 253, to make war againſt the Perſians; and that it was then that Babylas would not ſuffer his Church to be profaned by the preſence of ſuch an Emperor (1). This does not agree either with chronology, or hiſtory, or the prudence of the Biſhop of Antioch. The beſt Chronologers place Decius's death in the year 251 (2). No good Hiſtorian tells us, that Decius was ever in the Eaſt to make war againſt the Perſians. It is true, the Acts of St. Laurence (3) aſſure us, that this Emperor went to make war againſt the Perſians, and that he took from them the country of Babylon, Aſſyria, all Perſia, Hyrcania, and even Bactriana, and that he died at Rome, poſſeſſed by the Devil, a little after the martyrdom of St. Laurence (4); but theſe Acts are without any authority and full of errors (5). Father Noris does not ſtick to ſay, that all this Perſian War is a mere fable (6). With regard to the prudence of St. Babylas we may ſay, that it would never have allowed him to reſiſt a Pagan Emperor. It was inconſiſtent with the conduct of the Church, that St. Babylas ſhould attempt to hinder him from entring, if he had come, tho' a Pagan, to do ſome act of violence there; for the Church had no power, and exerciſed her own authority only upon thoſe, who were her children, and ſhe ſuffered quietly the inſults of her perſecutors. In this manner ſpeaks the Author of the Life of Tertullian and Origen (7). Mr. de Tillemont confirms this remark. The Church upon theſe occaſions defends herſelf, ſays he (8), *only by her prayers, and by an humble and peaceable patience, with which ſhe bears the injuries of her perſecutors. But if we find in an Oration aſcribed to St. Chryſoſtom , that St. Roman of Antioch hindered a Pagan Governor from coming into the Church, this is a very extraordinary piece of conduct, and the fact itſelf is by no means well atteſted. He obſerves likewiſe, that all the expreſſions of St. Chryſoſtome ſhew, that the Emperor, who was oppoſed by St. Babylas, was a Chriſtian. It is not true therefore, that this holy man reſiſted Decius; and yet he died under that Emperor: ſo that we muſt ſay that St. Chryſoſtome was miſtaken, when he tells us, that St. Babylas ſuffered death for having oppoſed an Emperor's entrance into the Church.

(1) Baron. Annal. ad ann. 253. num. 128.

(2) Calviſius, Petavius, Pagi, &c.

(3) See Tillemont, tom. 3. pag. 600.

(4) This Saint did not die till 258. Tillemont, ibid.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Noris, Epocbæ Syro-Maced. pag. 293, quoted by Tillemont, ibid.

(7) Printed at Paris in 1675. See pag. 642.

(8) Tillemont, tom. 3. p. 821.

* Chryſoſt. tom. 1. Oration 48. pag. 547, a; 549, e; 550, e.

[B] . . . . And he ſpeaks of that Emperor like a man, who had not at all conſulted Hiſtory.] He relates, that a certain Nation, which was at war with that Emperor, deſired to put an end to it, and to eſtabliſh peace by the ſtrongeſt and moſt inviolable obligations, which are amongſt men; that this agreement was made and confirmed by an oath on both ſides; that this Nation being deſirous to ſhew their enemies that they acted with ſincerity, perſuaded their King to give his own ſon as an hoſtage to the Prince, with whom they had concluded peace; that the ſequel of this affair proved, that they had put into the lion's mouth him, whom they thought they had intruſted to the protection of a friend, for that Prince, having no regard to the youth of his Ally's ſon, nor to the inviolable ſanctity of the oath, which he had ſworn, nor to the eye of Divine Juſtice, which is always open for the puniſhment of crimes . . . . . with his own hand cut the throat of him, whom he ought to have cheriſhed as a ſacred pledge and inviolable bond of the alliance (9). This according to St. Chryſoſtom is the crime of the Emperor, whom St. Babylas treated in the manner, which we are going to relate. This great Prelate exactly imitated upon that occaſion the zeal of Elias and St. John; for he did not conſider, that he was to oppoſe not only a Prince, an ordinary King, but even one, who was Lord of a great part of the earth, who had a very ſtrong army, and one, whom all things ſeemed to conſpire to render formidable to him. He was not touched by all this external ſplendor . . . . . and even this ſplendor ſerving only to repreſent to him at that moment the Majeſty of the ſupreme King, whoſe Miniſter he was . . . . . he advanced boldly towards THIS CRIMINAL PRINCE in the midſt of his guards, ſtop'd him with his hand againſt his breaſt, repreſented his crime to him, and forbad him in God's name to enter into the aſſembly of the faithful (10). It is not neceſſary to obſerve, that St. Chryſoſtom adds to the ralation of theſe facts the moſt lively and pathetic figures of Rhetoric (11). We may imagine the reſt, when we know (and who does not know it?) that he was a great Preacher, and that he ſpoke to a people full of reverence and zeal for the name of St. Babylas (12). But have not we reaſon to pity him for having employed ſo many ornaments, and ſuch force of imagination and eloquence upon mere falſities? For what can be more chimerical, than the ſtory of the people, who were enemies to the Romans, and yet perſuaded the King to give his ſon as an hoſtage into the hands of the Emperor? If any Nation did this, it was without doubt the Perſians. Now it is very certain, that they did nothing like this while Babylas was Biſhop. I doubt very much that any Roman Emperor ever killed with his own hand a young Prince, who had been given him as an hoſtage after the concluſion of a peace; but it is very falſe, that ſuch a perfidious barbarity was committed under the Emperors, in whoſe reign St. Babylas enjoyed the Biſhoprick of Antioch. I have no manner of doubt but that St. Chryſoſtom was ſincere in this error; for he not only relates theſe falſities in the pulpit, but likewiſe in a Book, which he wrote againſt the Gentiles (13). If he could have promiſed himſelf, that his auditors ſhould have given him quarter upon his amuſing them with a fictitious and pious tradition, he could never expect the ſame favour from the enemies of the Chriſtian name. So that he muſt certainly think, that what he ſaid was true.

(9) See Vie de Tertullien & d'Origene, pag. 632.

(10) Ibid. pag. 636.

(11) Eraſmus adviſed to read this Homily in the Colleges of Louvain, as a model, which ſcholars ought to prefer to Lyſias, Libanius, &c. See the Letter, which he wrote to the Head of a College of Louvain. It is the 24th of the 28th book, pag. 1705.

(12) To the people of Antioch. St. Babylas had been Biſhop of that city.

(13) S. Chryſoſtom. Homil. de S. Babyl. p. 641. vol. 1; item Contra Gentes, & de S. Babyl. p. 647, 655, &c. quoted by the Author of Vie de Tertullien & d'Origine, pag. 632.

Babylas [C]. We may discover the general foundation of some of his mistakes [D]. We shall speak of all this in the remarks, as likewise of the request, which it is pretended Apollo

[C] St. Chrysostom knew nothing of what is related concerning the Deference, which that Emperor paid to the severe discipline of St. Babylas.] St. Chrysostom supposed that St. Babylas had to deal with a Monarch, which punish'd him with death for his pious boldness in refusing him entrance into the church. The falsity of that fact has been already shewn by reason that St. Babylas died under the Emperor Decius, and that Decius met with no resistance at the entrance of the Church of Antioch. We have now another means of proving this to be an error. The Predecessor of Decius was named Philip; it is to him, that it is said St. Babylas refused entrance into his Church, not regarding him as an Emperor, but as a Christian, who was obliged to submit to the laws of penance and the Canons of discipline. Now it is pretended that this Emperor submitted himself and behaved very near in the same manner towards the Bishop of Antioch, as Theodosius did afterwards towards St. Ambrose at Milan. Eusebius tells us, that the Emperor Philip would have assisted at the public prayers on Easter-Eve; but that the Bishop would not suffer him to come into the Church till he had obliged him to confess his sins, and place himself among the penitents; which conditions the Emperor submitted to with all the sincere marks of piety and the fear of God (14). Eusebius relates this only upon hear-say; and mentions neither the place of this great event, nor the Bishop, who did so brave an action. It is very strange, that such facts should be so confusedly known. Besides, we have several very learned men, who maintain, that the Emperor Philip was no Christian. But, however that be, we must not separate the firmness of Babylas, and the submission of Philip, as St. Chrysostom has done; we must either admit or reject them both together. There are some Historians, who speak in a less vague and uncertain manner than Eusebius. The Chronicle of Alexandria mentions, that the Empress was no less condemned to penitence than the Emperor her husband; and it adds, that St. Babylas used this rigour, because Philip had killed the son of the Emperor Gordian (15). We may observe, that Erasmus, deceived by St. Chrysostom, found a great difference with regard to the success between the firmness of St. Babylas, and that of St. Ambrose. Babylæ, says he (16), parum feliciter cessit quod Imperatorem impiâ cæde funestatum templo prohibuit; imò feliciter cessit ipsi, qui præsidis autoritatem suâ morte confirmavit. At Ambrosio cessit felicius, qui summâ constantiâ suam tuens autoritatem, ipsum etiam Cæsarem Christo lucri fecit. That is: "Babylas succeeded very ill, in forbidding an Emperor, "who was defiled with an impious murder, to enter "into the Church; nay rather he succeeded very well, "since he confirmed the authority of a Bishop by "his death. But Ambrose had better success, who "by defending his authority with the greatest constancy, gained even the Emperor himself over to "Christ." We have another passage to the same purpose: Ambrosius Episcopus Mediolanensis ausus est Theodosium Cæsarem, ob crudelem & præcipitatam in Thessalonicenses sententiam à templi limine secludere, postque sævas objurgationes, post indictam satisfactionem, in pœnitentium classem relegare.... Tentavit idem Babylas Antiochenus Episcopus adversus Regem innocentis homicidio pollutum, & interfectus est (17). That is: "St. "Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, had the courage to hinder the Emperor Theodosius from entering into the "Church, because of the cruel and precipitate sentence, which he had passed upon the Thessalonians; "and obliged him, after several severe reproofs, and "commanding him to make satisfaction, to place "himself amongst the penitents..... Babylas Bishop "of Antioch attempted the same against an Empe"peror, who had been polluted with the murder of "an innocent person, and was slain.

(14) Euseb. Hist. Ecclesiast. lib. 6. cap. 34.

(15) Chron. Alexand. pag. 630. quoted by Tillemont, tom. 3. pag. 822.

(16) Erasm. Epist. 3. lib. 28. pag. 1586.

(17) Idem, Epist. 69. lib. 29. pag. 1033.

[D] ....We may discover the general foundation of some of his mistakes.] We have seen above that it is reported, that St. Babylas founded his behaviour to Philip upon that Emperor's bloody disloyalty. The Emperor Gordian, under whom Philip was Prefect of the Pretorium, had committed his son to his care; after Gordian was dead, Philip being ambitious to reign in his room killed the young Prince, who had been entrusted with him. St. Babylas, knowing that he had been defiled with so execrable a murder, refused to admit him into the Church. Decius revenged this affront offered to Philip; for he put Babylas to death on that account. This we find in the Chronicle of Alexandria; and it was Leontius, Bishop of Antioch in the year 348, who reported all this. He did not well understand the conduct of Philip; but he has departed much less from the truth of the story than St. Chrysostom. The Emperor Gordian, under whom Philip was Prefect of the Pretorium, had no children to entrust with any person; for he never had any at all. So that it was not with a design to succeed this Emperor, who was then dead, that Philip killed his son; and therefore Leontius has been extremely mistaken in his account. Philip taking advantage of the youth of the Emperor Gordian, caballed in such a manner, that he procured himself to be declared his collegue and tutor. The factions were begun again; that of Gordian was obliged to give way; Philip had him deposed and afterwards killed (18). This is the true state of the fact. Different representations of this fact took place and encreased in process of time. Leontius said, that Philip killed his Emperor's son, the same son, whom that Emperor had entrusted to his care. This now is one alteration; but it has some resemblance to the truth. St. Chrysostom assures us, that Philip killed the son of a Prince, with whom he had concluded a treaty of peace, the same son, whom that Prince had left with him as a pledge of his friendship, and of his sincere desire to live in terms of good understanding with him; this is a second alteration; this is to approach too near to the erroneous account of Leontius. This last Author asserts that Decius put Babylas to death to punish him for his insolence towards Philip. Those, who have known the aversion of Decius to Philip, an aversion, which is supposed to have been the cause of Decius's persecuting the Christians, have considered what Leontius says as very absurd. They have corrected him therefore, by supposing that Philip himself put St. Babylas to death (19); they have corrected one error by another, and so unluckily deceived St. Chrysostom. They have made him lose his reflections, which he had graced with all the ornaments of his eloquence, in order to repel the insults of the Pagans, and to give an advantage to the Gospel Ministry. The humiliation of an Emperor at the word of a Bishop would have suggested a great many fine thoughts to St. Chrysostom; it is a pity, that he knew nothing of it. Let us see a little in what manner he improves upon the resistance of St. Babylas; "Whereas, says he (20), the "Priests of the false Gods are more the slaves of the "Emperors than of their Gods, and shew themselves "constant in their worship only out of fear of those "Princes, to whom the Demons are thus obliged for the "worship and reverence paid them by men; this great "Bishop of Antioch shewed, by punishing the Emperor "himself with a chastisement very sensible to a rea"sonable mind, and as far as he was permitted to "do it according to the measure of the power of the "Church, that the Priests of the Religion of Jesus "Christ are not slaves to any person whatever upon "earth, and that they ought to be so jealous of that "holy elevation, which God has given them by lot, as "the true character of their dignity, that they ought "rather to be disposed to give up their lives in a "pious manner, than to lose this privilege. This "same example, continues he, by confounding the "pride of the Pagans, encreased the piety of the "faithful, who learned from the behaviour of their "Pastor to fear God more than all mankind; and "entirely stop'd the mouths of those, who durst "maintain with an excessive impudence, that there "was no courage amongst the Christians, but that "every thing was false and spurious among them, be"ing only covered with a specious appearance."

(18) Capitol. in Vita Gordiani.

(19) See Tillemont, tom. 3. pag. 822.

(20) Contra Gentil. de S. Babyl. Oper. tom. 1. pag. 664, 665, quoted in Vie de Tertullien & d'Origene, pag. 639.

Apollo made to Julian the Emperor with regard to the relicks of St. Babylas [E]. There are aſcribed to this Martyr three eminent triumphs over the Pagan Emperors, two during his life, and one after his death (e). The firſt is the advantage, which he gained over Philip by obliging him to continue without the Church in the condition of a Penitent; the ſecond is that, which he had over the perſecutor Decius, when he choſe rather to prepare himſelf to ſuffer every thing for the faith, than to do any thing, which was unworthy of a good Prelate. The third is that, which his aſhes obtained over the Oracle of Apollo near Antioch (f). Mr. Chevreau has ſpoken with very little exactneſs of the Martyrdom of St. Babylas [F]. This is what I ſhall examine more fully below.

(e) Vie de Tertullien & d'Origene, pag. 757.

(f) See the Remark [E].

BABYLON.

[E] It is pretended that Apollo made a requeſt to Julian the Emperor with regard to the relicks of St. Babylas.] There was near Antioch a Temple and Oracle of Apollo in a place called Daphne. Superſtition and debauchery endeavoured as it were to exceed each other in diſtinguiſhing that place; it was the reſort of lovers and their miſtreſſes. Others went thither to perform their devotions; and it is probable a great many went with both views at the ſame time. Gallus brother to Julian the Apoſtate, was no ſooner declared Cæſar, but in order to put an end to this double diſorder, he built a Church in that place, and commanded the Sepulchre of Babylas to be removed thither. It is ſaid, that when this was done, Apollo gave no more anſwers. The tomb of that Martyr was the cauſe of this, and not the interruption of the ſacrifices; for the ſacrifices having been reſtored under the Emperor Julian, the Oracle ſtill continued ſilent; and when Julian conſulted it in perſon, he underſtood, that the dead bodies, which that place was full of, had rendered the Oracle dumb. The Emperor applied this only to the tomb of St. Babylas; and for that reaſon he ordered it to be removed. The Chriſtians of Antioch carried away this into the City. It was a proceſſion of perſons of both ſexes and of every age, who ſung all the way (21) a ſong of triumph; for the burthen related to the confuſion of thoſe, who worſhip Idols, and was taken out of the 97th Pſalm. Ἐξῆρχεν δὲ τῶν ψαλμῶν τοῖς ἄλλοις, οἱ τέκνες ἀκριβοῦσιν, καὶ ἐνισχύει τὸ πλῆθος ἐν συμφωνίᾳ καὶ ταύτην τὴν φωνὴν ἐπῆσαν· ἠχύθησαν πάλιν οἱ προσκυνοῦντες τοῖς γλυπτοῖς οἱ ἰσχυχώμενοι τοῖς εἰδώλοις (22). By the argument à majori ad minus, we might conclude from this Hiſtory, that the Birth of Jeſus Chriſt put the Heathen Oracles to ſilence, if we did not find otherwiſe from the confeſſion of Sozomen, that this Oracle of Apollo gave anſwers till the reign of Conſtantius, under whom Gallus had the dignity of Cæſar. The objection appears ſtronger againſt thoſe, who acknowledge no diabolical operation in the Pagan Oracles. But let us ſee what Mr. Van Dale anſwers to this. He ſuppoſes that the Prieſts of Apollo, not being willing to be obſerved ſo nearly by the Chriſtians, who came in vaſt numbers to viſit the tomb of Babylas, invented an anſwer, which might oblige the Emperor to remove that Martyr's tomb from that place. Theſe Prieſts were fearful of nothing ſo much as of the eyes of unbelievers, and had no hopes of being able to conceal their artful practices from perſons ſo very curious to detect them as the Chriſtians were. Perhaps too the blind ſuperſtition of theſe Prieſts perſuaded them that they ſhould do a great act of Religion, if they ſhould procure the tomb of a Chriſtian Martyr, reverenced by the enemies of their Gods, to be removed from the neighbourhood of their temple. Chriſtiani, quibus repleta erat Antiochia, aliique ejuſdem religionis aliunde advenientes, viſitabant quotidie ſepulchra martyrum, atque inprimis quidem Babylæ. Sub quo prætextu dum loca illa ita frequentarent, cum ſubreperent etiam huic Oraculo, oculiſque emiſſitiis omnia perluſtrarent, ut ſic detegerent impoſturas ac præſtigias ibi exercitas, neque id ferrent ea tempora, ut vi expellere eos inde poſſent Antiſtites; illi ſub prætextu à mortuis purgandi locum Diis ſacratum, cum Babila aliiſque, Chriſtianos inde removere nitebantur. Nihil enim magis aut citius detegere valebat Antiſtitum ejuſmodi impoſturas, quam continuus concurſus publicæque panegyres, ob ludos aut feſta publica ibi celebranda, ſi quarumcunque ſectarum Philoſophi, eorumve ſequacibus ad illa pateret acceſſus (23).

(21) It was about 40 ſtadia, that is 5000 paces.

(22) Sozomeni, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 5. cap. 20.

(23) Van Dale de Oracul. p. 442. See Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for March 1684, p. 15, 16.

[F] Mr. Chevreau has ſpoken with very little exactneſs of the martyrdom of St. Babylas.] This is what he ſays: "Babylas, Biſhop of Antioch, ſuffered "martyrdom with his three children, on account of "his not permitting Numerianus to ſee the ceremonies of the Chriſtians, adding, That a man defiled "with blood and the ſacrifice of idols could not enter into "the church; or, as Suidas tells us, That he would not "ſuffer a wolf to enter into the ſheepfold of the Lord "(24)." I. Babylas had no children; he ſhould have ſaid, that he had three brothers, who were then but children, or very young, who ſuffered martyrdom with him (25). II. There was above thirty years between the death of Babylas and the reign of Numerianus. III. The antient Authors do not attribute to the martyr the expreſſions, which Mr. Chevreau relates. We muſt confeſs that an Univerſal Hiſtory is a very arduous undertaking. Mr. Chevreau was a very ingenious man; he knew the defects of thoſe who went before him in that deſign; he has employed a long time in his work; and yet..... As he is a Gentleman ſtill living (26), and notwithſtanding his age, enjoys a perfect vigour of body and mind, I do not doubt but he will publiſh a new edition, which will be ſtill more beautiful than the former (27).

(24) Chevreau, Hiſt. du Monde, lib. 4. ch. 4. pag. 400. tom. 2. Holland edit.

(25) Vie de Tertullien & d'Origene, pag. 758.

(26) I write this in 1694.

(27) He has publiſhed an edition at the Hague in 1698, with ſeveral additions and corrections; but he has not at all altered the paſſage relating to Babylas.

I was in hopes that Mr. Chevreau would not take amiſs the ſhort critical notes, which I have given above; and as I had all the value for him which was due to his great merit, I ſhould have ſuppreſſed them, if I could have foreſeen that they would have diſpleaſed him; but I thought him ſuperior to any concern for ſuch a trifle. I imagined that he would have applied to himſelf what I had ſaid in my firſt preface; and he was unqueſtionably one of thoſe Authors, who had no reaſon to fear a ſmall loſs (28). So that I was ſurprized at his unexpected ſenſibility upon this occaſion, and extremely ſorry that he was angry. There are ſeveral illuſtrious perſons, who can teſtify, that in wiſhing him a longer life, than his proved to be (29), I grounded my wiſh not only upon his being an ornament of the age, but likewiſe upon my deſire, that he might read in this ſecond edition the proof of my regard for him, and the explanation of a thing, which had been expreſſed in an ambiguous manner. I preſume that this equivocal expreſſion was the chief occaſion of his diſpleaſure. He thought that the line which was pointed, and yet.... had a great deal of latent poiſon in it. It was a void, which his imagination filled up with very diſobliging ideas; and I was willing that he ſhould know, that according to my real ſentiments, this chaſm was only to ſuggeſt a general repreſentation of the impoſſibility of avoiding errors, how able ſoever the Author be, who undertakes a work, which contains a variety of particulars.

(28) See the Plan of this Dictionary towards the end of the ſixth paragraph.

(29) He died the 15th of February 1701, aged 87 years and ſome months. See the Journal de Trevoux, for March and April 1701, pag. 241. Dutch edition.

But to come to the point: Mr. Chevreau acknowledges himſelf the juſtice of my firſt remark; ſince he owns (30) that it would have been more right to have put THREE BROTHERS WHO WERE AS YET CHILDREN, in order to avoid all ambiguity, and that he ſhould have explained himſelf more clearly, than many Authors, who wrote upon the ſame ſubject before him. With regard to the expreſſions, which I ſaid the antient Authors have not aſcribed to St. Babylas, Mr. Chevreau quotes Georgius Syncellus, and Paulus Diaconus (31); but can we call theſe Authors antient, with reſpect to the age of the martyr whom we are ſpeaking of? Did not they live about the end of the eighth Century? In ſhort, he quotes ſeveral Writers, for the moſt part moderns, who have aſſerted, that St. Babylas was put to death by Numerianus; and he gives us (32) theſe words of Mr. de Tillemont; It muſt be confeſſed that the Hiſtory of St. Babylas is embarraſſed with ſeveral difficulties, which are unſurmountable by our weakneſs. I agree that all this may ſerve for an excuſe to thoſe, who ſpeak with very little exactneſs of the martyrdom of St. Babylas; but it will ſtill be allowed me to remark, that they did not take proper care to chooſe what was the leaſt erroneous and unexact upon that point.

(30) Chevræana, Part 2. Dutch edition.

(31) Ibid. pag. 321.

(32) Ibid. pag. 329, 330.

I am

BABYLON. Moreri and his continuators have collected ſo many particulars relating to this City, that if I were to give this Article a reaſonable length, I ſhould be obliged to repeat the greateſt part of their collections. So that, to ſave the public the tedioufneſs of meeting with the ſame things in different Dictionaries, I ſhall inſiſt only upon a fact, which they have not touch'd upon. I ſhall not examine whether what they have related is done with all the exactneſs neceſſary. The inhabitants of Babylon pretended that this City was very ancient; they reckon 473 thouſand years from the firſt obſervations of their Aſtrologers till the coming of Alexander. This we are told by Diodorus Siculus (a). Others, confining themſelves to a round number, inform us, that the Babylonians boaſted of having kept in their Archives obſervations made by their Aſtrologers upon nativities for 470 thouſand years [A]. We muſt correct by this a paſſage in Pliny [B], which ſome authors have made uſe of improperly, either to refute the antiquity of Babylon, or for other purpoſes. A learned Profeſſor of Leyden has obſerved this lately (b), and it is ſtrange, that it was (a) Lib. 11. pag. 118. edit. Rhodomanni.

(b) Mr. Perizonius. See remark [B], quotation (8) and (9).

I am very well perſuaded, that Mr. Chevreau has found ſeveral faults in my work. It is poſſible to diſcover a great many without having a fourth part of the abilities of ſo great a man as he was. If he had given inſtances of what he has ſaid in general concerning thoſe eſſential faults againſt our language, and thoſe low, burleſque, obſcure, and embarraſſed expreſſions (33), I ſhould have thought my ſelf obliged either to have debated about them, or to have condemned them; and I ſhould have ſubmitted to the latter without any reluctance, as ſoon as ever I ſaw that it was reaſonable: but ſince nothing has been particularly mentioned, I preſume it will not be thought unreaſonable, that I ſhould conſider that part of his book (34) as general and uncertain reproaches. He has objected in particular to me a kind of contradiction, with relation to a perſon, who, he ſays, had been a long while my idol (35). I am certain he would have omitted that, if he had ſeen how I have vindicated my ſelf in that point in my Reflections upon a Pamphlet called the Judgment of the Public, &c. And with regard to the words, which he aſſerts that nice ears cannot bear (36), the reader may ſee what I have to anſwer to that objection in an explication at the end of this work. I wiſh that I deſerved all that he has obſerved in his retorſion of the period, which ends with And yet . . . . (37); and I ſhould think my ſelf very happy, if the world would excuſe me upon this account, that it is abſolutely impoſſible, or almoſt ſo, not to commit a great many errors in ſuch a work as this. I think that I ſhould never have attempted this Dictionary, if I had foreſeen, that all my care to avoid miſtakes, would not have prevented me from falling into very frequent and groſs errors. To conclude, it is proper to deſire my readers to conſult the learned work publiſhed by Monſr. de Larroque (38) at Leyden in 1688, under the title of Matthæi Larroquani Adverſariorum Sacrorum Libri tres. See pag. 79 and the following.

(33) Ibid. pag. 320.

(34) Compare this with the end of the remark [C] of the article REGIUS.

(35) Chevræana, Part 2. p. 320.

(36) Ibid.

(37) Ibid. pag. 330, 331.

(38) Daniel Larroquanus, Matthæi Filius.

[A] The Babylonians boaſted of having kept the obſervations made by their Aſtrologers . . . . for four hundred and ſeventy thouſand years.] I ſhall quote only two paſſages of Cicero. Contemnamus etiam Babylonios, & eos, qui è Caucaſo cæli ſigna ſervantes, numeris & motibus ſtellarum curſus perſequuntur. Condemnemus, inquam, hos aut ſtultitiæ aut vanitatis, aut imprudentiæ, qui CCCCLXX millia annorum, ut ipſi dicunt, monumentis comprehenſa continent (1). Let us ſee how he ridicules them in another place. Quod ajunt 470 millia annorum in periclitandis experiundiſque pueris quicunque eſſent nati, Babylonios poſuiſſe, fallunt. Si enim eſſet factitatum, non eſſet deſitum. Neminem autem habemus autorem, qui id aut fieri dicat, aut factum ſciat (2). That is: "They ſay, that the Babylonians "have calculated the nativities of all the children who "were born for 470,000 years; but they deceive "us. For if this had been done, it would not ceaſe to be "done now. But we have no Author, who aſſerts "that it is done, or knows that it ever was done."

(1) Cicero, de Divin. lib. 1. cap. 19.

(2) Ibid. lib. 2. cap. 46.

[B] We muſt correct, on occaſion of the aſtronomical obſervations of the Babylonians, a paſſage in Pliny.] His words are theſe: Epigenes apud Babylonios 720 annorum obſervationes ſyderum coctilibus lateritiis inſcriptis docet, gravis auctor imprimis; qui minimum Beroſus & Critodemus 480 annorum. Ex quo apparet æternus literarum uſus (3). He had juſt before ſaid, that he believed that the Aſſyrian Letters had always exiſted, or that the Aſſyrians had always the uſe of writing; Literas ſemper arbitror Aſſyrias fuiſſe (4). So that he muſt take for the proof of his opinion the teſtimonies of Epigenes and Beroſus relating to the Aſtronomical Obſervations, which the Babylonians had cauſed to be engraved; for the concluſion, which he infers from theſe teſtimonies is the ſame with the opinion, which he had repreſented a little before; ex quo apparet, ſays he, æternus literarum uſus; that is, "from hence it appears, that the uſe of letters was "eternal." Now there is nothing more abſurd than his manner of reaſoning, if we ſuppoſe, that he wrote as it is repreſented in the manuſcripts and editions of his book. Epigenes, a grave Author, aſſures us, that the obſervations of the Babylonian Aſtrologers contain 720 years. Thoſe, who give them the ſhorteſt extent, as Beroſus and Critodemus, aſſign to them 480 years. And therefore the uſe of Letters is eternal, and I think upon good grounds that it always exiſted amongſt the Aſſyrians. In this manner Pliny reaſons, as his Natural Hiſtory ſtands now; in this manner, I ſay, he reaſons, after he had obſerved, that Cadmus brought the uſe of Letters into Europe, and that it was ſaid, that the invention of them in Egypt was prior to the reign of Phoroneus. Could any man in his ſenſes, a drunkard, or a dotard, have been guilty of a more extravagant rhapſody? We muſt therefore neceſſarily ſuppoſe, that this paſſage is not in its proper ſtate; and it is very ſurprizing, that ſo many learned Critics ſhould have examined theſe expreſſions, and yet not have perceived the falſe and impertinent reaſoning, which might render them ſuſpected. The Scaligers, the Voſſius's, the Marſhams, the Dodwells, have ſo little miſtruſted this paſſage, that they have taken it as a foundation of the concluſions, which they would form concerning the age of Beroſus (5), or againſt the antiquity of Babylon (6), or for other purpoſes (7). Father Hardouin has corrected part of this paſſage; but this was not chiefly with a deſign to adjuſt Pliny's reaſoning; for if that had been his principal motive, he would have corrected the whole. But Mr. Perizonius (8) is the Gentleman, who has fully diſcovered the cauſes of this error, and the proofs of the corruption of the text (9). He has ſhewed that we muſt add the number of a thouſand both to the account of Epigenes, and that of Beroſus; and thus Pliny will be found to ſay, that according to the teſtimony of Epigenes, the obſervations of the Aſtrologers of Babylon contained 720 thouſand years; and according to the teſtimony of thoſe, who like Beroſus and Critodemus give them the leaſt extent, 480 thouſand years. Pliny was right, if we ſuppoſe as he does that theſe Writers are credible witneſſes, in concluding that we cannot aſſign any time, when the Aſſyrian Letters were firſt invented. Now when a thing is ſo ancient that we cannot fix the beginning of it, we make no ſcruple in writing after Pliny's manner, of calling it eternal. But would any perſon venture to call it ſo, when the proofs from antiquity, which are given, leave it of a later date than a thing whoſe beginning is known? This would be exactly the caſe of Pliny, if he had ſaid what we find at preſent in his writings. Conſider well what he ſaid with relation to Cadmus and Phoroneus.

(3) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 56.

(4) Mr. Perizonius thinks that we ought to read Aſſyriis. See his Diſſertatio Philologica de Originibus Babylonicis: they are Theſes maintained in April 1694.

(5) Scaliger ad Græca Euſebii, pag. 407. Voſſius de Hiſtoricis Græcis, apud Perizonium in Origin. Babylon. (6) Marſhamus, Secul. 17. pag. 474. edit. Anglic. apud eundem. (7) See Dodwell, Obſervat. Cyprian. in Append. pag. 36, 37. (8) Formerly Profeſſor at Franeker; but now Profeſſor of Greek, Hiſtory, and Eloquence at Leyden ſince the laſt year 1693. (9) See his Diſſertatio 1 de Originibus Babylonicis.

I shall explain Father Hardouin's correction ſeparately. He reſtores the text of Pliny thus. E diverſo Epigenes apud Babylonios CCCCLXX annorum M. Obſervationes ſiderum coctilibus laterculis inſcriptas docet . . . . qui minimum, Beroſus & Critodemus CCCCXC annorum was so long before it was taken notice of. Aristotle knew without doubt that the Babylonians boasted of having a series of Astronomical Observations for a prodigious number of ages. Being desirous to inform himself of it by means of Callisthenes, who was in the retinue of Alexander, he found there was a great error in the account; for it is said that Callisthenes acquainted him, that he had seen at Babylon Astronomical Observations but for 1903 years only. Simplicius relates this, and borrowed it from Porphyrius (c). If Callisthenes calculated right, it must be owned that after the flood men made prodigious haste to become Astrologers; for, according to the Hebrew Bible, we find but two thousand years from the Deluge to the death of Alexander. There is some reason to doubt what is related by Simplicius; and it is remarkable that all the ancient authors, who have ascribed to Semiramis the founding of Babylon, had no other authority for it than that of Ctesias, whose Histories were full of Fables (d). Besides we find that Berosus blames the Greek Writers extremely, for having reported that Semiramis built Babylon, and adorned it with admirable buildings (e). The Supplement to Moreri quotes Quintus Curtius concerning the lasciviousness of the women of Babylon. We may add to this account, that this disorder was very ancient. The letter of Jeremiah, inserted in the book of Baruch, touches a little upon this, but in an obscure manner, and which wants a Commentary taken from Herodotus [C].

(c) In Lib. 2. DE CŒLO, Com. xlvi. pag. 123.

(d) Marshamus, in Chronic. pag. 507. edit. ann. 1676, in 4to.

(e) Berosus, Chaldaicorum, lib. 3. apud Josephum, lib. 1. contra Apion. pag. 1045.

BACHOVIUS

annorum. On the one side he puts 470 thousand, instead of 720, and on the other he puts 490 instead of 480. He depends upon the authority of manuscripts, with regard to the latter correction, and upon that of Cicero, with respect to the former (10). It is true he observes by the way, that the passage of Pliny itself seems to require the former correction. Certe annorum millia locus iste postulare videtur, non annos (11). This is a sign that he was sensible of the false reasoning, which the common reading makes Pliny guilty of. But if we add a thousand to the 480 in the common reading, we fall into another difficulty. It is affirmed, that Berosus allows 480 thousand years to the Observations of the Babylonian Astrologers; and yet we find that he spoke but of 150 thousand years, when he mentioned the care, with which the Babylonians preserved the memory of a great many things in nature and history. Βηρωσσὸς ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ τῶν Βαβυλωνιακῶν φησὶ γενέσθαι αὐτὸν κατ' Ἀλέξανδρον τὸν Φιλίππου τὴν ἡλικίαν, ἀναγραφὰς δὲ πολλῶν ἐν Βαβυλῶνι φυλάσσεσθαι μετὰ πολλῆς ἐπιμελείας ἀπὸ ἐτῶν πλειόνων μυριάδων ἱ περιέχουσας χρόνον, περιέχειν δὲ τὰς ἀναγραφὰς ἱστορίας περὶ τῆς ὑφανοῦ, καὶ θαλάσσης, καὶ πρωτογονίας, καὶ βασιλέων, καὶ τῶν κατ' αὐτὰς πράξεων (12). That is: "Berosus in his first book of the Babylonics tells us, that "he was born in the time of Alexander the son of "Philip; and that a great many writings are pre"served at Babylon with great care, which include "a series of time for above fifteen myriads of years; "and that these writings contain histories relating to "the heavens, the sea, the origin of things, and of "Kings and their actions." It must be owned, that this passage equally proves these two things; first, that we must remove from the text of Pliny the number 480 or 490; and then, that we are not to substitute in the room of it 480 thousand but rather 150 thousand. Not but that we may still dispute about it; and conjecture, that Berosus, when he was better informed about this point, found it to be 480 thousand years, which calculation he published in a work, which Pliny took his account from. It may be objected likewise, that the numbers might be falsified in the passage quoted by Eusebius. However that be, I had rather retain Father Hardouin's correction, and add to it with respect to Berosus and Critodemus the alteration of 490 to 150 thousand.

(10) That is, upon the two passages of his book, de Divinatione, quoted above num. (1) and (2).

(11) Harduin. in Plinium, tom. 2. pag. 134. num. 157.

(12) Berosus, apud Alexandrum Polyhistorem, quoted by Eusebius in his Chronicon, pag. 5 and 6. edit. Scaliger. an. 1658.

I shall observe by the bye, that Vossius has not reported as he ought what concerns Berosus in the passage of Pliny, which has been the subject of this remark. He pretends, that Pliny says, that Berosus wrote an History of what passed for the course of 480 years. I shall give the words of Vossius. Plinius, Lib. VI. Hist. Nat. Cap. LV. (he should have said Lib. VII. Cap. LVI.) refert Berosum tradere memoriam quadringentorum annorum & octoginta (13). Compare this with the passage of Pliny, and you will find it to be a very great error. Whom can we possibly depend upon?

(13) Vossius, de Histor. Græc. pag. 86.

[C] The Letter of Jeremiah . . . . . relating to the lasciviousness of the women of Babylon, wants a Commentary taken from Herodotus.] The text of Jeremiah is as follows: The women also with cords about them sit in the ways . . . . . and if any of them drawn by some that passeth by, lie with him, she reproacheth her fellow, that she was not thought as worthy as herself, nor her cord broken (14). To understand this thoroughly, we must have recourse to Herodotus, who tells us that there was a law at Babylon, which obliged all the women of the country to go and sit down near the temple of Venus, in order to wait an opportunity of lying with a stranger (15). It was necessary for them once in their life to pass thro' this. The richer part of them kept themselves in their coaches, and carried a great many servants with them; the rest had only an inclosure of cords, that is, they formed themselves into certain ranks, which were divided from each other by cords (16); but in such a manner, that they had a liberty to go in and out, that the strangers might walk freely between them, and choose such an one, as was most agreeable to them. When they had chosen, they threw money into her lap, and carried her aside to enjoy her. They put up a prayer for her to the Goddess of the Temple (17). It was not permitted to these women to refuse any stranger, nor reject the money offered her, how small soever the sum was. They were obliged to the first stranger, who threw the money to them. We may observe that this money was designed for religious uses. Γίνεται γὰρ ἱερὸν τοῦτο τὸ ἀργύριον (18). After the consummation of the Act, they might return to their lodging; the devotion, or expiation, which the Goddess required, was finished. Those, who were beautiful and handsome, were soon dispatched, and relieved from the watch; but the ugly waited a long while for the propitious hour to satisfy the law. There were some so unhappy, that three or four years waiting would not finish their novitiate. Καὶ γὰρ τριέτεα καὶ τετραέτεα μετεξέτεραι χρόνον μένουσι (19). Thus all the obscurity of Jeremiah's expressions is now entirely removed. Every one of these women sat in a little cell surrounded with cords, and did not go out but by breaking the cord; after which she insulted those, who were still in the inclosure. We may apply to those, who went out late, these verses:

(14) Book of Baruch, in the Apocrypha, ch. 6. ver. 42 and 43.

(15) Herod. lib. 1. cap. 199.

(16) I have added something to the exact Letter of the Author, in order to explain by a paraphrase what Herodotus has not represented particularly enough.

(17) It was Venus; the Babylonians called her Mylitta. Herodot. lib. 1. cap. 199.

(18) Ibid.

(19) Herod. lib. 1. cap. 199.

Tam gratum mihi quam ferunt puellæ
Pernici aureolum fuisse malum,
Quod zonam solvit diu ligatam (20).

(20) Catulli, Epigram 2.

——— —— "As pleasing
"As the bright golden apple was of old
"To Atalanta, which unloos'd her zone
"Long bound."

Who can sufficiently lament the monstrous alliance, which was formed amongst the Heathens between the worship of the Gods, and the most shameful passions? This is what might be justly called Easy Devotion, if the Comedy had contained more Acts and Scenes, and if there had not been a disagreeable circumstance for the ugly: for this patience of three or four years at once was too harsh a penance. Martin del Rio retracted what he had said upon the words, which I have quoted from the Book of Baruch. He imagined before, BACHOVIUS (REINIER) was born at Cologne in the year 1544. His Life is publiſhed amongſt thoſe of the Civilians of Germany in Melchior Adam. I ſhall not repeat what Moreri has extracted from thence, but only give an account of the perſecutions which Bachovius ſuffered at Leipſic, becauſe of his being a Calviniſt. At firſt there were nothing but ſuſpicions againſt him, and they were ſatisfied with removing him from his public employments; but the times changing, he obtained the office of Senator, and afterwards in the year 1585 that of Echevin, and about three years after that of Conſul. The Elector Chriſtian I dying in 1591, Bachovius was importuned to profeſs Lutheraniſm, which he refuſing to do, they obliged him to quit his poſts. He had no regard to the advice which was given him to retire, though they repreſented to him the danger of a priſon; he thought that this flight would give occaſion to his enemies to tell the world, that he was not conſcious of his innocence; but in the year 1593 he was forced to give way to the popular commotions, and to depart from Leipſic. He went firſt to Serveſte (a), and the year following to the Palatinate, not without the loſs of almoſt all his effects. He found a kind protector in the Elector Palatine, and he executed ſeveral Offices of profit and honour at Heidelberg till his death, which happened the 27th of February 1614 (a). He publiſhed a book, which ſhews more of the Divine than the Lawyer [A]. He left among other children REINIER or REINHARD BACHOVIUS, whom he ſaw raiſed from the Profeſſorſhip of Politics to that of Civil Law in the Univerſity of Heidelberg. This ſon had a conſiderable character among the Civilians of the ſeventeenth Century [B]. He was in a very eminent manner maſter of the art of confuting with great ſubtilty whatever he engaged to attack (b): he was uncertain with reſpect to religion; for he ſaid in confidence to a Lutheran Profeſſor (c), that if they would permit him to read private Lectures in Civil Law at Straſbourg, he would quit his Profeſſorſhip at Heidelberg, and go to Straſbourg. He declared that he abhorred the doctrine of abſolute Predeſtination, and that he believed the corporal preſence of Jeſus Chriſt in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, though he did not underſtand the manner of it. The perſon to whom he diſcovered his mind in theſe points, communicated it to the Magiſtrates of Straſbourg, who deſired him to acquaint Bachovius that he ſhould be welcome there. Upon this he removed thither with his Library, but not finding any method to ſupport himſelf there (d) he returned to Heidelberg, where the friend, whom he had confided in, found him chagrin'd and ſick in the year 1629 (e).

(a) Taken from Melchior Adam. in Vitis Jurisconſultorum.

(b) See the remark [B].

(c) His name was Tabor, and he was eſteemed a great Civilian.

(d) Vtæ præſidiis deſtitutus religionem omiſit. Praſchius in Mauſoleo Taberi.

(e) Idem, ibid.

that they meant certain ligatures, which were practiſed to make a perſon loved. See his Magical Diſquiſitions (21).

(24) Lib. 3. Part 1. Quæſt. 3. pag. 13.

(a) Zerbſt, the German name of this city, is likewiſe the French name, both in the Index Thuani, and in Baudrand, in the word Zerveſta. [CRIT. REM.]

[A] He publiſhed a Book, which ſhewed more of the Divine, than of the Lawyer.] It was a kind of Commentary upon the famous Catechiſm of the Palatinate. Melchior Adam tells us this: Propagandæ Veritatis Evangelicæ ſtudio edidit Catecheſin Palatinatus, teſtimoniis ſacræ Scripturæ ac ſententiis Patrum, qui primis quingentis à Chriſto nato annis in Eccleſiâ Dei claruerunt, exornatam & illuſtratam, cum Epitome vitæ eorundem Patrum, & methodicâ narratione de Conciliis; quorum Canones in illo catechetico libro citantur (1). That is: "With a deſign to propagate the truth of the "Goſpel, he publiſhed the Catechiſm of the Palatinate, "adorned and illuſtrated with the teſtimonies of the "holy Scripture and the opinions of the Fathers, who "flouriſhed in the Church of God for the firſt five "hundred years from our Saviour's Nativity, with an "Epitome of the Lives of thoſe Fathers, and a me"thodical Account of the Councils, whoſe Canons "are quoted in that catechetical work."

(1) Melchior Adam. in Vitis Jurisconſult. pag. 472, 473.

[B] REINIER, or REINHARD BACHOVIUS ..... had a conſiderable character among the Civilians.] Conringius ſtiles him diſciplinæ juridicæ æternum decus (2); that is, "the eternal Honour of the Civil Law." According to Vinnius he was ſubtiliſſimus Juriſconſultorum, non tam ſuæ ſententiæ adſtructor, quam deſtructor alienæ (3); that is, "the moſt ſubtil of all the Civi"lians, and one, who did not ſo much inſiſt upon "his own opinion, as deſtroy that of others." Another ſays, Eo, in his quæ ad ſolidam noſtri juris interpretationem faciunt, acutiorem vix tradit prior ætas (4); that is, "The former Age ſcarce produced "any one, who was more acute in thoſe things, "which are neceſſary to the ſolid interpretation of "our law." In ſhort, the epithets of accuratiſſimus, ſubtiliſſimus, acutiſſimus, inexorabilis cenſor (5); that is, "moſt exact, moſt ſubtle, moſt acute, and the "inexorable Cenſor," were never wanting to him. The commendation, which Vinnius gave him, may be applied to a great many people: we find a vaſt number of ſubtle writers, and great reaſoners, who prove their own doctrine but very weakly; and yet have the talent of entirely overturning that of others. A man is generally much ſtronger in an offenſive than in a defenſive diſpute. See what an Elector of Cologne ſaid with reſpect to the diſputes between the Franciſcans and Dominicans. It is mentioned by Father Paul. See the fourth Book of his Hiſtory of the Council of Trent p. 309 of the verſion of Mr. Amelot de la Houſſaie.

(2) Conringius, de Autoritate Juris publ. Juſtin. in Germaniâ, apud Magirum, Eponym. pag. 99.

(3) Vinnius, cap. 11. de Pact. num. 9. apud Magirum, Eponym. pag. 99.

(4) Hahn. in Dedic. Obſervat. ad Weſenbec. ap. eundem.

(5) Schutz, apud eundem.

BACON (ROGER) an Engliſh Franciſcan Friar, lived in the thirteenth Century. He was a great Aſtronomer, a great Chymiſt, and a great Mathematician. This without doubt is what made him ſuſpected of Magic. There is a tradition amongſt the Engliſh that this Friar made a brazen head, which anſwered the queſtions which he propoſed [A]. Selden rejects this as a mere childiſh Fable [B], and obſerves, that no Hiſtorian

[A] It is ſaid .... that he made a brazen head, which anſwered the queſtions, which he propoſed to it.] Maier obſerves, that it was uſual to introduce Roger Bacon in Comedies as a great Magician, and that the common tradition is that he and his Fellow-Monk Thomas Bungey were ſeven years in making this head, in order to know of it if there was any method diſcoverable of ſurrounding all England with a thick wall and rampart; upon which the brazen head gave them an anſwer, which they could not well underſtand, becauſe as they did not expect to receive it ſo ſoon, they were employed in ſomething elſe inſtead of hearkening to this Oracle (1). Theſe are mere popular tales, which deſerve no ſerious confutation. Such kind of ſtories have been told of Albertus Magnus (2).

(1) Maierus, Symbol. aureæ Menſæ, lib. 10. pag. 453. quoted by Naudé, Apolog. des grans Hommes, p. 491.

(2) See above remark [F], num. 2. of the article of ALBERTUS MAGNUS.

[B] .... Selden rejects this as a mere childiſh fable.] I ſhall

torian mentions it, and that Baleus, who had defamed Roger Bacon, retracted his calumnies, and repaired that injury very honourably. Franciſcus Picus ſays, that he had read in a book of Bacon's, "that a man might become a Prophet, and foretel things to come, "by means of the looking-glaſs Almuchefi formed after the rules of perſpective, provi- "ded that he did but uſe it under a proper conſtellation, and had before reduced his body "to an even temperature by Chymiſtry (a)." This is not contrary to what John Picus Mirandula ſays, who aſſerted that Bacon amuſed himſelf only with natural Magic (b). This Friar ſent divers inſtruments of his invention to Pope Clement IV (c). Several of his books have been publiſhed: Specula Mathematica & perſpectiva, Speculum Alchemiæ, de mirabili poteſtate Artis & Naturæ, Epiſtolæ cum Notis, &c. It is very probable that he performed nothing by means of a compact with the Devil; but notwithſtanding he might aſcribe ſurprizing effects to things, which had not naturally ſuch a virtue in them. So that there is ſome reaſon for ſaying, that his Writings contain a great deal of ſuperſtition [C]. He was extremely infatuated with judiciary Aſtrology [D].

(a) Franc. Picus, lib. 2. de Prænotione, cap. 1. and lib. 7. cap. 7. quoted by Naudé, Apolog. des grans Hommes, pag. 490.

(b) Jo. Picus in Præfat. Apolog. quoted by Naudé ibid.

(c) Naudé, ibid. pag. 493.

The Letter which he wrote to Pope Clement IV, and which is ſtill in the Library at Lambeth, contains with the commendations of the holy Scripture a very ſtrange deſign; for he deſires that Pope to confirm by the Apoſtolical Authority, and to recommend to the whole Church, the method which he had invented of teaching any perſon Hebrew, Latin, Greek and Arabic, in a very few days. He aſſerted that Laymen ought not only to read the Scripture, but even to underſtand the Originals [E]; and he affirmed that his Univerſal Grammar was earneſtly deſired, and that ſeveral Prophecies confirmed it.

I ſhall give his own words: Iſtiuſmodi caput ex ære conflatum ab eruditiſſimo Rogero Bacon eſt in ore noſtratis vulgi, ſed non ſine injuriâ in illius Matheſin, quam ſummam & à dæmonum præſtigiis puram monſtrant ſatis illius opera quotquot nos legiſſe contigit, & quicquid adverſus eum uti magum ſeu νικυόμαντιν J. Balæus inſcitia dicam, an in optimas artes malitiâ, editione centuriarum prima ſatis incogitanter effutierat, id benè monitus omne non modò retractavit, verum in ea quæ tali & tanto viro digna ſunt poſtremâ recognitione etiam prudenter commutavit. Nec quod banc vulgi famam adſtruat, habent Annales noſtri (3). John Dee, an Engliſh Philoſopher and Mathematician, wrote an Apology for Roger Bacon. He mentions in the Epiſtle Dedicatory his Propædeumata Apoſtolica de præſtantioribus quibuſdam naturæ virtutibus. See Naudé pag. 488 of his Apology for great men.

(3) Selden. de Diis Syris, Syntagma 1. cap. 2. pag. 38.

[C] His writings contain a great deal of ſuperſtition.] Martin del Rio, an Author, who in theſe points is the leaſt free to acquit ſuſpected perſons, has yet cleared our Roger Bacon from being a Magician, and contents himſelf with repreſenting him only as a ſuperſtitious Author. Alchindus, ſays he (4), Rogerius Bachonus, & Geber Arabs multis ſcatent ſuperſtitioſis; ideò vetitæ lectionis etiam hos putârim: that is, "Alchin- "dus, Roger Bacon, and Geber the Arabian are full "of ſuperſtitious obſervations, and therefore I think "the reading of them ought to be prohibited." John Wierus is not ſo indulgent; for he ranks in the ſame claſs Roger Bacon, Petrus Aponenſis, Anſelmus Parmenſis, Cicchus of Aſculum, and ſeveral others, whereas Martin del Rio repreſents the three laſt as real Magicians, and only places Bacon among the ſuperſtitious. Ab hoc numero removeo, ut dæmoniacos magos Picatricem Hiſpanum, Anſelmum Parmenſem, Cicchum Eſculanium, Petrum de Abono, & Cornel. Agrippam, & Paracelſum . . . . . homines partim atheos, partim hæreticos (5). Wierus agrees exactly with him in relation to the reſt, that is, he conſidered Petrus Aponenſis, Anſelmus Parmenſis, &c, as men, who were guilty of magic. Superiorum magorum nugamenta itidem inſulsè ſequuti ſunt Appion Grammaticus, Julianus Apoſtata, Robertus Anglicus apud Helvetios miſerè mortuus, Rogerius Bachon, Petrus Aponenſis Conciliator dictus, Albertus Teutonicus, Arnoldus de Villa-nova, Anſelmus Parmenſis, Picatrix Hiſpanus, vel author Libri ad Alfonſum ſub Picatricis nomine, Cicchus Aſculus Florentinus, & plerique alii obſcurioris nominis ſcriptores, deplorati certè ingenii homines. Qui quum ſe magiam tradere pollicentur, non niſi aut deliramenta quædam nulla ratione ſubnixa, aut ſuperſtitiones piis omnibus indignas congeſſerunt (6).

(4) Diſquiſit. Magicar. lib. 1. cap. 3. pag. 22.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Wier. de Præſtigiis, lib. 2. cap. 4. He remarks that John Franciſcus Picus, lib. 7. cap. 7. confutes Bacon.

[D] He was extremely infatuated with judiciary Aſtrology.] John Picus aſſerts, that the Book intitled Speculum Aſtrologiæ, which treats of the lawful and unlawful Authors, who wrote upon Aſtrology, is the work of Roger Bacon (7). This Book was condemned by Gerſon (8) and by Agrippa, as ſuperſtitious to the laſt degree (9): Franciſcus Picus (10) and many others condemned it, becauſe it is maintained there, with ſubmiſſion to better judgments, that the Books of Magic ought to be carefully preſerved, becauſe the time draws on, when, for certain reaſons, which are not ſpecified, there will be a neceſſity of peruſing them, and making uſe of them upon ſome occaſions. Naudé adds that Roger Bacon was ſo much addicted to Judiciary Aſtrology, that Henry de Haſſia, William of Paris, and Nicholas Oreſme . . . . were obliged to declaim ſeverely againſt his writings, and againſt all the vanities of the Aſtrologers (11).

(7) Jo. Picus, lib. 1. adverſus Aſtrolog. quoted by Naudé, pag. 526.

(8) Lib. de Libris Aſtrolog. non tolerandis, Propoſ. 3. quoted by Naudé, p. 525.

(9) Agrippa in Epiſt. quoted by the ſame Author, ibid.

(10) Lib. 7. de Prænotione, cap. 2. quoted by the ſame Author, ibid.

(11) Naudé, Apolog. pour les grans Hommes, pag. 526.

[E] He aſſerted, that laymen ought not only to read the Scripture, but even to underſtand the Originals.] As I have not read the Letter, I cannot ſay whether he proceeds upon this argument, that a private perſon, who does not underſtand Greek or Hebrew, is obliged to depend upon the fidelity and capacity of the Tranſlators; which it may be ſaid is a very precarious foundation, and ſuch as it would be hard to truſt our ſalvation upon. However that be, his pretenſion is not far from being extravagant, and is involved in impoſſibilities. This is the opinion of the Author, who mentions that Letter, Inter Scriptores 13 ſeculi, qui à Whartono pro ſcripturis & ſacris vernaculis adducuntur, comparet Rogerus Bacon, cujus Epiſtolam de laudibus S. Scripturæ ad Clementem IV Bibliotheca Lambethana tenet. Obſervat autem, Autorem illum portentoſa quædam & impoſſibilia in prolixâ illâ Epiſtolâ comminiſci. Non enim tantum neceſſarium eſſe docet, ut omnes Chriſtiani ſacram Scripturam tanquam fidei ſuæ fontem & regulam perfectè ſciant, ſed etiam fontes Hebraicos & Græcos ab omnibus conſulendos aſſerit. Et quamvis incredibile videatur, ut ſinguli Chriſtiani linguarum iſtarum notitiam ſibi comparere poſſint, id tamen Baconus factu perquam facile eſſe perſuadere ſuis Lectoribus cupit, imprimis cum ſe Grammaticam quandam univerſalem invenisse glorietur, cujus ope intra pauciſſimos dies quilibet linguam Hebraicam, Græcam, Latinam, & Arabicam addiſcere queat; & ut omnes, quod legunt, etiam intelligant, ſe opus quoddam manuductorium ſeu præliminare ad promovendam S. Scripturæ intelligentiam editurum ſpondet, enixè Pontificem orans, ut artificium ſuum ſummis omnium votis expetitum, & frequentibus vaticiniis confirmatum, apoſtolicâ autoritate confirmet, & univerſæ eccleſiæ commendet, unde innumera in Eccleſiam beneficia redundatura minimè dubitat (12).

(12) Acta Eruditor. Lipſ. menſis Junii 1691. pag. 279. in an Extract from Uſſerius de Hiſtoriâ dogmaticâ Controverſiæ de Scripturis & ſacris vernaculis.

☞BACON (ROGER), The great merit of this Writer will juſtify us for enlarging Mr. Bayle's Article concerning him. He was deſcended from a good family, and born in 1214 (a) at Ilcheſter (b) in Somerſetſhire. He was diſtinguiſhed by the title of Doctor Mirabilis on account count of the extent of his learning and the penetration of his genius. He ſtudied at Oxford under Edmund Rich, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Richard Fitzacre (c), where he made a prodigious progreſs in all parts of polite Learning, and from thence removed to the Univerſity of Paris, which was greatly frequented by the Engliſh at that time (d). After he had taken his degree of Doctor of Divinity there, he is ſaid (e) to have returned to his own country, and by the advice of Robert Groſtete or Groſthead the learned Biſhop of Lincoln, who was always a kind Patron to him, entered himſelf among the Franciſcan Monks at Oxford. But others are of opinion, that he engaged in that Order at Paris (f). Caſimir Oudin in his Commentar. de Scriptor. & ſcriptis Eccleſ. (g) places this fact about the year 1240. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf, as well as his brother Robert Bacon, by a Sermon which he preached at Oxford before King Henry III, wherein he remonſtrated againſt his conduct for paying too great a regard to the advice of Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and giving the moſt conſiderable Poſts of the Kingdom to Foreigners (h). Dr. Cave and Oudin fix this under the year 1259. Dr. Plot in his Natural Hiſtory of Oxfordſhire (i) tells us, that he was ſome time Fellow of Merton-College in Oxford; but Mr. Wood in his Hiſtoria & Antiquitates Univerſitatis Oxonienſis (k), repreſents this as very doubtful. His ſtrong inclination to the purſuits of knowledge engaged him in the moſt intenſe application to it imaginable; but his chief ſtudy was that of Philoſophy [A], in which he made ſo great a progreſs, that Leland tells us, that he left no part of it unexplored (l). In order to open the way to his improvement in the Sciences, he endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of the Latin, Hebrew, Greek, and Arabic Languages; for which purpoſe he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Grammar, which was at that time ſo greatly neglected, that there were ſcarce four perſons among the Latins who underſtood Grammar, though there were many who could ſpeak Greek, Arabic, and Hebrew.

(a) Dr. Freind's Hiſtory of Phyſic, Part 2. pag. 235.

(b) Mr. du Pin calls it erroneouſly Iccheſter, Bibliotb. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 10. pag. 77. edit. de Pariſ. 1702.

(c) Cave, Hiſt. Literar. in Sæc. Scholaſt. ad ann. 1278. pag. 648. edit. Coloniæ Allobrog. 1720. in fol.

(d) See Dr. Jebb in his Preface to his edition of Bacon's Opus Majus, publiſhed at London 1733. in fol.

(e) Hiſt. & Antiq. Acad. Oxon. &c. pag. 136. and Cave, ubi ſupra.

(f) See Dr. Jebb in his marginal note (i).

(g) Tom. 3. Sæc. 13. col. 191. ed. Lipſiæ 1722. in fol.

(h) Pitſeus, Relat. Hiſt. de Rebus Anglic. tom. 1. pag. 366. edit. Paris 1619.

(i) Cap. 9. pag. 214. edit. 1677.

(k) Lib. 2. pag. 88. edit. 1674.

(l) Ingreſſam ita totam penetraverit & circuiverit, ut nullum locum jam non excuſſum reliquerit. Comment. de Scr. Brit. pag. 257.

[A] His chief ſtudy was that of Philoſophy.] Philoſophy, as Dr. Jebb obſerves in the Preface to his edition of the Opus Magnum of our Author, was at that time abſolutely neglected, and almoſt extinguiſhed in our own country, as well as in other parts of Europe. Some of the ancient Fathers having expreſſed themſelves with ſeverity againſt the Philoſophers in the heat of their controverſies, this gave occaſion to the later Divines to reject all Philoſophy with the utmoſt indignation; particularly Gratian (1), who collected the Canon-Law into one body. He having compiled his work from the ſentences of the Fathers, the Decrees of the Councils, the Decretals of the Popes, and a great many ſuppoſititious writings, publiſhed it in the year 1151; and it was immediately confirmed by Pope Eugenius III, and ordered to be read publickly in the Univerſities (2). In this compilation there are many paſſages, which repreſent the ſtudy of Philoſophy as uſeleſs and unworthy of the application of a Chriſtian. The Divines of Paris therefore being induced by this authority, in the beginning of the thirteenth Century, condemned Ariſtotle's philoſophical writings, and excommunicated thoſe, who ſhould preſume to read them (3). Scimus enim quod temporibus noſtris Pariſiis diu fuit contradictum naturali philoſophiæ & metaphyſicæ Ariſtotelis per Avicennæ & Averrois expoſitores; & ob denſam ignorantiam fuerunt libri eorum excommunicati, & utentes eis per tempora ſatis longa. But perhaps this cenſure will appear leſs obnoxious, if we conſider, that the Divines of Paris had not the works of Ariſtotle in the original, and in the ſame degree of purity, as we have them now, but tranſlated very imperfectly from the Arabic Verſions of them, and extremely diſguiſed and corrupted. And Father Rapin obſerves (4), that this condemnation was particularly occaſioned by a man of a violent factious ſpirit, whoſe name was Amaury, who endeavoured to juſtify his extravagant opinions by the principles of Ariſtotle, which were then begun to be taught, and whoſe Phyſics he had read; and aſſerted, that God ſerved for form to the matter of all natural beings; and that this matter being uncreated was divine. Theſe errors of Amaury's were imputed to Ariſtotle, from whom he pretended to have taken them. But the Divines did not continue long in this opinion; for ſoon after the year 1230, when Michael Scotus publiſhed a Latin Verſion of ſome parts of Ariſtotle relating to Natural Philoſophy and Mathematics (5), that Philoſopher ſeems to have recovered his reputation among the Students. The new Orders of the Dominicans and Franciſcans, which were inſtituted about the ſame time, favouring likewiſe the doctrine of that Philoſopher, and defending it in their publick Lectures, Ariſtotle's character was raiſed ſo high, that the title of Philoſopher was ſolely appropriated to him (6). By this means ſeveral others beſides Michael Scotus laboured in explaining his works, and ſoon after divers verſions of them, which were ſaid to have been made by Gerard of Cremona, Alured Anglicus, Herman Alemannus, and Willielmus Flemingus. However Philoſophy was ſtill in a very rude and uncultivated ſtate. And Bacon himſelf tells us (7), that tho' there never was ſo great an Appearance of knowledge, nor ſo great an application to ſo many ſciences in ſeveral countries, as there had been for forty years paſt; yet there never was ſo great ignorance and ſuch a variety of errors as then. Nunquam fuit tanta apparentia ſapientiæ, nec tantum exercitium ſtudii in tot facultatibus, in tot regionibus, ſicut jam à quadraginta annis; ubique enim Doctores ſunt diſperſi . . . in omni civitate, & in omni caſtro, & in omni burgo, præcipuè per duos ordines ſtudentes, quod non accidit niſi à quadraginta annis vel circiter, cum tamen nunquam fuit tanta ignorantia, tantus error. Thoſe who had undertaken to publiſh new verſions of Ariſtotle's works, were not ſufficiently converſant in the languages, or in the ſciences of which they treated. Herman confeſſed to Bacon, that he was rather an aſſiſtant in the tranſlations than a tranſlator himſelf, ſince he employed Saracens in Spain, who had the chief hand in his verſions (8). Michael Scotus borrowed all that he publiſhed in his own name from one Andrew a Jew. And Willielmus Flemingus, ſays Bacon, as every body knows at Paris, has no ſkill in the Greek language; tho' he pretends to it, and therefore he tranſlates every thing falſly, and corrupts the learning of the Latins. Tho' Bacon therefore eſteemed Ariſtotle's works as the foundation of all knowledge, yet he thought it would have been of advantage to learning, if all the copies of them, which were then in uſe amongſt the Latins, were deſtroyed; and he declares, that if it had been in his power, he would have burnt them all; for the ſtudy of them was mere loſs of time, and the occaſion of error, and the multiplying of ignorance, beyond what could be expreſſed. Si haberem poteſtatem ſuper libros Ariſtotelis, ego facerem omnes cremari; quia non eſt niſi temporis amiſſio ſtudere in illis, & cauſa erroris, & multiplicatio ignorantiæ, ultra id quod valeat explicari (9). He tells us afterwards, that the herd of Students with their Teachers had no valuable knowledge as the object of their purſuits, and therefore they languiſhed in a ſtupid application to bad tranſlations, and loſt both their time and expence. In ſhort, that they were amuſed with a mere appearance or ſhadow of knowledge, and did not value what they really knew, but what they were thought to know by the ignorant multitude. Vulgus ſtudentium cum capitibus ſuis non habet unde excitetur ad aliquid dignum, & ideo languet & aſininat circa malè tranſlata, & tempus & ſtudium amittit in omnibus & expenſas. Apparentia quidem ſola tenet eos, &c.

(1) Baconi, Opus Maj. lib. 1. cap. 15.

(2) Cave, Hiſt. Litter. Sæc. Waldenſe, ad ann. 1131. pag. 578. edit. Coloniæ Allobrogum, 1720. and Jebb, ubi ſupra.

(3) Baconi, Opus Maj. lib. 1. cap. 9. pag. 14. edit. Jebb. See likewiſe Father Rapin's Compariſon between Plato and Ariſtotle, ch. 5.

(4) Ubi ſupra.

(5) Baconi, Opus Majus, lib. 2. cap. 8. pag. 36, 37.

(6) Idem, lib. 2. cap. 8.

(7) MS. Cot. Tib. C. 5. f. 121, apud Jebb.

(8) Ib. fol. 138. c. 8.

(9) Ibid.

Hebrew (l). He then turned his thoughts to the Mathematics, which he eſteemed the chief of all the Sciences, and that, which ſhould precede and qualify us for the reſt (m). He took a great deal of pains in ſearching out the Works of the Antients, and he procured at a large expence rare copies from different parts of the world (n). He tells us likewiſe himſelf (o), that after he had ſtudied the Languages and Sciences from his youth, yet he at laſt found that he was deficient in many points of knowledge, ſo that after the example of Biſhop Groſtete, he laid aſide Ariſtotle, and reſolved to penetrate into the receſſes of Nature by experiments. He contracted a friendſhip with all the learned men of his time, and procured ſeveral young men to be inſtructed in the Languages, and other things neceſſary, in order to aſſiſt him in his experiments. In theſe deſigns he ſpared no coſt, but within the ſpace of twenty years, according to his own account (p), he ſpent above two thouſand pounds (q). It is not at all ſurprizing therefore, that a man of his genius and induſtry ſhould make ſo many noble diſcoveries in Aſtronomy, Perſpective, Chymiſtry, Phyſic, and the mechanical Sciences [B]. His uncommon and extenſive Learning

(l) Opus Tert. ad Clem. IV. MS. Cot. Tib. c. 5. f. 6. apud Jebb, ubi ſupra.

(m) Prima erit inter ſcientias, & præcedens alias, & diſponens ad eas. Opus Majus, Part 4. pag. 64.

(n) MS. Cot. Tib. C. 5. fol. 10. apud Jebb.

(o) Ib. fol. 138.

(p) Ibid. fol. 19.

(q) Dr. Jebb, ſays, that they were of Paris Pounds or Livres.

& non curant quid ſciant, ſed quid videantur ſcire coram multitudine inſenſatâ (10). With regard to Mathematics in general, he owns, that Robert Groſtete, Biſhop of Lincoln, and his brother Fryer Adam de Mariſco were eminent in this way (11); and indeed they were not only ſo in this, but in other parts of learning; but they died when Bacon was in the flouriſhing part of his life. So that in his later years, giving an account of what ſteps were taken in this branch of knowledge, he acquaints us, that there were but four in Europe (of whom his pupil Johannes Londinenſis was one,) who had made any progreſs in that ſcience. The reſt, he tells us, ſtuck in the firſt elements at the fifth propoſition of Euclid, which afterwards went by the name of Pons Aſinimus (12). In an age of ſuch profound ignorance, and amidſt all theſe prodigious diſadvantages our Author appeared, and by the uncommon force of his genius and intenſe application made great advances in the ſeveral arts and ſciences, as we ſhall ſee in the following notes.

(10) Ibid.

(11) Specul. Mathemat. pag. 12. apud Freind, Hiſt. of Phyſick, Part 2. pag. 242, 2d edit. London 1727.

(12) See Freind, ibid. p. 242, 243.

[B] Should make ſo many noble diſcoveries in Aſtronomy, Perſpective, Chymiſtry, Phyſic, and the mechanical Sciences.] Dr. Freind obſerves (13), that he was almoſt the only Aſtronomer of his age; he accordingly took notice of an error in the Calendar, with regard to the quantity of the ſolar year, which had been encreaſing ever ſince the time of Julius Cæſar; and propoſed in 1267 a Plan for the correction of it to Pope Clement IV, who was a man of ſome learning himſelf, and an encourager of it in others. He treats of this at large in the fourth Book of his Opus Majus. And Dr. Jebb (14) ſtiles this one of the nobleſt inventions, which were ever diſcovered by the human mind and induſtry. Et primo Calendarii emendandi ratio, quam fuſius tractat in majoris hujuſce operis libro quarto, inter pulchriora jure recenſenda eſt, quæ humana unquam excogitaverat induſtria. And the ſame Gentleman obſerves, that in this point he ſurpaſſed not only Bede and other Engliſh Writers, who endeavoured to reform the errors of the Calendar, but likewiſe Theophilus, Euſebius, Victorius, Cyrill, and all the other foreigners. And that when the queſtion was diſcuſſed concerning the ſame ſubject in the Lateran Council under Pope Leo X, tho' it remained undetermined, becauſe the quantity of the years and months, and the motions of the Sun and Moon, were not yet ſufficiently adjuſted (15), yet Paul Biſhop of Foſſombrone, who was at the head of that affair, borrowed a great part of his Book, concerning the right celebration of Eaſter, from Bacon; tho' he concealed his name, and in ſome places diſapproved of his opinion. But when the celebrated Nicholas Copernicus at the advice of the ſame Biſhop had applied himſelf to the obſervation of the motions of the heavenly bodies with more accuracy, than they had been obſerved before, he confirmed the judgment of Bacon, and made thoſe diſcoveries, which enabled thoſe, who followed, to compleat the reformation of the Calendar, under Pope Gregory XIII; ſo that the merit of this work, according to Dr. Jebb, is juſtly to be aſcribed to our Author. Dr. Plot likewiſe in his Natural Hiſtory of Oxfordſhire (16) obſerves, that "whatever has been done in this matter from the time "of Frier Bacon to that of Pope Gregory XIII, "muſt in great meaſure be aſcribed to him, "their "whole reformation ſcarce differing from his," except in this circumſtance, which, as that Writer remarks, is well worth the obſervation; that whereas the Gregorian Reformers reduced the equinoxes and ſolſtices to the places, which they ſuppoſed they held in the time of the Nicene Council, Bacon ſeems inclinable to have brought them (and that moſt rationally) to their places, in a much more eminent epoche, viz. the winter-ſolſtice to the tenth of the Calends of January, and the vernal equinox to the tenth of the Calends of April, their true places at the time of Chriſt's Birth; which he proves by a very cogent argument drawn from the obſervations of Ptolemy, who lived but 140 years after Chriſt; in whoſe time the vernal equinox was found to be on the eleventh of the Calends of April. Now allowing, that it aſcends in the Calendar a whole natural day in 130 years, if in Ptolemy's time it fell on the eleventh of the Calends of April, it muſt neceſſarily at Chriſt's Birth have been at leaſt on the tenth; and ſo of the ſolſtice (17). According to which computation they had gone back ſince the time of our Saviour, as Dr. Plot obſerves, to the year 1676 almoſt thirteen days, the number 130 days being ſo often to be found in 1676 wanting but fourteen. Now the Æra of Chriſt's Birth, concludes that Author (18), being a time of much higher value, and more to be reſpected by Chriſtians than the Nicene Council, in whatever elſe they have exceeded him, I am ſure in this they have fallen ſhort of his Reformation. Dr. Freind (19) alſo tells us, that it was his Plan, which Pope Gregory above 300 years after followed in his reformation of the Julian Calendar, with this difference only, that Bacon would have had it begun from the Birth of our Saviour; whereas the Gregorian correction reaches no higher than the Nicene Council. With regard to Perſpective, he was at infinite pains and charge in the improvement of that ſcience; which was then underſtood but by very few, and he tells us (20), that no Lectures had been read upon it at Paris, and but twice at Oxford, and that there were but three, who had any ſkill in it. However theſe perſons made ſuch prodigious advances in it, that, as Dr. Jebb obſerves, they ſeem to have left nothing for poſterity to add to the perfection of their inſtruments. Bacon has very accurately deſcrib'd the uſe of reading glaſſes, and ſhewn the way of making them. We ſhall give the reader the following paſſage from his Opus Majus (21). Si vero homo aſpiciat literas & alias res minutas per medium cryſtalli vel vitri, vel alterius perſpicui ſuppoſiti literis, & ſit portio minor ſphæræ, cujus convexitas ſit verſus oculum, & oculus ſit in aere, longè melius videbit literas, & apparebunt ei majores . . . & ideo hoc inſtrumentum eſt utile ſenibus & habentibus oculos debiles. Nam literam quantumcunque parvam poſſunt videre inſufficienti magnitudine. Dr. Freind likewiſe remarks (22), that he deſcribes the Camera Obſcura, and all ſorts of glaſſes, which magnify or diminiſh any object, bring it nearer to the eye, or remove it farther off. Bacon tells us alſo himſelf, that he had made a great number of burning-glaſſes, and that there were none ever in uſe among the Latins, till his friend Peter de Maharn-Curia had applied himſelf to the making of them (23). He informs us in another paſſage of his writings, that this Peter had already laboured three years about one glaſs, which was to burn at a certain diſtance, and that he would ſoon compleat it thro' the favour of God, tho' the Latins knew not how to do that, nor was it ever attempted by them, notwithſtanding, ſays he, we have books concerning the method of forming glaſſes of that kind.

(13) Ibid. pag. 237. and his Appendix, num. 4.

(14) In Præfat.

(15) Quod annorum & menſium magnitudines, atque ſolis & lunæ motus, nondum ſatis dimenſi haberentur. Nic. Copernic. in Proœm. Op. de Revolutionibus Orbium Cœleſtium.

(16) Cap. 9. pag. 220. edit. 1677.

(17) In Oper. Minor. Part 3. cap. 69. MS. in Bibliotb. Colleg. Univerſit.

(18) Natural Hiſt. of Oxfordſhire, pag. 221.

(19) Ubi ſupra, pag. 238.

(20) Opus Tert. ad Clem. MS. Cot. Tib. C. 5. fol. 6. apud Jebb, ubi ſupra.

(21) Pag. 352.

(22) Pag. 256.

(23) MS. Reg. 2. cap. 1. Part 5. de Compend. Studii Theolog. apud Jebb, ubi ſupra.

Learning drew upon him the attention of mankind, and his fame became ſo univerſal, that Pope Clement IV, before he was raiſed to the See of Rome, deſired to have an account of his inventions, and wrote a letter to Bacon for that purpoſe, which he ſent by Raymund de Lauduno (r). But our Author was at that time involved in the greateſt perplexity imaginable, occaſioned by the envy or the ignorance of thoſe who were of his own Order. For his ſuperiors had made an expreſs decree, that he ſhould not communicate (r) MS. Cot. Tib. C. 5. fol. 3. apud Jebb.

Circa vero unum ſpeculum comburens in certâ diſtantiâ laboravit jam per tres annos, & cito veniet ad finem per gratiam Dei, quod omnes Latini neſcirent facere, nec unquam fuit attentatum inter eos, cum tamen libros habemus de hujuſmodi ſpeculorum compoſitione (24). We may obſerve likewiſe, that tho' Galileo aſcribes the Invention of the optic Tube or Teleſcope to himſelf (25), and Peter Borellus contends that the honour of it is due to Zachary Joannides a Citizen of Middleburg (26), yet it is evident, that the invention was known to our Author from a paſſage, wherein he tells us, that he was able to form glaſſes in ſueh a manner, with reſpect to our ſight and the objects, that the rays ſhall be refracted and reflected wherever we pleaſe, ſo that we may ſee a thing under what angle we think proper, either near or at a diſtance, and be able to read the ſmalleſt letters at an incredible diſtance, and to count the duſt and ſand, on account of the greatneſs of the angle, under which we ſee the objects, and alſo that we ſhall ſcarce ſee the greateſt bodies near us on account of the ſmallneſs of the angle under which we ſee them. Nam poſſumus ſic figurare perſpicua, & taliter ea ordinare reſpectu noſtri viſûs & rerum, quod frangentur radii & flectentur quorſumcunque voluerimus, ut ſub quocunque angulo voluerimus, videbimus rem prope vel longè, & ſic ex incredibili diſtantia legeremus literas minutiſſimas, & pulveres & arenas numeraremus propter magnitudinem anguli, ſub quo videremus, & maxima corpora de prope vix videremus, propter parvitatem anguli, ſub quo videremus, &c. (27). We find, that he made uſe of his teleſcope in his aſtronomical obſervations from what he ſays in his Opus Tertium dedicated to Pope Clement concerning thoſe things, which were neceſſary for compleating the Aſtronomical Tables, which he deſigned. " But, ſays he, what is much " more requiſite than theſe things, is to have men, " who underſtand Perſpective and the inſtruments of " it very well, ... becauſe the inſtruments of " Aſtronomy are only made uſe of by ſight according " to the laws of that ſcience." Sed longe magis quam hæc oporteret homines haberi, qui bene, immo optime ſcirent perſpectivam & inſtrumenta ejus, . . quia inſtrumenta Aſtronomiæ non vadunt niſi per viſionem ſecundum leges iſtius ſcientiæ (28). To this we ſhall add two other paſſages from him quoted by Dr. Plot (29). De viſione fractâ majora ſunt, nam de facili patet, maxima poſſe apparere minima, & è contra; & longe diſtantia videbuntur propinquiſſimè, & è converſo; ſic etiam faceremus ſolem & lunam & ſtellas deſcendere ſecundum apparentiam hic inferius, &c. (30) : i. e. " Greater things are per- " formed, if the viſion be refracted, for [by refracti- " on] it is eaſily made appear, that the greateſt things " may be repreſented leſs, and little things as the " greateſt; and that things afar off may be repre- " ſented near. Thus we can make the ſun, and " moon, and ſtars, to all appearance, come down to " us here below, &c." And again in his Epiſtle to Pariſienſis, concerning the ſecret Works of Art and Nature : Poſſunt enim ſic figurari perſpicua, ut longiſſimè poſita, appareant propinquiſſima, & è contrario; ita quod ex incredibili diſtantiâ legeremus literas minutiſſimas, & numeraremus res quantuncunque parvas, & ſtellas faceremus apparere quo vellemus (31) : i. e. " Glaſſes may " be ſo figured, that things the moſt remote may appear " near; ſo that at an incredible diſtance we may " read the ſmalleſt character, and number things tho' " ever ſo ſmall; and laſtly 'make ſtars appear as " near as we pleaſe." Theſe things, as he tells us in another place (32), were to the illiterate ſo formidable and amazing, ut animus mortalis ignorans veritatem non poſſit aliqualiter ſuſtinere; i. e. " that no mor- " tal ignorant of the means could poſſibly bear it." All which put together, ſays Dr. Plot (33), it muſt neceſſarily be confeſt, that he had ſome ſuch inſtrument, tho' not ſo trimly made, 'tis like, as our teleſcopes are now. In favour of which truth much more might be alledged, did I not think this ſufficient to evince it with unprejudiced readers. Dr. Freind likewiſe remarks (34), that how far he advanced Optics in all its branches, is ſufficiently evident from his book of Perſpective, wherein he diſcourſes of the Reflexion and Refraction of light (35), and deſcribes all ſorts of glaſſes, which magnify or diminiſh any object, &c; and that amongſt the reſt the uſe of the Optic Tube or Teleſcope, though thought to be a modern invention, was plainly known to him. With reſpect to his improvements in Chymiſtry, Dr. Freind tells us (36), that the honour of introducing it into Europe was chiefly owing to Bacon. He was at leaſt one of the firſt, (for he was contemporary with Albertus Magnus,) who cultivated that art in our Weſtern Climates; and to prove how little it had hitherto been known, he informs us, that at this time there were but three perſons in the Roman world, who underſtood any thing of it, one of whom was the famous Peter de Maharn-Court, a Picard, whom he ſtiles Dominus Experimentorum. He embraced the Philoſophy of Geber the Arabian, as Dr. Jebb remarks, and conſidered mercury and ſulphur as the two principles of all metals and minerals. From theſe, ſays he (37), are generated all metals and minerals, of which there are many different kinds. But nature always endeavours after the perfecting of gold. But if any accidents intervene to hinder the operation of nature, the metals are transformed; and they are produced pure or impure according to the quality of the mercury and ſulphur. From thence he endeavours to ſhew, that baſer metals may be changed into gold, by purging off the impure parts of them, and digeſting the matter of them into the form of gold. And he tells us (38), that the medicine, which will remove theſe impurities, may be made by reducing the elements almoſt to an equality; and that by means of this ſecret life may be prolonged, ſince that medicine, which will remove all the impurities and corruptions of the baſer metal, ſo that it ſhall become the moſt pure ſilver and gold, is thought by Philoſophers capable of taking away the corruptions of the human body ſo far as to prolong life for many ages. " Medicinam vero, quæ has impurita- " tes tollat, confici poſſe dicit, reducendo elementa " ferè ad æqualitatem, atque hinc etiam vitæ longæ- " vitati conſuli poſſe, cum illa medicina, quæ tolleret " omnes immunditias & corruptiones metalli vilioris, ut " fieret argentum & aurum puriſſimum, æſtimatur à " ſapientibus poſſe tollere corruptiones corporis humani in " tantum, ut vitam per multa ſecula prolongaret (39)." We may obſerve here, that the famous Monſr. Homberg, by the experiments, which he made at the command of the Duke of Orleans, in order to diſcover the art of making gold, was induced to refer it to the ſame principles with our Bacon (40). Dr. Freind tells us (41), that he ſpeaks of almoſt every operation now uſed in Chymiſtry, and deſcribes the method of making tinctures and elixirs. He mentions the Incineration of Fern, from which the Engliſh make glaſs. And in his Preface to the Art of Chymiſtry he extols it for being the perfection of Natural Philoſophy, and, which is its higheſt character, as it is capable of being made ſubſervient to health, long life, and the removal of diſeaſes. The ſame Author likewiſe obſerves, that we find enough in him to let us ſee, that the purſuit of the Philoſopher's Stone began very early; and that Lully, who owns himſelf his diſciple, (which probably might be, when both of them were at Paris) carried thoſe viſionary notions to an extravagant height. However that there is a great deal of new and ſolid learning upon this ſubject of Chymiſtry in the works of Bacon, particularly in his Speculum Alchymiæ, de Arte Chymiæ, Lapis Aquilæ Philoſophicus, Epiſtolæ tres ad Joh. Pariſienſem; if we ſtrip it of that jargon of language, which was ſo faſhionable in thoſe times. The compoſition and effects of Gun-powder were known to him, tho' that diſcovery has been generally ſuppoſed to be of a much later date. This will appear evident from a paſſage in his writings, wherein he has theſe words : In

(24) MS. Cot. Tib. C. fol. 8. apud Jebb.
(25) Libell. rogator. ad Remp. Holland.
(26) De vero teleſcopii inventore, cap. 12, &c.
(27) Opus Maj. P. 357.
(28) MS. Cot. Tib. C. 5. fol. 6. apud Jebb.
(29) Natural Hiſtory of Oxfordſhire, ch. 9. pag. 215.
(30) Perſpectiv. Part 3. diſt. ultima; apud Plot, ubi ſupra.
(31) Epiſt. ad Pariſienſ. cap. 5.
(32) Perſpect. Part 3. Diſt. 3. apud Plot.
(33) Ubi ſupra, pag. 216.
(34) Pag. 236.
(35) See Dr. Freind's Appendix, num. 3.
(36) Pag. 233.
(37) MS. Cot. Tib. C. 5. fol. 6. apud Jebb.
(38) Spec. Alch. chem. cap. 2. apud Jebb.
(39) Jebb, ubi ſupra. See Baconi Opus Maj. pag. 471, 472.
(40) Mem. de l'Acad. Royale des Sciences, an. 1707. apud Jebb.
(41) Pag. 234.

cate his Writings to any perſon under pain of the forfeiture of his book, and being confined to bread and water for many days (5). But ſoon after upon Clement's being elected Pope, Bacon thought that he ought rather to diſregard this decree, than neglect the commands of the Pope, and therefore ſent him a letter, in which he promiſed to ſatisfy his Holineſs in whatever he ſhould demand. The Pope returned him an anſwer, inſiſting upon his former requeſt, which occaſioned our Author to ſend him his Opus Majus [C], with

(5) Ibid.

In omnem diſtantiam, quam volumus poſſumus artificialiter componere ignem, comburentem ex ſale Petræ & aliis (41), i. e. "From Salt-Peter and other ingredi- "ents, we are able to make a fire, that ſhall burn at "what diſtance we pleaſe;" and the alia, which he mentions, as Dr. John Wallis ſaw it in a manuſcript copy of the ſame Roger Bacon in the hands of Dr. Langbain, were ſulphur and carbonum pulvis or duſt of coal (42), concerning which he afterwards adds, "that "ſounds like thunder, and coruſcations may be form- "ed in the air, and even with greater horror, than "thoſe which happen naturally. For a little matter "properly diſpoſed, about the quantity of a man's "thumb, makes a dreadful noiſe, and occaſions a "prodigious coruſcation. And this, ſays he, is done "ſeveral ways, by which a city or an army may be "deſtroyed, after the manner of Gideon's ſtratagem, "who having broken the pitchers and lamps, and "the fire iſſuing out with an inexpreſſible noiſe, kil- "led an infinite number of the Midianites with only "three hundred men." Nam ſoni velut tonitrus & coruſcationes poſſunt fieri in aere, immo majore horrore, quam illa quæ fiunt per naturam. Nam modica materia adaptata, ſcilicet ad quantitatem unius pollicis, ſonum facit horribilem, & coruſcationem oſtendit vehementem; & hoc fit multis modis, quibus civitas aut exercitus deſtruatur, ad modum artificii Gideonis, qui lagunculis fractis & lampadibus, igne exſiliente, cum fragore inæſtimabili, infinitum Midianitarum deſtruxit exercitum cum trecentis hominibus (43). But we have a ſtill clearer paſſage in his Opus Majus (44), wherein he obſerves, that "ſome things affect the hearing in ſo "violent a manner, that if they were compounded in "a proper manner, and diſcharged of a ſudden, and "in the night time, a city or an army would not "bear the ſhock, for the noiſe of thunder is not com- "parable to it. That ſome things ſtrike ſuch a terror "upon the ſight, that lightning is far inferior to them; "and that Gideon was ſuppoſed to have made uſe of "ſuch contrivances in the camp of the Midianites. "We have an experiment of this, ſays he, in the ſport "uſed by children in many parts of the world, viz. "that from an inſtrument about as large as a man's "thumb, by the force of ſalt-petre, there ariſes ſo hor- "rible a ſound by the breaking of a bit of parch- "ment, that it ſurpaſſes the noiſe of a violent thunder, "and a coruſcation beyond that of lightning." Quædam verò auditum perturbant in tantum, quod ſi ſubito & de nocte & artificio ſufficienti fierent, nec poſſet civitas nec exercitus ſuſtinere. Nullus tonitrûs fragor poſſet talibus comparari. Quædam tantum terrorem viſui incutiunt, quod coruſcationes nubium longe minus & ſine comparatione perturbant; quibus operibus Gideon in caſtris Midianitaram conſimilia æſtimatur fuiſſe operatus. Et experimentum hujus rei capimus ex hoc ludicro puerili, quod fit in multis mundi partibus, ſcilicet ut inſtrumento facto ad quantitatem pollicis humani ex violentiâ illius ſalis, qui Sal Petræ vocatur, tam horribilis ſonus naſcitur in rupturâ tam modicæ rei, ſcilicet modici pergameni, quod fortis tonitrui ſentiatur excedere rugitum, & coruſcationem maximam ſui luminis jubar excedit. Dr. Plot tells us (45) that it is plain, that Bacon either invented or knew Gun-powder, tho' he thinks that we cannot allow him leſs than the firſt, till we find out an ancienter author for it, ſince he died in 1292, near a hundred years before any of the other pretended inventions; which if no body does, ſays he, (as 'tis manifold odds they never will) in all probability it was invented here at Oxford, where he made the reſt of his affrightening experiments. And that out of his works Conſtantinus Ancklitzen of Friburg (d), or Bertholdus Swartz (e), and the reſt of the improvers, in all likelihood might have their pretended inventions, tho' we allow him not quite ſo explicit as in the copy of the reverend and learned Dr. Langbain, but that, as it is conjectured by Dr. Dee (f), he ſomewhat concealed his invention in the word [aliis], well knowing it might be dangerouſly deſtructive to mankind. Dr. Freind ſeems likewiſe to ſuppoſe that he was the Inventor of Gun-powder; for having mentioned ſeveral of his mechanical inventions he tells us (45), that there is ſomething too in a chymical way, which he hit upon, as extraordinary, and that is the ſecret of Gun-powder; he deſcribes the materials of its compoſition, and the amazing effects of it, noiſe and light. But Dr. Jebb obſerves, that Bacon perhaps borrowed his account of it from the treatiſe of one Marcus a Greek, which he calls Liber Ignium, a manuſcript of which is in the poſſeſſion of the learned Dr. Richard Mead. The account of Gun-powder by Marcus is as follows: Secundus modus ignis volatilis hoc modo conficitur. Recip. lib. 1. Sulphuris vivi, lib. 2. carbonis ſalicis, ſalis petroſi 6 libras, quæ tria ſubtiliſſimè terantur in lapide marmoreo; poſtea pulvis ad libitum in tunica reponatur volatili vel tonitrum faciente. Nota, quod tunica ad volandum debet eſſe gracilis & longa, & prædicto pulvere optimè conculcato repleta; tunica vel tonitrum faciens debet eſſe brevis, groſſa, & prædicto pulvere ſemiplena, & ab utraque parte filo fortiſſimo bene ligata. i. e. "The ſecond kind of vo- "latile fire is made in this manner. Take one pound "of ſulphur, two pounds of charcoal, and ſix pounds of "ſalt-peter, and beat theſe three ingredients together "in a mortar. Afterwards let the powder be put in- "to a ſocket, which is to fly up into the air, or to "raiſe a prodigious noiſe. You muſt obſerve, that "the flying ſocket ought to be thin and long, and "filled with the powder above mentioned well ram- "med into it; and that which is to burſt with a "great noiſe muſt be ſhort and thick, and half filled "with the ſaid powder, and tied at both ends with "a very ſtrong thread." But to return to Bacon; his knowledge, as Dr. Freind remarks (46), was ſo univerſal, that he had ſome inſight into Phyſic; for beſides what has been mentioned in Chymiſtry, among other Tracts, which he has left us in that way, there is one, wherein he animadverts upon ſome errors of the Phyſicians; and another work of his concerning the retarding the accidents of old age, and preſerving the ſenſes; a book inſcrib'd to and written for the uſe of Pope Nicholas IV a little before the death of the Author, with a deſign probably to mollify that Prelate, who, as he had been General of the Franciſcan Order, had been concerned in the perſecution of Bacon. "This Treatiſe "is not ill writ; he has here collected whatever he "had met with upon this ſubject, both in the Greek "and Arabian Writers, and has added a great many "remarks of his own. . . He ſpeaks much of the Pre- "parations of Medicines, which he had made trial of "himſelf; and gives broad hints particularly about a "tincture of gold, which might contribute very greatly "to prolong life; and recites a remarkable ſtory of "an old Sicilian plow-man, who by drinking gree- "dily of a yellowiſh ſtream, (which our Author ſuſ- "pects was impregnated with gold) grew young again, "and lived many years in full vigour (47)." Bacon likewiſe entered into the depth of the mechanical Sciences, and was ſo well acquainted with the force of elaſtic bodies, that in imitation of Archytas, who contrived a wooden dove, which could fly, he, as we are told, could make a flying chariot, and had an art of putting ſtatues into motion, and producing articulate ſounds out of a brazen head; and this, as Dr. Freind remarks (48), not by a magical power, but by one much ſuperior, that of Philoſophy and Nature, which can do ſuch things, to uſe his own expreſſions, as the ignorant think miracles. Mr. Wood in his Hiſtoria & Antiquitates Univerſitatis Oxonienſis (49) obſerves, that this ſtory of the brazen head was likewiſe aſcribed to Robert Groſtete Biſhop of Lincoln, tho' it is generally imputed to our Author. Bacono autem ut plurimum aſſuitur fabula ea de capite neſcio quo æneo.

[C] His Opus Majus.] In this Work he gives an account of almoſt all the new improvements, which he made in the Sciences. It has been the general notion, that

(41) In Epiſt. ad Pariſienſ. c. 6. apud Plot, pag. 231.

(42) See Plot, ibid.

(43) De Secret. Oper. Art. & Naturæ, cap. 6. apud Jebb. See likewiſe Dr. Plot, ubi ſupra, pag. 231, 232.

(44) Pag. 474.

(45) Ubi ſupra, pag. 232. See likewiſe p. 217.

(d) Vid. Guid. Pancirolli rer. memorabil. recens invent. Part 2. tit. 18.

(e) Vid. Steph. Forcatulum J. C. de Gallorum Imperio & Philoſoph. lib. 4. ſub finem.

(f) Dr. Dee's Annotations in Epiſt. ad Pariſienſem.

(46) Pag. 244.

(47) Idem, pag. 244, 245.

(48) Pag. 238, 239.

(49) Lib. 1. pag. 82. edit. 1674.

with ſeveral other Tracts, by his ſcholar John, whom he recommended to him in very ſtrong terms. This John was inſtructed by Bacon how to explain the difficulties which might that he wrote this in order to vindicate himſelf from the imputation of Magic, of which he had been accuſed to that Pope. Dr. Cave (50) and the Author of the Collection. Anglo-Minorit. (51), are of the ſame opinion. But this Work does not ſeem at all to be deſigned as an apology, nor does it appear, that the Author was accuſed of Magic before Pope Clement. For, as Dr. Jebb obſerves, his only view appears to have been to endeavour to ſerve the public by gratifying the Pope's requeſt, and introducing the true principles of Philoſophy under the ſanction of the Apoſtolical See. And we may obſerve, that in ſpeaking of this work, he tells the Pope, that out of reverence to his Holineſs's ſtation in the Church, he had endeavoured to carry Philoſophy to as great a degree of perfection, as the obſtacles which he met with would permit. Propter veſtræ celſitudinis reverentiam & officii dignitatem, quâ totius mundi utilitas debet procurari, prout potui per impedimenta, & ut memoriæ occurrebat, ſapientiam Philoſophiæ conabar uſque ad ultimam ſui deducere poteſtatem (52). And a little after he informs him, that if it had not been out of regard to the Vicegerent of our Saviour, and the advantage of the world, which could be promoted by him alone, he ſhould not have proceeded in that work, amidſt the obſtacles, which he encountered with, though all who were in God's Church ſhould have requeſted him ever ſo earneſtly. Niſi eſſet Vicarii Salvatoris ſolius reverentia & utilitas mundi per ipſum ſolum procuranda, non proceſſiſſem cum his impedimentis in hoc negotio pro omnibus, qui ſunt in Eccleſia Dei, quantumcunque rogaſſent & inſtitiſſent (53). Dr. Jebb tells us, that Bacon ſeems to have propoſed two things principally in this book; either, that laying down a good ſcheme of Philoſophy he might excite the Pope to reform the errors which had crept into the Church; or, if he could not effect this, to propoſe ſuch expedients as would break the power of Antichriſt, and retard his progreſs. For he appears to have been firmly perſuaded, that the Church would ſoon be reformed either by means of the Pope himſelf, who was a man of integrity, or becauſe the exorbitant dominion of Antichriſt would become obnoxious to mankind, and ſo fall to deſtruction. Duo ſibi potiſſimum in hoc opere præſtanda duxiſſe videtur Baconus; vel, ut purioris Philoſophiæ præcepta tradendo pontificem ad errores, qui in Eccleſiam irrepſerant, caſtigandos excitaret; vel, ſi hoc minus effici poſſet, ut remedia proferret, quæ Antichriſti vires frangerent, & progreſſus ejuſdem retardarent. [m] Id enim ſibi firmiter perſuaſiſſe viſus eſt, eccleſiam cito purgandam fore, vel pontificis optimi cura in eadem reformandâ adhibitâ, aut graſſante ſaltem Antichriſti tyrannide dominationem inviſam exercentis. Mr. Edward Leigh in his Fœtix Conſortium, or a fit Conjunction of Religion and Learning (54), mentions this work, and tells us, that Bacon hath a manuſcript intitled Opus Magnum, to ſhew, that all Sciences conduce to the underſtanding of the Scripture. Dr. Jebb publiſhed a beautiful edition of this work from a manuſcript in the Library at Dublin College, collated with ſeveral other MSS., at London in fol. 1733, under this title; Fratris Rogeri Bacon Ordinis Minorum Opus Majus ad Clementem Quartum Pontificem Romanum. Ex MS. Codice Dublinenſi, cum aliis quibuſdam collato, nunc primum edidit. S. Jebb, M. D. The Editor has prefixed a long Epiſtle addreſſed to Dr. Richard Mead, wherein he gives an account of his Author and edition; and obſerves, that very few of his writings had been before publiſhed, though Leland, Balæus, and Pitſeus have given us a long catalogue of them. However he tells us, that Sir Kenelm Digby and Dr. G. Langbain, Provoſt of Queen's College at Oxford, had formerly undertaken to publiſh Bacon's Works at the advice of Mr. Selden, as appears from their letters to that great man, ſome fragments of which Dr. Jebb has printed. Sir Kenelm Digby has this paſſage in his letter dated from Paris Feb. 11. 1637. Your Collections concerning Bacon I ſhall print before his Works, under your name. Dr. Langbain in a letter dated Jan. the 30th 1653, ſays; When I have heretofore made report to ſome judicious friends of ſeveral paſſages in Fryar Bacon's Epiſtle to Pope Clement, which I perceive is the ſame with what you call De Utilitate Scientiarum, they were very much taken with them, and ſuitors to me for a publication. In a letter dated Feb. the 9th 1653, he ſays; I am very much encouraged by your laſt to reſume thoſe thoughts which I had laid aſide, of publiſhing that piece of Roger Bacon. And in another dated February the 20th 1653, he ſays; That later copy is of ſo legible a hand, as, unleſs I receive a countermand from you, I ſhall not long forbear to get it tranſcribed with a purpoſe to print all together, for I judge it well deſerves to be more public. Dr. Jebb had propoſed to have publiſhed all his Works about three years before his edition of the Opus Majus; but while he was engaged in that deſign, he was informed by letters from Dublin, that there was a manuſcript in the College Library there, which contained a great many Treatiſes, generally aſcribed to Bacon, and diſpoſed in ſuch order, that they ſeemed to form one complete work. But the title was wanting, which had been careleſly torn off from the reſt of the manuſcript. The Doctor ſoon found that it was a collection of thoſe Tracts, which Bacon had written for the uſe of Pope Clement IV, and to which he had given the title of Opus Majus, ſince it appeared, that what he had ſaid of that Work in his Opus Tertium addreſſed to the ſame Pope, exactly ſuited with this, which contained an account of almoſt all the new diſcoveries and improvements which he had made in the Sciences. Upon this account Dr. Jebb laid aſide his former deſign, and reſolved to publiſh only an edition of this Opus Majus. The manuſcripts which he made uſe of to complete this edition, are as follow: 1. MS. in the Cotton Library, inſcribed, Jul. D. V. which contains the firſt part of the Opus Majus, under the title of a Treatiſe de utilitate Scientiarum. 2. Another MS. in the ſame Library marked Tib. C. V. containing the fourth part of the Opus Majus, in which is ſhewn, the uſe of Mathematics in the Sciences and affairs of the world. In the MS. it is erroneouſly called the fifth part. 3. A MS. in the Library belonging to Corpus Chriſti in Cambridge, containing that portion of the fourth part which treats of Geography. 4. A MS. of the fifth part, containing the treatiſe upon Perſpective, in the Earl of Oxford's Library. 5. A MS. in the Library of Magdalen College in Cambridge, containing the ſame treatiſe of Perſpective. 6. Two MSS. in the King's Library, communicated to the Editor by Dr. Richard Bentley, one of which contains the fourth part of the Opus Majus, and the other the fifth part. The reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed with a general account of a work, which till lately was imagined to have been loſt, and which is eſteemed the moſt conſiderable of all his writings. In the firſt chapter of the firſt part (55) he obſerves, that there are four chief obſtacles, which prevent men from attaining to true knowledge, namely, dependance upon the weak authority of others, the length of cuſtom, the opinion of the ignorant vulgar, and the concealment of one's own real ignorance under the oſtentation of ſeeming knowledge. Quatuor vero ſunt maxima comprehendendæ veritatis offendicula, quæ omnem quemcunque ſapientem impediunt, & vix aliquem permittunt ad verum titulum ſapientiæ pervenire, viz. fragilis & indignæ auctoritatis exemplum, conſuetudinis diuturnitas, vulgi ſenſus imperiti, & propriæ ignorantiæ occultatio cum oſtentatione ſapientiæ apparentis. He endeavours to remove the three firſt of theſe obſtacles by authority, experience, and reaſon, and to ſhew how injurious all of them are by miſleading mankind into the moſt abſurd and dangerous opinions, and extinguiſhing the light of truth. He concludes therefore in his ſeventh chapter, that we ought not to give our aſſent to every thing that we hear or read, but to examine carefully the opinions of thoſe who have gone before us, that we may add what was wanting to them, and correct their errors, though with all poſſible modeſty. Quoniam igitur hæc ita ſe habent, non oportet nos adhærere omnibus quæ audimus & legimus, ſed examinare debemus diſtrictiſſimè ſententias majorum, ut addamus quæ eis defuerunt, & corrigamus quæ errata ſunt, cum omni tamen modeſtiâ & excuſatione (56). In his twelfth chapter he complains, that a great many parts of Learning of the utmoſt importance were neglected

(50) Hiſt. Litter. pag. 486. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(51) Pag. 111.

(52) MS. Cotton. Tiber. C. 5. fol. 1. apud Jebb.

(53) Ibid. fol. 3.

m Op. 3. ad Clem. MS. Cot. Tib. C. 5. fol. 2. Op. Min. ibid. C. 1.

(54) Lib. 3. cap. 5. pag. 125. edit. 1663. in fol.

(55) Pag. 2.

(56) Pag. 10, 11.

might occur in his writings, and carried with him ſeveral mathematical inſtruments made by Bacon, as a preſent to his Holineſs. Our Author was greatly poſſeſſed with the belief of lected merely from the ignorance of mankind in his time; and that the knowledge of the Languages and Mathematics, though highly valued by the Antients, was deſpiſed by the Moderns, who endeavoured to vindicate themſelves in that point by the authority of ſome weak though good men. He ſhews, that many of the Saints and Fathers were involved in the common infirmities of human nature, and conſequently that their example ought not abſolutely to determine our conduct. And in the following chapter (57) he obſerves, that there were ſome peculiar reaſons which prevented them from applying themſelves to Philoſophy, and particularly, becauſe Ariſtotle's books were not then tranſlated into Latin, and they were extremely attach'd to Plato's Writings, whoſe doctrines they found to be inconſiſtent with thoſe of Ariſtotle. In his fourteenth Chapter (58) he proceeds to mention other reaſons for the neglect of Philoſophy in the primitive Church; which neglect likewiſe continued among the later Divines (59). In the laſt chapter (60) he addreſſes himſelf to Pope Clement, and tells him, that if it was not poſſible for his Holineſs during his Pontificate to perfect the whole reformation of the vulgar errors, yet he might lay the foundation for the ſuperſtructure, ſo that his ſucceſſors might with the greater facility complete what had been thus ſo happily begun. Quod ſi non eſt temporis veſtri omnia apud vulgum conſummare, poterit veſtra magnificentia locare fundamenta, fontes eruere, radices figere, ut veſtræ ſanctitatis ſucceſſores, quod feliciter inceptum fuerit, valeant facilius adimplere. In the firſt chapter of the ſecond part he tells us, that there is one perfect kind of wiſdom which is contained in the holy Scriptures, from which ſource all truth is derived. Relegatis igitur quatuor cauſis totius ignorantiæ humanæ generalibus, volo in hac ſecundâ diſtinctione unam ſapientiam eſſe perfectam oſtendere, & hanc in ſacris literis contineri; de cujus radicibus omnis veritas eruitur. In the following chapters he endeavours to ſhew, that true Philoſophy is not inconſiſtent with Divinity, but rather promotive of the true knowledge of the Deity and Religion, which he confirms from the authority of the antient Chriſtians themſelves. And he tells us in the beginning of the ſeventh chapter (61) that the whole deſign of Philoſophy conſiſts in this, that we may know the Creator by means of the creature, and perceive the obligations which we are under from the excellence of his nature, and the goodneſs which he has exerted in the creation and conſervation of mankind, with the aſſurances of a future felicity, to ſerve him with a proper reverence of mind, and regulation of our behaviour according to the laws of juſtice and reaſon. Cæterum totius Philoſophiæ decurſus conſiſtit in eo, ut per cognitionem ſuæ creaturæ cognoſcatur Creator, cui propter reverentiam majeſtatis & beneficium creationis & conſervationis & futuræ felicitatis ſerviatur in cultu honorifico & morum pulchritudine & legum honeſtate, ut in pace & honeſtate vivant homines in hac vitâ. In his third part (62) he treats of the Uſefulneſs of Grammar, and obſerves that it is impoſſible for the Latins to attain the knowledge of thoſe things, which are neceſſary both in divine and human learning, without a proper ſkill in other languages; ſince all the Old and New Teſtament is tranſlated from the Hebrew and Greek, and Philoſophy is likewiſe borrowed from thoſe languages and the Arabic; and ſince it is impoſſible to preſerve the propriety and force of one language in another. The conſequence of this therefore is, that none of the Latins can obtain ſuch a knowledge as is neceſſary in the holy Scriptures and Philoſophy, without underſtanding the tongues from whence they are tranſlated. Et ideo nullus Latinus ſapientiam ſacræ ſapientiæ & philoſophiæ poterit ut oportet intelligere, niſi intelligat linguas, à quibus ſunt tranſlatæ. The ſecond conſideration which he urges in proof of this, is, that the Tranſlators had not words enough in Latin to expreſs the terms of the ſciences. In the third place he tells us, that it is neceſſary the Tranſlator ſhould underſtand the ſcience which he treats of, and the languages which he tranſlates from and into; whereas almoſt all of them have been extremely defective in theſe points. The fourth reaſon is, that a great many things both in Philoſophy and Divinity were ſtill wanting to the Latins; of which he mentions ſeveral inſtances. The fifth reaſon is, that as the ſciences had been delivered to the Latins from other languages, all the Saints and Philoſophers among the Latins, who treat of the Sciences, have made great uſe of thoſe languages, and employed a variety of Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic words. The ſixth reaſon is, the neceſſity of correcting an infinite number of errors both in the text of Divinity, as he ſtiles it, and that of Philoſophy, which errors are not only in the letter, but likewiſe in the ſenſe. And becauſe the errors are of more conſequence in Divinity than in Philoſophy, he proceeds to point out the corruption of the text of the holy Scriptures, in order to ſhew the neceſſity of the knowledge of the tongues in order to correct it. Sexta ratio eſt propter errorum & falſitatum infinitarum correctionem in textu tam theologiæ quam philoſophiæ, non ſolum in literâ, ſed in ſenſu. Quod autem correctio ſit neceſſaria, probo per corruptionis magnitudinem. Et quoniam periculoſius erratur in textu Dei quam in textu Philoſophiæ, ideo convertam linguarum poteſtatem ad corruptionem textûs ſacri, ut pateat neceſſitas earum (63). He gives ſeveral inſtances of this corruption. His ſeventh reaſon is, that it is neceſſary for the Latins to underſtand the languages, even tho' the text were pure and uncorrupt, in order to obtain the true ſenſe of the words amidſt the variety of interpretations. His laſt reaſon for the neceſſity of the tongues, is, that the Grammar of the Latins is derived from the Greek and Hebrew. Eſt ultima ratio ſcientialis de neceſſitate linguarum, quod Grammatica in lingua Latinorum tracta eſt à Græco & Hebræo. Our Author's fourth part is deſigned to ſhew the uſe of Mathematics in the ſciences and affairs and employments of this world. In qua oſtenditur poteſtas mathematicæ in ſcientiis & rebus & occupationibus hujus mundi. In the firſt chapter he tells us, that there are four great ſciences, without which the reſt cannot be underſtood, but by the knowledge of which any perſon may make a noble progreſs without any difficulty both in divine and human learning. That the key of theſe ſciences is the Mathematics, which holy men diſcovered from the beginning of the world, and which was always in uſe among all holy and wiſe men above the other ſciences. But that the neglect of this for thirty or forty years paſt had deſtroyed all the learning among the Latins; ſince a perſon, who is not converſant in that ſcience, can never underſtand the reſt, nor the affairs of this world, as he ſhall ſhew in the courſe of his work. And, what is ſtill worſe, thoſe, who are ignorant of it, do not perceive their ignorance, and therefore ſeek no remedy. Whereas on the other hand the knowledge of Mathematics prepares the mind for a compleat ſkill in all things; ſo that if we make ourſelves maſters of this as the foundation of our ſtudies, and apply it to the other ſciences in a proper manner, we ſhall then be able to attain what follows with the utmoſt facility, and without any error or doubt. But without the aſſiſtance of Mathematics neither the preceding nor conſequent parts of learning can be obtained, ſince the ſtudy of it is the only means of opening the way to our farther improvement in knowledge. Et harum ſcientiarum porta & clavis eſt mathematica, quam ſancti à principio mundi invenerunt, ut oſtendam, & quæ ſemper fuit in uſu omnium ſanctorum & ſapientum præ omnibus aliis ſcientiis. Cujus negligentia jam per triginta vel quadraginta annos deſtruxit totum ſtudium Latinorum. Quoniam qui ignorat eam non poteſt ſcire cæteras ſcientias, nec res hujus mundi, ut probabo. Et quod pejus eſt, homines eam ignorantes non percipiunt ſuam ignorantiam, & ideo remedium non quærunt. Ac per contrarium hujus ſcientiæ notitia præparat animum & elevat ad omnium certificatam cognitionem, ut ſi radices ſapientiæ datas circa illam cognoſcat, & eas radices recte applicet ad cæterarum ſcientiarum & rerum cognitiones, tunc omnia ſequentia poterit ſcire ſine errore & ſine dubitatione, ac de facili & potenter. Sine his enim nec præcedentia nec conſequentia ſciri poſſunt, unde perficiunt priora & regulant, ſicut finis ea quæ ſunt ad finem, & diſponunt & aperiunt viam ad ſequentia (64).

(57) Pag. 18.
(58) Pag. 18, 19.
(59) Cap. 15. pag. 21.
(60) Pag. 21, 22.
(61) Pag. 28, 29.
(62) Pag. 44.
(63) Pag. 49.
(64) Pag. 57.

of judiciary Aſtrology, which was one of the reaſons that expoſed him to the imputation of magic.

In the ſecond chapter he proves from authority, that every one of the ſciences requires the knowledge of the Mathematics; and in the third he proves the ſame from reaſon. In the ſecond Diſtinction of the fourth part, he ſhews the neceſſity of that ſcience in order to underſtand the things of this world. In the third and fourth Diſtinctions he lays down mathematical principles for the explication of ſeveral of the Phænomena of the univerſe, and examines into the nature of the ſeveral climates of the earth, eſpecially of thoſe near the poles, and the middle of the earth. In the fifth chapter of the fourth Diſtinction he treats of the Cauſe of the ebbing and flowing of the Sea; and in the ſeventh chapter of the Infinity of Matter; de Infinitate Materiæ. In the eighth chapter he enquires whether bodies touch each other in a point; and in the ninth he treats of the Figure of the World, which he determines to be ſpherical, and aſſerts that the earth is likewiſe of the ſame form. In the twelfth chapter he endeavours to ſhew, that there are no more worlds, nor ſuns, nor moons, than one; and that matter is not extended in infinitum. In the thirteenth he treats of the Unity of Time, de Unitate Temporis; and in the fourteenth he aſſerts that motion occaſions heat. In the fifteenth he treats of the Motion of a Ballance, de Motu Libræ. After having ſhewn the Neceſſity of Mathematics in human affairs and ſciences, he proceeds then to ſhew it likewiſe in thoſe, which are divine. And he obſerves, that ſince he had proved, that Philoſophy cannot be underſtood without Mathematics, and ſince every one perceived that Divinity cannot be underſtood without Philoſophy, it follows therefore, that a Divine is obliged to make himſelf maſter of the Mathematics. Cum igitur oſtenſum ſit quod philoſophia non poteſt ſciri, niſi ſciatur mathematica, & omnes ſciunt quod theologia non poteſt ſciri niſi ſciatur philoſophia, neceſſe eſt ut theologus ſciat mathematicam (65). He ſhews that all holy men have made uſe of the Mathematics; and alledges ſeven weighty reaſons why the ſtudy of it is neceſſary to a Divine, and eſpecially from the uſe of Aſtronomy and Chronology in the explication of the Scriptures; and in this part we have ſeveral curious enquiries into thoſe Sciences and Muſic. He then anſwers the objections urged againſt Mathematics, and particularly that which is drawn from the unlawfulneſs of Judiciary Aſtrology; upon which occaſion, he obſerves, that the true Aſtrologers do not pretend to an abſolute certainty in their judgments, nor aſſert that human actions are neceſſarily determined by the influence of the ſtars (66), but always proceed upon the ſuppoſition of human liberty (67). He propoſes the reformation of the Calendar (68). Having thus ſhewn the Neceſſity of Mathematics with regard to Philoſophy, Divinity, and the Church of God, he proceeds to point out the advantage of it, with reſpect to the uſeful diſcoveries which may be made of it, and particularly in Phyſic; which requires a different management of the body according to the difference of the climate; for which purpoſe he diſcourſes at large of the ſeveral parts of the earth, and gives a deſcription of theſe countries. He afterwards conſiders the Virtues of the fix'd ſtars, the number of whom he reckons to be DXXII, and of the Planets, and their Influences upon mankind. The fifth part of his Opus Majus treats of Perſpective, in which he diſcourſes at large of the Faculties of the Soul, and the Organs of Sight, and ſhews that ſight is not performed in the eye itſelf, but in the optic nerve. He is very diffuſe upon the Requiſites in the organs and objects of ſight; and in his third diviſion of this part examines into the nature of reflex and refracted Viſion, and treats of ſeveral kind of Glaſſes. Then follows his Tract de Multiplicatione Specierum. The ſixth part of his Opus Majus is concerning Experimental Knowledge; in the firſt chapter of which he tells us, that having thus laid the foundation of learning in the Languages, Mathematics, and Perſpective, he ſhall proceed to the ſcience of Experiments, ſince nothing can be ſufficiently underſtood without experiments. For he obſerves, that there are two methods of obtaining knowledge, one by argument, and the other by experiment. An argument determines a queſtion, and obliges us to determine it, but it does not give us abſolute certainty, nor remove all doubt, ſo that the mind ſhall acquieſce in the perception of truth, unleſs it diſcover it by the way of experiment. Many perſons have arguments enough in the ſeveral parts of knowledge, but not having made experiments, they are negligent, and do not avoid and purſue what they ought to do. Thus if a man, who never ſaw fire, has proved by ſufficient arguments, that it burns and injures and deſtroys things, yet his mind would never be ſufficiently ſatisfied with this proof, nor would he avoid the fire, till he had put his hand or ſome combuſtible matter to it, in order to know by experience the truth of what his arguments aſſerted. This is particularly evident in the Mathematics. Poſitis radicibus ſapientiæ Latinorum penes linguas & mathematicam & perſpectivam, nunc volo revolvere radices à parte ſcientiæ experimentalis, quia ſine experientia nihil ſufficienter ſciri poteſt. Duo enim ſunt modi cognoſcendi, ſcilicet per argumentum & experimentum. Argumentum concludit & facit nos concludere quæſtionem, ſed non certificat neque removet dubitationem, ut quieſcat animus in intuitu veritatis, niſi eam inveniat viâ experientiæ; quia multi habent argumenta ad ſcibilia, ſed quia non habent experientiam, negligunt ea, nec vitant nociva, nec perſequuntur bona. Si enim aliquis homo, qui nunquam vidit ignem, probavit per argumenta ſufficientia quod ignis comburit & lædit res & deſtruit, nunquam propter hoc quieſceret animus audientis nec ignem vitaret, antequam poneret manum vel rem combuſtilem ad ignem, ut per experientiam probaret quod argumentum edocebat; ſed aſſumptâ experientiâ combuſtionis certificatur animus, & quieſcit in fulgore veritatis, quo argumentum non ſufficit, ſed experientia. Et hoc patet in Mathematicis, ubi eſt potiſſima demonſtratio (69). He obſerves (70), that this ſcience of Experiments has three great prerogatives above the other ſciences; the firſt of which is, that it examines and inveſtigates all the noble concluſions of thoſe ſciences by experience; and he illuſtrates this by a long explication of the phænomenon of the rainbow. The ſecond prerogative of it is, that it diſcovers ſeveral noble truths within the limits of the other ſciences, which could not be found out by means of thoſe ſciences themſelves. He mentions ſome inſtances, which he tells us that he knew by experience to be true. The firſt inſtance is as follows: Mathematics, ſays he (71), can eaſily produce a ſpherical Aſtrolabe, in which are deſcribed all the parts of the heavens, which are neceſſary, according to the longitudes and latitudes, with the proper circles and ſtars agreeable to Ptolemy's method in his Almage. But it is not in the power of the Mathematics to cauſe a body of that form to move naturally with a diurnal motion; whereas a man perfectly ſkilled in experimental Philoſophy is able to conſider of the methods of that motion, being induced to it by a great many things, which follow the motion of the heavenly bodies, as in the firſt place the three elements, which are moved circularly by the celeſtial influences, then the comets, ſeas, rivers, marrow, the brains of animals, and the matter of diſeaſes. Plants likewiſe open and ſhut themſelves according to the ſun's motion. The Philoſopher therefore is excited by the conſideration of theſe things, which have ſome reſemblance to what he intends, ſo that he may be able at laſt to complete his deſign. Such an inſtrument, ſays he, would be worth a King's treaſure, and the inſtruments of aſtronomy and clocks would become uſeleſs, and it would be an admirable effect of Art and Philoſophy. Et tunc theſaurum unius regis valeret hoc inſtrumentum, & ceſſarent inſtrumenta aſtronomiæ & horologia, & eſſet pulcherrimum ſpectaculum ſapientiæ (72). His ſecond inſtance is a Method of prolonging life; and his third the Tranſmutation of metals. The third prerogative of Experimental Philoſophy is, that without regard to any of the other ſciences, by its own power it inveſtigates the ſecrets of nature; and this, he tells us, conſiſts in two things, in the knowledge of things to come, as well as thoſe, which are paſt and preſent, and in the wonderful works, by which it ſurpaſſes the common Judiciary Aſtrology in the method of forming a judgment of things future. And under this head he mentions that ſome Authors have aſſerted the poſſibility of changing the genius and diſpoſition of a Nation, by altering the conſtitution of the air; upon which occaſion he tells us, that when Alexander

(65) Pag. 108.
(66) See p. 155.
(67) Pag. 169, & ſeq.
(68) Pag. 169, & ſeq.
(69) Pag. 445.
(70) Pag. 448.
(71) Pag. 465.
(72) Pag. 468.

magic [D]. It is not known whether the works which he ſent to Pope Clement proved agreeable to him, or not. Some Writers (s) tell us, that he admired the Author, and generouſly promoted his ſtudies, and raiſed his ſcholar John to conſiderable preferments. But it does not appear that Bacon's Writings were of any great advantage to himſelf, ſince it is certain, that he ſtill continued in the monaſtery at Paris, though he complained very highly of the perſecutions which he ſuffered from the Monks there. However this neglect

(s) Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 1. pag. 138.

Alexander the Great enquired of Ariſtotle whether he ſhould exterminate the barbarous nations, which he met with, on account of their intolerable ferocity, or permit them to live, that Philoſopher anſwered him in his Book of Secrets, that if he could alter the air of the country, he ſhould ſuffer them to live, if not, he ſhould deſtroy them. For he thought, continues our Author, that the air might be changed to advantage, ſo that the complexion of their bodies might be altered, and by that means their minds might produce a courſe of good actions from the freedom of their wills; and this is one of the ſecrets. Opera vera hujus ſcientiæ, quæ oſtendunt philoſophum, quidam teſtantur eſſe in alteratione regionis, ut mores vulgi alterentur, de quibus Alexandro quærenti ab Ariſtotele gentibus, quas invenit, an eas exterminaret propter morum feritatem, an permitteret eos vivere, ipſe Ariſtoteles philoſophorum doctiſſimus in Libro Secretorum reſpondit, ſi potes alterare aerem ipſorum, permitte eos vivere; ſi non, interfice eos. Voluit enim quod aer eorum potuit alterari utiliter, ut complexiones corporum eorum alterentur, & deinde animi excitati per complexiones elicerent bonos mores ex arbitrii libertate; & hoc eſt unum ex ſecretis. He obſerves afterwards, that ſome Writers have affirmed, that an army has been ſtruck with ſuch a terror, as to fly immediately; and he tells us, that Ariſtotle directed Alexander to carry a particular ſtone about him; by which means his enemies would always fly before him. Theſe and a great many other things, ſays he, are aſſerted by Philoſophers to be true, tho' they do not pretend, that any violence is offered to the freedom of the will, ſince Ariſtotle, who propoſes this, tells us in his Ethics, that the will cannot be forced, but that the body may be changed by the virtues of things, and the mind excited and induc'd to chooſe that voluntarily, to which it is inclined, as by means of medicinal potions many perſons have been changed not only with regard to their bodies, but likewiſe their paſſions and inclinations. Hæc & hujuſmodi innumerabilia teſtantur eſſe vera, non intendentes quod violentia fiat libero arbitrio, cum ipſe Ariſtoteles, qui hoc proponit, dicit in Ethicis, quod voluntas cogi non poteſt, poteſt autem corpus alterari per virtutes rerum, & animi deinde excitantur & moventur, ut omnino gratis velint illud ad quod inclinantur, ſicut per potiones & medicinas multas in libro medicorum, multos non ſolum in corpore poſſe alterari, ſed in paſſionibus animæ & inclinatione voluntatis (73). He proceeds then to treat of ſeveral other things, whoſe effects are more natural, without working any ſuch wonderful change in the will; and diſplays the great advantages, which may reſult from Experimental Philoſophy to the Public. He obſerves, that the Church of God might employ the effects of it in the improvement of Navigation and War for the deſtruction of all her enemies, which would be more eaſily deſtroyed by the inventions of Art and Philoſophy, than the weapons of war; the former of which he tells us, were made uſe of in paſt Ages by tyrants in ſubduing the world, as appears, ſays he, from innumerable inſtances. Et jam ex iſtis ſcientiis tribus patet mirabilis utilitas in hoc mundo pro eccleſiâ Dei contra inimicos fidei, deſtruendos magis per opera ſapientiæ, quam arma bellica pugnatorum, &c. Upon this occaſion he mentions Alexander's conqueſt of the Eaſt with a ſmall number of forces, and remarks, that Oroſius affirms, that he executed this vaſt deſign no leſs by means of art than by the valour of the Macedonians. "This, continues Bacon, "is not at all wonderful, when Ariſtotle attended "him, as we read in the Life of that Philoſopher; "and Seneca tells us in his Natural Queſtions, that "Alexander conquered the world, by the direction of "Ariſtotle and Calliſthenes; who were his inſtructors "in all kinds of wiſdom. But Ariſtotle was the principal perſon in theſe affairs; and it is evident from "what has been ſaid above how he was able to deliver up the world to Alexander by the methods "of Wiſdom and Philoſophy. The Church ought "to conſider this in oppoſing infidels and rebels, that "Chriſtian blood may be ſpared, and eſpecially on "account of future dangers in the times of Antichriſt, "which with the grace of God it would be eaſy to "obviate, if the Prelates and Princes would promote "a ſtudy of Philoſophy, and ſearch out the ſecrets of "nature and art." Sed Oroſius dicit, non minus arte quam virtute Macedonum ſuperavit. Nec mirum, cum Ariſtoteles fuerit cum eo in his bellis, ut legimus in vita Ariſtotelis. Et etiam Seneca in Naturalibus dicit quod mundum vicit Alexander, Ariſtotele & Calliſthene ducibus, qui magiſtri ei fuerunt in omni ſapientia. Sed Ariſtoteles extitit principalis; & facile patet per prædicta quomodo per vias ſapientiæ potuit Ariſtoteles mundum tradere Alexandro; & hoc deberet eccleſia conſiderare contra infideles & rebelles, ut parcatur ſanguini Chriſtiano, & maxime propter futura pericula in temporibus Antichriſti, quibus cum Dei gratia facile eſſet obviare, ſi prælati & principes ſtudium promoverent; & ſecreta naturæ & artis indagarent (74).

(73) Pag. 473.

(74) Pag. 477.

[D] Poſſeſſed with the notion of judiciary Aſtrology, which was one of the reaſons that expoſed him to the imputation of magic.] He imagined that the Stars had a great influence upon human affairs, ſo that by means of them he thought things to come might be foretold, and that the mind of man was diſpoſed by them to good or evil. He tells us in his Opus Majus (75), that God has pleaſed to regulate the world in ſuch a manner, that ſome things which he foreſaw or predetermined ſhould come to paſs, ſhou'd be diſcovered to men of Reaſon and Philoſophy by the Planets. Voluit ergo Deus res ſuas ſic ordinare, ut quædam, quæ futura præviderit, vel prædeſtinaverit, rationabilibus per planetas oſtenderentur. And in another place (76) he obſerves, that true Mathematicians do not preſume to be poſitive with regard to human affairs, but conſider how the body is altered by the heavens, and conſequently how the mind through the alteration of the body is influenced ſometimes to private and ſometimes to public acts, though the liberty of the will is ſtill preſerved in all points. For though the rational ſoul is not forced in its acts, yet it may be ſtrongly induced and excited to do thoſe things voluntarily, to which the celeſtial influence inclines it; as we ſee men through company, fear, love, and other paſſions of that kind, alter their reſolutions greatly, and voluntarily do what they were unwilling to do before, though they are not obliged to it; juſt as a man chooſes to throw his moſt valuable effects into the Sea out of hopes to eſcape death. Sed in rebus humanis veri mathematici non præſumunt certificare, ſed conſiderant quomodo per cælum alteratur corpus, & alterato corpore excitatur anima nunc ad actus privatos, nunc publicos, ſalvâ tamen in omnibus arbitrii libertate. Quamvis enim anima rationalis non cogitur ad actus ſuos, tamen fortiter induci poteſt & excitari, ut gratis velit ea, ad quæ virtus cæleſtis inclinat, ſicut nos videmus homines per ſocietatem, conſilia, timorem, & amorem, & hujuſmodi, multum mutare de propoſito, & gratis velle ea quæ prius non volebant, licet non cogantur, ſicut ille, qui ſpe ſalutis projicit merces in mare cariſſimas. From hence he concluded, that nothing was to be undertaken, unleſs the Stars were propitious. And therefore in order to give a particular account of the influences of them at all times, he reſolved to draw up a ſet of Aſtronomical Tables, in which he tells us (77) "there was to be a ſcheme of all the motions of the heavenly bodies from the beginning of "the world to the end; and that then we might "every day conſider in the heavens all things which "were renewed in the earth, and ſeek out the like "diſpoſition of the heavens in ſome paſt period, and "find the like effects, and ſo on for the future, by "which means all things would be known." This, according to Dr. Jebb, gave occaſion to the Friers of his Order to conſider him as a perſon engaged in unlawful arts, upon which he was caſt into priſon; and

(75) Pag. 168.

(76) Ibid. pag. 156.

(77) Opus Tert. ad Clem. MS. Cot. Tib. C. 5. fol. 6. apud Jebb.

neglect of him might be occaſioned by the death of Clement the year following. Ten years after this in 1278, under the Pontificate of Nicholas III, Jerom de Eſculo General of the Order of the Franciſcans being appointed Legate in France, came to Paris, where he is ſaid to have condemned the doctrine of Bacon [E], at the advice of many of the Monks of that Order, and caſt him into priſon; and to prevent the cauſe from being carried to Rome, wrote to the Pope to confirm what he had done (q). Bacon was kept in priſon for many years, and when Jerom de Eſculo was choſen Pope under the name of Nicholas IV, he brought his cauſe before that Pope, but met with ſuch ill ſucceſs, that he was put under a more ſevere confinement (r). However at laſt by the intereſt of ſeveral noble perſons he was ſet at liberty, and returned to England, and died at Oxford in 1292 (ſ), in about the 78th year of his age [F], and was buried upon the feaſt of St. Barnabas in the Church of the Franciſcans. He wrote a prodigious number of books [G]. Johannes Picus Mirandula ſtiles him a moſt ingenious perſon (t); Biſhop Jewel "in

(q) Luc. Wadding. Annal. Fratr. Minor. tom. 2. pag. 449. and Jebb, ubi ſupra.

(r) Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. 1. p 38.

(ſ) Ibid. pag. 79.

(t) Vir ingenioſiſſimus. Pic. Mirandula, apud Pitſeum, ubi ſupra, and Balæum, Scriptor. Brytanniæ Centur. IV. p. 342. edit. Baſil. 1557.

and obliged to deſiſt from his undertaking. He tells us himſelf (78), that he had often endeavoured to draw up thoſe tables, but could not finiſh them on account of the ignorance of thoſe with whom he lived. Et ſæpe aggreſſus ſum compoſitionem iſtarum tabularum, ſed non potui conſummare propter .... ſtultitiam eorum, cum quibus habui facere. He was repreſented as a Conjurer, and as one, who had made a compact with the Devil, not only among the vulgar, but even among the more intelligent of the Divines themſelves. He obſerves in his Opus Majus (79), that "becauſe "theſe performances in Aſtrology ſeemed to the generality of Students above the reach of human underſtanding, by reaſon that they and their teachers "do not apply themſelves to Philoſophy, ſcarce any "perſon would venture to ſpeak of them in public. "Thoſe who were converſant in this art, were immediately ſtigmatized as Magicians, though they "were only learned Philoſophers. The Divines and "Canoniſts, who are not ſkilled in theſe points, and "obſerve that bad things can be done as well as "good, neglect and deteſt them, and conſider them "as effects of magic. For they ſee that conjurers, "and thoſe who turn the rules of Philoſophy to bad "purpoſes, make uſe of them; and upon that account they eſteem them unworthy of Chriſtians." Sed quia hæc opera (aſtrologica ſcil.) videntur vulgo ſtudentium eſſe ſupra humanum intellectum, quia vulgus cum ſuis doctoribus non vacat operibus ſapientiæ, ideo vix eſt aliquis auſus loqui de his operibus in publico. Statim enim vocantur magici, cum tamen ſint ſapientiſſimi, qui hæc ſciunt. Utique theologi & decretiſtæ non inſtructi in talibus, ſimulque videntes quod mala poſſunt fieri ſicut & bona, negligunt hæc & abhorrent, & computant inter magica. Vident etiam quod magici & abuſores documentorum ſapientiæ his utuntur, & ideo æſtimant indigna Chriſtianis. Mr. Wood obſerves (80), that Balæus in the firſt edition (81) had ſtigmatized Bacon with the odious imputation of being a Conjurer, Magician, and Necromancer, Præſtigiator, Magus, & Necromanticus; but that in his ſecond edition at Baſil 1559 in fol. he expunged thoſe reproachful expreſſions; and tells us, that he was prodigiouſly skilled in the Mathematics, without ever engaging in the ſtudy of Necromancy, though many perſons have caſt that ſcandal upon him. Acceſſit ei in Matheſi peritia incredibilis, ſed abſque Necromantiâ; quamvis ea à multis infametur (82). Pitſeus (83) obſerves, that his deep reſearches into the Mathematics and Natural Philoſophy drew this odium upon him, and that his enemies took that opportunity to procure his writings to be condemned, and himſelf to be caſt into priſon. The ſame Writer remarks, that this misfortune of his was occaſioned by his uncommon merit; for his profound and fruitful genius having diſcovered a great many noble inventions, which others envied him the honour of, or did not underſtand, their malice or ignorance led them to condemn what ſurpaſſed their own capacity to diſcover or to comprehend. Certe malum hac in parte non videtur homini eveniſſe, niſi ex ſuo bono; nam fœcundum illud & profundum litteratiſſimi hominis ingenium difficilia multa invenit, quæ aliorum ingenia, ſi alta, à ſe non inventa dolebant, & ex invidia accuſabant; ſi vulgaria, ne inventa quidem capere poterant. Itaque vel ex invidiâ vel ex ignorantiâ calumniabantur & condemnabant illa, quæ ſuam vel effugerant induſtriam, vel ſuperaverant captum. In ſuch an unlearned age as his was, it is no wonder, as Dr. Freind obſerves (84), that his great diſcoveries were ſo little underſtood. "Indeed, continues that Author, for this "very reaſon, that he performed things by the help "of mathematical knowledge, which were above "common underſtandings, he was ſuſpected of Magic. And as ignorance and malice are generally "active and violent, he was perſecuted particularly "by his own fraternity, ſo that they would not receive his works into their Library, and at laſt had "intereſt enough with the General of their Order to "get him impriſoned; ſo that, as he confeſſes himſelf, he had reaſon to repent of his having taken "ſuch pains in the Arts and Sciences." Dr. Plot tells us (85) that he wrote a whole Treatiſe againſt the uſe of Magic, Contra Necromanticos ſive de nullitate Magiæ.

(78) Ibid.

(79) Pag. 249.

(80) Hiſt. & Antiquit. Univerſitat. Oxon. lib. 1. pag. 79.

(81) Printed Gippeſwici in Anglia, ann. 1548, 4to. fol. 114. b.

(82) Balæus, Cent. 4. num. 55. pag. 342.

(83) Relat. Hiſt. de Rebus Anglic. pag. 366.

(84) Pag. 243.

(85) Natural Hiſt. of Oxfordſhire, ch. 9. pag. 217.

[E] Condemned the doctrine of Bacon.] Balæus (86) tells us, that the Monks charged his doctrine with containing ſome ſuſpected novelties. In ea nimirum dicebant aliquas contineri novitates ſuſpectas. But that Hiſtorian does not inform us, what thoſe novelties were. But we may collect from what Toſſinianenſis writes (87), that it was his opinion concerning judiciary Aſtrology, which was principally objected againſt, if that Writer's account be true, when he relates, that Jerom de Eſculo condemned Bacon's books de Necromanticis, i. e. "Of Necromancy;" de Prognoſticis ex Stellis, i. e. "Of Prognoſtics from the Stars;" and de verâ Aſtronomiâ; i. e. "Of true Aſtronomy." This diſgrace rendered his memory very obnoxious to thoſe of his own Order; and John Twine in his Comment. de rebus Albionicis &c. (88) informs us, that his Writings not being underſtood by them, but imagined to relate to ſubjects of Magic and Necromancy, were chained to the ſhelves in the Library of the Franciſcans at Oxford, where they were abſolutely neglected, and left to be conſumed by the moths. But Dr. Langbain rejects this account of Twine, as appears from the following paſſage in his letter to Selden, dated Jan. the 20th 1653, and quoted by Dr. Jebb. I doubt, ſays he, whether the ſtory be probable, as the ſcene is laid by Twine, where Abbot Voche ſpeaks it, as done before his time. Which, if true, I think would not have eſcaped the knowledge of Leland. And conſidering he was ſo much an admirer of Bacon, and withal ſo highly angry with that Houſe for making his acceſs into their Library ſo difficult, I do not ſee well how he could omit to have taken notice of it, &c. Though it be no neceſſary conſequence in Logick to argue ab authoritate negativè, yet this authority, all circumſtances conſidered, makes it to me very probable.

(86) Scriptor. Brytann. Cent. IV. pag. 342. edit. Baſil. 1557.

(87) See Collect. Anglo-Minorit. pag. 116. apud Jebb.

(88) Lib. 2. pag. 130.

[F] Died at Oxford in 1292, in about the 78*th year of his age.*] This is the account of Mr. Wood in his Hiſt. & Antiq. Univerſ. Oxon. (89). Pitſeus (90) and Balæus (91) tell us, that he died in 1284. Leland erroneouſly ſuppoſes that he died in 1248, as Dr. Freind (92), and Mr. Wood (93) informs us, the former of whom is of opinion, that his death is to be fixed upon June the 11th 1292. But Dr. Cave, and Dr. Jebb place it in 1694.

(89) Lib. 1. pag. 79.

(90) Ubi ſupra, pag. 369.

(91) Ubi ſupra, pag. 1284.

(92) Pag. 235.

(93) Ubi ſupra.

[G] He wrote a prodigious number of books.] Leland aſſures of this, and obſerves, that his genuine works, which he wiſhes for an hundred tongues to commend as they deſerve, were in his time ſo difficult to be met with, or at leaſt ſo mangled and imperfect in moſt of the Libraries which he had ſeen, that it would be as eaſy to gather up the Sybills leaves, as to collect even a bare catalogue of the books which he wrote. Nunc autem, pudet dicere, partim e ſuis forulis exciſi, & furto, cuſtodum negligentiâ, ſublati, partim mutili, direptis hinc inde quaternionibus, facti tam raro comparent, in his Defence of his Apology, Part IV. c. 15. tells us, that he "was notable and famous in "his time, and in all reſpects comparable then with the beſt." He was able to judge of "the Latin, Greek and Hebrew Tongues, as appears by his book De Idiomate Linguarum." And Selden De Diis Syris Syntag. 1. c. 2. obſerves, that he was a very excellent Mathematician, and maſter of an extent of Learning ſuperior to the age in which he lived. Dr. Freind (u) tells us, that he was the miracle of the age he lived in, and the greateſt genius perhaps for mechanical knowledge, which ever appeared in the world ſince the time of Archimedes. He complains likewiſe (w), that ſo great an Author ſhould not only be in a manner unknown to foreigners, but that they, who have profeſſedly wrote our Engliſh Hiſtories, ſhould have ſcarce ſaid any thing concerning him or his Works; though ſurely, ſays he very juſtly, ſome relation of ſo extraordinary a genius would have as well deſerved to have had a place in their writings, as the detail of a blazing ſtar, or a bloody ſhower; which they never fail to regiſter at large. And it might perhaps have been of as much uſe and pleaſure to the reader, as a long recital of the riſe and fall of a great Miniſter, or the wars and victories of our Kings.

(u) Hiſtory of Phyſic, Part 2. pag. 235.

(w) Ibid. pag. 248.

rent, ut facilius ſit Sibyllæ folia colligere, quam nomina librorum, quos ſcripſit. Pitſeus likewiſe tells us, that he wrote an infinite number of books upon almoſt all ſubjects, which was the moſt inconteſtable proof of his various and extenſive learning, Jam verò ad immenſam Librorum, quos de omni pene materiâ ſcripſit, multitudinem veniamus, quo nullum multiplicis ejus doctrinæ locupletius eſſe poteſt teſtimonium. Dr. Jebb has given us a catalogue of thoſe works which are aſcribed to him, according to the order of the Sciences, as particularly in Grammar, Mathematics, and Natural Philoſophy, Optics, Geography, Aſtronomy, Chronology, Chymiſtry, Magic, Logic, Metaphyſics and Ethics, Phyſic, Divinity, and Philology, with other miſcellaneous pieces. But that Gentleman is of opinion, that this prodigious number of books, which were ſaid to have been written by him, will be reduced to a few, if we conſider the affair rightly. For the copies of his writings being diſperſed into ſeveral places, it happened that the ſame Tracts had different titles given them, or that particular chapters or fragments of them were conſidered as diſtinct Treatiſes. He proceeds then to ſhew, that our Author wrote no Tract in Philoſophy, while he continued a Layman; and nothing but a few little pieces, Capitula quædam, before the year 1276, when he ſent his works to Pope Clement; ſo that the eleven books of his, which are mentioned by the writers of his life, ſcarce contain ſo many pages. The firſt conſiderable volume which he wrote was his Opus Majus, which he divided into ſix parts, and annexed to it his Tracts de Prognoſticis ex Stellis, de multiplicatione Specierum, and de Morali Philoſophia. Theſe ſeveral parts being tranſcribed ſeparately, with each of them a proper and diſtinct title, were conſidered as entire books, and enlarged the catalogues of his works. Beſides his Opus Majus, he ſent two other works to Pope Clement, one of which he ſtyled Opus Minus, and the other Opus Tertium. Manuſcripts of both theſe works are extant in the Cotton Library, but that of the Opus Minus is imperfect. After the death of Pope Clement, Bacon about the year 1271 reviſed this work, and corrected and enlarged it conſiderably, as appears from the manuſcript of it in the Library abovementioned (94). His Treatiſe of Chronology, which in the manuſcript in the King's Library is entitled Computus Rogeri Bacon, is called by Balæus and Pitſeus Computus Naturalium. He divided it into three parts; at the end are ſubjoined a Calendar and ſome Aſtronomical Tables, which tho' they have not his name to them, are moſt probably of his own compoſition, ſince he tells us himſelf, that he had undertaken to draw up ſuch a ſett of Tables, and ſome of them relate to the year 1269, which very well agrees with the age of Bacon. It is uncertain whether he wrote any thing after this till he was caſt into priſon; tho' his three Epiſtles to Johannes Pariſienſis, publiſhed at Francfort 1620 with ſome other chymical pieces of our Author, may be well enough reduced under this period. But when Jerom de Eſculo was raiſed to the Popedom in the year 1288, in order to mitigate the reſentments of that Prelate, Bacon is ſaid to have written his Book de retardandis ſenectutis accidentibus for the uſe of his Holineſs. This Book was publiſhed at Oxford in 1590, and divided it into ſeveral Tracts de Retardatione ſenectutis, de univerſali Regimine ſenum, and de Conſervatione ſenſuum. Upon his recovering of his liberty, and return into his own country, tho' he was then very old, at the deſire of his friends, who requeſted him to publiſh ſome pieces in Divinity, he wrote his Compendium ſtudii theologici. There are ſeveral pieces falſely aſcribed to him, as particularly Tractatus ſuper Pſalterium, Vita S. Edmundi Archiepiſcopi Cantuarienſis, which are thought to have been written by Robert Bacon. The Treatiſe de Fluxu & Refluxu Maris Britannici is aſcribed to Walter Botoner; and the Rogerina major & minor to Thomas de Sancto Amando, and by others to Roger of Parma (95). Dr. Freind obſerves (96), that there is a copy of the two laſt Treatiſes in the Harleyan Library; but as they contain in a manner the whole practice of Phyſic in all diſtempers, he tells us, that he ſhould queſtion very much, if Bacon, who without diſpute never made this profeſſion his buſineſs, were the Author; and therefore, he thinks that it is much more probable, that they might have been written by Roger of Parma, whoſe Books of Surgery are now extant. He informs us likewiſe, that as to the writings of Bacon in general, many, which go under his name, are without doubt ſpurious; and that ſuch particularly is the piece ſo much cryed up by the Chymiſts concerning the Oil of Antimony, where ſome Authors are quoted, who lived long after him.

(95) Jebb, ubi ſupra.

(96) Pag. 249.

T.

(94) Op. Min. C. 1. MS. Cot. Tib. C. 5. fol. 121.

BACON (FRANCIS) Lord High Chancellor of England, under King James I, was one of the greateſt genius's of his age, and one of thoſe, who knew beſt the imperfect ſtate in which Philoſophy then was. He laboured very intenſely to find out the proper means of remedying theſe defects, and he formed ſome excellent plans for the reformation of it [A]. The Public received his Works with great applauſe. There was a complete edition of them publiſhed at Frankfort in folio in the year 1665. The Journal des Savans did not mention it without giving a great elogium to this illuſtrious Chancellor (a). The treatiſe De Augmentis Scientiarum, which was reprinted at Paris in 1624, is one of the beſt productions of the Author [B]. His Moral and Political Works, tranſlated into French by Baudouin, (a) In the Journal of the 8th of March 1666. Obſerve, that there was promiſed an edition in ſix volumes in 12mo, in 1684. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for June 1684, in the catalogue of new books, num. 5.

[A] He formed ſome excellent plans for a reformation of it.] See what Mr. Baillet has ſaid in the firſt volume of his Life of Mr. Des Cartes (1), and what Gaſſendi has ſaid in particular of Bacon's Logic (2).

(1) Pag. 147, 148.

(2) Gaſſendi, Oper. tom. 1. pag. 62.

[B] His treatiſe de Augmentis Scientiarum ..... is one of the beſt productions of the Author.] Here is what Coſtar wrote to Voiture: I have read a few months paſt a Book written by Chancellor Bacon concerning the Advancement of Learning, in which I have found a great many admirable things (3). He mentions afterwards ſome of thoſe things, and ſhews by that choice his own good taſte; for it is certain they are all douin, ſold ſo prodigiouſly, that ſeveral editions were publiſhed of them. His Life of Henry VII, King of England, is very much eſteemed (b). My Lord Bacon was ſo much employed in ſerving the Republic of Letters, that he neglected his own domeſtic affairs in ſuch a manner, that he died extremely poor. I ſhall quote two authorities upon that point [C]. His death is placed on the 9th of April 1626. He lived ſixty ſix years.

(3) Entretiens de Voiture & de Coſtar. pag. 173. Paris edit. in 1654.

(b) See in Pope Blount, pag. 635. the judgment of Conringius, Boeclerus, &c. upon it. We find there ſeveral other judgments in favour of Bacon.

all fine and noble ſentiments. I have been informed that the works of Bacon was one of the Books, which Coſtar made the greateſt uſe of, and that from thence he took the foundation of his own Collection; that is, having found in Bacon's writings a thought, that pleaſed him, he wrote it upon a ſheet of paper; and afterwards when he met in other Books with any thing that had any relation to it, he added it to that paper; by which means he wanted no Repoſitory or Common-Place Book.

[C] He died poor. I ſhall quote two authorities upon that ſubject.] The firſt is ſupplied me by the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, and the ſecond by the Sorberiana. The Bibliotheque Univerſelle informs me that James Howell writes in a Letter (4) dated the 6th of January 1625 (5), . . . that Chancellor Bacon died ſo poor, that he had ſcarce left enough to bury him; which made Howell give his opinion, that tho' he was a great genius with reſpect to the ſciences, he was not a judicious man. However he aſcribes the poverty of this famous Chancellor either to his contempt of riches, or his exceſſive liberality. A little before he died, he wrote, according to Howell's account, a complaining Letter to the King, in which he deſired him to aſſiſt him, "leſt he ſhould be "reduced in his laſt days to beggary, and he, who de-"ſired to live only in order to ſtudy, ſhould be forced "to ſtudy how to live." Which expreſſions ſeemed to our Author as mean, as thoſe in another Letter, which he wrote before to the Prince of Wales, were profane. He told that Prince, "that he hoped, that as the Father "had been his Creator, the Son would be his Redeemer." Let us now ſee what Sorbiere ſays: "The Natural "Hiſtory of Bacon at Paris 1631, tranſlated or rather "abridged by Peter Amboiſe, Eſq; Sieur de la Made-"laine. We have there an account by the tranſla-"tor of the Life of this Chancellor, and at the end is "added a tranſlation of the Nova Atlantis. The few "excellent remarks which I have ſeen, makes me "prodigiouſly deſirous of ſeeing a complete and exact "tranſlation. Sir Will. Boſwel told me, that he had a "particular intimacy with this extraordinary per-"ſonage, who left him by Will all his papers, which "was the only thing, that was executed of above a mil-"lion of Legacies, which he had made out of gal-"lantry. He bequeathed four hundred thouſand livres "to an imaginary College, the plan of which he "had laid down in his Nova Atlantis (7)." This diſ-courſe does not ſeem to expreſs that Bacon died poor; but rather to inſinuate that he died a little whimſical (8); but if we examine it more cloſely, we ſhall find that there is a ſign of poverty in it.

(6) Biblioth. Univerſ. tom. 15. pag. 45.

(4) The 8th of the 4th Section of the 1ſt volume.

(5) There muſt be here an error of the preſs in the numbers; for Chancellor Bacon did not die till the 9th of April 1626.

(7) Sorberiana, pag. 41. Dutch edition.

(8) See what the Sieur de Maurier ſays concerning the will of Ceriſantes in his Memoires de Hollande pag. 430.

☞ BACON (FRANCIS). The diſtinguiſhed character and abilities of this great Man deſerve a much more copious article, than Mr. Bayle has given us of him. He was ſon of Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, by Anne one of the daughters of Sir Anthony Cook, and eminent for her ſkill in the Latin and Greek Tongues. He was born at York-Place in the Strand January 22d 1560 (a). He ſhewed ſeveral marks of an excellent genius, when he was very young; ſo that he was particularly taken notice of by Queen Elizabeth [A]. June 10, 1573, he was matriculated in the Univerſity of Cambridge (b), and enter'd into Trinity College there under the care of Dr. John Whitgift, then Maſter of that College, and afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury. While he continued here, at about ſixteen years of age, he firſt fell into a diſlike of Ariſtotle's Philoſophy [B]; which induced him afterwards to endeavour after a more ſatisfactory and perfect ſyſtem. After he had paſſed through the circle of the Liberal Arts, his father thought proper to qualify him for the management of public affairs; for which purpoſe he ſent him over to France with Sir Amyas Paulet, Embaſſador to that Court; who entruſted him wirh a commiſſion to the Queen; which he diſcharged with great approbation, and returned to France, with an intention to continue there for ſome years (c). During his abſence his father died in 1579 [C]; upon which he returned to England, and applied

(a) See Dr. Rawley's Life of him, p. 1. in the 1ſt volume of the edition of the Lord Bacon's works, publiſhed at London 1730, in fol.

(b) See the Collections relating to his Life in that edition, p. 217.

(c) Rawley, ubi ſupra, pag. 5.

[A] He ſhewed ſeveral works of his excellent genius, when he was very young, ſo that he was particularly taken notice of by Queen Elizabeth.] Dr. Rawley tells us (1), that the Queen delighted much in converſing with him, and trying him with queſtions; which he anſwered with a gravity and maturity ſuperior to his years; ſo that her Majeſty uſed frequently to call him, The young Lord Keeper. Being once aſked by the Queen how old he was, he replied with a great deal of vivacity, tho' he was then but a child, that he was two years younger than her Majeſty's happy reign; with which anſwer the Queen was prodigiouſly charmed.

(1) Life of Lord Bacon, pag. 4. in the 1ſt vol. of his works publiſhed at London 1730, in 4 vol. in fol.

[B] While he continued here, at about ſixteen years of age, he firſt fell into a diſlike of Ariſtotle's Philoſophy.] Dr. Rawley obſerves (2), that he was informed of that particular from his Lordſhip himſelf; and that his exceptions againſt that great Philoſopher were not founded upon the worthleſsneſs of the Author, to whom he would ever aſcribe all high attributes, but for the unfruitfulneſs of the way, being a Philoſophy (as his Lordſhip uſed to ſay) only for diſputations and contentions, but barren in the production of works for the benefit of the life of man; in which mind he continued to his dying day. Dr. Teniſon likewiſe in his Introduction to the Baconiana tells us (3), that when our Author began his ſtudies, Ariſtotle was in effect the Pope in Philoſophy. The lectures both in his private College, and in the public Schools were generally expoſitions upon Ariſtotle's text; and every opinion written by him as his own was eſteemed as authentic, as if it had been given under the ſeal of the Fiſher. It was therefore a very ſingular felicity in a young Gentleman to ſee farther into nature than that celebrated Philoſopher, at whoſe feet he was placed. And it was as happy as it was extraordinary, that he took diſtaſte betimes at the vulgar ſchemes of Natural Philoſophy. Uſe and cuſtom in that way, continues Dr. Teniſon, might have reconciled it to him, as it had done to others of great learning. For a Philoſopher is like a vine, of which they ſay, it muſt be ſet of a plant, and not of a tree. But tho' there was bred in Mr. Bacon ſo early a diſlike of the Phyſiology of Ariſtotle, yet did he not deſpiſe him with that pride and haughtineſs, with which youth is wonted to be puffed up. He had a juſt eſteem of that great maſter in learning (a); a greater than that, which Ariſtotle himſelf expreſſed towards the Philoſophers, that went before him; for he endeavoured (ſome ſay) to ſtifle all their labours, deſigning to himſelf an univerſal monarchy over opinions, as his patron Alexander did over men. Our Hero owned what was excellent in him; but in his enquiries into nature, he proceeded not upon his principles. He began the work anew, and laid the foundation of philoſophic theory in numerous experiments.

(2) Ubi ſupra, pag. 5.

(3) Pag. 9. edit. London 1679.

(a) De Augm. Scient. l. 3. c. 4. Cæterum de viro tam eximio certe, & ob acumen ingenii mirabili, Ariſtotele, &c.

[C] During his abſence his father died in 1579.] His father had collected a conſiderable ſum of money, which he had ſeparated with an intention to have made applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Common Law [D], which he reſolved upon as his profeſſion, though his inclinations led him much more ſtrongly to the affairs of State. He was appointed one of the Queen's Council extraordinary in the 28th year of his age, an honour, which was ſcarce ever granted before (d). And to her he dedicated his Maxims and Elements of the Common Law in the year 1596, though they were not printed till ſome years after his death, and then incorrectly; though not ſo ill as his Reading upon the Statute of Uſes in Gray's-Inn, which he performed with honour to himſelf and profit to his hearers, having been one of the firſt, who argued that difficult Caſe of Uſes, called Chudleigh's Caſe, which is reported by Sir Edward Coke. But the greateſt figure, which he made in the laſt ten years of the Queen's reign, was in the Houſe of Commons; and then it is thought that he applied himſelf to Politics, ſo that the Queen and Lord Treaſurer Burghley employed his head and hand in affairs of State; for he obſerves himſelf, that in the buſineſs, which paſſed through the hands of the Queen's learned Council, either of State or Revenue, he was conſtantly employed (e). He was in his younger years attached to the intereſt of the Earl of Eſſex, whom he endeavoured to diſſuade from thoſe raſh attempts, which proved afterwards his ruin (f). He made no conſiderable advances in his fortune under Queen Elizabeth [E]; but upon the acceſſion of King James to the Crown he was ſoon raiſed to conſiderable honours. July 23d 1603, in the firſt year of the reign of the King he was knighted at Whitehall, and the year following he was made one of the King's Council learned in the law, with a grant of forty pound per annum fee (g). And as his abilities had appeared in Council, in Parliament, and in his Profeſſion, and eſpecially in his Speeches which he made in the Houſe of Commons, and the Treatiſes, which he wrote in favour of the Union of the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, which the King ſo paſſionately deſired, he had reaſon to expect, that his ſuit for the place of Sollicitor-General, which he had likewiſe made intereſt for under the Queen, would have been immediately granted him; but it is ſuppoſed, that his preferment was obſtructed by the jealouſy of his couſin-german Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Lord Treaſurer, and Earl of Saliſbury, and Sir Edward Coke, the Attorney-General (h). However at laſt, in the beginning of the year 1607 he was appointed to that poſt in the room of Sir Henry Hobart (i). In 1611 he was made joint Judge with Sir Thomas Vavaſor, then Knight-Marſhal, of the (d) Idem, pag. 5. and Mr. Stephens's Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon, pag. 10, 11. in the edition of his Letters and Remains, London 1734, in 4to.

(e) Stephens's Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon, pag. 11.

(f) Rawley, pag. 6.

(g) See the Inſertions from Dugdale and Teniſon, ibid. p. 7.

(h) See Stephens's Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon, pag. 14.

(i) Collections, ubi ſupra, p. 66.

made a competent purchaſe of land for the ſupport of our Author, who was his youngeſt ſon, and the only one unprovided for, though he was particularly beloved by his father. But this purchaſe not being executed at his father's death, there came no greater ſhare to him, than his ſingle part and proportion of the money, which was divided among the five brothers; by which means his circumſtances were very narrow in his younger years. For the manner of Gorhambury near St. Albans in Hertfordſhire did not come to him till many years after, by the death of his brother, Mr. Anthony Bacon, a Gentleman equal to him in wit, tho' inferior with regard to learning; and who had a great affection for our Author, they two being the only male iſſue by a ſecond venter (4). Lord Bacon tells us himſelf in the tenth Century of his Natural Hiſtory (5) a remarkable incident, which happened to him at the time of his father's death. Having obſerved, that the relations touching the force of imagination and the ſecret inſtincts of nature, are ſo uncertain, that they require a great deal of examination, before we conclude upon them; and that he would have it firſt thoroughly enquired, whether there be any ſecret paſſages of ſympathy between perſons of near blood, as parents, children, brothers, ſiſters, nurſe-children, huſbands, wives, &c. ſince there are many reports in Hiſtory, that upon the death of perſons of ſuch nearneſs, men have an inward feeling of it; he relates the following ſtory: I myſelf remember, that being in Paris, and my father's dying in London, two or three days before my father's death I had a dream, which I told to divers Engliſh Gentlemen, that my father's houſe in the country was plaiſtered all over with black mortar.

(4) Dr. Rawley, pag. 5.

(5) Num. 986.

[D] Upon his return from his travels he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Common-Law.] He made a great progreſs in it, tho' he conſidered it only as an acceſſory, as himſelf ſaid, and not as his principal ſtudy. He ſeated himſelf for the convenience of his ſtudies and practice amongſt the Society at Gray's-Inn, of which he was a member; and erected that elegant building, commonly known by the name of the Lord Bacon's Lodgings, which he inhabited by turns for the greateſt part of his life, except for ſome years only. In this Society he behaved with ſuch a ſweetneſs and generoſity of temper, that he was equally admired and beloved by the Readers and Gentlemen of that Houſe (6).

(6) Rawley, pag. 5 and 6.

[E] He made no conſiderable advances in his fortune under Queen Elizabeth.] Dr. Rawley obſerves (7), that tho' his birth and other advantages qualified him above all others of his profeſſion for an eaſy acceſs at Court, and introduced him frequently to the Queen's preſence, who often honoured him with private and free converſation upon the moſt important affairs of State, and received the higheſt ſatisfaction from him upon ſuch ſubjects; yet ſhe never conferred upon him any place of profit, but only the reverſion of the Regiſter's office in the Star-Chamber, which was worth about 1600 pounds per annum, tho' it did not fall to him till about twenty years after; ſo that his Lordſhip ſaid of it in Queen's Elizabeth's time, that it was like another man's ground buttalling upon his houſe; which might mend his proſpect, but it did not fill his barn. This neglect of him, ſays the Writer abovementioned, might be imputed, not ſo much to her Majeſty's averſion and diſaffection towards him, as the arts and policy of a great Stateſman there, who laboured by all induſtrious and ſecret means to ſuppreſs and keep him down, leſt if he had riſen, he might have obſcured his glory. Mr. Stephens the late Hiſtoriographer in his Introduction (8) to that part of our author's Letters, which he wrote in the reign of King James, tells us, that the books, which he was known to have read, beſides thoſe of his profeſſion, and the learning he was maſter of, which made him ſo great a benefactor to the world, was turned to his own diſadvantage, and made uſe of as a reaſon, why the poſt of Sollicitor-General ſhould not be conferred upon him. This preferment he had in his eye in the year 1595 (9) thro' the intereſt of no leſs a favourite than the Earl of Eſſex. However it is obſerved, that he was zealous in bearing teſtimony to the wiſe adminiſtration of affairs in thoſe [Queen Elizabeth's] times, in which himſelf advanced little either in profit or honour. For he was hindered from growing at Court by a very great man, who knew the ſlenderneſs of his purſe, and alſo feared, that if he grew, he might prove taller than himſelf (10). The little art he uſed againſt him was the repreſenting of him as a ſpeculator; though it is plain no man dealt better with kinder ways in publick buſineſs than himſelf; and it generally ripened under his hands. At the end of the fourth volume of his works we have ſeveral Letters from him and the Earl of Eſſex to the Lord Keeper Puckering relating to the Sollicitor's place.

(7) Pag. 6.

(8) Pag. 10. London 1702, in 4to.

(9) See his Letter to the Lord Treaſurer Burghley, publiſhed in the 4th vol. of his Works, pag. 474.

(10) See his Letters to Sir Robert Cecill; Works, vol. 4. pag. 488, 498.

the Knight-Marſhal's Court, lately erected within the Verge of the King's Houſe (k); and on the 27th of October 1613 he ſucceeded Sir Henry Hobart as Attorney-General (l), and June the 9th 1616 he was ſworn of the King's Privy Council (m), a truſt rarely conferred either before or ſince on a Gentleman in that Office. Upon which occaſion he tells the King, that being exempted from pleading cauſes between party and party, he thought himſelf obliged to dedicate his leiſure time to his Majeſty's ſervice, and particularly to the reducing and recompoſing of the Laws of England, with the proper aſſiſtance of others; and in this deſign he perſiſted when he had greater leiſure, by offering the King a ſpecimen of a Digeſt of the ſame Laws, publiſhed by Dr. Rawley (r). While he was Attorney-General he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his endeavours to reſtrain the cuſtom of Duels, which was then very frequent [F], and by his abilities in the management of ſeveral important cauſes. About the beginning of his promotions he married a daughter of Benedict Barnham Alderman of London; but (k) Inſertions, &c. ubi ſupra, pag. 7.

(l) Collections, &c. ubi ſupra, pag. 67.
(m) Cambden's Annals of King James.
(n) Stephens's Account, p. 15.

[F] While he was Attorney-General he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his endeavours to reſtrain the cuſtom of Duels, which was then very frequent.] This cuſtom is ſaid to have been introduced into England from France, where a prodigious quantity of blood had been ſhed notwithſtanding the Edicts of King Henry IV and Lewis XIII, till the evil became ſo powerful, that though the great Cardinal Richelieu gave ſome check to it by the puniſhment of de Chappelle and Bouteville, two young Gentlemen of great valour, without any regard to the intreaties of their friends, and the mediation of perſons of the greateſt quality, yet all his application and thoughts upon this ſubject, as he tells us in his Political Teſtament, could never gain that effect, which has ſince been accompliſhed by the reſolution and ſeverity of Lewis XIV in the year 1702; and which Monſr. le Vaſſor, a French Hiſtorian, ſays is the beſt, and perhaps the only good action he did in a reign of fifty ſix years. Sir Francis Bacon being made the King's Attorney uſed all his efforts to put a ſtop to this practice here; and his charge with regard to duels upon an information in the Star-Chamber againſt Prieſt and Wright was ſo highly approved by the Lords of the Council, who were then in the Star-Chamber, that they ordered it to be printed and publiſhed with the decree of the Court itſelf. In this charge he ſpeaks of the nature and greatneſs of the miſchief of duels; the cauſes and remedies of it; the juſtice of the Law of England, which ſome, ſays he, ſtick not to think defective in this matter; of the capacity of the Court of the Star-Chamber, where certainly the remedy of that miſchief was to be found; and of his own purpoſe and reſolution, wherein he humbly deſired the aſſiſtance of that Court. With regard to the miſchief itſelf, he obſerves, that when revenge is once extorted out of the Magiſtrate's hand contrary to God's ordinance, and every man ſhall bear the ſword, not to defend, but to aſſail, and private men begin once to preſume to give Law to themſelves, and to right their own wrongs, no man can foreſee the dangers and inconveniences which may ariſe and multiply by that means. Other offences yield and conſent to the Law, that is good, not daring to make defence, or to juſtify themſelves; but this offence expreſly gives Law an affront, as if there were two Laws, one a kind of gown-Law, and the other a Law of reputation, as they term it; ſo that Paul's and Weſtminſter, the Pulpit and the Courts of Juſtice, muſt give place to the Law (as King James expreſſes it in his Proclamation) of ordinary tables and ſuch reverend aſſemblies. "The year-books and ſtatute-books muſt give place "to ſome French and Italian Pamphlets, which han"dle the doctrine of duels, which if they be in the "right, tranſeamus ad illa, let us receive them, and "not keep the people in conflict and diſtraction be"tween two laws." He conſiders then the loſs which the nation ſuffers by the deſtruction of thoſe perſons in private and inſignificant quarrels, whoſe blood if it were adventured in the ſervice of the King and Realm, would be able to make the fortune of a day, and to change the fortune of a Kingdom. With reſpect to the cauſes of it; the firſt motive undoubtedly is a falſe and erroneous imagination of honour and credit; upon which account King James in his Proclamation called them bewitching duels. For if one judge of it truly, ſays the Attorney, it is no better than a ſorcery, that enchanted the ſpirits of young men, that bear great minds with a falſe ſhew, ſpecies falſa, and a kind of ſatanical illuſion and apparition of honour againſt religion, againſt law, againſt moral virtue, and againſt the precedents and examples of the beſt times and valianteſt nations. Beſides this, men have almoſt loſt the true notion and underſtanding of fortitude and honour. For fortitude diſtinguiſheth of the grounds of quarrels, whether they be juſt; and not only ſo, but whether they be worthy, and ſetteth a better price upon mens lives than to beſtow them idly. Nay it is a weakneſs and diſeſteem of a man's ſelf to put a man's life upon ſuch lieger performances; a man's life is not to be trifled away; it is to be offered up and ſacrificed to honourable ſervices, public merits, good cauſes, and noble adventures. It is in expence of blood as it is in expence of money; it is no liberality to make a profuſion of money upon every vain occaſion; nor no more it is fortitude to make effuſion of blood, except the cauſe be of worth. The remedies, which he propoſes for the reſtraint of this evil, are firſt, that there appear and be declared a conſtant and ſettled reſolution in the State to aboliſh it. Secondly, care muſt be taken, that it be no longer countenanced, or the humour of it indulged. Thirdly, ſays he, I muſt acknowledge, that I learned out of the King's laſt Proclamation the moſt prudent and beſt applied remedy for this offence (if it ſhall pleaſe his Majeſty to uſe it) that the wit of man can deviſe. This offence is grounded upon a falſe conceit of honour, and therefore it would be puniſhed in the ſame kind, in eo quis rectiſſimè plectitur, in quo peccat. The fountain of honour is the King and his aſpect, and the acceſs to his perſon continueth honour in life, and to be baniſhed from his preſence is one of the greateſt eclipſes of honour that can be. If his Majeſty ſhall be pleaſed, that when this Court ſhall cenſure any of theſe offences in perſons of eminent Quality, to add this out of his own power and diſcipline, that theſe perſons ſhall be baniſhed and excluded from his Court for certain years, and the Courts of his Queen and Prince, I think there is no man, that hath any good blood in him, will commit an act, that ſhall caſt him into that darkneſs, that he may not behold his Sovereign's face. Laſtly, that this Court ſhould puniſh all the middle acts and proceedings which tend to the duel, and ſo to hew and vex the root in the branches, which no doubt will kill the root, and yet prevent the extremity of the Law. The Attorney obſerves then, that the Law of England is excepted to, though ignorantly, in two points; the one, that it ſhould make no difference between an inſidious and foul murther, and the killing a man upon fair terms, as it is called. The other, that the Law has not provided ſufficient puniſhment and reparations for contumely of words, as the lie, and the like. But theſe are no better than childiſh novelties againſt the Divine Law, and againſt all Laws in effect, and againſt the examples of all the braveſt and moſt virtuous nations of the world. For in the Law of God there is never to be found any difference made in homicide, but between homicide voluntary and involuntary, which we term miſadventure. As for example, in Civil States, all memory, ſays he, doth conſent, that Greece and Rome were the moſt valiant and generous nations of the world; and that which is more to be noted, they were free States, and not under a Monarchy, whereby a man would think it a great deal the more reaſon that particular perſons ſhould have righted themſelves; and yet they had not this practice of duels, nor any thing, that bare ſhew thereof; and ſure they would have had it, if there had been any virtue in it. Nay, as he ſaith, (fas eſt & ab hoſte doceri:) It is memorable, that it is reported by a Counſellor, Embaſſador of the Emperor's, touching the cenſure of the Turks, of theſe duels. There was a combat of this kind performed by two perſons of quality of the Turks, wherein one but had no iſſue by her. March 7, $161\frac{6}{7}$ he was appointed Lord Keeper of the Great Seal [G]; but one of them was ſlain, the other party was convened before the Council of Baſhaws. The manner of the reprehenſion was in theſe words: How durſt you undertake to fight one with the other? Are there not Chriſtians enough to kill? Did you not know, that whether of you ſhould be ſlain, the loſs would be the Grand Seignior's? So as we may ſee, that the moſt warlike nations, whether generous or barbarous, have ever deſpiſed this, wherein now men glory. As for the ſecond defect pretended in our Law that it hath provided no remedy for lies and fillips, it may receive the ſame anſwer. It would have been thought a madneſs amongſt the antient Lawgivers, to have ſet a puniſhment upon the lie given, which in effect is but a word of denial, a negative of another's ſaying. Any Law-giver, if he had been asked the queſtion, would have made Solon's anſwer, that he had not made any puniſhment for it, becauſe he never imagined the world would have been ſo fantaſtical as to take it ſo highly. The Civilians diſpute whether an action of injury lie for it, and rather reſolve the contrary. So every touch or light blow of the perſon is not in itſelf conſiderable, except that they have got upon them the ſtamp of a diſgrace, which makes theſe light things paſs for great matter. The Law of England, and all Laws, hold theſe degrees of injury to the perſon, ſlander, battery, maim, and death; and if there be extraordinary circumſtances of deſpite and contumely, as in caſe of libels, and baſtinadoes, and the like, the Court taketh them in hand, and puniſheth them exemplarily. But for this apprehenſion of a diſgrace, that a fillip to the perſon ſhould be a mortal wound to the reputation, it were good that men did hearken unto the ſaying of Conſalvo, the great and famous Commander, that was wont to ſay, a Gentleman's honour ſhould be de telâ craſſiore, of a good ſtrong warp or web, that every little thing ſhould not catch it; whereas now it ſeems they are but of cob-web lawn or ſuch like ſtuff, which certainly is weakneſs, and not true greatneſs of mind, but like a ſick man's body, that is ſo tender, that it feels every thing. We find likewiſe, that in December in the year 1616 he proſecuted one Mr. Markham for diſperſing letters of challenge to the Lord D'arcy. He mentions this in a Letter to the Lord Viſcount Villiers, publiſhed in the fourth volume of his works (13).

(13) Num. 98. pag. 651.

(14) Ad ann. 1617.

[G] He was appointed Lord Keeper of the Great Seal.] Cambden tells us in his Annals of King James (14), that when the King delivered the Seal to him, he had admoniſhed him not to ſeal any thing till after mature deliberation; to give righteous judgment between parties; and that he ſhould not extend the prerogative too far. Sir Anthony Weldon in his Court and Character of King James (15) aſſerts, that the Duke of Buckingham, to vex the very ſoul of the Lord Chancellor Egerton in the laſt agony ſent Bacon to him for the Seals; and that the dying Chancellor hated that Bacon ſhould be his ſucceſſor; and that the old man's ſpirit could not brook this, but ſent the ſeals by his own ſervant to the King, and ſhortly after yielded up his ſoul to his Maker. But this account contains two egregious falſities; for in the firſt place the King himſelf ſent for the ſeals, and not the Duke of Buckingham; and he ſent for them not by Sir Francis Bacon, but by Secretary Winwood (16) with this meſſage, that himſelf would be his Underkeeper, and not diſpoſe of them while he lived, to bear the name of Chancellor. Nor did any perſon remove the Seal out of the King's ſight, till the Lord Egerton died, which happened ſoon after. In the next place the Lord Chancellor Egerton, as Dr. Teniſon obſerves (17), was willing that the Attorney-General Bacon ſhould be his ſucceſſor, and ready to promote it; ſo far was he from conceiving any hatred againſt him either upon that or any other account. He had been a friend to Sir Francis Bacon even in the Queen's time, as appears from a Letter of the latter to him mentioned by Dr. Teniſon; and this favour of his continued to the laſt. For Sir Francis Bacon writes as follows in a Letter to Sir George Villiers, dated the 15th of Febr. 1615, and printed in the fourth volume of his works (18). My Lord Chancellor told me yeſterday in plain terms, that if the King would aſk his opinion touching the perſon, that he would commend to ſucceed him upon death or diſability, he would name me for the fitteſt man. You may adviſe, whether uſe may not be made of this offer. And in a Letter (19) to King James dated January 29th 1614, he wrote as follows: It pleaſed the Lord Chancellor, out of his ancient and great love to me, (which many times in ſickneſs appeareth moſt,) to admit me with a great deal of ſpeech with him this afternoon, which during theſe three days he hath ſcarcely done to any. Sir Anthony Weldon reproaches (20) my Lord Bacon as a very neceſſitous man, and one for that reaſon made Keeper by the Duke of Buckingham, to ſerve ſuch turns as men of better fortunes would never condeſcend to. But this is a mere groundleſs and malicious inſinuation. For he had enjoyed for a conſiderable time many profitable places, which preſerved him from indigence, tho', as Dr. Teniſon obſerves (21), his great mind did not permit him to ſwell his purſe by them to any extraordinary bigneſs. And in the Queen's time, when he was in meaner circumſtances, he did not look upon himſelf as in that eſtate of neceſſity, which tempteth generous minds to vile things. But let us hear him repreſenting his own condition in the Letter to the Lord Chancellor Egerton quoted by Dr. Teniſon. My eſtate, ſays he, I confeſs a truth to your Lordſhip, is weak and indebted, and needeth comfort. For both my father (tho' I think I had greateſt part in his love of all his children) in his wiſdom ſerved me in as a laſt comer; and myſelf in mine own induſtry have rather referred and aſpired to virtue than to gain; whereof yet I am not wiſe enough to repent me. But the while, whereas Solomon ſpeaketh, That want cometh firſt as a way-faring man, and after as an armed man, I muſt acknowledge myſelf to be in primo gradu, for it ſtealeth upon me; but for the ſecond, that it ſhould not be reſiſted, I hope in God I am not in that caſe. For the preventing whereof, as I do depend upon God's Providence all in all, ſo in the ſame his Providence I ſee opened unto me three not unlikely expectations of help. The one my practice; the other ſome proceeding in the Queen's ſervice; the third the place I have in reverſion; which as it ſtandeth now unto me, is but like another man's ground buttalling upon my houſe, which may mend my proſpect, but it doth not fill my barn (22). However it muſt be owned, that the Earl of Buckingham was very inſtrumental in the Lord Keeper's preferment, which he acknowledges in his Letter written the ſame day, that the Seals were preſented to him. And ſurely, ſays Mr. Stephens (23), fewer lines did never contain a greater ſenſe of gratitude, or expreſſed it in a more becoming manner; though by the original they ſeemed to have been haſtily written, and may ſerve to confirm what had been told to one, that lived in his later times, that his firſt copies required no great labour to render them competent for the niceſt judgments. The Letter is publiſhed in the fourth volume of his works (24), and is as follows: It is both in cares and buſineſs, that ſmall ones ſlote upon the tongue, and great ones ſink down into the heart in ſilence. Therefore I could ſpeak little to your Lordſhip to day, neither had I fit time; but I muſt profeſs thus much, that in this day's work you are the trueſt and perfecteſt mirror and example of firm and generous friendſhip that ever was in Court. And I ſhall count every day loſt, wherein I ſhall not either ſtudy your well-doing in thought, or do your name honour in ſpeech, or perform you ſervice in deed. In the ſame volume we have likewiſe his Speech at the taking of his place in Chancery, in performance of the charge his Majeſty had given him, when he received the Seals in 1617. Sir Anthony Weldon has upon this occaſion introduced another ſcandalous ſtory with regard to Sir Francis Bacon, and tells us (25), that "this great favourite [Buckingham] ſent "a noble Gentleman, and of much worth to him, with "this meſſage, that he knew him to be a man of ex- "cellent parts, and as the times were, fit to ſerve his "Maſter in the Keeper's place; but he alſo knew "him of a baſe and ungrateful diſpoſition, and an "errant knave, apt in his proſperity to ruin any that "had raiſed him in his adverſity; yet for all this he "did ſo much ſtudy his Maſter's ſervice (knowing "how fit an inſtrument he might be for him,) that "he had obtained the Seals for him; but with this "aſſurance, ſhould he ever requite him, as he had "done

(15) Pag. 115, 116. edit. London 1651.

(16) See Aulicus Coquinariæ, pag. 171.

(17) Baconiana, pag. 249.

(18) Num. 65. pag. 605.

(19) Num. 51. pag. 592.

(20) See Court and Character of King James, pag. 119.

(21) Baconiana, pag. 251.

(22) See above, Note [E].

(23) Introduction, pag. 42, 43. See Collections relating to the Life of Lord Bacon, pag. 16.

(24) Num. 99. pag. 652.

(25) Pag. 116, 117, 118.

but ſoon after was in great danger of being remov'd from that poſt [H]. Jan. 4, 1618, he was made Lord Chancellor of England; and on the 11th of July following created Lord Verulam. We have ſome verſes of Ben. Johnſon upon his birth-day, which he celebrated at " done ſome others, to whom he had been more bound, " he would caſt him down as much below ſcorn, as " he had now raiſed him high above any honour he " could ever have expected." Bacon, continues that Author, was at that time Attorney-General, who patiently hearing this meſſage, replied; I am glad my noble Lord deals ſo friendly and freely with me, and hath made that choice of ſo diſcreet and noble a friend, that hath delivered his meſſage in ſo plain language. But, faith he, can my Lord know theſe abilities in me, and can he think when I have attained the higheſt preferment my profeſſion is capable of, I ſhall ſo much fail in my judgment and underſtanding, as to loſe theſe abilities; and by my miſcarriage to ſo noble a Patron, caſt myſelf headlong from the top of that honour to the very bottom of contempt and ſcorn? Surely my Lord cannot think ſo meanly of me. The Gentleman replied; I deliver you nothing from myſelf, but the words are put into my mouth by his Lordſhip, to which I neither add nor diminiſh; for had it been left to my diſcretion, ſurely tho' I might have given you the ſubſtance, yet ſhould I have apparelled it in a more modeſt attire; but as I have faithfully delivered my Lord's to you, ſo will I as faithfully return yours to his Lordſhip. You muſt underſtand, concludes Sir A. Weldon, the reaſon of this meſſage was his ungratefulneſs to Eſſex, which every one could remember; for the Earl ſaved him from ſtarving, and he requited him ſo, as his Apology muſt witneſs. Were there not a great fault, there needed no apology; nor could any Age, but a worthleſs and corrupt in men and manners, have thought him worthy ſuch a place of honour. With regard to this charge againſt him of ingratitude towards the Earl of Eſſex, we may obſerve, that tho' the Earl had been very generous to him, yet he neglected the good counſel, which Mr. Bacon had given him, and having ſome time before his inſurrection diſcontinued his friendſhip and acquaintance with him, that Gentleman thought himſelf obliged to eſpouſe the cauſe of his Queen and Country, ſo far as not to decline the ſervice, which his Miſtreſs and her Miniſters thought proper to lay upon him. The part indeed, which he acted againſt the Earl at his trial, occaſioned ſome reflections upon his conduct; upon which account he wrote his Apology, addreſſed to the Earl of Devonſhire, his Lordſhip's great friend, in which he declares, that he was true to the Earl of Eſſex uſque ad aras, and that he had on all occaſions endeavoured to pacify the Queen's diſpleaſure againſt him, tho' her commands and his duty obliged him to appear againſt his Lordſhip at the Bar. But the Declaration of the Earl's treaſons, publiſhed ſoon after his death, tho' drawn up by Mr. Bacon, was impoſed upon him; and much altered by the Privy-Council. The account, which he drew up for the Queen's peruſal and by her command, of what paſſed at the aſſembly at the Lord Keeper's houſe, on the 5th of June 1600, where the Earl was charged for leaving the command of the army in Ireland in 1599, much to the Queen's and the Nation's prejudice, and contrary to her expectation, was ſhewn to very few others; and if the latter part of that imperfect narration could be obtained, it would have diſcovered, as Mr. Bacon ſays in his Apology, his endeavours to ſerve the Earl in that diſcourſe and on that occaſion (26). When he was newly advanced to the Great Seal, Gondemar the Spaniſh Embaſſador came to viſit him. My Lord Bacon told him, that he was to thank God and the King for that honour; and yet upon condition he might be exempt from the burden, he could very willingly reſign the honour; and that he formerly had a deſire, and the ſame continued with him ſtill, to lead a private life. Gondemar anſwered, that he would tell him a ſtory of an old Rat, that would needs leave the world; and acquainted the young rats, that he would retire into his hole and ſpend his days ſolitarily, and enjoy no more pleaſure. He commanded them therefore upon pain of his high diſpleaſure not to preſume to come in to him. They forbore two or three days; at laſt one of them, that was more bold than the reſt perſuaded ſome of his fellows to go in with him, and he would venture to ſee how his father did; for he might be dead. They went in, and found the old rat ſitting in the midſt of a rich Parmeſan cheeſe. And ſo he made a facetious application of the fable to the Lord Keeper (27).

(26) See Mr. Stephens's Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon, pag. 11, 12. prefixed to his edition of the Letters and Remains of the Lord Chancellor Bacon, London 1734, 4to.

(27) See Lord Bacon's Apothegms, Numb. 103. vol. 3. of his Works, pag. 273.

[H] But ſoon after was in danger of being removed from that poſt.] Mr. Stephens tells us in his Introduction (28), that the Lord Keeper was ſcarce warm in his ſeat, before the ſame hand, which conducted him thither, had like to have removed him from it; the occaſion of which was as follows. Upon the 16th of June 1617 Secretary Winwood wrote to the Earl of Buckingham, who was then with the King in Scotland, that Sir Edward Coke coming to him upon buſineſs, began of his own accord to complain of his unhappineſs to be ſo far removed from his Majeſty's favour, to which he deſired to be reſtored, and without which he at length could no longer breathe. That he with much ſorrow acknowledged his former want of reſpect to his Lordſhip in relation to the treaty ſome time before propoſed of a marriage between his youngeſt daughter Frances and Sir John Villiers his Lordſhip's elder brother, deſiring that the ſame might be renewed with very advantageous propoſals upon his part. But her mother the Lady Hatton, (between whom and her huſband Sir Edward Coke there was little agreement and no love,) being either averſe to this match altogether, or becauſe it did not ariſe from her, from whom the young Lady was to expect a conſiderable addition to her fortune, employed her utmoſt endeavours to prevent it. The Lord Keeper likewiſe in his Letters to the King and to the Earl dated in July, uſed all the arguments he could think of to ſhew, that it was not adviſeable to proceed in the match, and (which was the point intended by it), that Sir Edward Coke ſhould not be readmitted into favour. In the mean time the Lady's mother removed her to Sir Edmund Withipole's near Oatlands without the knowledge of Sir Edward; who thereupon applied to the Earl of Buckingham, and by his means entreated the King to direct a Warrant to ſome of his Privy-Council to ſummon before them his wife and her confederates in order to recover his daughter. But underſtanding in a few days where ſhe was conveyed, he with his ſons and ſervants, without any Warrant or Conſtable aſſiſting, broke open Sir Edmund's houſe, and took his daughter away. The Lady Hatton complaining of this violence to the Privy-Council, Sir Edward Coke affirmed, that he could juſtify his proceedings by law. But Sir Henry Yelverton the King's Attorney maintaining the contrary, he was ordered to proſecute the father in the Star-Chamber, and to take upon him the preſent care of the young Lady. By his endeavours the Act of Council dated the 18th of July 1617, which recites this whole affair at large, declares, that Sir Edward and his Lady were ſo far reconciled, that their daughter was delivered to them again, and the information ſuſpended till his Majeſty's pleaſure was known. But the Lady Compton and her ſon Sir John Villiers preſſing the marriage, and the King and the Earl of Buckingham approving of it, the oppoſition, which the Lord Keeper Bacon, and perhaps ſome others of the Privy-Council had given to it, drew down no ſmall diſpleaſure upon them. For upon the King's return from Scotland, Buckingham wrote to his Lordſhip, that his Majeſty intended at his firſt ſitting in Council to reprimand thoſe of his Council, who had been active in that buſineſs for their ill behaviour in it; and that he would name ſome of the particular errors, tho' without accuſing any particular perſons. He then adds, that notwithſtanding the reaſon he himſelf had to be offended, yet ſeeing his Majeſty ſo much diſpleaſed, from being a party concerned he was become an advocate. The Lord Keeper in his Letter to the Earl of Buckingham dated July 25th 1617 (29) writes as follows, I do think long to hear of your Lordſhip touching my laſt Letter, wherein I gave you my opinion touching your brother's match. As I then ſhewed my diſlike of the matter, ſo the carriage of it here in the manner

(28) Pag. 42, & ſeq. See likewiſe his Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon, pag. 17.

(29) See his Works, vol. 4. pag. 661. Num. 109.

at York-houſe in the Strand in 1619 [I]. In the midſt of theſe honours, applauſes, and multiplicity of buſineſs, he forgot not his beloved Philoſophy. For in October 1620 he publiſhed his great Work, intitled, Novum Organum. We find by ſeveral of his letters, that he thought the convening of Parliaments was the beſt expedient for the welfare of the King and people [K]. January 27, 162$\frac{0}{1}$, he was advanced to the dignity of Viſcount St. Albans; and appeared with the greateſt honour and ſplendor at the opening of the Seſſion of Parliament on the 30th of that month. But he was ſoon after ſurpriſed with a melancholy reverſe manner I diſlike as much. If your Lordſhip think it is humour or intereſt in me that leads me, God judge my ſincerity. But I muſt ſay, that in your many noble favours towards me, they ever moved and flowed from your ſelf, and not from any of your friends whatſoever; and therefore in requital give me leave, that my counſels to you again be referred to your happineſs, and not to the deſires of any of your friends. I ſhall ever give you, as I give my maſter, ſafe counſel, and ſuch as time will approve. In another Letter to the Earl dated the 23d of Auguſt following (30) he tells him, that ſince his laſt he had ſent to the Attorney General, and let him know, that ſince he had heard from Court, he was reſolved to further the match and the conditions of it for his Lordſhip's brother's advancement the beſt he could. But, ſays he, I did ever foreſee, that this alliance would go near to loſe me your Lordſhip, that I hold ſo dear; and that was the only reſpect particular to myſelf, that moved me to be as I was, till I heard from you. But I will rely upon your conſtancy and nature and my own deſerving, and the firm tye we have in reſpect of the King's ſervice. The Earl having waved his reſentments againſt the Lord Keeper, and reconcil'd the King to him, it occaſioned the following Letter of acknowledgment from his Lordſhip, dated September 22d 1617 (31). Your Lordſhip's pen or rather pencil hath pourtrayed towards me ſuch magnanimity and nobleneſs and true kindneſs, as methinketh I ſee the image of ſome ancient virtue, and not any thing of theſe times. It is the line of my life and not the lines of my letter, that muſt expreſs my thankfulneſs; wherein if I fail, then God fail me, and make me as miſerable as I think myſelf at this time happy by this reviver, thro' his Majeſty's ſingular clemency, and your incomparable love and favour. Sir Anthony Weldon upon occaſion of Lord Bacon's falling under cenſure from the King and the Earl of Buckingham, takes occaſion to introduce another ſtory, in order to fix a mark of infamy upon him, as far as his libel is capable of doing it. He tells us (32), that within ten days after Lord Bacon was inveſted in his office, the King went to Scotland; upon which Bacon inſtantly begins to believe himſelf King, lies in the King's lodgings, gives audience in the great banqueting houſe, makes all other Counſellors attend his motions, with the ſame ſtate the King uſed to come out to give audience to Embaſſadors; and when any other Counſellor ſate with him about the King's affairs, would bid them, if they ſat near him, know their diſtance. Upon this Secretary Winwood roſe, and would never ſit more, but inſtantly diſpatched a perſon to the King to deſire him to make haſte back, for even his very ſeat was already uſurped. At which, ſays the Author, I remember the King reading it unto us, both the King and we were very merry. If Buckingham had ſent the Lord Keeper any letters, he would not vouchſafe the opening or reading them in public, tho' they required diſpatch, nor return an anſwer to them. "In "this poſture he lived, until he heard the King was "returning, and began to believe the play was al"moſt at an end, he might perſonate a King's part "no longer, and there did again re-inveſt himſelf with "his old rags of baſeneſs, which were ſo tatter'd and "poor at the King's coming to Windſor, he attended "two days at Buckingham's chamber, being not ad"mitted to any better place, than the room where "trencher-ſcrapers and lacquies attended, there ſitting "upon an old wooden cheſt (amongſt ſuch as for his "baſeneſs were only fit companions, although the ho"nour of his place did merit far more reſpect) with "his purſe and ſeal lying by him, on that cheſt. "My ſelf told a ſervant of my Lord of Buckingham's, "it was a ſhame to ſee the purſe and ſeal of ſo little "value or eſteem in his chamber, though the car"rier without it merited nothing but ſcorn, being worſt "among the baſeſt. He told me, they had command "it muſt be ſo." After two days he had admittance. At his firſt entrance he fell down flat on his face at the Duke's foot, kiſſing it, vowing never to riſe till he had his pardon. Then he was again reconciled, and ſince that time ſo very a ſlave to the Duke and all that family, that he durſt not deny the command of the meaneſt of the kindred, nor oppoſe any thing. By this you ſee, a baſe ſpirit is ever concomitant with the proudeſt mind, and ſurely never ſo many brave parts, and ſo baſe and abject a ſpirit tenanted together in any one earthen cottage, as in this one man.

(30) Ibid. Num. 111. pag. 662.

(31) Ibid. Num. 112. pag. 662, 663.

(32) Court and Character of King James, pag. 121, 122. 123.

[I] Some verſes of Ben. Johnſon upon his birth-day, which he celebrated at York-Houſe near the Strand in 1619.] Theſe verſes are addreſſed to the Genius of the place, and are as follow:

Hail happy Genius of this ancient pile!
How comes it all things ſo about thee ſmile,
The fire, the wine, the men? and in the midſt
Thou ſtand'ſt, as if ſome myſtery thou didſt?
Pardon, I read it in thy face; the day
For whoſe return, and many, all theſe pray;
And ſo do I: This is the ſixtieth year,
Since Bacon, and thy Lord was born, and here;
Son to the grave wiſe Keeper of the Seal,
Fame and foundation of the Engliſh weal.
What then the father was, that ſince is he,
Now with a title more to the degree;
England's High Cancellor, the deſtin'd heir
In his ſoft cradle to his father's chair.
Whoſe even thread the Fates ſpin round and full
Out of their choiceſt and their richeſt wool.
'Tis a brave cauſe of joy, let it be known,
For 'twere a narrow gladneſs, kept thine own.
Give me a deep-crown'd bowl, that I may ſing,
In raiſing him, the wiſdom of my King.

[K] He thought the convening of Parliaments was the beſt expedient for the welfare of the King and people.] In a letter to the Marquis of Buckingham dated October the 7th, 1620, and publiſhed in the 4th volume of his works (33) he takes notice of the preparations that were made for a Parliament, and his ſervices in that point. He obſerves there, that he had the day before conſulted with the two chief Juſtices and others, what perſons were fit to be of the houſe, tending to make a ſufficient and well-compoſed houſe of the ableſt men of the Kingdom, fit to be adviſed with circa ardua Regni, as the ſtyle of the writs goeth, according to the pure and true inſtitution of a Parliament; and of the means to place ſuch perſons without novelty or much obſervation. For this purpoſe we made ſome liſts of names of the prime Counſellors, and principal Statesmen, or Courtiers, of the graveſt or wiſeſt Lawyers, of the moſt reſpected and beſt tempered Knights and Gentlemen of the County. The reader will obſerve from ſome paſſages in his letters, that he always was of opinion, that the calling of Parliaments was the ſureſt method of promoting the intereſt both of his Majeſty and the Kingdom. And how averſe ſoever the King had been from falling in with thoſe meaſures, yet the neceſſity of the times, and the deſires of the people, who were more concerned to ſee the Proteſtant Religion declining in Germany, and the Elector Palatine not only in danger of loſing his new crown of Bohemia, but even his antient inheritance, than the King his father-in-law ſeemed to be, forced his Majeſty from his former reſolutions. He knew well in what manner he had parted with his laſt Parliament, and that during this interval, which abounded ſo much in projects and monopolies, many grievances had ſprung up. And therefore he had reaſon to apprehend, that the ſame ſpirit might revive, unleſs ſome care was taken to allay the more vehement, and ſatisfy the more peaceable tempers. But as the unhappy fate of the King of Bohemia and his family, and the ill ſucceſs of this "Parliament

(33) Num. 136. pag. 679.

reverſe of fortune. For about the 12th of March following a Committee was appointed of ſome Members of the Houſe of Commons to inſpect the Abuſes of the Courts of Juſtice, whereof Sir Edward Sackville was named the Chairman; but by reaſon of his indiſpoſition Sir Robert Philips was put in his room. The firſt thing which they fell upon, was Bribery and Corruption, of which the Lord Chancellor Bacon was accuſed by one Aubery and Egerton, who affirmed, that they had procured money to be given to him, to promote their cauſes depending before him. This being corroborated by ſome circumſtances, a report was made from the Committee to the Houſe upon the fifteenth day of that month, yet with all imaginable tenderneſs and reſpect to his Lordſhip, in regard, as the Chairman declared, it touched the Honour of a great Man, ſo endued with all parts both of Nature and Art, as that he would ſay no more of him, being not able to ſay enough (o). Upon Monday the 19th the Commons had a Conference with the Lords, which was reported the next day by the Lord Treaſurer; after which the Marquis of Buckingham preſented to the Lords a letter written to them by the Chancellor the ſame day [L]. The Houſe of Lords returned him for anſwer, that they intended to proceed in his Cauſe now before them according to the right rule of juſtice, and ſhould be glad to find his Lordſhip able to clear his Honour in the points objected to him. Wedneſday March 21, the Commons ſent a meſſage to the Lords concerning their farther complaints againſt the Chancellor (p). In the mean time the Lords proceeded to the examination of the complaints, and took divers examinations of witneſſes in the Houſe; and appointed a ſelect Committee of themſelves to take examinations

(o) Ibid. p. 139.

(p) Paſſages in Parliament againſt the Lord Chancellor, ann. Dom. 1620, and 1621, publiſhed in the 2d volume of Lord Bacon's Works, p. 548, 549, 550.

Parliament are very well known, ſo the cauſes of calling them together are fully and excellently repreſented in a draught of a Proclamation drawn up by my Lord Bacon, and the latter part, which relates to the choice of Parliament men, is ſo well conſidered, as to make it a ſeaſonable advice at all times (34). This draught is publiſhed in the fourth volume of his works, Numb. CXL. It concludes thus: "And becauſe as "well this great cauſe (there to be handled among the "reſt, and to be weighed by the beam of this Kingdom) "as alſo the true and antient inſtitution of Parliament, "do require the Lower-Houſe (at this time if ever) "to be compounded of the graveſt, ableſt, and wor-"thieſt members that may be found; we do hereby, "out of the care of the common good, wherein "themſelves are participant, without all prejudice to "the freedom of elections, admoniſh all our loving "ſubjects, that have votes in the elections of Knights "and Burgeſſes of theſe points following: Firſt, "that they caſt their eyes upon the worthieſt men of "all ſorts, Knights and Gentlemen, that are lights "and guides in their countries, experienced Parlia-"ment Men, wiſe and diſcreet Stateſmen, that have "been practiſed in public affairs, whether at home "or abroad, grave and eminent Lawyers, ſubſtantial "Citizens and Burgeſſes, and generally ſuch as are "intereſted and have portion in the eſtate. Secondly, "That they make choice of ſuch as are well affected "in religion, without declining either on the one "hand to blindneſs and ſuperſtition, or on the other "hand to ſchiſm or turbulent diſpoſition. Thirdly "and laſtly, That they be truly ſenſible not to diſva-"lue or diſparage the houſe with bankrupts and ne-"ceſſitous perſons, that may deſire long Parliaments "only for protection; Lawyers of mean account and "eſtimation; young men that are not ripe for grave "conſultations; mean dependents upon great perſons, "that may be thought to have their voices under "command, and ſuch like obſcure and inferior per-"ſons. So that to conclude, we may have the com-"fort to ſee before us the very force of a ſufficient "and well compoſed houſe, ſuch as may be worthy "to be a repreſentative of the third eſtate of our King-"dom, fit to nouriſh a loving and comfortable meet-"ing between us and our people, and fit to be a "noble inſtrument under the bleſſing of Almighty "God, and our Princely care and power, and with "the loving conjunction of our Prelates and Peers, for "the ſettling of ſo great affairs as are before ex-"preſſed.

(34) Collections relating to the Life of Lord Bacon, pag. 137.

[L] The Marquis of Buckingham preſented to the Lords a letter written to them by the Chancellor the ſame day.] In this letter (35), he deſires their Lordſhips to make a favourable and true conſtruction of his abſence, which was no feigning or fainting, but ſickneſs both of his heart and back, though joined with that comfort of mind, which perſuaded him that he was not far from heaven, whereof he felt the firſt fruits. But becauſe, whether he lived or died, he ſhould be glad to preſerve his honour and fame, ſo far as he was worthy, hearing that ſome complaints of baſe bribery were coming before their Lordſhips, his requeſts unto them were as follow: "Firſt, ſays he, "that you will maintain me in your good opinion "without prejudice. Secondly, that in regard I "have ſequeſtered my mind at this time in great "part from worldly matters, thinking of my account "and anſwers in a higher Court; your Lordſhips "will give me convenient time, according to the "courſe of other Courts, to adviſe with my Counſel, "and to make my anſwer, wherein nevertheleſs my "Counſel's part will be the leaſt: for I ſhall not by "the grace of God trick up an innocency with ca-"villations, but plainly and ingenuouſly (as your "Lordſhips know my manner is) declare what I "know or remember. Thirdly, that according to "the courſe of juſtice I may be allowed to except to "the witneſſes brought againſt me, and to move queſ-"tions to your Lordſhips for their croſs examinations, "and likewiſe to produce my own witneſſes for the "diſcovery of the truth. And laſtly, that if there "be any more petitions of like nature, that your "Lordſhips would be pleaſed not to take any preju-"dice or apprehenſion of any number or muſter of "them, eſpecially againſt a Judge, who makes two "thouſand orders and decrees in a year, (not to ſpeak "of the courſes that have been taken for hunting out "complaints againſt me;) but that I anſwer them "according to the rules of juſtice, ſeverally and re-"ſpectively. Theſe requeſts I hope appear to your "Lordſhips no other than juſt. And ſo thinking my "ſelf happy to have ſo noble Peers and reverend Pre-"lates to diſcern of my cauſe, and deſiring no pri-"vilege of greatneſs for ſubterfuge of guiltineſs, but "meaning, as I have ſaid, to deal fairly and plainly "with your Lordſhips, and to put my ſelf upon your "honours and favours &c." The ſame day he wrote likewiſe a letter to the King, wherein he tells him, that when he enters into himſelf, he finds not the materials of ſuch a tempeſt as was caſt upon him; that he had been (as his Majeſty knew beſt) never the author of any immoderate counſel, but always deſired to have things carried ſuavibus modis. That he had been no avaricious oppreſſor of the people; no haughty, nor intolerable, nor hateful man in his converſation or carriage, nor inherited any hatred from his father, but was a good Patriot born. Whence ſhould this be? For theſe are the things that uſe to raiſe diſlikes abroad. For the Houſe of Commons, he had begun his credit there, and now it muſt be the place of the ſepulture thereof; and yet in the preſent Parliament upon the meſſage, touching Religion, the old love revived, and they ſaid, that he was the ſame man ſtill, only honeſty was turned into honour. "For the Upper-"Houſe, ſays he, even within theſe days, before "theſe troubles, they ſeemed as to take me into their "arms, finding in me ingenuity, which they took to "be the true ſtrait line of nobleneſs, without any "crooks or angles. And for briberies and gifts, "wherewith I am charged, when the books of hearts "ſhall nations likewiſe. On Wedneſday April 24, 1621 Prince Charles acquainted the Lords, that the Lord Chancellor had ſent a ſubmiſſion [M], which was immediately read. But the Lords having conſidered of this ſubmiſſion, and heard the collections of Corruptions charged upon him, and the proofs thereof read, they ſent a copy of the charge without the proofs to him by Mr. Baron Denham and the Attorney-General, with this meſſage from them, that his confeſſion was not fully ſet down by him in that ſubmiſſion, ſince he had not confeſſed any particular Bribe or Corruption, nor ſhewn how he had heard the charge thereof; and becauſe the confeſſion, ſuch as it was, was afterwards extenuated in the ſame ſubmiſſion; and that therefore the Lords had ſent him a particular account of the charge, and expected his anſwer to it with all convenient expedition. He replied to this meſſage, that he would return them an anſwer with ſpeed. April the 25th the Lords conſidered of this anſwer of his, and ſent him a ſecond meſſage, that as this anſwer was doubtful, they had ſent again to him to know directly and preſently, whether his Lordſhip will make any confeſſion, or ſtand upon his defence. He replied, that he ſhould make no manner of defence to the charge, but intended to acknowledge Corruption, and to make a particular confeſſion to every point, and after that an humble ſubmiſſion; but deſired the liberty, that where the charge is more full than he finds the truth of the fact, he may make a declaration of the truth in ſuch particulars, the charge being brief, and not containing all the circumſtances (q). On Monday April 29th he ſent his confeſſion and ſubmiſſion to the Houſe of Lords, (q) Ibid. pag. 551.

(35) See the 4th volume of his Works, Numb. 145. pag. 685, 686.

" ſhall be opened, I hope I ſhall not be found to have " the troubled fountain of a corrupt heart in a depraved habit of taking rewards to pervert juſtice, " howſoever I may be frail, and partake of the abuſes of the times. And therefore I am reſolved, " when I come to my anſwer, not to trick up my " innocency (as I writ to the Lords) by cavillations or " voidances, but to ſpeak to them the language that " my heart ſpeaketh to me, in excuſing, extenuating, " or ingenuouſly confeſſing; praying to God to give " me the grace to ſee the bottom of my faults, and " that no hardneſs of heart do ſteal upon me, without " ſhew of more neatneſs of conſcience than is cauſe. " But not to trouble your Majeſty any longer, craving pardon for this long mourning letter; that " which I thirſt after, as the hart after the ſtreams, " is, that I may know by my matchleſs friend, that " preſenteth to you this letter, your Majeſty's heart, " (which is an abyſſus of goodneſs, as I am an abyſſus " of miſery) towards me. I have been ever your " man, and counted myſelf but an uſufructuary of " myſelf, the property being yours. And now making myſelf an oblation to do with me as may beſt " conduce to the honour of your juſtice, the honour of " your mercy, and the uſe of your ſervice, reſting as " clay in your Majeſty's gracious hands, &c.

[M] Prince Charles acquainted the Lords, that the Lord Chancellor had ſent a Submiſſion.] It was dated the 22d of April 1621. He deſires firſt of their Lordſhips a benign interpretation of what he ſhall write, ſince words that came from waſted ſpirits and an oppreſſed mind, are more ſafe in being depoſited in a noble conſtruction, than in being circled in any reſerved caution. He tells them then, that in the midſt of a ſtate of as great affliction as he thinks a mortal man can endure, (honour being above life) he ſhall begin with the profeſſing of gladneſs in ſome things. The firſt is, that hereafter the greatneſs of a Judge or Magiſtrate ſhall be no ſanctuary or protection of guiltineſs; which, in few words, is the beginning of a golden world. The next, that after this example, it is like that Judges will fly from any thing that is in the likeneſs of corruption, (tho' it were at a great diſtance,) as from a ſerpent; which tendeth to the purging of the Courts of Juſtice, and the reducing them to their true honour and ſplendor. He obſerves, that he underſtood that ſome juſtification had been expected from him; and therefore he had choſen one only juſtification inſtead of all others out of the juſtification of Job. For after the clear ſubmiſſion and confeſſion, which he ſhould then make to their Lordſhips, he hoped he might ſay and juſtify with Job in theſe words, I have not hid my ſin as did Adam, nor concealed my faults in my boſom. That it reſted therefore, that without fig-leaves he ſhould ingenuouſly confeſs and acknowledge, that having underſtood the particulars of the charge, not formally before the houſe, but enough to inform his conſcience and memory, he found matters ſufficient and full both to move him to deſert his defence, and to move their Lordſhips to condemn and cenſure him. That he would not trouble their Lordſhips by ſingling thoſe particulars, which he thought might fall off, Quid te exempta juvat ſpinis de millibus una? nor prompt them to obſerve upon the proofs, where they come not home, or the ſcruple touching the credit of the witneſſes. Neither would he repreſent to their Lordſhips how far a defence in divers things might extenuate the offence in reſpect of the time and manner of the gift, or the like circumſtances; but only leave thoſe things to ſpring out of their own noble thoughts and obſervations of the evidence and examinations themſelves, and charitably to wind about the particulars of the charge, here and there, as God ſhould put into their minds, and to ſubmit himſelf wholly to their piety and grace. That having ſpoken to their Lordſhips as Judges, he ſhould ſay a few words to them as Peers and Prelates, humbly commending his cauſe to their noble minds and magnanimous affections. That their Lordſhips were not ſimply Judges, but Parliamentary Judges, and had a farther extent of arbitrary power than other Courts; and if their Lordſhips were not tyed by ordinary courſes of Courts, or precedents in points of ſtrictneſs and ſeverity, much more in point of mercy and mitigation. And yet if any thing, which he ſhould move, might be contrary to their worthy ends of introducing a Reformation, he ſhould not ſeek it. That his humble deſire was, that his Majeſty would take the Seal into his hands, which would be a great downfall, and might ſerve, he hoped, in itſelf for an expiation of his faults. Therefore if mercy and mitigation were in their Lordſhips power, and did no ways croſs their noble ends, why ſhould he not hope of their favour and commiſeration? " Your Lordſhips, ſays he, will " be pleaſed to behold your chief pattern the King our " Sovereign, a King of incomparable clemency, and " whoſe heart is inſcrutable for wiſdom and goodneſs. " Your Lordſhips will remember that there ſat not " theſe hundred years before a Prince in your houſe, " and never ſuch a Prince, whoſe preſence deſerves " to be made memorable by records and acts mixed " of mercy and juſtice. Your Lordſhips are either " Nobles, (and compaſſion ever beateth in the veins " of noble blood) or reverend Prelates, who are the " ſervants of him, who would not break the bruiſed " reed, nor quench the ſmoking flax. You all ſit " upon one high ſtage, and therefore cannot but be " more ſenſible of the changes of the world, and of " the fall of any of high place. Neither will your " Lordſhips forget that there are vitia temporis, as " well as vitia hominis, and that the beginning of " Reformations hath the contrary power of the pool " of Betheſda; for that had ſtrength to cure him " only that was firſt caſt in, and this hath commonly " ſtrength to hurt him only, that is firſt caſt in. And " for my part, I wiſh it may ſtay there, and go no " farther. Laſtly, I aſſure my ſelf your Lordſhips " have a noble feeling of me as a member of your " own body, and one that in this very Seſſion had " ſome taſt of your loving affections, which I hope " was not a lightening before the death of them, " but rather a ſpark of that grace, which now in

Lords [N], in which he confeſſed ſome facts, denied others, and endeavours to anſwer or explain the reſt in ſuch a manner as to take off the malignity of the offence (r). But the Lords taking this for a full and ingenuous confeſſion, ſent ſeveral of their Members to ſee, if the Chancellor would own it to be his own hand, and ſtand to it, or not; which he did in theſe words: My Lords, it is my Act, my Hand, my Heart: I beſeech your Lordſhips to be merciful to a broken reed. This anſwer being reported to the Houſe, the Lords agreed to move the King to ſequeſter the Seal, and on Wedneſday May the 2d it was reſolved to proceed to give ſentence againſt him the next morning; and accordingly he was ſummoned to attend; but he anſwered that he was ſick, and proteſted, that he did not feign this for any excuſe; for if he had been well, he would willingly have come (s). The Lords however ſent to the Houſe of Commons, that they were ready to give judgment, when they were willing to demand it; which being done by their Speaker, upon the 3d of May 1621, the Lord Chief Juſtice pronounced the following Judgment; that the Lord Chancellor ſhould undergo the fine and ranſom of forty thouſand pounds; that he ſhould be impriſoned in the Tower during the King's pleaſure; that he ſhould be for ever incapable of any office, place, or employment in the State or Commonwealth; and never ſit in Parliament, or come within the Verge of the Court (t). The Prince of Wales and ſome others endeavoured to have mitigated the ſeverity of this ſentence; and many of the Lords by way of excuſe for the rigour of it told him afterwards, that they knew they left him in good hands (u); and it might be preſumed, that the King, who, as his Lordſhip writes, had ſhed tears upon the news of his being accuſed, would be indulgent and beneficent to him upon his ſentence (w). There is a variety of opinions concerning his guilt in the points charged againſt him [O]. After the Judgment given againſt him, and a ſhort impriſonment

(r) Collections, &c. ubi ſupra, pag. 140.

(s) Proceedings, &c. pag. 557.

(t) Ibid. p. 558, and Collections, &c. pag. 141.

(u) Collections, pag. 141.

(w) Stephens's Account, p. 23.

" the concluſion will more appear. And therefore my " humble ſuit to your Lordſhips is, that my penitent " ſubmiſſion may be my ſentence, and the loſs of the " ſeal my puniſhment; and that your Lordſhips will " ſpare any further ſentence, but recommend me to " his Majeſty's grace and pardon for all that is paſt.

[N] On Monday April 29th he ſent his Confeſſion and Submiſſion to the Houſe of Lords.] He declares at the beginning of this Confeſſion, that upon adviſed conſideration of the charge, deſcending into his own conſcience, and calling his memory to account ſo far as he was able, he plainly and ingenuouſly confeſſes that he was guilty of corruption, and renounces all defence, and put himſelf upon the grace and mercy of the Houſe of Lords. He proceeds then to a particular conſideration of the charge exhibited againſt him; and with reſpect to the twenty eighth article of it, that he had given way to great exactions by his ſervants both in reſpect of private ſeals, and otherwiſe for ſealing of Injunctions; he confeſſes that it was a great fault in him, that he look'd no better to his ſervants. This declaration, ſays he, I have made to your Lordſhips with a ſincere mind, humbly craving, that if there ſhould be any miſtake, your Lordſhips would impute it to want of memory, and not to any deſire of mine to obſcure truth, or palliate any thing; for I do now again confeſs, that in the points charged upon me, though they ſhould be taken, as myſelf have declared them, there is a great deal of corruption and neglect, for which I am heartily ſorry, and ſubmit myſelf to the judgment, grace, and mercy of the Court. For extenuation, I will uſe none concerning the matters themſelves, only it may pleaſe your Lordſhips out of your nobleneſs to caſt your eyes of compaſſion upon my perſon and eſtate. I was never noted for an avaritious man; and the Apoſtle ſaith, that covetouſneſs is the root of all evil. I hope alſo, that your Lordſhips do the rather find me in the ſtate of grace; for that in all theſe particulars there are few or none, that are not almoſt two years old; whereas thoſe that have an habit of corruption do commonly wax worſe; ſo that it hath pleaſed God to prepare me by the precedent degrees of amendment to my preſent penitency. And for my eſtate it is ſo mean and poor, as my care is now chiefly to ſatisfy my debts. And ſo fearing I have troubled your Lordſhips too long, I ſhall conclude with an humble ſuit unto you, that if your Lordſhips proceed to ſentence, your ſentence may not be heavy to my ruin, but gracious and mixt with mercy; and not only ſo, but that you would be noble interceſſors for me to his Majeſty likewiſe for his grace and favour.

[O] There is a variety of opinions concerning his guilt in the points charged againſt him.] Arthur Wilſon in his Life and Reign of King James I, publiſhed in the ſecond volume of the Complete Hiſtory of England (36), tells us, that the great Lord Chancellor Bacon came to a cenſure for the moſt ſimple and ridiculous follies, that ever entered into the heart of a wiſe man. That he was the true emblem of human frailty, being more than a man in ſome things, and leſs than a woman in others. That his crime was bribery and extortion, (which the King hinted at in his Speech, when he facetiouſly ſaid, that he thought the Lords had bribed the Prince to ſpeak well of them); and theſe he had often condemned others for as a Judge, which he now came to ſuffer for as a Delinquent. " They were " proved, continues that Hiſtorian, and aggravated a- " gainſt him with ſo many circumſtances, that they " fell very foully on him, both in relation to his re- " ception of them, and his expending of them. For " that which he raked in and ſcrued for one way, " he ſcattered and threw abroad another. For his " ſervants being young, prodigal, and expenſive " youths, which he kept about him, his treaſure was " their common ſtore, which they took without ſtint, " having free acceſs to his moſt retired privacies; " and his indulgence to them, and familiarity with " them opened a gap to infamous reports, which left " an unſavoury tincture on him; for where ſuch leeches " are, there muſt be putrid blood to fill their crav- " ing appetites. His gettings were like a Prince " with a ſtrong hand; his expences like a prodigal " with a weak head; and 'tis a wonder a man of his " noble and gallant parts, that could fly ſo high a- " bove reaſon, ſhould ſo far fall below it; unleſs that ſpi- " rit that acted the firſt, were too proud to ſtoop to " ſee the deformities of the laſt. And as he affected " his men, ſo his wife affected hers. Seldom doth " the huſband deviate one way, but the wife goeth " another. The things came into the public mouth, " and the genius of the times (where malice is not cor- " rival) is the great dictator of all actions; for innocency " itſelf is a crime, when calumny ſets her mark upon " it." Mr. Wilſon likewiſe having tranſcribed his Submiſſion of the 22d of April, obſerves, that " this hu- " miliation might have raiſed him up again, if his " offences had not been ſo weighty as to keep him " down." The ſhocking inſinuation againſt Lord Bacon in the laſt paſſage but one from this Hiſtorian, occaſioned ſome animadverſions from Mr. Stephens (37), who having mentioned that Nobleman's regard to Religion, tells us, that he takes notice of that qualification, to ſhew the improbability of a calumny lately divulged, that a religious Gentleman, of a ſickly conſtitution, whoſe time had been employed in ſtudying, practiſing, and governing the common Law; in ſearching into the depths and myſteries of State and Philoſophy; ſhould be guilty or thought guilty of a crime rarely known to the Nation. Nor do I remember it mentioned by any Hiſtorian but Wilſon; who writes, that his indulgence to his ſervants and his familiarity with them, opened a gap to infamous reports; but he thereupon adds, that innocency ment in the Tower, he retired from the engagements of an active life, which he had been called to very much againſt his genius, to the ſhade of a contemplative one, which he had always innocency itſelf is a crime, when calumny ſets her mark upon it. It appears before, that he was accuſed of being too indulgent to his ſervants, and his Lordſhip does confeſs, and Dr. Rawley, and Mr. Buſhel who was one of them, inſinuate, that ſome of them had abuſed his good nature. But that he ſhould have abuſed himſelf or any of them in the manner, that has been repreſented by a Gentleman, who was very young, when his Lordſhip was cenſured, and likely to believe any baſe ſtories of the ſervants of Kings, as well as of Kings themſelves, is no more to be credited, than the like defamation of Virgil, a moſt chaſte Poet. Dr. Teniſon in his Baconiana (38) obſerves, that his ſervants were moſt guilty of the corruption objected againſt him, and he himſelf not much acceſſary; and that it is true, that after the Seal was taken from him, he became a great example of penitence and ſubmiſſion; but it was a ſubmiſſion, which both manifeſted his juſt ſenſe of his fault, and the more venial nature of it, as ariſing from negligence rather than avarice and malice. He ſhewed by it, that there was not in his heart that ſtiffneſs of pride, which openly denies or juſtifies thoſe crimes, of which itſelf is ſecretly convinced. The ſame Author likewiſe tells us (39), that it muſt be confeſſed, that he was not without infirmities intellectual or moral; the latter of which have made the greater noiſe from the greatneſs of his fall. I do not here, continues he, pretend to ſpeak of an Angel, but of a man; and no man great in wit, and high in office can live free from ſuſpicion of both kinds of errors. For that heat, which is inſtrumental in making a great Wit, is apt to diſorder the attention of the mind and the ſtability of the temper. And high place, becauſe it giveth power to opportunity, though no authority to offend, is ever look'd on with a jealous eye; and corrupt men, who mete by their own meaſures, think no man can be great, and innocent too. His Lordſhip owned it under his hand (g), that he was frail, and did partake of the abuſes of the times. And ſurely he was a partaker of their ſeverities alſo, though they proved by accident happy croſſes and misfortunes. Methinks they are reſembled by thoſe of Sir George Sommers, who being bound by his employments to another coaſt, was by tempeſt caſt upon the Barmudas. And therefore a ſhipwrack'd man made full diſcovery of a new temperate fruitful Region, which none had before inhabited; and which Mariners, who had only ſeen its rocks, had eſteemed an inacceſſible and enchanted place. The great cauſe of his ſuffering is to ſome a ſecret. I leave them to find it out by his words to King James (h); I wiſh, ſaid he, that as I am the firſt, ſo I may be the laſt of ſacrifices in your time. And when from private appetite it is reſolved, that a creature ſhall be ſacrificed, it is eaſy to pick up ſticks enough from any thicket, whither it hath ſtrayed, to make a fire to offer it with. But whatſoever his errors were, or the cauſes of his misfortunes, they are overballanced by his virtues, and will die with time. His errors were but as ſome excreſcences, which grow on thoſe trees, that are fit to build the palaces of Kings. For tho' they are not proper and natural parts, yet they do not very much deprive the body of its uſe and value. And further (to expreſs myſelf by a more decent image, a compariſon of his own,) " His fall will be to poſterity, but as a little picture " of night-work remaining amongſt the fair and ex- " cellent tables of his acts and works (i)." Mr. Thomas Buſhel mentioned in this paſſage of Dr. Teniſon, had been a menial ſervant of my Lord Bacon (40), and eminent in his ſkill for diſcovering and opening of mines, and his curious water-works in Oxfordſhire, by which he imitated rain, hail, the rainbow, thunder and lightning (41). He gives us a particular account of his Patron's fate in his Extract (42), where he tells us, that there aroſe ſuch complaints againſt his Lordſhip and the then Favourite at Court (43), that for ſome days put the King to this query, whether he ſhould permit the Favourite of his affection, or the Oracle of his Council, to ſink in his ſervice. Whereupon his Lordſhip was ſent for by the King, who after ſome diſcourſe gave him this poſitive advice, to ſubmit himſelf to his Houſe of Peers, and that upon his princely word he would then reſtore him again, if they in their honours ſhould not be ſenſible of his merits. Now tho' his Lordſhip foreſaw his approaching ruin, and told his Majeſty there was little hopes of mercy in a multitude, when his enemies were to give fire, if he did not plead for himſelf; yet ſuch was his obedience to him, from whom he had his being, that he reſolved his Majeſty's will ſhould be his only law, and ſo took leave of him with theſe words, Thoſe that ſtrike at your Chancellor, it is much to be feared will ſtrike at your Crown; and wiſhed that as he was then the firſt, ſo he might be the laſt of ſacrifices. " Soon after, ſays Mr. Buſhell, according to " his Majeſty's commands he wrote a ſubmiſſive Letter " to the Houſe, and ſent me to my Lord Windſor to " know the reſult, which I was loth at my return to " acquaint him with; for alas! his Sovereign's favour " was not in ſo high a meaſure, but he like the Phœnix " muſt be ſacrificed in flames of his own raiſing, and " ſo periſhed like Icarus in that his loſty deſign, the " great revenue of his office being loſt, and his titles of " honour ſaved but by the Biſhops votes; whereto he re- " plied, that he was only bound to thank his Clergy. " The thunder of this fatal ſentence did much per- " plex my troubled thoughts, as well as others, to ſee " that famous Lord, who procured his Majeſty to call " this Parliament, muſt be the firſt ſubject of their re- " vengeful wrath; and that ſo unparallel'd a Maſter " ſhould be thus brought upon the public ſtage, " for the fooliſh miſcarriages of his own ſervants, " whereof with grief of heart I confeſs my ſelf to be " one. Yet ſhortly after the King diſſolved the Par- " liament, but never reſtored that matchleſs Lord to " his place; which made him then wiſh the many " years he had ſpent in State-policy and Law-ſtudy " had been ſolely devoted to true Philoſophy; for, " ſaid he, the one at beſt doth but comprehend man's " frailty in its greateſt ſplendor, but the other the " myſterious knowledge of all things created in the " ſix days work." Mr. Stephens in his Introduction (44) having obſerved that the laſt article in the charge againſt his Lordſhip, was that he had given way to great exactions in his ſervants, and that he confeſſed, it was a great neglect in him, that he looked to them no better; tells us, that he mentions this the rather, becauſe thoſe Writers, who excuſe the maſter, lay the greateſt blame upon his ſervants. And there is no doubt, but that ſome of them were very guilty, and that their Lord had that opinion of them; which it is reported his Lordſhip in the time of his troubles ſignified in paſſing through a room, where many of his retinue riſing up to ſalute him, he ſaid, Sit you down, my maſters, your riſe hath been my fall. We are told likewiſe by Ruſhworth in the firſt volume of his Hiſtorical Collections, that he treaſured up nothing for himſelf or family, but was over indulgent to his ſervants, and connived at their takings, and their ways betrayed him to that error. They were profuſe and expenſive, and had at their command whatever he was maſter of. The gifts taken were for the moſt part for interlocutory orders; his decrees were generally made with ſo much equity, that though gifts rendered him ſuſpected for injuſtice, yet never any decree made by him was reverſed as unjuſt, as it has been obſerved by ſome, who are well ſkilled in our Laws. To this we may add, what he alledges by way of excuſe, that great part of the gifts, &c. were made as preſents, in caſes where no ſuit was depending, or a good while before they were begun, or after they were ended. Upon this occaſion, ſays Mr. Stephens, who can forbear to obſerve and lament the weakneſs and infirmity of human nature? To ſee a man ſo far exalted above the common level of his fellow-creatures, to ſink ſo far below it. To ſee a man, who like Seneca gave admirable rules for the conduct of life, and condemning the avaritious purſuit after riches; and what is unlike Seneca, contemning them in his own perſon, and yet to be defiled thereby. To ſee a man applauding Sir George Villiers, whilſt very young, for deſpiſing money, where it croſſed reaſon of ſtate or virtue, to take money in his mature age, in oppoſition to both, and to his own deſtruction. Above all, to ſee a great Maſter of Reaſon and Philoſophy, who had been a credit and ornament to the Reformed Religion, to abate the luſtre of his example by ſubmitting

(36) Pag. 734. edit. London 1706.

(37) See his Account of the Life of Lord Bacon, pag. 33.

(38) Pag. 254, 255.

(39) Introd. pag. 15, 16, 17.

(g) In his Letter to King James, March 25, 1620. in the Cabala.

(h) See Mr. Buſhel's Extract, pag. 19.

(i) Epiſt. to Biſhop Andrews.

(40) See his Extract, pag. 17.

(41) See Introd. to Baconina, pag. 18.

(42) Poſtſcript, pag. 19, 20.

(43) See Dr. Hacket's Life of Biſhop Williams, pag. 49, 50.

(44) Pag. 54.

(x) Collections, Pag. 146.

always loved (x). The firſt, or at leaſt the greateſt act of kindneſs, which the King extended to him, was the remitting the parliamentary fine, and granting it to ſome of his Lordſhip's ſubmitting to a temptation, which many of the Heathen Philoſophers had the power to reſiſt. But as his Lordſhip had the misfortune to be made a memorial for the greateſt and the wiſeſt to take heed leſt they fall; ſo hath he the good fortune (which he obſerves attended three famous Writers, fallen under the like circumſtances) to have the remembrance of this calamity looked on by poſterity as a little picture of night-work remaining amongſt the fair and excellent tables of his acts and works. The

(45) Pag. 55. ſame Gentleman alſo tells us (45), that the Marquis of Buckingham in a letter which he wrote to Sir Lionel Cranfield, ſoon after the accuſing of the Chancellor, ſays, that he hoped that God, who had given that Lord many other great gifts, had alſo preſerved him from being guilty of ſuch crimes; yet that he likewiſe hoped, that the Houſe of Commons would wave their application to the Lords, and go their direct way to the King, who both could and would do them juſtice. Dr. Heylin likewiſe in his Life of Archbiſhop Laud

(46) Part 1. ad ann. 1620. (46), and Mr. Elſing in a manuſcript Diſcourſe concerning Parliaments, conſidered the giving up of this great Miniſter to the Parliament as a falſe ſtep made by the King, and a leading card to others ſoon after. Yet the Committee ſeemed to be of another opinion, when they told the Peers, that they followed ancient precedents, which ſhewed that great perſons had been accuſed for the like crimes in Parliament. From what Mr. Stephens obſerves, it appears how miſtaken the Editor of Moreri's Dictionary is, when he affirms under the articles of King James and the Lord Bacon, that the Duke of Buckingham was the cauſe of the Lord Chancellor's downfall; nor do I know, ſays Mr. Stephen, any Hiſtorian that aſſerts the ſame. In the year 1721 there was publiſhed the fifth edition of a Pamphlet in 8vo intitled, FRANCIS Lord BACON, or the Caſe of private and national Corruption and Bribery impartially conſidered. Addreſs'd to all South-Sea Directors, Members of Parliament, Members of State and Church-Dignitaries. By an Engliſhman. It was dedicated to Philip

(47) Pag. 13. Duke of Wharton. The Author tells us (47), that my Lord Bacon's caſe was a preſumption of bribery (as ſome have ſaid) for a private decree pronounced in the Court of Chancery; and having ſtated his character

(48) Pag. 15. from Dr. Rawley's Life of him, he obſerves (48), that he had all the qualifications of a faithful, wiſe, and an able Miniſter, and was a man that ſeemed made to draw the affections of the people upon their Prince; yet all ſullied by one inglorious imputation, which made him at the ſame time both pitied and deſpiſed. He remarks then that the Hiſtorians of thoſe times are very obſcure as to the particulars of the fact, and that moſt of them, who have written any thing of him, ſeem willing to think him innocent of the crime ſuſpected. That there is one ex poſt facto circumſtance which goes a great way to prove him ſo, which is his poverty after he was degraded; and that Mr. Echard in his Hiſtory of England ſays, that he treaſured up nothing either for himſelf or his family; but his fatal error was his indulgence to his ſervants. In ſhort, that his decrees were always made with ſo much equity, that none were ever

(49) Pag. 19, & ſeq. reverſed as unjuſt. The Author afterwards (49) mentions the caſe of Sir Giles Mompeſſon and Sir Francis Mitchel, and obſerves, that none of the Hiſtorians (at leaſt as far as he had either read or could remember) are particular enough, or ſeem to ſuppoſe that my Lord Chancellor Bacon had any feeling in that affair.

(50) Pag. 21. But, continues he (50), I ſhall bring in one witneſs, from whom the information might be ſuſpected, who intimates a bribe in this very caſe to have been the ſlip, which overthrew this great Man. The Author here meant is Dr. Hacket Biſhop of Lichfield, who in his Life of Archbiſhop Williams has the following paſſage. " The Parliament, whoſe bearing was dutiful to the " King, was quick and minatory againſt ſome vile " perſons who had ſpoiled the people by illegal op- " preſſions. Theſe were cankerworms, harpies, pro- " jectors, who between the eaſineſs of the Lord Mar- " quis to procure, and the willingneſs of the Lord " Chancellor Bacon to comply, had obtained Patent- " Commiſſions for latent knaveries. Which exorbi- " tances being countenanced in the Court, were grown " too ſtrong for any juſtice but the Parliament's to " root them up. There the appeals of the vexed " ſubject were heard, more like to outcries than " complaints, which fell thick upon Sir Giles Mom- " peſſon and Sir Francis Mitchel, for fines and levies " raiſed upon inns and alehouſes, arbitrary impoſiti- " ons, and a precedent dangerous to ſpread even to " ſhops and warehouſes. Others remonſtrated againſt " a pack of cheaters, who procured the monopoly of " gold-thread, which with their ſpinning was palpa- " bly corrupted and embaſed. . . . . Together with " theſe vermin, (and much more than theſe) the Lord " Chancellor was queſtioned, and (without pity to his " excellent parts) the Caſtle of Munera (as I borrow " it from Mr. Spencer's divine wit) muſt be quite de- " faced." The Author of The Caſe of private and national Corruption, &c. (51) proceeds to obſerve from (51) Pag. 23. Biſhop Hacket, that the Parliament wearied with long ſittings and great pains was content againſt the Feaſt of Eaſter to take ſome relaxation, and was prorogued from the 27th of March to the 18th of April. The Marquis of Buckingham had an eye in it upon the Lord Chancellor, to try if time would mitigate the diſpleaſure, which was ſtrong againſt him in both Houſes. But the leiſure of three weeks multiplied new ſuggeſtions againſt him. In ſhort, adds the Author, the opinion of his being faulty ſpread among the crowd, and innocency itſelf then becomes a crime, when calumny once ſets her mark upon it. He was immediately degraded from his peerage, and rendered incapable of any employment of truſt or honour, only upon the ſuſpicion of his bribery. I ſay, only the ſuſpicion; for the proofs, I think, (at leaſt at firſt) were no more than circumſtantial; a purſe of gold found under the Chancellor's ſeat. Had the Houſe probably gone cloſely to work upon the queſtion of his fault, evidence might have been wanting to amount to a conviction. But my Lord Bacon, who knew that all wounds ake with lying open, and that circumſtances are ſufficient to blaſt a reputation, took a method to ſave the Parliament the trouble of an examination. For in a ſupplicating letter, which he wrote to them, he ingenuouſly acknowledges (52), that having underſtood the particulars of the charge, not formally from the Houſe, but enough to inform his conſcience and memory, he found matter ſufficient and full both to move him to deſert his defence, and to move their Lordſhips to condemn and cenſure him. . . . We hardly have a greater inſtance in Hiſtory how little compaſſion follows the perſon of a great Miniſter, that is once ſtigmatized with ſordid corruption. The ſame Author ſays likewiſe in another place (53), that " in my Lord Bacon's caſe, the pu- (53) Pag. 27. " niſhment was equal to the crime. There were cir- " cumſtances to give a ſuſpicion of bribery, and there- " fore he was unqualified for the ſervice of the pub- " lic." And again he tells us (54), that my Lord (54) Pag. 53. Chancellor Bacon knew very well that the evidence againſt him in this caſe could not have come up to affect him at common Law; but he knew too, that he was to be tried by a Court, whoſe power can ſupply the deficiences of formal proof; and therefore in his Letter of Submiſſion to the Houſe of Peers, he tells them, that their Lordſhips are not ſimply Judges, but Parliamentary Judges; that they have a further extent of arbitrary power than other Courts; and are not tied by ordinary courſe of Courts, or precedents in points of ſtrictneſs and ſeverity. Mr. Pope in his fourth Eſſay upon Man (55), has given us this character of him; (55) Ver. 277, 278.

If parts allure thee, think how Bacon ſhin'd
The wiſeſt, brighteſt, meaneſt of mankind.

But let us ſee in what manner he ſpoke himſelf of his misfortune in a Letter to Dr. Lancelot Andrews, Biſhop of Wincheſter, prefixed to his Advertiſement touching an Holy War, written in the year 1622. He obſerves in that Letter, that amongſt conſolations it is not the leaſt to repreſent to a man's ſelf like examples of calamity in others; and as it ſavours of vanity to match ourſelves highly in our own conceit, ſo on the other ſide it is a good ſound concluſion, that if our betters have ſuſtained the like events, we have the leſs cauſe to be grieved. That in this conſolation he had not been wanting to himſelf; tho' as a Chriſtian he had taſted, thro' God's great goodneſs, of higher remedies.

(52) Wilſon's Life of King James I.

Lordſhip's friends, in order to give him a little reſpite from his creditors, to whom he is ſaid to have paid 8000*l.* after his fall (y); and in his CXLIX Letter printed in the fourth Volume of his Works (z), which is a very moving expoſtulation with the King [P], he tells him, that the poor remains, which he had of his former fortunes in plate and jewels he had ſpread upon poor men to whom he owed, ſcarce leaving himſelf a convenient ſubſiſtence. In another letter to the King, dated July 30th 1624, wherein he uſes the moſt pathetic expreſſions imaginable, he implores his Majeſty to grant him a total remiſſion of his ſentence, to the end that blot of ignominy might be removed from him, and from his memory with poſterity. This requeſt very probably was granted him, for we find that he was ſummoned to Parliament in the firſt year of King Charles I (aa). It may be preſumed, that the preſſing of his creditors, and the ill payment of his penſions upon his diſgrace, obliged him to write to the King ſeveral complaining letters. But it is by no means certain, that he died in ſo low a condition as Mr. Howel and ſome other writers pretend [Q]. However it appears from medies. Having therefore thro' the variety of his reading ſet before him many examples both of ancient and later times, his thoughts he confeſſed had chiefly ſtaid upon three particulars, as the moſt eminent and the moſt reſembling. All three perſons, that had held chief place of authority in their countries; all three ruined, not by war, or by any other diſaſter, but by juſtice and ſentence, as delinquents and criminals; all three famous Writers, inſomuch as the remembrance of their calamity is now to poſterity but as a little picture of night-work remaining amongſt the fair and excellent tables of their acts and works. And all three (if that were any thing to the matter) fit examples to quench any man's ambition of riſing again; ſince they were every one of them reſtored with great glory, but to their farther ruin and deſtruction, ending in a violent death. The men were Demoſthenes, Cicero, and Seneca; perſons that he durſt not claim affinity with, except the ſimilitude of their fortunes had contracted it. That when he caſt his eyes upon theſe examples he was carried on farther to obſerve how they bore their fortunes, and principally how they employed their times, being baniſh'd and diſabled for publick buſineſs, to the end that he might learn by them, and that they might be as well his counſellors as his comforters. Whereupon he happened to note how differently their fortunes wrought upon them, eſpecially in that point at which he moſt aimed, which was the employing of their times and pens. "In Cicero, ſays he, I ſaw that dur- "ing his baniſhment, (which was almoſt two "years) he was ſo ſoftened and dejected, as he wrote "nothing but a few womaniſh Epiſtles. And yet "in mine opinion he had leaſt reaſon of the three "to be diſcouraged; for that although it was judged, "and judged by the higheſt kind of judgment in "form of Statute or Law, that he ſhould be baniſh'd "and his whole eſtate confiſcated and ſeized, and his "houſes pulled down; and that it ſhould be highly pe- "nal for any man to propound a Repeal; yet his caſe "even then had no great blot of ignominy; for it "was thought but a tempeſt of popularity, which "overthrew him. Demoſthenes contrariwiſe, tho' "his caſe was foul, being condemned for bribery, "and not ſimple bribery, but bribery in the nature "of treaſon and diſloyalty, yet nevertheleſs took ſo "little knowledge of his fortune, as during his ba- "niſhment he did much buſy himſelf, and intermeddle "with matters of State, and took upon him to coun- "ſel the State (as if he had been ſtill at the helm) "by Letters, as appears by ſome Epiſtles of his, "which are extant. Seneca indeed, who was con- "demned for many corruptions and crimes, and ba- "niſhed into a ſolitary iſland, kept a mean; and "though his pen did not freeze, yet he abſtained from "intruding into matters of buſineſs; but ſpent his "time in writing Books of excellent argument and "uſe for all Ages; though he might have made bet- "ter choice ſometimes of his Dedications. Theſe "examples confirmed me much in a reſolution (where- "unto I was otherwiſe inclined) to ſpend my time "wholly in writing, and to put forth that poor ta- "lent or half talent, or what it is that God hath "given me, not as heretofore to particular exchanges, "but to banks or mounts of perpetuity, which will "not break."

(y) Ibid. pag. 147.

(z) Pag. 691.

(aa) Collections, &c. pag. 147.

[P] Which is a very moving expoſtulation with the King.] He tells his Majeſty, that in the midſt of his miſery, which was rather aſſuaged by remembrance than by hope: his chiefeſt worldly comfort was to think, that ſince the time he had the firſt vote of the Houſe of Commons for Commiſſioner of the Union, until the time that he was in the laſt Parliament choſen by both Houſes for their Meſſenger to his Majeſty in the petition of Religion; (which two were his firſt and laſt ſervices,) he was always ſo happy as to have his poor ſervices graciouſly accepted by his Majeſty, and likewiſe not to have any of them miſcarry in his hands. That unto this comfort of nineteen years proſperity there ſucceeded a comfort even in his greateſt adverſity ſomewhat of the ſame Nature, which is, that in thoſe offences, wherewith he was charged, there was not any one, that had ſpecial relation to his Majeſty, or any of his particular commands. "I am a year and half old "in miſery, ſays he, though I muſt ever acknowledge "not without ſome mixture of your Majeſty's grace "and mercy; for I do not think it poſſible, that any "one whom you once loved ſhould be totally miſer- "able. Mine own means, through my own impro- "vidence, are poor and weak, little better than my "father left me. The poor things that I have had "from your Majeſty, are either in queſtion, or at "courteſy. My dignities remain marks of your paſt "favour, but burdens of my preſent fortune. The "poor remnants, which I had of my former fortunes "in plate and jewels, I have ſpread upon poor men "unto whom I owed, ſcarce leaving my ſelf a con- "venient ſubſiſtence. So as to conclude, I muſt pour "out my miſery before your Majeſty ſo far as to ſay, "Si deſeris tu, perimus.... But if it may pleaſe your "Majeſty (for Saints I ſhall give them reverence, but "no adoration, my addreſs is to your Majeſty the "Fountain of Goodneſs,) your Majeſty ſhall by the "grace of God, not feel that in gift, which I ſhall "extremely feel in help: for my deſires are moderate, "and my courſes meaſured to a life orderly and re- "ſerved, hoping ſtill to do your Majeſty honour in "my way. Only I muſt humbly beſeech your Ma- "jeſty to give me leave to conclude with theſe words, "which neceſſity ſpeaketh; help me, dear Sovereign "Lord and Maſter, and pity me ſo far, as that I that "have born a bag, be not now in my Age forced in "effect to bear a wallet; not that I that deſire to live "to ſtudy may not be driven to ſtudy to live." Mr. Le Clerc in his Reflections upon what the world commonly call Good Luck and Ill Luck with regard to Lotteries, chap. XII. wherein he diſcourſes of liberality, and the obligations, which are upon Princes and great men to extend their bounty to learned men, in reſpect of the benefit, which the world receives from them, obſerves upon occaſion of the laſt paſſage of my Lord Bacon's Letter above quoted, that one cannot without a juſt indignation read the account of that famous Chancellor, whom King James I. ſuffered to languiſh in poverty, whilſt he preferred worthleſs perſons, who were fit for nothing but to diſgrace their Benefactor. And then citing the pathetic concluſion of his letter to the King, he tells us, that tho' thoſe expreſſions have been repreſented as marks of abjectneſs of mind in my Lord Bacon; yet they caſt a much greater imputation of it upon his Maſter, who forced ſo great a man to the neceſſity of making ſo poor a requeſt; and who had the inhumanity to let him die in circumſtances ſo deplorable, that he had ſcarce enough left to bury him. We ſhall examine this laſt fact with regard to the poverty of my Lord Bacon in the following note.

[Q] But it is by no means certain that he died in ſo low a condition, as Mr. Howel and ſome other writers ſuppoſe.] from the Works, which he compoſed and deſigned during his retirement, that his thoughts were ſtill free, vigorous and noble (bb): and, as Dr. Teniſon obſerves (cc), it did not appear by any thing during all the time of his eclipſe of fortune, that there was any abjectneſs of ſpirit in him. His Writings ſhew a mind in him not diſtracted with anxiety, nor depreſſed with ſhame, nor ſlow for want of encouragement, nor broken with diſcontent. Such a temper is inconſiſtent with ſuch noble thoughts and deſigns, ſuch ſtrict attention, ſuch vigour of conceit, ſuch a maſculine ſtyle, ſuch quickneſs in compoſition, as appeared in his learned labours. The laſt five years of his life he devoted entirely to his ſtudies; a thing which he would often ſpeak of during the active part of his life, as if he affected to die in the ſhadow, and not in the light (dd). In this receſs he compoſed the greateſt part of his Latin and Engliſh Works; which we ſhall give an account of in the order, in which they are diſpoſed by Mr. Blackbourne in his edition of them publiſhed at London in four Volumes in folio in the year 1730. The firſt Volume includes his Inſtauratio magna, the

(bb) Ibid. pag. 148.

(cc) Baconiana, p. 255.

(dd) See Dr. Rawley's Life of Lord Bacon.

* Letter VIII. vol. 1. Sect. 4. pag. 158, 159, 6th edit. London 1688.

ſuppoſe.] Mr. Howel tells us in a letter of his * dated Jan. the 6th 1625, that my Lord Chancellor Bacon was lately dead of a long languiſhing weakneſs, and that he died ſo poor, that he ſcarce left money to bury him; which though he had a great Wit, did argue no great wiſdom, it being one of the eſſential properties of a wiſe man to provide for the main chance . . . . I believe he died poor out of a contempt of the pelf of fortune, as alſo out of an exceſs of generoſity, which appeared as in divers other paſſages, ſo once when the King had ſent him a ſtag, he ſent up for the Under-keeper, and having drunk the King's health unto him in a great ſilver gilt bowl, he gave it him for his fee. He writ a pitiful letter to King James not long before his death, and concludes, Help me, dear Sovereign Lord and Maſter, and pity me ſo far, that I, who have been born to a bag, be not now in my age forced in effect to bear a wallet; nor I that deſire to live to ſtudy, may be driven to ſtudy to live; which words in my opinion, argue a little abjection of ſpirit, as his former letter to the Prince did of profaneneſs, wherein he hoped, that as the father was Creator, the ſon will be his Redeemer. I write not this to derogate from the noble worth of the Lord Viſcount Verulam, who was a rare man, a man reconditæ ſcientiæ, & ad ſalutem literarum natus, and I think the eloqueneſt, that was born in this Iſle. This letter of Mr. Howel confirms the ſuſpicion mentioned by Mr. Wood in his Athenæ Oxonienſes †, that many of the letters publiſhed by him were never written before the Author of them was in the Fleet, as he pretends they were, only feigned, (no time being kept with their dates,) and purpoſely publiſhed to gain money to relieve his neceſſities. For we may obſerve, that this letter, which mentions my Lord Bacon's death, is dated January 6th 1625, whereas he did not die till April 9th 1626; and with regard to what that Author ſays, that he died ſo poor, that he ſcarce left money to bury him, this will be conſidered in the ſequel of this note. And here we ſhall take notice of another miſtake in Mr. Howel, who in a letter (57) dated Feb. the 2d 1621. ſtiles my Lord Bacon, Lord Keeper, whereas he had been appointed Lord Chancellor January the 4th 1618. However it may not be improper to mention the ſtory which he there relates. " There is, ſays he, a flaunting French Ambaſſador come over lately, and I " believe his errand is nought elſe but compliment; " for the King of France being lately at Calais, and " ſo in ſight of England, he ſent his Ambaſſador, " M. Cadenet, expreſly to viſit our King. He had " audience two days ſince, where he with his train " of ruffling long-hair'd Monſieurs carried himſelf " in ſuch a light garb, that after the audience, " the King aſked my Lord Keeper Bacon what he " thought of the French Ambaſſador? He anſwered, " that he was a tall proper man: Ay, his Majeſty replied, but what think you of his head piece? Is he " a proper perſon for the office of an Ambaſſador? Sir, " ſaid Bacon, tall men are like high houſes of four or " five ſtories, wherein commonly the uppermoſt room is " worſt furniſhed." But to proceed to the other Authors, who mention the wretched circumſtances of Lord Bacon. Arthur Wilſon in his hiſtory of the life and reign of King James I. (58) tells us, that to heighten his miſery the more, many others were cruſhed to pieces by his fall; for he had a vaſt debt upon him, which they were forc'd to pay; and though he had a penſion allow'd him by the King, he wanted to his laſt, living obſcurely in his Lodgings at Grays-Inn, where his loneneſs and deſolate condition wrought upon his ingenious, and therefore then more melancholy temper, that he pined away; and had this unhappineſs after all his height of plenitude to be denied beer to quench his thirſt. For having a ſickly taſte, he did not like the beer of the houſe, but ſent to Sir Fulk Grevil Lord Brook, in the neighbourhood, now and then for a bottle of his beer, and after ſome grumbling the Butler had order to deny him. So ſordid was the one, that advanced himſelf to be called Sir Philip Sidney's friend, and ſo friendleſs was the other, after he had dejected himſelf from what he was. Sir Anthony Weldon in his Court and Character of King James (59) has the following paſſage: " I ſhall not remember his baſeneſs, being " out of place, of pinning himſelf for very ſcraps on " that noble gentleman, Sir Julius Cæſar's hoſpitality, " that at laſt he was forc'd to get the King's warrant " to remove him out of his houſe. Yet in his proſperity, the one being Chancellor, and the other " Maſter of the Rolls, did ſo ſcorn and abuſe him, as " he would alter any thing the other did." But Mr. Stephens in his Introduction (60) obſerves, that tho' his liberality and neglect of treaſuring up money, and his great expence in making of experiments ſeem to have exhauſted the gains of his profeſſion and preferments, yet Dr. Rawley, his domeſtic Chaplain, and a perſon much truſted by his Lordſhip aſſures us, that the King had given him out of the Broad-Seal, and out of the Alienation-Office to the value of eighteen hundred pounds per annum, which with his manor of Gorhambury and other lands adjoining, amounting to a third part more, he retained till his death; and ſo it is to be preſumed he did the profits of the Office of Regiſter in the Star-Chamber, computed at ſixteen hundred pounds per annum, which fell to him towards the latter end of King James the Firſt's reign. However Mr. Stephens obſerves in his Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon (61), that it is true, though it be known to few perſons, that when the Marquis of Buckingham went into Spain, the Lord Bacon's affairs were at ſo low an ebb, that upon the death of Mr. Murray, he ſollicited the King by Secretary Conway to be made Provoſt of Eaton-College, where indeed he would have enjoyed a pleaſant retreat in the ſociety of learned men. The Secretary anſwered him in a letter of the 21ſt of March 1623, that the King could not value his Lordſhip ſo little, or conceive that he limited his deſires ſo low; in which however he ſhould have been gratified, had not the King been engaged by the Lord Marquis for Sir William Becher his Agent in France. But the place was ſoon after obtained by Sir Henry Wotton, who had been his Majeſty's Embaſſador in ſeveral Courts, and that by an honeſt artifice, as Mr. Iſaac Walton writes in his account of Sir Henry's life. But in Lord Bacon's laſt will, dated the 19th of December 1625, beſides what was ſettled and left to his Lady, anſwerable to her quality, he gives ſeveral large charities and legacies to his friends and ſervants, and makes an eſtimate of his eſtate, by which his debts and legacies might be ſatisfied; and appoints that out of the remainder a Lecture ſhould be founded in each Univerſity for Natural Philoſophy and the Sciences, which he hoped would at leaſt amount to two hundred pounds a year each. He directs likewiſe his Truſtees to have regard in that affair to the meaſures, which Sir Henry Savile had lately taken in his; and entreats his noble and conſtant friend the Duke of Buckingham to be an Overſeer of his Will, and that his Executors would take ſome pains in the performance; that conſidering what he † Vol. 2. Col. 382. 2d edit. London 1721.

(57) Letter 1. Sect. 2. vol. 1. pag. 65.

(58) See the Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. 2. pag. 735, 736. edit. London 1706.

(59) Pag. 123, 124.

(60) Pag. 58. See likewiſe his Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon, pag. 25, 26, and 29.

(61) Pag. 26.

the first part of which contains his IX Books De Augmentis Scientiarum [R], and the second his Novum Organum [S]. The second Volume contains his Parasceve ad Historiam Naturalem & Experimentalem; a Fragment of a book of his entitled Abecedarium Naturæ; Præfatio Historiæ Naturalis ad condendam Philosophiam; his History of Winds, of density and he had been, his good mind by their care might effect that good work. Yet Monsieur Sorbiere takes upon him to tell the world as from Sir William Boswel, a friend of my Lord Bacon's, that his Lordship made his will by way of gallantry, and that he therein left four hundred thousand Livres to an imaginary College, whereof he had designed the Plan in his new Atlantis. But this is a mere chimerical imagination; for it is well known, that my Lord Bacon in the fable of the new Atlantis exhibited a model, rather possible to be effected, than probable to be ever attempted by the greatest and most opulent Prince. It is true however, that his Lordship's Executors declined to act, finding, as it is probable, his debts greater, and the estate less than the Testator conceived, so that the administration was granted to Mr. Meautys and another of his creditors.

[R] The first part of his Instauratio Magna contains his nine Books de Augmentis Scientiarum.] His Instauratio is undoubtedly the most considerable of all his works. And it is evident that he thought so himself from his Letter to Dr. Andrews Bishop of Winchester prefixed to his Advertisement touching an holy War; in which Preface he observes, that this is the work that in his own judgment (si nunquam fallit imago) he most esteemed. In this work, as Dr. Tenison remarks (62), he designed to take in pieces the former model of sciences; to lay aside the rotten materials; to give it a new form and enlarge it; and to found it not upon imagination, but reason assisted by experience. This Great Instauration was to consist of six parts. The first part proposed was the Partitions of the Sciences; and this the Author perfected in his excellent treatise of the Advancement of Learning, addressed to King James, a labour, which he termed in his Letter to Sir Thomas Bodley (63) in the year 1605, the comfort of his other labours. This he wrote at first in two books in English; and it is of this his first edition that we are to understand that passage in his Letter to the Earl of Salisbury (64), wherein he tells him, that he should content himself to awake better spirits, like a bell-ringer, who is first up to call others to church. He afterwards enlarged the second of these two Discourses, which contained particularly the abovementioned Partition, and divided the matter of it into eight Books. And knowing that this work was desired by foreigners, and considering likewise that Books written in a modern language, which receives a great change in a few years, grow out of use; he caused that part, which he had written in English, to be translated into Latin by Mr. Herbert, Ben. Johnson, and some others, who were esteemed Masters in the Roman Eloquence. However he so adapted the style to his conceptions by a strict castigation of the whole work, that it may justly be considered as his own. The translation of this work, (that is, of a great part of the two Books) he first recommended to Dr. Playfer, a Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge; but the specimen, which he sent, was written with so much affectation of elegance, that my Lord Bacon did not encourage him to proceed in that work, since he wanted not so much a polite as a clear, masculine, and proper expression. The whole of this Book was translated into English by Dr. Gilbert Watts of Oxford, and the translation, printed at London 1674, has been well received by many. But others wished for a translation, in which the genius and spirit of the Lord Bacon had appeared to greater advantage. And Dr. Tenison tells us (65), that he had seen a Letter written by certain Gentlemen to Dr. Rawley, wherein they thus importune him for a more accurate version by his own hand. It is our humble suit to you, and we do earnestly sollicit you . . . to give yourself the trouble to correct the too much defective translation of de Augmentis Scientiarum, which Dr. Watts hath set forth. It is a thousand pities, that so worthy a piece should lose its grace and credit by an ill expositor, since those persons, who read that translation, taking it for genuine, and upon that presumption not regarding the Latin edition, are thereby robbed of that benefit, which (if you would please to undertake the business) they might receive. This tendeth to the dishonour of that noble Lord, and the hindrance of the advancement in learning. This work has also been translated into French at the desire of the Marquis D'Effiat. But there are many things wholly omitted in it, many things perfectly mistaken, and some things, especially such as relate to Religion, designedly perverted; so that in one place the translator makes his Lordship extol the Legend; a book, which was undoubtedly of very little credit with him, when he thus begins one of his Essays (66); I had rather believe all the fables in the Legend, and the Talmud, and the Alcoran, than that this universal frame is without a mind. The fairest and most correct edition of this book in Latin before that published in his works in 1730, is that in folio printed at London 1623. Dr. Tenison observes (67), that those, who would understand the Lord Bacon's cypher (68), must consult that accurate edition; since in some other editions the form of the letters of the alphabet, in which much of the mystery consists, is not observed; but the Roman and Italic shapes of them are confounded. To this book we may reduce the first four chapters of that imperfect treatise published in Latin by Isaac Gruter, and entitled The Description of the Intellectual Globe, since they are but a rude draught of the Partition of Sciences, so accurately and methodically disposed in the book de Augmentis Scientiarum. We may likewise refer to the same head the Thema Cœli, published in Latin by Gruter; which particularly belongs to the fourth chapter of the third book of that treatise; as it is a Discourse tending to the improvement of the System of the Heavens. For the same reason we may reduce to the same place of the Advancement the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters of the Descriptio Globi Intellectualis (69).

[S] His Novum Organum.] This is the second part of his Instauratio Magna, and so considerable a part of it, that, as Dr. Tenison observes (70), the name of the whole is given to it. It was written by himself in Latin, and dedicated to King James I, with with this excuse, that if he had stolen any time for the composure of it from his Majesty's other affairs, he had made some kind of restitution by doing honour to his name and his reign. Poterit fortasse Majestas tua me furti incusare, quod tantum temporis, quantum ad hæc sufficiat, negotiis tuis suffuratus sim. Non habeo quod dicam. Temporis enim non fit restitutio; nisi forte quod detractum fuerit temporis tuis rebus, id memoriæ nominis tui & honori sæculi tui reponi possit, si modo hæc alicujus sint pretii. The King wrote to him, who was then Chancellor, a letter of thanks with his own hand, wherein he promises him to read it over with the utmost attention; and in the mean time, says he, I can with comfort assure you, that you could not have made choice of a subject more befitting your place and your universal and methodical knowledge. Three copies of this Organum were sent by the Lord Bacon to Sir Henry Wotton, who took a pride, as himself says, in a certain congeniality with his Lordship's studies. And how much he valued the present, we may learn from his Letter published in his Remains (71). Your Lordship, says he, hath done a great and ever-living benefit to all the children of nature, and to nature herself in her uttermost extent of latitude; who never before had so noble, nor so true an interpreter, or (as I am readier to style your Lordship) never so inward a secretary of her cabinet. But of your said work (which came but this week to my hands) I shall find occasion to speak more hereafter; having yet read only the first book thereof, and a few aphorisms of the second. For it is not a banquet, that men may superficially taste, and put up the rest in their pockets, but in truth a solid feast, which requireth due mastication. Therefore when I have once myself perused the whole, I determine to have it read piece by piece at certain hours in my domestic college as an ancient author. For I have learned thus much by it already, that we are extremely mistaken in the computation of antiquity, by searching it backwards; because indeed the first times were the youngest, especially in points of natural discovery and experience.

(62) Baconiana, or an Account of all the Lord Bacon's Works, pag. 23, & seq.

(63) See his Works, vol. 4. pag. 561.

(64) Ibid. pag. 562.

(65) Baconiana. pag. 26, 27.

(66) Essay of Atheism.

(67) Ubi supra, pag. 27.

(68) In lib. 6. cap. 1.

(69) Tenison, ubi supra, p. 28.

(70) Ibid.

(71) Pag. 298, 299.

and rarity, of gravity and levity, of ſympathy and antipathy, of ſalt, ſulphur and mercury, and ence. This Novum Organum, as Dr. Teniſon obſerves (71), contains in it inſtructions concerning a better and more perfect uſe of reaſon in our enquiries after things. And therefore the ſecond title which he gave it, was, Directions concerning Interpretations of Nature. By this art he deſigned a Logic more uſeful than the vulgar, and an Organon more proper for the aſſiſtance of the intellectual powers, than that of Ariſtotle. For he propoſed here not ſo much the invention of arguments as of arts; and in demonſtration he uſed induction more than ſyllogiſm; and in his induction he did not immediately proceed from a few particular ſenſible notions to the moſt general of all, but raiſed axioms by degrees, deſigning the moſt general notions for the laſt place, and inſiſting on ſuch of them as are not merely notional, but coming from nature lead likewiſe to her. This Book contains three parts, the Preface, the Diſtribution of the work of the Great Inſtauration; and Aphoriſms directing to the Interpretation of Nature. The Preface conſiders the preſent unhappy ſtate of learning, with counſels and advices to advance and improve it. To this Preface therefore may be reduced the Indicia and the Proem publiſhed by Gruter concerning the Interpretation of Nature; the firſt Book de Augmentis Scientiarum, which treats in general of the Dignity and Advancement of the Sciences; and his Cogitata and Viſa. To the Diſtribution belong the Latin Fragment publiſhed by Gruter, intitled The Delineation and Argument of the ſecond part of the Inſtauration; and his Tract concerning the Philoſophy of Parmenides, Teleſius, and Democritus. For, as he obſerves in the beginning of that part, he deſigned firſt to conſider the learning, which the world was poſſeſſed of, and then to perfect it; and afterwards to open new ways to further diſcoveries. To the Aphoriſms may be reduced his Letter to Sir Henry Savil concerning Helps for the Intellectual Powers, which he wrote in Engliſh. This was a part of knowledge ſcarce attempted at that time, as it was the general opinion, that nature was here rather to be followed, than guided by art. But it was as neceſſary in his Lordſhip's judgment, as the grinding and whetting of an inſtrument, or the quenching it, and giving it a ſtronger temper. There belong likewiſe to this head the fragment intitled Aphoriſmi & Conſilia de Auxiliis Mentis; and his Sententiæ duodecim de Interpretatione Naturæ, publiſhed by Gruter. In perfecting this work he uſed the utmoſt care and deliberation; ſo that Dr. Rawley informs us in his Life of him, that he had ſeen twelve copies of his Inſtauration reviſed year by year, one after another; and every year altered and corrected in the frame of it, till at laſt it was reduced to the model in which it was publiſhed. In ſhort, as Dr. Teniſon (72) obſerves, it was like a mighty pyramid, long in its erection; and it will probably be like to it in its continuance. With regard to his Inſtauration he obſerves in his letter to Biſhop Andrews quoted above, that although he had received from many parts beyond the ſeas teſtimonies touching that work, ſuch as beyond which he could not expect at the firſt in ſo abſtruſe an argument; yet nevertheleſs, ſays he, I have juſt cauſe to doubt that it flies too high over mens heads. I have a purpoſe therefore (tho' I break the order of time) to draw it down to ſenſe by ſome patterns of a natural ſtory and inquiſition. Ben. Johnſon in his Diſcoveries (73) having obſerved, that it is the office of a wiſe Patriot among the greateſt affairs of State to take care of the commonwealth of learning; tells us, that this made the late Lord St. Albans entitle his work Novum Organum; which tho' by the moſt of ſuperficial men, who cannot get beyond the title of Nominals, it is not penetrated nor underſtood, really openeth all defects of learning whatſoever, and is a Book,

Qui longum noto ſcriptori prorogat ævum.

The Author of the Journal des Sçavans (74) having obſerved, that the great Chancellor Bacon was one of thoſe perſons, who have contributed moſt to the Advancement of the Sciences, and that he publiſhed his book de Augmentis Scientiarum to ſhew the ſtate of learning, and what is ſtill wanting to render it perfect; tells us, that his Lordſhip had proved that the Logic, which was in uſe, was more proper to carry on the diſputes of the ſchools, than to diſcover the truth, and to teach men how to chicane upon mere words, than to penetrate the ſubſtance of things; and that Ariſtotle, from whom we have borrowed that art, had accommodated his Phyſics to his Logic, inſtead of making his Logic ſubſervient to his Phyſics, by which means he has revers'd the natural order of things, and ſubjected the end to the means. "It was with a "view to remedy this diſorder, continues that Author, "that this great Chancellor publiſhed a ſecond work, "entitled, Novum Organum, in which he teaches us "a new Logic, the principal deſign of which is to "ſhew us the Method of forming a good Induction, "as the chief end of Ariſtotle's Logic was to make "a good Syllogiſm. This work is an excellent one, "and the Author always conſidered it as his maſter-"piece; and it is ſaid that he ſpent eighteen years "in compleating it before he publiſhed it." Mr. Baker in his Reflections upon Learning (75) remarks, that my Lord Bacon ſaw clearer into the defects of the art of reaſoning, than moſt men did, and being neither ſatisfied with the vulgar Logic, nor with its reformations that were made, ſuitably to his vaſt and enterprizing genius, attempted a Logic wholly new, the plan of which is laid down in his Novum Organum. The way of ſyllogizing ſeemed to him very fallacious, and too dependent upon words, to be much relied on. His ſearch was after things; and therefore he brought in a new way of arguing from induction, and that grounded upon obſervation and experiments. But the ſame Gentleman obſerves, that this plan, as laid by him, looks liker an univerſal Art, than a diſtinct Logic, and the deſign is too great, and the induction too large to be made by one man or any ſociety of men in one age, if at all practicable. For whatever opinion he might have of the concluſiveneſs of this way, one croſs circumſtance in an experiment would as eaſily overthrow his induction, as an ambiguous word would diſorder a ſyllogiſm; and a man needs only make a tryal in any part of Natural Hiſtory, as left us by my Lord Bacon, to ſee how concluſive his induction was like to have been. To ſay nothing, that notwithſtanding his blaming the common Logics, as being too much ſpent in words, himſelf runs into the fault that he condemns; for what elſe can we make of his Idola Tribus, Idola Specus, Fori, Theatri; or his Inſtantiæ ſolitariæ, migrantes, oſtenſivæ, clandeſtinæ, conſtitutivæ, &c. but fine words put to expreſs very common and ordinary things? After the way of free thinking had been laid open by my Lord Bacon, it was ſoon after greedily followed; for the underſtanding affects freedom as well as the will, and men will purſue liberty, tho' it ends in confuſion. Dr. Henry Pemberton in the Introduction (76) to his View of Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophy having remark'd that the Lord Bacon has judiciouſly obſerved (77), that the neglect of the proper means to enlarge our knowledge, joined with the preſumption of attempting what was quite out of the power of our limited faculties, is the great obſtruction to the progreſs of ſcience; tells us, that "indeed that excellent perſon was the firſt, "who expreſly writ againſt this way of Philoſo-"phizing; and he has laid open at large the abſur-"dity of it in his admirable treatiſe intitled, Novum "Organon Scientiarum; and has there likewiſe de-"ſcribed the true method, which ought to be follow-"ed." Mr. Voltaire in his Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation (78) remarks, that the moſt ſingular and the beſt of all his pieces is that which is the moſt uſeleſs and the leaſt read; I mean, ſays that Author, his Novum Scientiarum Organum. This is the ſcaffold, with which the new Philoſophy was raiſed; and when the edifice was built, part of it at leaſt, the ſcaffold was no longer of ſervice. The Lord Bacon was not yet acquainted with nature; but then he knew and pointed out the ſeveral paths that lead to it. He had deſpiſed in his younger years the thing called Philoſophy in the Univerſities, and did all that lay in his power to prevent thoſe ſocieties of men inſtituted to improve human reaſon, from depraving it by their quiddities, their horrors of vacuum, their ſubſtantial Forms, and all thoſe impertinent terms, which not only ignorance had rendered venerable, but which had been made ſacred by their being

(71) Ubi ſupra, pag. 31, & ſeq.

(72) Ubi ſupra, pag. 34.

(73) Pag. 701. edit. 1692.

(74) Du Lundy 8. Mars 1666. pag. 199. edit. de Cologne 1666.

(75) Chap. 5. pag. 71, 72. 4th edit. London 1708.

(76) Pag. 5. edit. London 1728. 4to.

(77) Novum Organ. Scient. lib. 1. Aphoriſm. 9.

(78) Letter 12,

and of life and death, in Latin, which Tracts we ſhall give an account of in the Note [T]. In the ſame Volume are likewiſe contained his Hiſtoria Soni & Auditus, his Articuli Quæſtionum circa Mineralia, his Inquiſitio de Magnete, his Inquiſitio de Verſionibus, Tranſmutationibus, Multiplicationibus, & Affectionibus Corporum, and his Topica Inquiſitionis de Luce & ing ridiculouſly blended with Religion. There was an Epitome of this Book publiſhed in Engliſh at London in 1676, under the title of The Novum Organum of the Lord Viſcount St. Albans epitomized, for the clearer underſtanding of his Natural Hiſtory. Tranſlated, and taken out of the Latin by M. D. B. D. This, as Dr. Shaw obſerves (79), affords but a very faint, imperfect and diſadvantageous idea of the plan, deſign, and diſcoveries of that extraordinary piece; yet the epitomizer ſeems by his Preface acquainted with the author's general view in that work, and has given a ſhort account of them; but when he comes to tranſlate and epitomize, he ſtrangely mangles the ſenſe, and defaces the whole, ſo that it cannot eaſily be known, or tolerably underſtood. Indeed the deſign was imperfect, for the Novum Organum being entirely aphoriſtical, its nature will not admit of epitomizing to any advantage, but, as the Epitomizer himſelf obſerves, rather requires a Comment.

(79) General Preface to the Philoſophical Works of Francis Bacon Baron of Verulam, &c. methodiz'd and made Engliſh from the Originals, p. 4. London 1733, in 4to.

[T] Which Tracts, we ſhall give an account of in the Note.] The third part of the Inſtauratio, which he called the Phænomena of the Univerſe, or the Hiſtory natural and experimental ſubſervient to the building of a true Philoſophy, conſiſts of ſeveral Tracts. The firſt is his Paraſceve or Preparatory to the Hiſtory natural and experimental. We have in it ten aphoriſms concerning the general manner of forming a natural Hiſtory. After which follows a catalogue of particular Hiſtories of celeſtial and aerial bodies, and of thoſe in the terreſtrial globe, with the ſpecies of them; ſuch as metals, gems, ſtones, earths, ſalts, plants, fiſhes, fowls, inſects, man in his body and in his inventions mechanical and liberal. To this Paraſceve we may reduce the fragment of the Abecedarium Naturæ. Dr. Teniſon tells us (80), that this was commonly ſaid to be loſt, and that it was almoſt ſo, the latter part of it only remaining; but that where the whole is good, each part is of value, as the Antiquaries, who travel in the dominions of the Grand Signior, do not deſpiſe the antient ſtatues which they find there, though Mahometan ſuperſtition has broken off their heads. He obſerves likewiſe, that this work is ſaid to be a metaphyſical piece, but that it is not ſo in its ſtricteſt ſenſe. Its principal deſign is the partition of things into their ſeveral claſſes; a deſign, which his Lordſhip brought to more perfection in his Novum Organum and his book de Augmentis Scientiarum. And tho' it treated of the Conditions of Being, yet it was not abſtractly from all body, but with reference to it. And therefore he did not call it Abecedarium Hyperphyſicum, but the Alphabet of Nature. And in his book de Augmentis Scientiarum (81) he expreſly declares, that when he ſpeaks of Conditions of Entities, which are called tranſcendental, ſuch as much, little, the ſame, diverſe, poſſible, impoſſible, he is not to be interpreted in a logical but phyſical ſenſe. He was averſe to high and uſeleſs ſpeculations, and he uſed to expreſs his averſion to them by the following compariſon; that the lark flies high, and in its flight does nothing but ſing; whereas the hawk flies high, and deſcends thence, and catches its prey. The Præfatio Hiſtoriæ Naturalis &c. publiſhed by Gruter is, as appears from the title of it, a Preface to the Phænomena of the Univerſe, or the Natural Hiſtory. The Hiſtory of Winds was written by him in Latin, and tranſlated into Engliſh by R. G. Gentleman, London 1671. It was dedicated, as Dr. Teniſon obſerves (82), to Prince Charles, as the firſt-fruits of his Natural Hiſtory. This was the product of the firſt of thoſe ſix months, in which he determined to write ſix ſeveral Hiſtories of natural things. In his Aditus or Preface he calls the winds the wings, by which men fly on the ſea, and the beeſoms of the air and earth. And he obſerves concerning theſe poſt-nati, (for, as he ſays, they are not a part of the ſix days works or primary creatures,) that the generation of them has not been well underſtood, becauſe men have been ignorant of the nature and power of the air, on which the winds attend, as Æolus on Juno. Natura ipſorum inter ſecreta & abdita reponi ſolet; nec mirum, cum nec aeris natura ac poteſtas cognita quoquomodo ſit, cui famulantur & paraſitantur venti, ut (apud Poetas) Æolus Junoni. Primariæ creaturæ non ſunt, nec ex operibus ſex dierum; quemadmodum nec reliqua meteora quoad actum, ſed poſt-nati ex ordine creationis. In The Hiſtory of denſe and rare Bodies his Lordſhip aſſerts, that though nothing is ſubſtracted or added to the total ſum of matter, yet in the ſame ſpace there may be much more or leſs of matter; and that, for inſtance, there is ten times more matter in one tun of wine, than in one of air. By which he ſeems to grant, what we do not however find in any other place, either that there is a vacuum in nature, or penetration of parts in bodies (83). The Hiſtory of Gravity and Levity was but deſigned; and the Aditus of it only remains. The world has ſuſtained a great loſs in this, tho' he had proceeded no further than the general delineation of that work; for thoſe out-lines drawn by ſo great an Artiſt, would have been of prodigious ſervice to others in deſcribing thoſe important Phænomena of Nature (84). However we have his Topics or Articles of Enquiry concerning Gravity and Levity in his Book de Augmentis Scientiarum (85); and in the Aditus, which is ſtill extant, he rejects the inclination of heavy bodies to the center of the earth as a ſcholaſtic fancy. He takes it likewiſe for a certain truth, that body does not ſuffer but from body, or that there is any local motion, which is not occaſioned either from the parts of the body itſelf, which is moved, or from bodies adjacent, either contiguouſly, or very near it, or at leaſt within the ſphere of their activity. He approves alſo of the magnetic virtues introduced by Gilbert; but he cenſures that Author for making himſelf as it were a magnet, and drawing every thing to his hypotheſis. Verum miſſis verbulis certiſſimum eſt, corpus nonniſi à corpore pati; nec ullum fieri motum localem qui non ſollicitetur, aut partibus corporis ipſius, quod movetur, aut à corporibus adjacentibus, vel in contiguo, vel in proximo, vel ſaltem intra orbem activitatis ſuæ. Itaque vires magneticas non inſcitè introduxit Gilbertus; ſed & ipſe factus magnes, nimio ſcilicet plura quam oportet ad illas trahens, & navem ædificans ex ſcalmo. His Hiſtory of Sympathy and Antipathy follows next. Of this we have only the Aditus remaining, and a few inſtances in his Sylva Sylvarum (86). In this Hiſtory he deſigned to avoid magical fancies, which raiſe the mind in theſe things to an undue height; and the pretence of occult qualities, which lays the mind aſleep, and prevents further enquiry into theſe uſeful ſecrets of nature. We have only the Aditus to his Hiſtory of Salt, Sulphur, and Mercury, the three principles of the common Chymiſts; of which three he thought the firſt to be no primordial body, but a compound of the other two united by an acid ſpirit. The treatiſe itſelf is ſuppoſed to have never been written. The Hiſtory of Life and Death was written by him in Latin, and firſt rendered into Engliſh by an injudicious tranſlator; but tranſlated afterwards by an abler hand, aſſiſted by Dr. Rawley. This work, tho' rank'd laſt amongſt the ſix monthly Deſignations, was publiſhed in the ſecond place, his Lordſhip inverting the order out of regard to the great uſe of that argument. He undertook it with a view to make art ſhort, and life eaſy and long; and he tells us in his Preface, that it was a particular deſire, that the nobler ſort of Phyſicians might not employ their time wholly in the ſordidneſs of cures, nor be honoured for neceſſity only; but become coadjutors and inſtruments of the divine Omnipotence and mercy in prolonging and renewing the life of man, and in helping Chriſtians, who pant after the Land of Promiſe, ſo to journey thro' the wilderneſs of this world, as to have their ſhoes and garments (theſe of their frail bodies) little worn and impaired. Speramus enim & cupimus futurum ut id plurimorum bono fiat; atque ut medici nobiliores animos nonnihil erigant, neque toti ſint in curarum ſordibus, neque ſolum propter neceſſitatem honorentur, ſed fiant demum omnipotentiæ & clementiæ divinæ adminiſtri, in vita hominum prorogandâ & inſtaurandâ, præſertim cum hoc agatur per vias tutas

(80) Ubi ſupra, pag. 94.

(81) Lib. 3. cap. 2.

(82) Pag. 36.

(83) Teniſon, pag. 38.

(84) Idem, pag. 22.

(85) Lib. 5. cap. 3.

(86) See Exper. 95, 96, 97, 462, 480 to 498.

(87) Pag. & ſeq.

(88) Se Works, pag. 34 London

(89) S Works, pag. 18

(90) P

& Lumine, with his Philoſophical Pieces publiſhed by Iſaac Gruter [U]; his Treatiſe De Sapientia Veterum [W], Imago Civilis Julii Cæſaris, and Imago Civilis Auguſti Cæſaris, and his Tract In felicem memoriam Elizabethæ Angliæ Reginæ [X], his Meditationes Sacræ with his Letters in Latin, and his Two Books of the Proficience and Advancement of Learning divine and human [Y]. The third Volume contains his Natural Hiſtory [Z], his Phyſiological tutas & commodas & civiles licet intentatas. Etſi enim nos Chriſtiani ad terram promiſſionis perpetuo aſpiremus & anhelemus; tamen interim itinerantibus nobis, in hac mundi eremo etiam calceos iſtos & tegmina (corporis ſcilicet noſtri fragilis) quam minimum atteri, erit ſignum favoris divini.

[U] His Philoſophical Pieces publiſhed by Gruter.] The titles of them are as follow: Filum Labyrinthi ſive Inquiſitio legitima de Motu; De Sectione Corporum; Continuo & Vacuo; De Fluxu & Refluxu Maris; Indicia vera de interpretatione Naturæ; Partis Inſtaurationis ſecundæ Delineatio & Argumentum; Aphoriſmi & conſilia de auxiliis mentis & accenſione luminis naturalis; De Interpretatione Naturæ ſententiæ duodecim; De Interpretatione Naturæ proœmium; Cogitata & viſa de interpretatione Naturæ; Bodlei Epiſtola, in qua candide expendit cogitata & viſa; Deſcriptio Globi intellectualis; Thema Cœli; Parmenidis, Teleſii, & Democriti Philoſophia, tractata in fabula; Scala Intellectus ſive Filum Labyrinthi, quæ eſt Inſtaurationis magnæ Pars IV; & Prodromus, ſive anticipationes Philoſophiæ ſecundæ; Inſtaurationis Magnæ Pars V. With regard to the Scala Intellectus, which the Lord Bacon deſigned for the fourth part of the Great Inſtauration, Dr. Teniſon obſerves (87), that there was ſome kind of entrance to this in his diſtribution of the Novum Organum, and in the little piece publiſhed by Gruter. But the work was never executed, and only the model of it invented by the Author. That which he intended was a particular explication and application of the ſecond part of the Inſtauration, which lays down general rules for the interpretation of nature, by gradual inſtances and examples. He thought that his rules, without ſome more ſenſible explication, would be like diſcourſes in Geometry or Mechanics, without figures and types of engines. He therefore deſigned to ſelect certain ſubjects in nature or art, and as it were to draw to ſenſe a certain ſcheme of the beginning and progreſs of Philoſophical diſquiſition in them, ſhewing by degrees where our conſideration takes root, and how it ſpreads and advances. Something of this kind is done by thoſe, who from the Cicatricula or the Punctum Saliens obſerve and regiſter all the Phænomena of the animal unto its death, and after that in the medical, culinary, or other uſe of the body, together with all the train of the thoughts occaſioned by thoſe Phænomena, or by others in compariſon with them. And becauſe he intended to exhibit ſuch obſervations, as they gradually ariſe, he gave to that deſigned work the title of the Scale or Ladder of the Underſtanding. He likewiſe expreſſed the ſame thought by another metaphor (88), adviſing young ſtudents to imitate thoſe, who by going by degrees from ſeveral eminencies of ſome very high mountain, at laſt reach the top of it. The fifth part of the Inſtauration, which he deſigned, was what he called Prodromi ſive Anticipationes Philoſophiæ Secundæ. The Preface to this is ſtill extant, and we have ſome attempt towards it in the Diſtribution (89). And tho' his Lordſhip is not known to have compoſed any part of this work by itſelf, yet ſomething of it is to be collected from the axioms and greater obſervations, interſperſed in his Natural Hiſtories, which are not pure but mixed writings. The Anticipations he intended to pay down as intereſt, till he might furniſh the world with the principal in the ſixth and laſt part of his Inſtauration deſigned, which was Philoſophia Secunda ſive Scientia Activa. This general Philoſophy founded upon ſenſible nature or artificial experiments, and built up by degrees in obſervations and axioms, he at laſt deſpaired of, and recommended to poſterity. Time only, ſays Dr. Teniſon (90), can thoroughly finiſh what his Lordſhip began, and ſufficiently commend his diligence and ſagacity, who collected ſo many materials, and diſpoſed them into ſuch order, and made in ſo ſhort a time, and (for the moſt part) in the midſt of civil buſineſs, ſuch mighty preparations towards the building of the Houſe of Wiſdom.

(87) Pag. 48, & ſeq.

(88) See his Works, vol. 2. pag. 343. edit. London 1730.

(89) See his Works, vol. 1. pag. 18.

(90) Pag. 51.

[W] His Treatiſe de Sapientia Veterum.] This book was written by him in Latin (91), and publiſhed a ſecond time with additions. It was tranſlated into Engliſh by Sir Arthur Gorges. Dr. Teniſon obſerves (92), that it is a book in which the Sages of former times are rendered more wiſe than perhaps they really were, by ſo ingenious an interpreter of their fables. It is this piece that Mr. Sandys means in theſe words, which he prefixed to his notes upon Ovid's Metamorphoſes (93): Of modern Writers I have received the greateſt light from Geraldus, Pontanus, Ficinus, Vives, Comes, Scaliger, Sabinus, Pierius, and the crown of the latter, the Viſcount of St. Albans. The deſign of it was inſtruction in natural and civil matters, either couched by the Antients under thoſe fictions, or rather made to ſeem to be ſo by his Lordſhip's wit, in the opening and application of them.

(91) See his Letter to Mr. Matthews, vol. 4. of his Works, pag. 580.

(92) Pag. 56.

(93) Pag. 18.

[X] His Tract in felicem memoriam Elizabethæ Angliæ Reginæ.] Dr. Teniſon calls this A Memorial of the Felicities of Queen Elizabeth, and tells us, that it was written by his Lordſhip in Latin only; but that a perſon of more good will than abilities tranſlated it into Engliſh in the year 1651 in 16mo, and called it in the ſingular her Felicity. But we have a verſion of it much more accurate and judicious by Dr. Rawley, who undertook that labour, becauſe he knew the value which the Lord Bacon put upon it, ſince he gave this charge in his will (94); In particular, I wiſh the Elogy which I writ in felicem memoriam Elizabethæ may be publiſhed. As for the occaſion of it, his Lordſhip writes thus in a Letter to Sir George Carey (95), then in France, to whom he ſent it. Becauſe one muſt begin, I thought to provoke your remembrance of me by a letter; and thinking to fit it with ſomewhat beſides ſalutations, it came to my mind, that this laſt ſummer vacation, by occaſion of a factious book, that endeavoured to verify Miſera Fœmina, (the addition of the Pope's Bull) upon Queen Elizabeth, I did write a few lines in her memorial, which I thought you would be pleaſed to read, both for the argument, and becauſe you were wont to bear affection to my pen. Verum ut aliud ex alio; if it came handſomely to paſs, I would be glad the Preſident de Thou (who hath written an Hiſtory, as you know, of that fame and diligence) ſaw it; chiefly becauſe I know not, whether it may not ſerve him for ſome uſe in his ſtory; wherein I would be glad he did right to the truth, and to the memory of that Lady, as I perceive by that he hath already written, he is well inclined to do.

(94) This appears to have been a former will, and not the laſt, as Dr. Teniſon aſſerts.

(95) See his Works, vol. 4. pag. 572.

[Y] His two books of the Proficience and Advancement of Learning divine and human.] This work was firſt printed in the year 1605, and is referred to in many of the Letters in the fourth volume of his Works beginning pag. 561. It is entirely contained in his Treatiſe De Augmentis Scientiarum. No writing can challenge the credit and authority of an original better than this, and no performance ever reflected more honour upon the Engliſh language, on account of its beautiful and maſterly expreſſion, its juſt and inimitable method, and its ſurprizing and important diſcoveries. Beſides it is the beſt preparatory for the reading of the book De Augmentis (96).

(96) Mr. Blackbourne's Account of his edition of Lord Bacon's Works, p. 163.

[Z] His Natural Hiſtory.] Dr. Teniſon obſerves (97), that the great branch of the third part of the Inſtauration is his Sylva Sylvarum, or Natural Hiſtory, which contains many materials for the building of Philoſophy, as the Organum furniſhes directions for the work. It is an hiſtory not only of nature freely moving in her courſe, as in the production of Meteors, Plants and Minerals, but alſo by nature in conſtraint, and vexed and tortured by human art and experiment. But it is not an hiſtory of ſuch things digeſted into order, but thrown into an heap. For his Lordſhip, that he might not diſcourage other Collectors, did not caſt this book into an exact method, for which reaſon it has the leſs ornament, but not much the leſs uſe. In this book are contained Experiments of light, and experiments of uſe, as he uſed to diſtinguiſh them, and amongſt them ſome extraordinary, ſiological and Medical Remains [AA], The New Atlantis [BB], a Work, which he left unfiniſhed; A Collection of Apothegms new and old [CC], Ornamenta Rationalia; Eſſays or nary, and others common. He knew that what was common in one country, might be ſcarce in another; for which reaſon Dr. Caius, when he was in Italy, thought it worth his pains to give a large and elegant account of our method of brewing (97). His Lordſhip likewiſe knew, that an experiment evident to the vulgar was a good foundation for Philoſophers to build upon. And himſelf rendered common experiments extraordinary by his directions for further trials and improvements. Hence he took occaſion to ſay (98), that his writing of the Sylva Sylvarum was (to ſpeak properly) not a natural Hiſtory, but a high kind of natural Magic, becauſe it was not a deſcription only of Nature, but a breaking of Nature into great and ſtrange works. This book was written by him in Engliſh, and tranſlated by an obſcure interpreter into French, and from thence into Latin by James Gruter, in ſo ill a manner, that they darkned his Lordſhip's ſenſe, and debaſed his expreſſion. James Gruter was ſenſible of this ill ſucceſs, being acquainted with it by Dr. Rawley; and he left behind him divers corrections publiſhed by his brother Iſaac Gruter in a ſecond edition at Amſterdam 1661 in 16mo. Yet ſtill ſo many errors have eſcaped, that the work requires another hand. Monſieur Ælius Deodatus had once engaged an able perſon in the tranſlation of this book, who went through the three firſt Centuries, and then deſiſted, at the deſire of Monſieur Deodatus, who was diſſatisfied with his ſlow proceeding in it. His tranſlation of the Third Century was in the hands of Dr. Teniſon, who was of opinion, that the verſion of the two firſt was loſt. While we are ſpeaking of this Natural Hiſtory, we ſhall take notice of a remarkable ſtory related by Dr. Rawley. One day his Lordſhip was dictating to that Doctor ſome of his experiments in his Sylva. The ſame day he had ſent a friend to Court to receive for him a final anſwer with relation to a grant which had been made him by King James. He had hitherto only had hopes of it, and he was deſirous to know the event of the affair, and to be freed one way or other from the ſuſpence of his thoughts. His friend returning told him plainly, that he muſt hereafter deſpair of that grant, whatever occaſion his circumſtances might have of it. Be it ſo, ſaid his Lordſhip, and then diſmiſſed his friend very chearfully with thankful acknowledgments of his ſervice. His friend being gone he came immediately to Dr. Rawley, and ſaid to him; Well, Sir! yon buſineſs won't go on; let us go on with this, for this is in our power. And then he dictated to him again for ſome hours without the leaſt heſitation of ſpeech or any diſcernible interruption of thought. But to return to our ſubject. Such a collection of Natural Hiſtory as we have in this Treatiſe, was of neceſſity, as Dr. Teniſon remarks (99), to be undertaken anew. For the Collections, which were before in men's hands, were but a ſmall and inconſiderable heap, when the chaff and fable were ſifted from them, though the more conſiderable for that ſeparation. Beſides, as his Lordſhip obſerves (100), too many of theſe Hiſtories were at firſt framed rather for delight and table-talk, than for Philoſophy. Stories were feigned for the ſake of their morals, and they were frequently taken upon groundleſs truſt; and the later Writers borrowed out of the more antient, and were not experimenters, but tranſcribers; and ſuch was Pliny himſelf both in his larger and leſſer work; I mean that of Solinus, who is but Pliny contracted. Some perſons have accuſed the Lord Bacon himſelf for taking experiments too readily upon truſt, and without ſufficient deliberation and choice. But we may anſwer them in his own words (101); The rejection, which I continually uſe of experiments, (though it appeareth not,) is infinite; but yet if an experiment be probable in the work, and of great uſe, I receive it, but deliver it as doubtful.

(97) Pag. 41.

(97) Ephem. Britan.

(98) Nat. Hiſt. Cent. 1. Exper. 93. vol. 3. pag. 25.

(99) Pag. 47.

(100) De Augment. Scient. lib. 2. cap. 3.

(101) Nat. Hiſt. Cent. 1. Exper. 25.

[AA] His phyſiological and medical remains.] The firſt piece is entitled, Inquiſitions concerning compounding of Metals; then follow his Articles of Queſtions touching Minerals, and the Anſwers of Dr. Meverel; his Inquiſition concerning the Verſions, Tranſmutations, Multiplications, and Affections of Bodies; a Speech touching the Recovery of drowned Mineral Works, prepared for the Parliament, as Mr. Buſhel ſays (103), when he was Lord High-Chancellor. Dr. Teniſon obſerves (104), that his Lordſhip no doubt had ſuch a project, and he might prepare a Speech likewiſe for the facilitating of it; but that he would not aſſert, that this is a true copy of that Speech; ſince his Lordſhip's Speeches were generally digeſted into more method; his periods were more round, his words more choice, his alluſions more frequent, and managed with more decorum. And as no man had a greater command of words for the illuſtration of his ſubject, ſo in this caſe had a ſubject, which admitted of the moſt beautiful expreſſion. The ſixth paper about natural Things contains Experiments made by him about Weight in Air and Water. The ſeventh contains a few propoſals to the countryman called Experiments for profit. The eighth, experiments about the Commixture of Liquors. The ninth, a Catalogue of Bodies attractive and not attractive; together with experimental obſervations about Attraction. Under the head of his Medical Remains is contained a paper, which he called Grains of Youth; in which he preſcribes divers things, as means to keep the body in vigour. Among theſe is the Receipt of the Methuſalem Water againſt the dryneſs of age, which he valued and uſed. Next follows a Catalogue of aſtringents, openers, and cordials, inſtrumental to health. Then comes an Extract by his Lordſhip for his own uſe, out of the Hiſtory of Life and Death; together with ſome new Advices in order to health. To theſe are ſubjoined four medical Receipts; the firſt of which is his Broth and Fomentation againſt the ſtone; the ſecond an Ointment, which he calls Unguentum fragrans ſive Romanum, conſiſting of aſtringents to prevent exceſs of tranſpiration, and of cordials to comfort the parts. Dr. Teniſon tells us (105), that he called it Roman Unguent, becauſe that people particularly made uſe of baths and anointings. He himſelf likewiſe was of opinion, that the anointing with oil was one of the moſt powerful means to prolong life (106); and that it conduced to health both in winter by the excluſion of the cold air, and in ſummer by detaining the ſpirits within, and keeping off the force of the air, which then preys moſt upon the body. But he thought, that it was beſt to anoint without bathing, though he thought bathing with anointing to be injurious. The third and fourth are Receipts to comfort the ſtomach.

(103) Extract, pag. 18, 19.

(104) Pag. 97.

(105) Pag. 99.

(106) See his Hiſtory of the Life and Death, of the Operation upon Excluſion of the Air, § 21.

[BB] The new Atlantis.] This work is not finiſhed. Dr. Rawley tells us in his Preface to it, that this fable was invented by his Lordſhip, in order to exhibit therein a model or deſcription of a College inſtituted for the interpreting of nature, and the production of great and prodigious works, for the benefit of mankind, under the name of Solomon's Houſe, or the College of the ſix days Work. His Lordſhip has proceeded ſo far as to finiſh that part. Certainly, continues the Doctor, the model is more vaſt and high, than can poſſibly be imitated in all things; notwithſtanding moſt things therein are within mens power to effect. His Lordſhip thought alſo in this preſent fable to have compoſed a frame of laws, or of the beſt ſtate or mould of a commonwealth; but foreſeeing it would be a long work, his deſire of collecting the Natural Hiſtory diverted him, which he preferred many degrees before it. The Doctor then obſerves, that the Author directed, that this piece ſhould follow his Natural Hiſtory, ſince one part of it has ſo near an affinity to that Hiſtory. We have here, according to Dr. Shaw (107), as in miniature, a ſummary of univerſal knowledge; Examples, Precepts, and Models for improving the mind in Hiſtory, Geography, Chronology, military Diſcipline, Civil Converſation, Morality, Policy, Phyſics, &c. whence it appears like a kind of epitome and farther improvement of the ſcheme of the de Augmentis Scientiarum. The dignity and uſefulneſs of the deſign may appear from hence, that not only Mr. Cowley endeavoured to imitate it in his Plan of a Philoſophical Society; but even the Royal Society of London and the Royal Academy of Paris, have from their firſt inſtitution employed themſelves, and ſtill continue employed, in its execution.

(107) Preface to it in pag. 277. of his 1ſt vol. of Lord Bacon's Philoſophical Works methodiz'd &c.

[CC] His Collection of Apothegms new and old.] Dr. Teniſon obſerves (108), that theſe Apothegms, of which

(108) Pag. 59.

or Counſels Civil and Moral [DD], with a Fragment of The Colours of Good and Evil [EE]. Next follow his Hiſtory of the Reign of King Henry VII [FF], a Fragment of his Hiſtory of the Reign of King Henry VIII, which he undertook at the deſire of King Charles I, but he which the firſt edition printed at London 1625 in 8vo, is the beſt, were, as he ſays likewiſe of his Eſſays in his Letter to Biſhop Andrews, but as the recreations of his other ſtudies. They were dictated one morning out of his memory. And his Lordſhip tells us in his Preface, that he made this Collection, fanning the old, not omitting any, becauſe they are vulgar (for many vulgar ones are excellent good), nor for the meanneſs of the perſon, but becauſe they are dull and flat, and adding many new, that otherwiſe would have died.

[DD] Eſſays or Counſels civil and moral.] Dr. Teniſon tells us (109), that theſe Eſſays, tho' a by-work, yet coming home to mens buſineſs and boſoms, his Lordſhip entertained this perſuaſion concerning them, as appears from his Dedication of them to the Duke of Buckingham, that the Latin volume might laſt as long as books ſhould laſt. He wrote them in Engliſh, and enlarged them as occaſion ſerved, and at laſt added to them the Colours of Good and Evil. The Latin Tranſlation of them was performed by divers hands; particularly Dr. Hacket, afterwards Biſhop of Lichfield, Ben. Johnſon the Poet, and others. To this Latin edition he gave the title of Sermones Fideles, after the manner of the Jews, who called the words, adagies, or obſervations of wiſe men, faithful Sayings, that is, credible propoſitions worthy of firm aſſent and ready acceptance. He ſeems likewiſe to allude more particularly to a paſſage in Eccleſiaſtes, c. xii, 1. 10, 11. where the Preacher ſays, that he ſought to find out verba delectabilia (as Tremellius renders the Hebrew) pleaſant words, that is, perhaps his Book of Canticles; and verba fidelia (according to the ſame Tremellius) faithful ſayings, meaning perhaps his Proverbs. In the next verſe he calls them words of the wiſe, and ſo many goads and nails given ab eodem paſtore, from the ſame ſhepherd of the flock of Iſrael. He had given the world a ſpecimen thereof in the year 1597, and dedicated them to his only brother Mr. Anthony Bacon; and in 1612 he review'd and enlarged them with a Dedication deſigned to Prince Henry; but upon that Prince's death he inſcribed them to his brother-in-law Sir John Conſtable. The laſt edition of 1625 was committed to the patronage of his faithful friend, the Duke of Buckingham. The former edition had been tranſlated into Italian by Mr. Tobie Matthew, and into French by the Marquis D'Effiat, Embaſſador from France; but he and Mr. Matthew omitted in the tranſlation what they thought might be offenſive to the rigid Roman Catholics (110). We have an Engliſh tranſlation of the Sermones Fideles publiſhed at London in two volumes in 8vo under the title of Lord Bacon's Eſſays, or Counſels moral and civil. Tranſlated from the Latin by William Willymot, L. L. D. Fellow of King's College in Cambridge, and Maſter of a private School at Iſleworth in Middleſex. Mr. Voltaire in his Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation (111) obſerves, that his moral Eſſays are greatly eſteemed, but they were drawn up in the view of inſtructing rather than pleaſing; and as they are not a ſatyr upon mankind, like Rochefoucault's Maxims, nor written upon a ſceptical ſcheme, like Montagne's Eſſays, they are not ſo much read as thoſe two ingenious Authors.

(109) Pag. 60.

(110) See Mr. Stephens's Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon, pag. 28, 29.

(111) Letter 12.

[EE] A Fragment of the Colours of Good and Evil.] He tells us in his Introduction to this piece, that in deliberatives the point is what is good, and what is evil; and of good, what is greater, and of evil, what is leſs. So that the perſuader's labour is to make things appear good or evil, and that in higher or lower degree, which as it may be performed by true and ſolid reaſons, ſo it may be repreſented alſo by colours, popularities and circumſtances, which are of ſuch force, as they ſway the ordinary judgment either of a weak man or of a wiſe man, not fully and conſiderately attending and pondering the matter. Beſides their power to alter the variety of the ſubject in appearance, and ſo to lead to error, they are of leſs uſe to quicken and ſtrengthen the opinions and perſuaſions which are true; for reaſons plainly delivered, and always after one manner, eſpecially with fine and faſtidious minds, enter but heavily and dully; whereas if they be varied, and have more life and vigour put into them by theſe forms and inſinuations, they cauſe a ſtronger apprehenſion, and many times ſuddenly win the mind to a reſolution. Laſtly, to make a true and ſafe judgment, nothing can be of greater uſe and defence to the mind, than the diſcovering and reprehenſion of theſe colours, ſhewing in what caſes they hold, and in what they deceive; which as it cannot be done but out of a very univerſal knowledge of the nature of things, ſo being performed, it ſo cleareth man's judgment and election, as it is the leſs apt to ſlide into error.

[FF] His Hiſtory of the Reign of King Henry VII.] Dr. Teniſon obſerves (112), that this Hiſtory, which was firſt publiſhed in 1622, was written by his Lordſhip in Engliſh, and addreſſed to Prince Charles, and afterwards tranſlated into Latin. It was the firſt Book which he wrote after his retirement from an active life (113); upon which occaſion he wrote thus in his Epiſtle Dedicatory to Dr. Andrews Biſhop of Wincheſter before his advertiſement touching an holy War. "Now having in the work of my Inſtauration had "in contemplation the general good of men in their "very being, and the dowries of nature; and in my "work of Laws the general good of men likewiſe "in ſociety, and the dowries of government; I "thought in duty I owed ſomewhat unto my own "country, which I ever loved, inſomuch as although "my place had been far above my deſert, yet my "thoughts and cares concerning the good thereof were "beyond and over and above my place; ſo now be-"ing (as I am) no more able to do my country ſer-"vice, it remained unto me to do it honour; which "I have endeavoured to do in my work of the Reign "of King Henry VII." He tells the Prince in his Dedication, that he had not flatter'd that King, but took him to life as well as he could, ſitting ſo far off, and having no better light. Henry Conringius (114) obſerves that this Hiſtory is written with great elegance and judgment, tho' the Author is not remarkable for the beauty and propriety of his Latin ſtyle. Henrici ſeptimi hiſtoriam perſecutus eſt ſeorſim, elegan-ter admodum, Cancellarius Regni Angliæ Baco de Verulamio; qui multum prudentiæ inſeruit, etiamſi non ſit facundus & probe Latinus ſcriptor. Grotius in his Letter to du Maurier dated the 26th of July 1629 remarks that this Hiſtory is written with admirable judgment. Baconi habemus librum ſanè magno judicio ſcriptum de rebus Henrici VII. Degory Whear in his Methodus legendi Hiſtorias Civiles (115) tells us, that this performance of my Lord Bacon is ſo happily executed, that he has equalled, if not ſurpaſſed, the greateſt Hiſtorians. Cujus (Henrici ſeptimi) vitam & res geſtas haud ita pridem nobis repræſentavit nobiliſſimus Vicecomes Sancti Albani, adeò fæliciter adeoque plenè, ut Hiſtoricorum præſtantiſſimos, ſi non ſuperaverit, certè prorſus æquaverit. The Author of the Preface to the three volumes of the Complete Hiſtory of England, which is ſaid to be Mr. Hughes (116), ſtiles it one of the moſt applauded pieces of Hiſtory, that has ever been writ in our own or any other language, either ancient or modern. He tells us, that it is impoſſible to exceed in his praiſe; that one may obſerve in him all the depth of a Stateſman and Philoſopher, all the ornament of a diſcreet Orator, and the conduct of a juſt Hiſtorian. That from him alone might ſufficiently be learned the idea of that true ſublime which ennobles Hiſtory; which conſiſts rather in a greatneſs of thinking than in a pomp of expreſſion, and is therefore reconcileable with that ſimplicity required too, tho' theſe are beauties rarely ſeen united. He traces things, continues the Author, with extraordinary judgment, relates them with clearneſs of ſenſe and good connection, and has the ſecret of making every part of the ſtory inſtructive without ſprinkling it over with perpetual adages and obſervations, which retard it, and are the falſe jewels for which coquet writers affect to be admired. Another maſterly excellence in him is that he does not content himſelf with a ſuperficial narration, but enters deeper into his ſubject, and diſcovers the motives of affairs, which every where ſeem true repreſentations, and not fanciful conjectures. This is the more worthy of notice, becauſe Tacitus, who is much admired for it by many,

(112) Pag. 51.

(113) See the Catalogue of his Works in his Life, by Dr. Rawley.

(114) Apud Pope Blount, Cenſur. Celebrior. Authorum, p. 903. edit. 1694, in 4to.

(115) Sect. 30. pag. 144. edit. Oxon. 1637.

(116) See the Life of Biſhop Kennet, pag. 334 edit. London 1730, in 8vo.

he did not live to finiſh it; and what we have of it was only the work of a ſingle morning (ee). The beginning of the Hiſtory of Great Britain; which was an Eſſay ſent to King James, whoſe times it conſider'd. This was a Work worthy of his pen; becauſe, as he tells the King in a Letter publiſhed in the IVth Volume of his Works (ff), he ſhould write of times not only ſince he could remember, but ſince he could obſerve; and, as he obſerves in his letter to the Lord Chancellor Egerton (g), of times, wherein he found the greateſt variety, that in ſo little a number of ſucceſſions of any hereditary Monarchy hath ever been known. The ſame Volume likewiſe contains his Conſiderations touching a War with Spain, inſcribed to Prince Charles, in 1624, An Advertiſement touching an Holy War, written in 1622, with his Queſtions about the lawfulneſs of a War for the propagating of Religion; An hiſtorical account of the Office of Alienations, written about the latter end of the year 1598, and Advice to Sir George Villiers, afterwards Duke of Buckingham. The Fourth Volume contains his Propoſition to his Majeſty for the compiling and amendment of our Laws [GG]; An offer to King James of a Digeſt to be made of the Laws of England; and The Elements of the Common Laws of England; containing, 1. A Collection of ſome principal Rules and Maxims of the Common Law, with their latitude and extent: 2. The uſe of the Common Law, for the preſervation

(ee) Dr. Rawley's Life of Lord Bacon.

(ff) Pag. 567.

(gg) Ibid. pag. 565.

* Sa maniere de critiquer eſt fine par elle-meme; mais elle devient groſſiere par l'envie qu'il a de critiquer tout. Rapin, Reflex. C'eſt plus la politique que la Verité, qui le fait parler. Ibid.

is by others thought to have over-acted the Politician, and by too much ſubtilty to have expounded the ſimpleſt actions in the world into deſign and artifice. But as nothing is more improving than this way of writing when well managed, ſo it ſeems to be the talent of a wiſe rather than of a cunning head.* Mr. Nicholſon in his Engliſh Hiſtorical Library (116) tells us, that the Hiſtory of King Henry the ſeventh "was the "moſt effectually undertaken and compleated by "the incomparable Sir Francis Bacon, who has "bravely ſurmounted all thoſe difficulties, and paſſed "over thoſe rocks and ſhallows, againſt which he "took ſuch pains to (t) caution other leſs experienced "Hiſtorians. He has perfectly put himſelf into King "Henry's own garb and livery, giving as ſpritely a "view of the ſecrets of his Council, as if himſelf had "been Preſident in it. No trivial paſſages, ſuch as "are below the notice of a Stateſman, are mixed "with his ſage remarks; nor is any thing of weight "or moment ſlubbered over with that careleſs haſte "and indifferency which is too common in other "Writers. No allowances are given to the Author's "own conjecture and invention, where a little pains "and conſideration will ſerve to ſet the matter in its "proper and true light. No impertinent digreſſions "nor fanciful comments diſtract his readers, but the "whole is written in ſuch a grave and uniform ſtyle, "as becomes both the ſubject and the artificer." But we have a ſevere Criticiſm upon this Hiſtory in the Guardian (117), wherein we are told, that my Lord Verulam is ever in the tedious ſtile of declaimers, uſing two words for one; ever endeavouring to be witty, and as fond of out of the way ſimilies as ſome of our Play-writers. He abounds in low phraſes, beneath the dignity of Hiſtory, and often condeſcends to little conceits and quibbles. His political reflections are frequently falſe, almoſt every where trivial and puerile. His whole manner of turning his thoughts is full of affectation and pedantry; and there appears throughout his whole work more the air of a recluſe ſcholar, than of a man verſed in the world. The Author then mentions ſome inſtances of theſe defects, and afterwards obſerves, that the whole work is ill conducted, and that the ſtory of Perkin Warbeck (which ſhould have been only like an Epiſode in a Poem) is ſpun out to near a third part of the book. That the character of Henry VII, at the end, is rather an abſtract of his hiſtory than a character, and tedious, and diverſified with ſo many particulars as confound the reſemblance, and make it almoſt impoſſible for the reader to form any diſtinct idea of the perſon. But he concludes, that after all it muſt be conſidered in favour of my Lord Verulam, that he lived in an age, wherein chaſte and correct writing was not in faſhion, and when pedantry was the mode even at Court; ſo that it is no wonder, if the prevalent humour of the times bore down his genius, though ſuperior in force perhaps to any of his countrymen, that have either gone before or ſucceeded him. Mr. Rapin de Thoyras in his Hiſtory of England (118), tells us, that my Lord Bacon has not given King Henry VII a juſt character, which he obſerves is not ſurpriſing, ſince as "his eſtate was forfeited by the ſentence paſſed upon "him, and as he lived only on a penſion from the "King, who always ſpoke of Henry VII his great "grandfather with high commendations, he made his (116) Pag. 223, 224. edit. London, 8vo.

(t) De Augment. Scientiar. lib. 2. cap. 5.

(117) Vol. 1. Numb. 25.

(118) Book 18. ad ann. 1621.

"court to the King by repreſenting that Prince as a "pattern of wiſdom and virtue." Mr. Voltaire in his Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation (119) obſerves, that this Hiſtory was conſidered as a maſter-piece; but he wonders how it is poſſible, that ſome perſons can preſume to compare ſo little a work with that of the illuſtrious Thuanus. He then quotes a paſſage, wherein Lord Bacon ſpeaks about the famous impoſtor Perkin, ſon to John Oſbeck a converted Jew, who aſſumed the name and title of Richard the Fourth King of England, at the inſtigation of the Ducheſs of Burgundy; and who diſputed the Crown with Henry VII. At this time, ſays Lord Bacon, the King began again to be haunted with ſprites, by the magic and curious arts of the Lady Margaret, who raiſed up the Ghoſt of Richard Duke of York, ſecond ſon to King Edward the fourth, to walk and vex the King.... After ſuch time as ſhe thought he (Perkin Warbeck) was perfect in his leſſon, ſhe began to caſt with herſelf from what coaſt this blazing Star ſhould firſt appear, and at what time it muſt be upon the Horizon of Ireland; for there had the like meteor ſtrong influence before. Mr. Voltaire remarks upon this, that the ſagacious Thuanus does not give into ſuch fuſtian, which formerly was look'd upon as ſublime, but in the preſent age is juſtly called nonſenſe.

(119) Letter 12.

[GG] His propoſition to his Majeſty for the compiling an amendment of the Laws.] In this piece he tells us, it is certain that our Laws, as they now ſtand, are ſubject to great uncertainties and variety of opinions, delays, and evaſions; from whence it follows. 1. That the multiplicity and length of ſuits is great: 2. That the contentious perſon is armed, and the honeſt ſubject wearied and oppreſſed: 3. That the Judge is more abſolute, who in doubtful caſes has a greater liberty: 4. That the Chancery Courts are more filled, the remedy of Law being often obſcure and doubtful: 5. That the ignorant Lawyer ſhrouds his ignorance of Law in this, that there are ſo many and ſo frequent doubts: 6. That mens aſſurances of their lands and eſtates by Patents, Deeds, and Wills are often ſubject to queſtión, and precarious; and many inconveniences of that nature. He then obſerves, that if it had not been for Sir Edward Coke's Reports, the Law by that time had been almoſt like a ſhip without ballaſt; ſince the caſes of modern experience are fled from thoſe that are adjudg'd and ruled in former time. But the neceſſity of this work, continues he, is yet greater in the Statute-Law. For, firſt, there are a number of enſnaring penal Laws, which lie upon the ſubject; and if in bad times they ſhould be awaked and put in execution, would grind them to powder. There is a learned Civilian, that expoundeth the curſe of the Prophet, pluet ſuper eos laqueos, of multitude of penal Laws; which are worſe than ſhowers of hail or tempeſt upon cattle, for they fall upon men. There are ſome penal Laws fit to be retained, but their penalty too great; and it is ever a rule, that any over great penalty, (beſides the acerbity of it) deadens the execution of the Law. There is a further inconvenience of penal Laws, obſolete, and out of uſe; for that it brings a gangrene, neglect, and habit of diſobedience upon other wholeſome Laws, that are fit to be continued in practice and execution; ſo that our Laws endure the torment of Mezentius,

The living die in the arms of the dead.

The

ſervation of our Perſons, Goods, and good Names, according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Land [HH]. Next follow his Caſes of Treaſon, Felony, Præmunire, the King's Prerogative, and the Office of Conſtables; his Arguments in Law; Draught of an Act againſt an uſurious Shift of Gain, in delivering of Commodities inſtead of Money; his Ordinances in Chancery; his Reading on the Statute of Uſes; Treatiſes relating to the Union; Charges; Speeches; Obſervations on a Libel, &c. Report of the Treaſon of Lopez; Apology concerning the Earl of Eſſex; Conſiderations touching the Plantation in Ireland; Advice to the King, touching Mr. Sutton's Eſtate [II]; his Theological Works [KK]; his Remains in quarto.

Laſtly, there is ſuch an accumulation of Statutes concerning one matter, and they ſo croſs and intricate, as the certainty of Law is loſt in the heap.. The Scheme, which he propoſes, conſiſts of two parts; the Digeſt or recompiling of the Common Laws; and that of the Statutes. In the firſt of theſe three things are to be done: 1. The compiling of a Book de Antiquitatibus Juris: 2. The reducing or perfecting of the courſe or body of the Common Laws: 3. The compoſing of certain introductive and auxiliary Books concerning the Study of the Law. The Reformation and Recompilement of the Statute-Law conſiſts of four parts. 1. The firſt to diſcharge the Books of thoſe Statutes, in which the caſe by alteration of time is vaniſhed. 2. To repeal all Statutes, which are dormant and not in uſe, and yet enſnaring and in force. 3. To mitigate the rigour of the penalty in many Statutes, tho' the ordinances ſtand. 4. To reduce concurrent Statutes heaped one upon another to one clear and uniform Law. This piece was written while he was Attorney-General, and one of the Privy-Council.

[HH] The Elements of the common Laws of England, containing &c.] In the Epiſtle Dedicatory to King James I, he takes notice of his Majeſty's purpoſe for many years infuſed into his breaſt, to enter into a general amendment of the ſtate of the Laws, and to reduce them to more brevity and certainty, that the great hollowneſs and unſafety in aſſurances of lands and goods may be ſtrengthened, the ſwerving penalties that lie upon many ſubjects removed, the execution of many profitable Laws revived, the Judge better directed in his ſentence, the Counſellor better warranted in his counſel, the Student eaſed in his reading, the contentious ſuitor that ſeeketh but vexation diſarmed, and the honeſt ſuitor that ſeeketh but to obtain his right relieved. In his Preface he tells us, that with regard to the manner of ſetting down of the rules, he has in all points applied himſelf not to that, which might ſeem moſt for the oſtentation of his own wit or knowledge, but to that, which may yield moſt uſe and profit to the ſtudents and profeſſors of our Laws. And therefore whereas theſe rules are ſome of them ordinary and vulgar, which now ſerve but for grounds and plain ſongs to the more ſhallow and impertinent ſort of arguments, others of them are gather'd and extracted out of the harmony and congruity of caſes, and are ſuch as the wiſeſt and deepeſt ſort of Lawyers have in judgment and uſe, tho' they be not able many times to expreſs and ſet them down. Secondly that whereas ſome of theſe rules have a concurrence with the Roman Civil Law, and ſome others a diverſity, and many times an oppoſition to ſuch grounds, which are common to our Law and theirs, he had not affected to diſguiſe them in other words than the Civilians uſe, that they might ſeem invented by him, and not borrow'd or tranſlated from them. Thirdly, that he choſe to write in diſtinct aphoriſms, becauſe that method leaves the mind more at liberty to make uſe of what is delivered to a greater variety of purpoſes. Fourthly, that he has put the rules themſelves in Latin; and with regard to the expoſitions and diſtinctions, retained the peculiar language of our Law. Fifthly, that he has abſtained from alledging of authorities; and laſtly, that he accompanied his rules with a clear and perſpicuous expoſition, breaking them into caſes, and opening them with diſtinctions, and ſometimes ſhewing the reaſons above, upon which they depend, and the affinity they have with other rules.

[II] Advice to the King touching Mr. Sutton's eſtate.] Dr. Teniſon obſerves (120), that in this Advice with relation to that eſtate, (in the ſettling of which in the Hoſpital of the Chartreux the event ſhewed, that his Lordſhip was miſtaken, when he called it a ſacrifice without ſalt,) he propoſed four other ends of that valuable gift. As firſt the erection of a College for controverſies for the refuting of Papiſts. Secondly the erection of a Receipt, (for the word Seminary he diſliked) for converts to the Reformed Religion. Thirdly a ſettlement of ſtipends for itinerary Preachers in places, which wanted them, as in Lancaſhire, where ſuch care had been taken by Queen Elizabeth. And laſtly an increaſe of ſalary to the Profeſſors in both the Univerſities. And therefore as his Lordſhip declared himſelf not averſe to the charity, but the manner of diſpoſing it, it was very unjuſt in thoſe, who publickly defamed him, by ſuggeſting that he had been bribed by the heir.

(120) Introduct. Pag. 68.]

[KK] His Theological Works.] Dr. Teniſon obſerves (121), that they are but few, and that there appears nothing ſo extraordinary in the compoſure of them, as is found in his Lordſhip's other labours. His Confeſſion of Faith was written by himſelf in Engliſh, and tranſlated into Latin by Dr. Rawley. Then follow his Advertiſement touching the Controverſies of the Church of England: his Conſiderations touching the better Pacification and Edification of the Church of England, dedicated to his moſt excellent Majeſty; and his Prayers, the firſt of which is mentioned in the Tatler (122) in the following manner: I was infinitely pleaſed to find among the works of this extraordinary man a Prayer of his own compoſing, which for the elevation of thought, and greatneſs of expreſſion ſeems rather the devotion of an Angel than a man. His principal fault ſeems to have been the exceſs of that virtue, which covers a multitude of faults. This betrayed him to ſo great an indulgence towards his ſervants, who made a corrupt uſe of it, that it ſtripp'd him of all thoſe riches and honours, which a long ſeries of merit had heaped upon him. But in this Prayer, at the ſame time that we find him proſtrating himſelf before the great Mercy-ſeat, and humbled under afflictions, which at that time lay heavy upon him, we ſee him ſupported by the ſenſe of his integrity, his zeal, his devotion, and his love to mankind; which give him a much higher figure in the minds of thinking men, than that greatneſs had done, from which he had fallen. The Tranſlation of certain Pſalms concludes his theological works. Dr. Teniſon tells us (123), that he diverted himſelf with his pious exerciſe in the time of his ſickneſs in the year 1625. When he publiſhed it, he made a Dedication of it to his very good friend, Mr. George Herbert, as he judged the ſubject to be ſuitable to him in his double character of a Divine and a Poet. His Lordſhip had very great judgment in Poetry, as appears by his diſcourſe about it in his Book de Augmentis Scientiarum (124); and the Author of the Tatler (125) quoting a paſſage from him, tells us, that it gives a truer and better account of this art, than all the volumes that were ever written upon it. We find likewiſe in my Lord Bacon's Apology in certain imputations concerning the late Earl of Eſſex, that when Queen Elizabeth deſigned to dine at his lodge at Twicknam-Park, he prepared a Sonnet, in order to procure the reconcilement of her Majeſty to that Earl, who was then out of favour. " But, as Dr. Teniſon obſerves " (126), it was very ſeldom that he courted the Muſes; " and therefore his vein does not appear ſo elegant " and happy, as exerciſe might have made it. The " truth is, it is one of the hardeſt things in the " world to excel in Poetry: and to attempt and not " to excel, is to loſe both time and reputation; for " in this Art mediocrity will not paſs for virtue. In " this ſqueamiſh Age (as Monſr. Rapin ſays in his judicious Reflections) verſes are ridiculous, if they " be not admirable. They are, it ſeems, like ſome " modern diſhes, which if they have not an high taſte, " occaſion diſguſt."

(121) Pag. 72.

(122) Vol. 4. Num. 267.

(123) Pag. 72.

(124) Lib. 2. cap. 13.

(125) Vol. 2. Num. 108.

(126) Pag. 73.

quarto [LL]; his Letters in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; Treaſons of Robert Earl of Eſſex; Letters in the reign of King James; and Letters concerning the Solicitorſhip. There have been lately publiſhed Letters and Remains of the Lord Chancellor Bacon, collected by Robert Stephens, Eſq; late Hiſtoriographer-Royal. London 1734 in quarto. And Dr. Shaw has rendered all his Philoſophical Works into Engliſh, and digeſted them into a proper method, under the title of The Philoſophical Works of Francis Bacon, Baron of Verulam, Viſcount St. Albans, and Lord High-Chancellor of England, methodized and made Engliſh from the Originals with occaſional Notes to explain what is obſcure, and ſhew how far the ſeveral Plans of the Author, for the Advancement of all parts of Knowledge, have been executed to the preſent Time. By Peter Shaw, M. D. Three Volumes quarto. London 1733. His Lordſhip had happily eſcaped the Plague, which infeſted the ſummer of the year 1625, and with ſome difficulty, being of a weak and tender conſtitution, paſſed the ſevere winter, which followed; but going in the ſpring to make ſome Experiment in Natural Philoſophy, he was taken ſo ill, that he was obliged to ſtay at the Earl of Arundel's houſe at Highgate [MM] about a week (bb), and there expired on Eaſter Day the ninth of April 1626, in the ſixty ſixth year of his age, of a gentle fever attended with a great cold, which occaſioned ſuch a defluxion of rheum, that he was ſuffocated with it. He was buried near his mother in St. Michael's Church at St. Albans, according to the direction in his laſt Will; and had a Monument of white marble erected to him by Sir Thomas Meautys, who had formerly been his Secretary, and was afterwards Clerk of the Privy Council under two Kings (ii). This Monument repreſented his full portraiture in a contemplative poſture, with an inſcription written by Sir Henry Wotton [NN]. Arthur Wilſon in his Life and Reign of King James I (kk) tells us, that he was of a middling ſtature; his countenance indented with age before he was old; and his preſence grave and comely. He had one peculiar temper of body, that he always fainted at an Eclipſe of the Moon, tho' he knew nothing of it (ll). He was the Author of ſeveral mechanical inventions [OO]; and Mr. Voltaire ſtiles him the Father of Experimental Philoſophy (mm), and tells us, that no

(bb) Stephens's Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon, p. 31.

(ii) Dr. Rawley's Life of Lord Bacon.

(kk) See the Complete Hiſtory of England, vol. 2. p. 736. edit. London 1706.

(ll) Dr. Rawley, ubi ſupra.

(mm) Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation, Letter 12.

[L L] His Remains in quarto.] We are informed in an Adverti ſement prefixed to them in Mr. Blackbourne's edition of Lord Bacon's Works (127), that theſe fragments were never acknowledged by Dr. Rawley among his genuine Writings, and do not appear to come up to the ſpirit and penetration of that noble Author. However as they are vouched to be authentic in an edition of the Remains of the Lord Verulam printed in 1648, and as Archbiſhop Sancroft has reflected ſome credit on them by a careful review, having in a great many inſtances corrected and prepared them for the preſs among other unqueſtioned Writings of his Lordſhip, they have been inſerted in the laſt edition of his Works. The titles of theſe pieces are as follow: I. An Explanation what manner of perſons thoſe ſhould be that are to execute the power or ordinance of the King's prerogative. II. Short Notes for civil converſation. III. An Eſſay on Death. IV. The Characters of a believing Chriſtian in Paradoxes and ſeeming Contradictions. V. A Prayer made and uſed by the Lord Chancellor Bacon. But this prayer does not appear to be caſt in the ſame mold with that mentioned in the preceding note.

(127) Vol. 4. pag. 458.

[MM] At the Earl of Arundel's houſe at Highgate near London.] We have a Letter of his to that Earl juſt before his death, and the laſt which he ever wrote, wherein he tells him, that he was likely to have had the fortune of Caius Plinius the Elder, who loſt his life by trying an experiment about the burning of the Mountain Veſuvius; for he himſelf was alſo deſirous to try an experiment or two touching the conſervation and induration of bodies. "As for the experiment it "ſelf, continues he, it ſucceeded excellently well, but "in the journey (between London and Highgate) I "was taken with ſuch a fit of caſting, as I knew "not whether it were the ſtone, or ſome ſurfeit, or "cold, or indeed a touch of them all three. But "when I came to your Lordſhip's houſe, I was not "able to go back, and therefore was forced to take "up my lodging here, where your houſe-keeper is "very careful and diligent about me, which I aſſure "myſelf your Lordſhip will not only pardon towards "him, but think the better of him for it. For in"deed your Lordſhip's houſe was happy to me, and "I kiſs your noble hands for the welcome, which I "am ſure you give me to it, &c. I know how unfit "it is for me to write to your Lordſhip with any o"ther hand than my own; but by my troth my fingers "are ſo disjointed with this fit of ſickneſs, that I can"not ſteadily hold my pen."

[NN] An inſcription written by Sir Henry Wotton.] It is as follows: FRANCISCUS BACON Baro de Verulam, S. Albani Vicecomes; ſeu notioribus titulis, Scientiarum lumen, facundiæ Lex, ſic ſedebat. Qui poſtquam omnia naturalis ſapientiæ & civilis arcana evolviſſet, Naturæ decretum explevit. Compoſita ſolvantur, Anno Dom. MDC XXVI. ætatis LXVI. Tanti veri memoriæ THOMAS MEAUTUS ſuperſtitis cultor, defuncti admirator, H. P. That is, according to Dr. Teniſon's tranſlation (128), "FRANCIS BACON, Ba"ron of Verulam, Viſcount of St. Albans, or "in more conſpicuous titles, the Light of the Sci"ences, the Law of Eloquence, ſate on this manner; "who, after he had unfolded all the myſteries of na"tural and civil wiſdom, obeyed the decree of Na"ture. Let the companions be parted ‖, in the year "of our Lord 1626, and in the ſixty ſixth year of "his age. THOMAS MEAUTYS, a reverencer of "him whilſt alive, and an admirer of him now "dead, hath ſet up this to the memory of ſo great a "man."

(128) See Baconiana, pag. 259.

‖ i. e. Soul and Body.

[OO] He was the Author of ſeveral mechanical inventions.] Dr. Teniſon tells us (129), that he doubts not but there were many of theſe inventions; but that he can recollect but three, and of them can give but a very broken account. And with regard to his inſtruments and ways in recovering deſerted mines, that he can give no account at all; though certainly without new tools and peculiar inventions he would never have undertaken that new and hazardous work. Of the three inventions which he recollected, the firſt was an Engine repreſenting the motion of the Planets, which my Lord Bacon ſpeaks of in one of his miſcellany papers in manuſcript. I did once, ſays he, cauſe to be repreſented to me by wires the motion of ſome Planets, in fact as it is, without Theories of Orbs, &c. And it ſeemed a ſtrange and extravagant motion. One while they moved in ſpires forwards; another while they did unwind themſelves in ſpires backwards. One while they made larger circles and higher; another while ſmaller circles and lower. One while they moved to the North in their ſpires, another while to the South, &c. His ſecond invention was a ſecret curioſity of Nature, whereby to know the ſeaſon of every hour of the year by a philoſophical glaſs, placed (with a ſmall proportion of water) in a chamber. This deſcription is in the words of Mr. Thomas Buſhel (130), one of his Lordſhip's menial ſervants. Dr. Teniſon tells us (131), that this ſecret cannot be that inſtrument, which is called Vitrum Calendare, or the Weather Glaſs, ſince my Lord Bacon in his Writings (132) ſpeaks of it as a thing in ordinary uſe, and recommends not water (133), but

(129) Pag. 17.

(130) See his Extract, pag. 17.

(131) Pag. 18.

(132) Hiſt. Vit. & Mortis, vol. 2. of his Works, pag. 118.

(133) In formâ Calidi, § 24. vol. 1. pag. 339. Organ.

no perſon before him was acquainted with that Philoſophy, or with the ſeveral phyſical Experiments which have been made ſince his time. That there is ſcarce one of them, but is hinted at in his Work; and that he himſelf made ſeveral; and particularly a kind of pneumatic engine, by which he gueſſed the elaſticity of the air, and very near diſcovered the weight of it. The ſame Author likewiſe obſerves, that what ſurprized him moſt was to read in his Work in expreſs terms the new Attraction, the invention of which is aſcribed to Sir Iſaac Newton [PP]. Mr. Evelyn in his deſcription of our Author in his book of Medals (nn) tells us, that he had a ſpacious forehead and a piercing eye, always, "ſays he, "as I have been told by one, who knew him well, looking upward, as a ſoul in ſublime "contemplation, and as the perſon, who by ſtanding up againſt Dogmatiſts, was to "emancipate and ſet free the long and miſerably captivated Philoſophia, which hath ever "ſince made ſuch conqueſts in the territories of nature." The greateſt Writers of our nation, as well as thoſe of other countries, conſpire in giving him the nobleſt character imaginable [QQ]; and the late Duke of Buckingham, Sheffield, in particular aſſures us (oo), that all his Works are, for expreſſion as well as thought, the glory of our nation and of all later but rectified ſpirit of wine in the uſe of it. Nor, as it was an inſtrument made with water, was it likely to have ſhewed the changes of the air with ſo much exactneſs, as the later Baroſcope made with Mercury. And yet it appears to be a ſecret of great value from the reward which it is ſaid to have procured. For Mr. Buſhel tells us in his Extract (134), that when Mr. Bacon made a preſent of it to the Earl of Eſſex, that Nobleman beſtowed upon him Twicknam Park and its Garden of Paradiſe, as a place for his ſtudies. Dr. Teniſon remarks, that he has not faith enough to credit the whole of this relation. And yet he believed the Earl of Eſſex was extremely liberal and free even to profuſeneſs; that he was a great lover of learned men, being in ſome ſort one of them himſelf (135); and that with ſingular patronage he encouraged the promiſing genius of Mr. Bacon, who alſo ſtudied his fortunes and ſervice. Yet Mr. Bacon himſelf in the place, where he profeſſes his unwillingneſs to be ſhort in the commemoration of the favours of that Earl, is abſolutely ſilent with regard to this ſignal favour (136). But there is in his Apology another ſtory, which may ſeem to have given occaſion to Mr. Buſhel's miſtake. After the Queen had denied to Mr. Bacon the Solicitor's place, for which the Earl of Eſſex had been a long and earneſt ſuitor on his behalf, it pleaſed that Earl to come to him from Richmond to Twicknam-Park, and thus to break with him: "Mr. Bacon, the Queen hath de-"nied me the place for you.... You fare ill, be-"cauſe you have choſe me for your mean and de-"pendance. You have ſpent your time and thoughts "in my matters; I die... if I do not do ſomewhat "towards your fortune. You ſhall not deny to ac-"cept a piece of land, which I will beſtow upon you." This piece of land was ſo large, that he underſold it for no leſs than eighteen hundred pounds. His third invention was a kind of mechanical index of the mind. Mr. Buſhel in his Extract (137) has given us the following deſcription of it. His Lordſhip preſented to Prince Henry two triangular ſtones (as the firſt fruits of his Philoſophy) to imitate the ſympathetical motion of the Load-ſtone and Iron, although made up by the compounds of Meteors (as Star-ſhot Jelly), and other like magical ingredients, with the reflected beams of the Sun, on purpoſe that the warmth diſtilled into them through the moiſt heat of the hands, might diſcover the affection of the heart by a viſible ſign of their attraction and appetite to each other, like the hand of a watch, within ten minutes after they are laid on a marble table, or the theatre of a great looking-glaſs. I write not this as a feigned ſtory, but as a real truth; for I was never quiet in my mind, till I had procured theſe jewels of my Lord's Philoſophy from my friend Mr. Archy Primroſe, the Prince's page. Dr. Teniſon obſerves (138), that he finds nothing of this either in his Lordſhip's Experiments touching emiſſion, or immateriate virtues from the minds and ſpirits of men (139), or in thoſe concerning the ſecret virtue of ſympathy and antipathy (140).

(nn) Pag. 340.

(oo) Vol. 1. of his Works, pag. 264.

(134) Pag. 17.

(135) MS. Hiſt. of Queen Elizabeth, p. 39. apud Teniſon, p. 19.

(136) See Bacon's Apology concerning the Earl of Eſſex, vol. 4. of his Works, p. 390, 391.

(137) P. 17, 18.

(138) Pag. 21.

(139) Nat. Hiſt. Cent. x. Exper. 939, &c.

(140) Ibid. Exper. 960, &c.

[PP] What ſurprized Mr. Voltaire moſt was to read in his works in expreſs terms the new Attraction, the invention of which is aſcribed to Sir Iſaac Newton.] The paſſages which Mr. Voltaire cites from my Lord Bacon, without quoting the place, are as follow: We muſt ſearch whether there may not be a kind of magnetic power, which operates between the Earth and heavy Bodies, between the Moon and the Ocean, between the Planets, &c. And in another place he ſays, that either heavy bodies muſt be carried towards the center of the earth, or muſt be reciprocally attracted by it; and in the latter caſe it is evident, that the nearer the Bodies in their falling draw towards the Earth, the ſtronger they will attract one another. "We muſt, ſays he, "make an Experiment to ſee whether the ſame clock "will go faſter on the top of a mountain, or at the "bottom of a mine. Whether the ſtrength of the "weights decreaſes on the mountain, and encreaſes "in the mine. It is probable that the Earth has a "true attractive power."

[QQ] The greateſt Writers of our Nation, as well as thoſe of other Countries conſpire in giving him the nobleſt character imaginable.] Ben. Johnſon the Poet, in his Diſcoveries (141), ſtiles him a noble Speaker, who was full of gravity in his ſpeaking. That his language, where he could ſpare or paſs by a jeſt, was nobly cenſorious. "No man ever ſpake more neatly, more "preſtly, more weightily, or ſuffered leſs emptineſs, "leſs idleneſs in what he uttered. No member of "his ſpeech but conſiſted of his own graces. His "hearers could not cough or look aſide from him with-"out loſs. He commanded where he ſpoke, and had "his judges angry and pleaſed at his devotion. No "man had their affections more in his power. The "fear of every man that heard him was, leſt he "ſhould make an end." He afterwards obſerves, that Lord Egerton the Chancellor was a great and grave Orator, but his learned and able, tho' unfortunate ſucceſſor, the Lord Bacon, was he who hath filled up all members, and performed that in our tongue, which may be compar'd or preferred either to inſolent Greece or haughty Rome. That, in ſhort, within his view and about his time, were all the Wits born, that could honour a language, or could help ſtudy. Now things, ſays he, daily fall; wits grow downwards, and eloquence goes backward; ſo that he may be named and ſtand as the mark or [illegible] of our language. He tells us likewiſe, that his conceit of his perſon was never increaſed towards him by his place or honours. But I have and do reverence him for the greatneſs, that was only proper to himſelf; in that he ſeemed to me ever by his works one of the greateſt men and moſt worthy of admiration, that had been in many Ages. In his adverſity I ever prayed that God would give him ſtrength; for greatneſs he could not want; neither could I conddle in a word or ſyllable for him, as knowing no accident could do harm to virtue, but rather help to make it manifeſt. Dr. Heylin in his Life of Archbiſhop Laud, Book 1, p. 78. ad ann. 1620, tells us, that the Lord Chancellor Bacon was "a man of a moſt ſtrong brain "and a chymical head, deſigning his endeavours to "the perfecting of the works of nature, or rather "improving nature to be the beſt advantages of life, "and the common benefit of mankind. Pity it was "he was not entertained with ſome liberal ſalary, "abſtracted from all affairs both of Court and Judi-"cature, and furniſhed with ſufficiency both of means "and helps for the going on in his deſign; which "had it been, he might have given us ſuch a body of "Natural Philoſophy, and made it ſo ſubſervient to "the public good, that neither Ariſtotle nor Theo-"phraſtus amongſt the ancients, nor Paracelſus or the "reſt of our later Chymiſts would have been conſi-"derable." Mr. Oſborn in the ſecond part of his later ages.. Morhof in a variety of places of his Polyhiſtor undertakes to ſhew, that all the modern improvements made by our nation in Philoſophy, are owing to the Lord Bacon; who, as that Writer expreſſes it, every where abounds with the ſeeds of things; many whereof, we may add, were ſown ſo deep, as not yet to have ſprung up (pp). Dr. Shaw remarks upon the queſtion of Lord Bacon, "What innovator follows the example of time, "which inſinuates new things ſo quietly, as to be almoſt imperceptible?" that it may juſtly be anſwered, the Lord Bacon, who, ſays he (qq), has reformed the ſtate of Learning ſo quietly, that his countrymen ſcarce perceive how or by whom it was effected. The learned Boerhaave likewiſe in his Methodus diſcendi Medicinam (rr) highly extolls him, and ſays, that if there is any thing in Des Cartes valuable, it is owing to our Author. However Spinoza in his ſecond letter to H. Oldenburg, publiſhed among his Opera poſthuma (ss), has excepted (pp) See Dr. Shaw's Note upon pag. 267. vol. 1. of the Philoſophical Works of Lord Bacon, methodiz'd and made Engliſh, London 1733, in 4to.

(141) Pag. 701. edit. 1692.

(qq) See his Note upon pag. 169. vol. 1. ibid.
(rr) Printed at Amſterdam in 12mo, 1726.
(ss) Pag. 398, 399.

(141) Pag. 150. edit. 1689.

Advice to a Son (141) aſſures us, that in all companies he appeared a good proficient, if not a maſter in thoſe Arts entertained for the ſubject of every one's diſcourſe. So as I dare maintain, continues he, without the leaſt affectation of flattery or hyperbole, that his caſual talk deſerveth to be written, as I have been told his firſt or fouleſt copies required no great labour to render them competent for the niceſt judgments.... So as I have heard him entertain a Country Lord in the proper terms relating to hawks and dogs, and at another time out-cant a London Surgeon.... Now this general knowledge he had in all things, huſhanded by his wit, and dignified with ſo majeſtical a carriage he was known to own, ſtruck ſuch an awful reverence in thoſe he queſtioned, that they durſt not conceal the moſt intrinſic part of their myſteries from him for fear of appearing ignorant or ſaucy. Dr.

(142) Part 1. § 16. pag. 35, 36.

Sprat in his Hiſtory of the Royal Society (142) preſmiſes this conſideration before his character of our Author, that the third ſort of new Philoſophers have been thoſe, who have not only diſagreed from the ancients, but have alſo propoſed to themſelves the right courſe of ſlow and ſure experimenting, and proſecuted it as far as the ſhortneſs of their own lives, or the multiplicity of other affairs, or the narrowneſs of their fortunes have given them leave; but that ſuch as theſe we are to expect to be but few; ſince they muſt diveſt themſelves of many vain conceptions, and overcome a thouſand falſe images, which lie like monſters in their way, before they can get as far as this. The Doctor then tells us, that of theſe he "ſhall only mention "one great man, who had the true imagination of the "whole extent of this enterprize, as it is now ſet on "foot, and that is the Lord Bacon; in whoſe Books "there are every where ſcattered the beſt arguments, "that can be produced for the defence of Experimental Philoſophy, and the beſt directions, that are "needful to promote it. All which he has already "adorned with ſo much art, that if my deſires could "have prevailed with ſome excellent friends of mine, "who engaged me in this work, there ſhould have "been no other preface to the Hiſtory of the Royal So"ciety, but ſome of his writings." But methinks in this one man I do at once find enough occaſion to admire the ſtrength of human wit, and to bewail the weakneſs of a mortal condition. For is it not wonderful that he, who had run through all the degrees of that profeſſion, which uſually takes up mens whole time, who had ſtudied and practiſed, and governed the common Law; who had always lived in the crowd, and born the greateſt burden of civil buſineſs, ſhould yet find leiſure enough for theſe retired ſtudies, to excel all thoſe men, who ſeparate themſelves for this very purpoſe? He was a man of ſtrong, clear, and powerful imaginations. His genius was ſearching and inimitable. And of this I need give no other proof than his ſtyle itſelf, which as for the moſt part it deſcribes mens minds, as well as pictures do their bodies, ſo it did his above all men living. The courſe of it is vigorous and majeſtical; the wit bold and familiar; the compariſons fetch'd out of the way, and yet the moſt eaſy; in all expreſſing a ſoul equally ſkilled in men and nature. All this and much more is true of him; but yet his philoſophical works do ſhew, that a ſingle and buſy hand can never graſp all this whole deſign, of which we treat. His rules were admirable; yet his Hiſtory not ſo faithful as might have been wiſhed in many places. He ſeems rather to take all that comes, than to chooſe, and to heap rather than to regiſter. But I hope this accuſation of mine can be no injury to his memory, ſeeing at the ſame time that I ſay he had not the ſtrength of a thouſand men, I do alſo allow him to have had as much as twenty. Mr. Cowley in his Poem to the Royal Society pays a fine compliment to my Lord Bacon:

Bacon at laſt, a mighty man, aroſe,
Whom a wiſe King and Nature choſe
Lord Chancellor of both their Laws,
And boldly undertook the injur'd pupil's cauſe.

And again in the fifth Stanza:

Bacon, like Moſes, led us forth at laſt,
The barren wilderneſs he paſt,
Did on the very border ſtand
Of the bleſt promis'd land,
And from the mountain's top of his exalted wit
Saw it himſelf, and ſhewed us it.

The Author of the Tatler (143) ſtiles him "a man, "who for the greatneſs of genius and compaſs of "knowledge did honour to his Age and Country; I "could almoſt ſay, to human nature itſelf. He poſſeſſed at once all thoſe extraordinary talents, which "were divided amongſt the greateſt Authors of antiquity. He had the ſound, diſtinct, comprehenſive "knowledge of Ariſtotle, with all the beautiful lights, "graces, and embelliſhments of Cicero. One does "not know which to admire moſt in his writings, "the ſtrength of reaſon, force of ſtyle, or brightneſs "of imagination." The ſame Writer in the Spectator N. 554, tells us, that he was one of the moſt extenſive and improved Genius's we have had any inſtance of in our Nation or in any other. This great man by an extraordinary force of nature, compaſs of thought, and indefatigable induſtry had amaſſed to himſelf ſuch ſtores of knowledge, as we cannot look upon without amazement. His capacity ſeems to have graſped all that was revealed in Books before his time; and not ſatisfied with that, he began to ſtrike out new Tracts of Science, too many to be travelled over by any one man in the compaſs of the longeſt life. Theſe therefore he could only mark down, like imperfect coaſtings in maps, or ſuppoſed points of land, to be farther diſcovered and aſcertain'd by the induſtry of after-ages, who ſhould proceed upon his notices or conjectures. Dr. Shaw (144) tells us, that it appears impoſſible, that the Lord Bacon's diſcoveries ſhould grow out of date, unleſs the frame of things was to alter; ſince he conſtantly endeavours to copy nature, which is always the ſame; ſo that his diſtinguiſhing merit lies in this, and in having every where opened the ſprings of knowledge and practice. "As to the mo"dern diſcoveries and improvements, however great "and numerous they may be, yet they are, in general, "no more than a part of what this Author foreſaw in "his mind, and taught the ways of bringing to light, "adding withal ſuch farther directions, that if men "are not wanting to themſelves, they may obtain "ſtill greater things. For he has ſhewn us the Art "of inventing Arts; which many of the ancients "ſeemed to deſpair of; and which the moderns per"haps are not hitherto ſufficiently vers'd in. So that, till "no more diſcoveries remain to be made in nature, "it ſhould ſeem that this Author's philoſophical writ"ings cannot be ſuperſeded." The great reputation he enjoyed even during his life-time in foreign countries appears from a Letter written from Italy to the Earl of Devonſhire, then Lord Cavendiſh, and quoted by Dr. Rawley; wherein it is ſaid, that my Lord Bacon is more and more known, and his books here more and more delighted in; and thoſe men, that have more than ordinary knowledge in human affairs, eſteem him one of the moſt capable ſpirits of this Age; and he is truly

(143) Numb. 267.

(144) Pag. 9. of his General Preface to the Philoſophical Works of Lord Bacon methodiz'd, &c.

excepted againſt his method [RR]. Dr. Rawley obſerves, that he was eminent for the ſharpneſs of his wit, his memory, judgment, and elocution; ſo that Sir Walter Raleigh once ſaid before the Doctor, that the Earl of Saliſbury was an excellent ſpeaker, but no good pen-man; the Earl of Northampton, and the Lord Henry Howard, excellent pen-men, but no good ſpeakers; but that Sir Francis Bacon was eminent in both. Tho' he was a great reader of books, yet he had not his knowledge from them, but from ſome grounds and notions within himſelf; which notwithſtanding he did not publiſh but with the utmoſt caution and circumſpection. He preferred a clear and maſculine expreſſion in his Works, to an affectation of elegance, and would often aſk whether the ſenſe was repreſented plainly enough. He read much and with great judgment; and after a moderate relaxation of his mind from ſtudy, returned to it with freſh vigour, and would not ſuffer any moment to eſcape him without improvement (tt). His converſation was extremely delightful and inſtructive [SS]. When his Office called him, as he was of the King's Council, to charge any offenders, he did it with the greateſt lenity; and in civil affairs, as Counſellor of State, he never engaged his Maſter in any ſevere or precipitate courſes. Neither was he leſs in favour with the ſubject than with his Sovereign; for he was always acceptable to the Houſe of Commons, when he was a Member thereof; and being appointed the King's Attorney, he was allow'd to ſit there, which was not permitted to other Attornies. He was very generous to his ſervants; which was the cauſe, ſays Dr. Rawley, that ſo many young Gentlemen of Blood and Quality ſought to liſt themſelves in his retinue. And if he were abuſed by any of them in their places, it was only the error of the goodneſs of his nature, but the badges of their indiſcretions and intemperances. He was religious [TT]; free from malice, which, as he ſaid himſelf, he never bred nor fed; no revenger truly ſuch. Several Perſons of Quality croſſed the ſeas on purpoſe to ſee and diſcourſe with him.... Among the reſt the Marquis Fiat (145), a French Nobleman, who was Embaſſador to England in the beginning of the reign of King Charles I, had a great inclination to ſee him; and when he came to his Lordſhip, who was then confined by his ſickneſs to his bed, the Marquis ſaluted him with this high compliment, that his Lordſhip had been ever to him like the Angels, of whom he had often heard, and read much of them in Books, but he never ſaw them; to which he replied, Sir, the charity of others does liken me to an Angel, but my own infirmities tell me I am a man (146). After which they contracted an intimate acquaintance, and the Marquis rever'd him ſo highly, that beſides his frequent viſits, they wrote Letters to each other under the titles of Father and Son (147). Mr. Voltaire relates this ſtory (148), and repreſents the Marquis's compliment in this manner: You reſemble the Angels; we hear thoſe beings ſpoken of perpetually, and we believe them ſuperior to men, but are never allowed the conſolation to ſee them. We ſhall add but one authority more from any foreign Writer in his favour, and that is from the great Baron Puffendorff, who tells us (149), that this wiſe Chancellor of England was the chief Writer in our age, who engaged us in a further and more accurate enquiry into philoſophical affairs, than had ever been purſued in the ſchools before. So that if Philoſophy has received any improvement in our times, it is greatly owing to his diſcoveries. Sapientiſſimus quondam Angliæ Cancellarius, qui præcipuè noſtro ſæculo velut claſſicum cecinisſe & ſignum ſuſtuliſſe videtur, ut in rebus Philoſophicis aliquid ulterius & exquiſitius inveſtigaretur, quam quo hactenus ſcholarum parietes reſonuerant. Sic ut ſi quæ eſt pulchriùs noſtro tempore efflorescentis Philoſophiæ gratia, iſti viro non minimâ ex parte debeatur.

(tt) See Dr. Rawley's Life of him.

(145) Mr. Voltaire in his 12th Letter concerning the Engliſh Nation calls him d'Effiat.

(146) See Dr. Rawley's Life of Lord Bacon, and Dr. Teniſon's Account of all the Lord Bacon's Works, pag. 101, 102.

(147) Dr. Rawley, ubi ſupra, and Lord Bacon's Works, vol. 4. Letter 159.

(148) Ubi ſupra.

(149) Specim. Controverſ. c. 1. Sect. 5. apud Pope Blount, ubi ſupra, p. 904.

[RR] Spinoza ... has excepted againſt his method.] Dr. Teniſon tells us (150), that he objects againſt it, becauſe, as he alledges, it fails in the very entrance of it through a miſtake about the original of error. My Lord Bacon's opinion is the ſame with that, which Des Cartes (151) inſiſts upon in his latter Philoſophy. Both of them ſhew, that man deceives himſelf, becauſe his will, being larger in its deſires than the underſtanding is in its comprehenſions, and haſtning its opinion of ſuch objects as it wants to know, before it has ſufficiently attended to them, and obtained a clear and diſtinct perception of them, cauſes it to yield a blind and raſh, and therefore groundleſs aſſent to inſufficient evidence. His Lordſhip expreſſes it thus in his Novum Organum (152). The underſtanding is not only made up of dry light, but it receives an infuſion from the will and affections; and that begets ſuch ſciences as the heart deſires. For a man ſooneſt believes that which he would have to be true. He therefore rejects difficult truths through impatience in enquiring; and ſober truths, becauſe they reſtrain his hope [or deſire]; and the deeper natural truths by reaſon of ſuperſtition; and the light of experiments by reaſon of arrogance and pride, leſt the mind ſhould ſeem to be converſant in mean and tranſitory things; and paradoxes out of reſpect to the opinion of the vulgar. In ſhort, the will ſeaſons and infects the mind by innumerable ways, and by ſuch as are ſometimes not at all perceived. Spinoſa endeavours to ſhew this opinion to be a groſs and fundamental miſtake by denying, that there is any ſuch thing in man as will; as if that general name was ever uſed to ſignify a particular act, and not rather to expreſs the general notion of that power. He tells us, that all volitions are particular acts, and as fatally determined by a chain of phyſical cauſes, as any effects whatſoever of natural bodies. " So that, as Dr. Teniſon obſerves (153), we are like to learn well from his Phi- (153) Pag. 154.
" loſophy how to amend our erroneous aſſent, whilſt
" it teaches us, that it is neceſſary, and not to be " mended, unleſs men could have other bodies, and
" there were another ſcheme of nature."

(150) Introd. p. 13.

(151) Dr. Teniſon erroneouſly calls him de Chart.

(152) Lib. 1. Aphor. 49. pag. 279. of his Works, vol. 1.

[SS] His converſation was extremely delightful and inſtructive.] Dr. Rawley tells us, that his meals were refections of the ear as well as of the Stomach, like the Noctes Atticæ or Banquets of the Deipnoſophiſts; and he knew ſome perſons of no mean parts, who profeſſed that they made uſe of their Note-Books, when they roſe from his table. He was not the leaſt overbearing in diſcourſe, nor apt to engroſs the whole converſation to himſelf, or to endeavour to excell others; but took a pleaſure in engaging them upon thoſe ſubjects, which they were peculiarly ſkilful in, or loved to talk upon. He contemned no man's obſervations, but would light his torch at every man's candle. His opinions and aſſertions, continues the ſame Author, were for the moſt part binding, and not contradicted by any, rather like oracles than diſcourſes; which may be imputed to the well-weighing of his ſentence by the ſcales of truth and reaſon, and alſo to the reverence and eſtimation, wherein he was commonly had, that no man would conteſt with him; ſo that there was no argumentation or pro and con (as they term it) at his table; or if there chanced to be any, it was carried with much ſubmiſſion and moderation. I have often obſerved, and ſo have other men of great account, that if he had occaſion to repeat another man's words after him, he had an uſe and faculty to dreſs them in better veſtments and apparel, than they had before; ſo that the Author ſhould find his own ſpeech much amended, and yet the ſubſtance of it ſtill retained, as if it had been natural to him to uſe good forms, as Ovid ſpoke of his faculty of verſifying,

Et quod tentabam ſcribere, verſus erat?

[TT] He was religious.] Though the world has been venger of injuries. He never endeavoured to remove others from their places, or accuſed any man to his Prince. However his Lordſhip has not been well treated by Mr. Rapin de Thoyras [VV]. In his Will he has this remarkable paſſage; For my name and memory, I leave it to mens charitable ſpeeches, and to foreign nations, and the next ages [WW]. Upon his death ſeveral Scholars of the Univerſity of Cambridge compiled a Monument of Latin Verſes to his memory, which were ſoon after printed.

been apt to ſuſpect great Wits and Politicians to have very faint ſentiments of religion, yet the contrary appears to have been the caſe of our Author from the whole current of his writings; otherwiſe he would have contradicted his own principles, which were, that a little Philoſophy inclineth men's minds to Atheiſm; but depth in Philoſophy bringeth men's minds about to Religion; for while the mind of man looketh upon ſecond cauſes ſcattered, it may ſometimes reſt in them, and go no farther; but when it beholdeth the chain of them confederate and linked together, it muſt needs fly to Providence and Deity (154). Dr. Rawley informs us, that he repaired frequently to the ſervice of the church to hear ſermons, and to receive the Sacrament, and died in the faith of the eſtabliſhed Church of England.

(154) Eſſay xvii.

[VV] His Lordſhip has not been well treated by Mr. Rapin de Thoyras.] That Author in his Hiſtory of England (155) having commended his great abilities, and declared that he was a very great genius, and one of the moſt learned men in Europe, has thought proper to aſſert, upon the authority of Sir Anthony Weldon's Court of King James, that his Lordſhip was a ſervile flatterer of thoſe in favour, exceeding haughty, while fortune ſmiled; but ſubmiſſive and fawning, when ſhe frowned. And in another place he remarks, that though Bacon, the Lord-Keeper, was well verſed in the Laws of the land, and capable of giving good advice, yet he made it his whole ſtudy to adapt himſelf to the King's humour, and make his court to the Favourite. Mr. Stephens in his Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon (156), vindicates him from theſe imputations, and obſerves, that with regard to flattery it may be anſwered, that ſome perſons repreſent the civil and decent expreſſions contained in addreſſes to Kings and great perſons as flattery; whereas the Lord Bacon writes in his Eſſay of Praiſe, that ſome praiſes come of good wiſhes and reſpects, which is a form due in civility to Kings and men of ſuperior rank, Laudando præcipere, when by telling them what they are, they repreſent to them what they ſhould be. And if his Lordſhip was guilty of exceſs in that point, it may be conſidered as one of the vices of the age, which infected other great men and writers of that time. But the counſels which he always gave the King and his Favourite, were the advices of a ſincere ſervant and friend, and not of a ſycophant; he aſſuring the Lord Buckingham in one of his Letters, that he ſhould ever give him, as he gave the King his Maſter, ſafe counſel, and ſuch as time would approve. As to the haughtineſs with which he is charged, we may refer the reader to the account of him written by Dr. Rawley, and publiſhed above thirty years after his deceaſe, and therefore not to be ſuſpected of flattery. Nor ought his ſubmiſſion upon his misfortunes to be too much objected to him, ſince that might proceed from the ſenſe of his faults and of his condition, wherein others were like to ſuffer with him. But that he ſupported himſelf under them as a Chriſtian and a Philoſopher, appears from the learned and noble works which he compoſed the laſt five years of his life.

(155) B. 18. ad ann. 1621. See likewiſe the ſame Author, ibid. ad ann. 1616.

(156) Pag. 34, 35.

[WW] In his laſt will he has this remarkable paſſage: For my name and memory, &c.] This paſſage is mentioned in the Tatler (157), though with ſome variation in the words. I have, ſays the Author, often read with a great deal of pleaſure, a legacy of the famous Lord Bacon, one of the greateſt genius's that our own or any country has produced. After having bequeathed his ſoul, body, and eſtate in the uſual form, he adds, My name and memory I leave to foreign nations, and to my countrymen, after ſome time be paſſed over. T.

(157) Vol. 3. Num. 133.

BACOUE (LEO), born at Caſteljaloux in lower Guienne, abandoned the Religion in which he was born, which was the Reformed, and entered himſelf into the Franciſcan Order. He was raiſed afterwards to the Prelacy, and became Biſhop of Glandeve. The Author, who informs me of this, obſerves, that Father Leo Bacoue is the only converted Huguenot, who was raiſed to a Biſhoprick in the reign of Lewis XIV (a). This Franciſcan Friar publiſhed a Latin Poem upon the Education of a Prince, about the time when the Dauphin was to have Preceptors appointed him. He had it reprinted at Paris in the year 1685. The Journal des Savans mentions it the year following (b).

(a) Rocoles, Hiſtoire veritable du Calviniſme, pag. 166.

(b) See the Journal of the 21ſt of January, pag. 23.

☞ BACONTHORP (a) or BACONDORP (JOHN) an eminent Engliſh Philoſopher and Divine in the XIVth Century, was born at Baconthorp, an inconſiderable village in the County of Norfolk. He was entered when he was young into a Monaſtery of the Carmelites at Blackney about five miles from Walſingham, where he was educated in Learning and Religion under the moſt learned men of that Order. Here he gave ſuch excellent marks of genius, that they thought proper to ſend him to the Univerſity of Oxford for his further improvement in the Sciences (b). From thence he removed to Paris, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage [A]; and upon his return to his own country was choſen the twelfth Provincial of his Order by the unanimous ſuffrages of the whole Aſſembly in the year 1329. Four years after this he was ſent for to Rome, in order to declare his opinion upon ſome important queſtions relating to Marriage [B]. He was diſtinguiſhed

(a) Trithemius and ſome other Writers call him Bacon.

(b) Joan. Pitſeus, Relat. Hiſtor. de Reb. Anglic. ad ann. 1346. pag. 451. edit. Paris 1619, 4to; and Joan. Balæus, Scriptor. Major. Brytanniæ illuſtr. Cent. 5. pag. 382. edit. Baſil, 1557.

[A] Removed to Paris, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage.] Pits (1) tells us, that he went thither, in order to compleat his ſtudies, which he had begun with ſuch great ſucceſs in his own country. He anſwered in all points the great hopes, which were conceived of him, and even far ſurpaſſed the moſt ſanguine expectations of all who knew the ſtrength of his natural genius. At Paris he took the Degrees of Doctor of Laws and Divinity, his prodigious parts, extenſive learning and ſolid judgment being univerſally admired. He was a ſtrenuous defender of all the opinions of Averroes, and was conſidered as the Head of the Sect of Averroiſts in that age. He was honoured likewiſe with the title of Doctor Reſolutus. Having finiſh'd his ſtudies in all parts of learning, he returned to his own country. Sed inde miſſus Lutetiam perrexit, ut quæ in patriâ fæliciter inceperat, apud exteros fælicius perficeret & finiret. In omnibus nullius de ſe bonam opinionem conceptam fefellit, imò omnem planè omnium ſpem longe ſuperavit. Ibi utriuſque Juris & Theologiæ Doctor creatus eſt, admirantibus omnibus ſtupendum hominis ingenium, multiplicem doctrinam, & ſolidum judicium. Omnes Averrois ſententias mordicus tenuit, & illius ſcholæ ſuo tempore quaſi princeps haberi voluit. Cognomentum accepit Doctoris Reſoluti. Collecto igitur undique inſtar apis ſedulæ dulciſſimo ſcientiarum melle, in patriam reverſus eſt (2).

(1) Relat. Hiſt. de Rebus Anglic. pag. 451. edit. Paris 1619.

(2) Idem, ibid. See likewiſe Balæus, Script. Maj. Brytanniæ Illuſtr. pag. 382.

[B] He was ſent for to Rome, in order to declare his opinion upon ſome important queſtions relating to marriage.] This is all that Pits tells us of this affair; but he informs ſtinguiſhed by the title of Doctor Reſolutus, or the Reſolute Doctor, and particularly maintained the opinions of Averroes in Philoſophy (c). He wrote a great number of Books [C]. He was very low of ſtature, but this defect of his body was recompenſed by the greatneſs of Genius and the extent of his Learning. Paulus Panſa, an Italian Author quoted by Bale and Pits, gives him a noble character, and tells us, that no Writer has treated of the Nature and Attributes of the Deity to greater advantage than our Author, whoſe philoſophical Works are likewiſe equally admirable. That he has defended the Chriſtian Religion againſt the attacks of the Jews, Mahometans, and Infidels with uncommon ſucceſs, and confounded Hereticks in the ſtrongeſt manner. That he has detected the impoſtures of Antichriſt, and explained the obſcure paſſages of the Holy Scripture, and penetrated into the moſt abſtruſe myſteries of it, and repreſented them in an eaſy and familiar light. This character of him, according to Pits, is ſufficiently evident from his Writings, which that Wrirer tells us will prove as laſting as the World. Bale likewiſe ſpeaks of him in very favourable terms [D]. After a long courſe of ſtudy and indefatigable labour in the promotion of Religion and Learning, he died at London, and was interred there in the year 1346, in the reign of King Edward the third (d).

(c) See note [A].

(d) Balæus, pag. 385; and Pitſeus, pag. 454. Wharton, Append. ad Hiſt. Litter. G. Cave, pag. 18. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720. and Caſ. Oudin. Commentar. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 3. col. 908. edit. Lipſiæ 1722.

forms us, that his fame grew every day more and more conſiderable in Italy, as it had done before in France. Romam vocatus eſt, ſuper græviſſimis de matrimonio dubiis. Tum cœpit fama hominis apud Italos, uti prius apud Gallos, magis magiſque indies clareſcere. But Bale is more particular upon this ſubject, and obſerves, that he was ſent for by Letters to Rome, where he was once hiſſed, as he was diſputing; which contempt was not ſhewn him on account of any want of acuteneſs or fluency in the diſpute, but becauſe for ſome time he aſcribed too much to the Pope's authority in diſpenſing with the Laws of God with regard to marriage. Bale tells us, that he did this very probably out of want of ſufficient reflection; but that being convinced of his error by the Word of God, he acknowledg'd his miſtake, and made a modeſt recantation, proving very ſolidly from Scripture and Reaſon, that the Pope had no right to give Diſpenſations in thoſe degrees of conſanguinity, which are prohibited by God. The ſame Hiſtorian informs us, that he got a great reputation by that action, an ample account of which is given in Jacobus Calcus of Pavia's Treatiſe concerning the Divorce of King Henry VIII. Et quum eo magiſtratu quatuor annos functus fuiſſet, per literas accerſitus, magnis itineribus Romam venit, ubi inter diſputandum vel ſibilos ſemel paſſus eſt; non quod parum acutè & facundè diſſeruiſſet, ſed quod diverſam ſententiam aliquandiu tueretur, vel, ut apertius dicam, quia Pontificis Romani authoritati nimium in cancellandis divinis de matrimonio legibus, fortaſſis incogitantèr, attribuiſſet. Sed erroris à Dei verbo admonitus, vitium agnovit, deteſtabatur noxam, ac palinodiam modeſtiſſimè cecinit, ſolidiſſimis ſcripturis & rationibus probans, in gradibus conſanguinitatis divinâ lege prohibitis Papam diſpenſare non poſſe. Et magnam ab eo facto famam per literas ibidem ſibi peperit, ut fuſius narrat Jacobus Calcus Papienſis in opere ſuo de Henrici octavi Anglorum regis divortio (3).

(3) Balæus, pag. 382.

[C] He wrote a great number of Books.] Trithemius in his Book de Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis (4), Anthony Poſſevinus in the firſt volume of his Apparatus Sacer under the word Joannes de Bacone, Bale (5), and Pits (6) give a long catalogue of his writings; the greateſt part of which were never printed. He wrote Commentaries upon all the Old and New Teſtament, and upon St. Auguſtin de Civitate Dei; ſeveral Treatiſes againſt the Jews; divers Tracts upon Ariſtotle; Sermons; Commentaries upon St. Anſelm of the Incarnation of the Word, and concerning the Queſtion why God was made Man; a Treatiſe againſt Pope John XXII, concerning the beatific Viſion, with a variety of other works. Thoſe of his writings which are publiſhed are I. Commentaria ſeu Quæſtiones ſuper quatuor libros Sententiarum; i. e. "Queſtions and Anſwers upon the four Books of Sentences;" printed at Milan 1510 and 1611, at Cremona 1618, twice at Paris, and once at Venice (7). II. Compendium Legis Chriſti; i. e. "An Abridgment of the Law of Chriſt" (8); Venice 1527 in fol. III. Quodlibeta, publiſh'd at Venice with the preceding work, and with the Commentaries upon the Sentences, at Cremona 1618 (9).

(4) Ad ann. 1340.

(5) Pag. 383, 384, 385.

(6) Pag. 452, 453 and 454.

(7) Wharton; Appendix ad Hiſtor. Litter. G. Cave, p. 18. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720, in fol.

(8) Du Pin, Bibliotb. tom. 11. pag. 77. edit. Paris 1702, gives this piece the title of An Abridgment of the Life of Chriſt.

(9) Wharton, ubi ſupra.

[D] Bale likewiſe ſpeaks of him in favourable terms.] He tells us, that he was maſter of various and abſtruſe learning; Opus non eſt, ut variam & reconditam ejus eruditionem accuratâ hic oratione depingam (10). He obſerves alſo, that if he had not lived in that dark age, and under the tyranny of Antichriſt, he would have done a great many excellent things, and appeared one of the moſt perfect genius's in the world. That he ſaw a great deal notwithſtanding the darkneſs of thoſe times, though he durſt not declare his ſentiments. The ſame Hiſtorian tells us, that he had found ſome ſentences in his writings more weighty, than any in the other Authors of that age; which ſentences he had collected as marks of his juſt ſenſe of religion, though he was fearful, that he had loſt them in Ireland. Si non fuiſſet hic ſcriptor ejus ætatis caligine impeditus, ſub Antichriſti tyrannide, multa & magna præſtitiſſet, nec eo fuiſſet quicquam abſolutius. Multa certe in ipſis tenebris vidit, quæ pronunciare non audebat. Porro inveni ſententias aliquot graviores apud illum, quam apud omnes ejus temporis ſcriptores. Et eas ut fragmenta quædam pietatis ejus collegi; quæ tamen apud Hybernos periiſſe timeo (11).

T.

(10) Pag. 382.

(11) Pag. 382.

BADIUS (JODOCUS or JOSSE) ſirnamed Aſcenſius, on account of his being born in the Borough (a) of Aſſche near Bruſſels, raiſed himſelf a conſiderable character by the number of books, which he printed and commented upon. He was born in the year 1462. He performed his firſt ſtudies at Ghent, and continued them in Italy; and he made a great progreſs in Greek at Ferrara under Baptiſta Guarini. He ſettled at Lyons, and taught there as well publickly as privately the Latin and Greek Tongues. After that he removed to Paris, and ſet up a Printing-houſe there, which advanced his reputation [A]. He

(a) Moreri was miſtaken in calling it an Houſe. The Authors, whom he quotes, uſe the word Municipium. Geſner gives Badius the ſirname of Gandenſis.

[A] He ſet up at Paris a Printing-houſe, which advanced his reputation.] Father du Moulinet tells us, that Jodocus Badius was the firſt who brought the round characters into France, and that before him all the Printers of that Kingdom uſed the Gothic characters. He came from Italy to France about the year 1500, with a deſign both to teach the Greek Language at Paris, and to ſet up a very noble Printing-houſe, which he called PRÆLUM ASCENSIANUM (1). Father du Moulinet forgot that Badius ſtaid a long time at Lyons, before he came to Paris. See the remark [H]. Beſides, Mr. Chevillier has proved againſt this Father, that printing in France did not begin with the Gothic character (a), and that there were ſeveral impreſſions in Roman Letter before the time of Joſſe Badius (2), and that though he printed a great number of editions in a good Letter . . . . yet he printed likewiſe ſeveral in Gothic (3).

(1) See the Journal des Savans of the 31ſt of January 1684, pag. 38.

(a) Gabriel Naudé, ch. vii. of his Addition à l'Hiſtoire de Louis XI. pag. 317 and 318 of the edition in 1630, aſſerts, that theſe workmen, who were leſs deſirous of reputation than profit, were the perſons who introduced the Gothic character; but I cannot tell what he means by this, ſince the number of editions which we have in the ſquare Letter, are as full of abbreviations as the Gothic which ſucceeded them. CRIT. REM.

(2) Chevill. Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 54.

(3) Ibid. p. 128.

He publiſhed a conſiderable number of Claſſic Authors, with his own Explications and Notes [B]. He took the ſame pains with ſeveral modern Authors, as Petrarch, Politian, Laurentius Valla, Baptiſta Mantuanus, &c. He publiſhed likewiſe ſeveral books of his own compoſition, both in verſe and proſe (b) [C]; and good judges have agreed, that if his domeſtic cares had not obliged him to direct his labours as much or more to gain, than to glory, he would have ſucceeded much better than he did [D]. Eraſmus happened to compare him to Budæus in ſome points; and it is incredible what a prodigious noiſe was raiſed at Paris againſt this compariſon [E]. Thoſe, who place Badius's death in the year 1526, are miſtaken [F]. He had the charge of a large family; and it is ſaid in his Epitaph, that probably he would have produced as many children as he did books, if he had applied himſelf to one of thoſe functions as early as to the other [G]; but that he had been a long while an Author, before he engaged in marriage. I would not affirm that this was exactly true [H]. CONRADE BADIUS, his ſon, was born at Paris, and ſettled at Geneva. He became a hearty Proteſtant, which he gave a proof of in his Alcoran of the

(b) Ex Valerii Andreæ Bibliothecâ Belgic. pag. 588, 589.

[B] He printed a conſiderable number of Claſſic Authors with his own Explications and Notes.] Valerius Andreas gives a catalogue of them, among which are Horace, Perſius, Terence, Juvencus, Theocritus, Salluſt, Valerius Maximus, Quintilian, Aulus Gellius, and ſeveral Tracts of Cicero. Commentarii verò, ſive familiares Enarrationes circumferuntur in Horatium Flaccum, &c. (4). The catalogue of Swertius is more full: Ovid and Seneca's Tragedies are mentioned in it (5).

(4) Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 589.
(5) Swert. in Athen. Belgicis.

[C] He publiſhed ſeveral books of his own compoſition both in verſe and proſe.] Valerius Andreas mentions the following: Pſalterium B. Mariæ; Epigrammatum Liber; Navicula Stultarum Mulierum; de Grammaticâ; de conſcribendis Epiſtolis; Vita Thomæ a Kempis.

[D] If his domeſtic cares had not prevented him . . . he would have ſucceeded much better than he did.] Eraſmus ſpeaks very freely. Nec infeliciter omnino ceſſit conatus Badio: adeſt illi Facilitas non indocta, felicius tamen ceſſurus; niſi curæ domeſticæ reique parandæ ſtudium interrupiſſent otium illud Muſis amicum hujus laudis candidato neceſſarium (6). He confirms this judgment of his in one of his Letters (7). Aliis liberum erit de Badio judicare quod volunt, ego ſemper illum habui in eorum numero, quorum nec eruditionem, nec ingenium, nec eloquentiam poſſis contemnere; tametſi non diſſimulo illum longe majorem fuiſſe futurum, ſi fortuna benignior otium ac tranquillitatem ſtudiorum ſuppeditâſſet. Brixius after he has given a very indifferent character of Badius, accuſes him of having applied himſelf more to his intereſt, than to the ſtudy of eloquence. Scio Badium non eſſe prorſus ἄμουσον. Verum qualis qualis eſt, talem ſe certe hominibus noſtris hactenus probavit, ut quoties de doctis ſermo inter doctos incidit de Badio planè ἰδιὸς λόγος. Illi, quod non inficiaris, quæſtus tantum non eloquentia ſcopus eſt (8).

(6) Eraſm. in Ciceronian. pag. 73.
(7) The 28th of 22d book, pag. 1172, 1173.
(8) Brixius in Epiſt. ad Eraſm. inter Epiſt. Eraſmi, xxvii. lib. 22. pag. 1166.

[E] Eraſmus compared him with Budeus; and it is incredible what a noiſe was raiſed at Paris againſt this compariſon.] Brixius, who was a friend of Eraſmus, wrote to him upon this affair the Letter, which I quoted ſome expreſſions from above. He did not conceal from him that the learned men at Paris were angry to ſee that Badius was in ſome meaſure preferred to Budæus: Quo major indignatio noſtrorum omnium animas ſubit, quod hac in opinione, juſta de cauſa quum ſint, exiſtiment illum abs te non tantum BADIO collatum, ſed & præpoſitum . . . Ea una commiſſura adeò noſtris omnibus invidioſa eſt, ut multorum tibi benevolorum animos à tui ſtudio abalienârit, ob id, quod exiſtimant BUDÆUM cum BADIO commiſſum perinde eſſe, ac ſi quis ACHILLEM cum THERSITE committeret (9). Eraſmus juſtified himſelf, and ſhewed that he had very clearly aſſerted the ſuperiority of Budæus. He was ſurprized, that they had not perceived this in France, or if they had perceived it, that they ſhould exclaim ſo much againſt him, and write ſo many ſatyrical verſes upon him. Demiror iſthic eſſe doctos, qui hæc non videant, & ſi vident, magis etiam demiror eſſe, qui vociferentur, qui maledicis verſiculis rem dignam exiſtiment (10). This affair was ſo much talk'd of that it came to the ears of Francis I. Si verus eſt rumor, ſic fremunt amici Budæi, quaſi in cineres patris ac matris illius imminxerim. Clamant, O Cœlum! O Terra! Budæum cum Badio! Clamant me invidere gloriæ Budæi, meque multis Epigrammatis dilacerant. . . Cauſa delata eſt ad Regis cognitionem. Volenti cognoſcere diſſidii cauſam, dictum eſt Budæum me taxâſſe in loco quodam, eo me offenſum quæſiſſe vindictam, eumque cum Badio contuliſſe (11). If Eraſmus had a deſign to have done honour to Badius by this compariſon, he was much deceived; for with what cruelty did they ſtab that poor man to the heart, every time that they complained of the injuſtice, which was done to Budæus? It would have been much better for Badius, that Eraſmus had never thought of him. The place was corrected in the ſecond edition.

(9) Ibid. pag. 1168.
(10) Eraſm. Epiſt. 28. lib. 22. pag. 1172.
(11) Eraſm. Epiſt. lxxii. lib. 20. pag. 1030.

[F] Thoſe who place his death in the year 1526, are miſtaken.] Swertius contented himſelf with ſaying, that he found, that Badius lived to the year 1526 (12). This ſhews that he did not know whether he lived beyond that year; but he did pretend to aſſert, that he lived no longer. Konig, inſtead of uſing this reſerve, affirms that Badius died in the year 1526. Others have ſaid the ſame after him. But let us conſider a little Brixius's Letter, which I quoted above. It was written in 1528, and Badius appears in it to be ſtill living. Valerius Andreas ſays nothing of his death. Moreri places it about the year 1529 or 1530. He is miſtaken; for it is certain that Eraſmus, in a Letter dated in September 1530 (13), rejoices that the news, which had been diſperſed of Badius's death, was not true; and we have an edition of Longolius's Epiſtles, printed by Badius in 1533. Geſner in his Bibliotheca printed in 1545 obſerves, that it was about ten years ſince Badius died. He was living, when Alphonſo de Caſtro's Book againſt Hereſies was printed at Paris; for he was one of thoſe, who printed it in 1534 (14). The firſt page of Peter Lombard in Epiſtolas Pauli contains theſe words, Pro Hæredibus Jodoci Badii, 1535, menſe Decembri (15). So that he was not living in December 1535.

(12) In Athen. Belgic. pag. 490.
(13) It is the 23d of the 25th book, pag. 1373.
(14) See La Caille Hiſtoire de l'Imprimerie, pag. 74.
(15) Chevill. de l'Origene de l'Imprim. de Paris, pag. 138.

[G] He would have produced as many children as books, if he had applied himſelf to one of theſe functions as early as to the other.] This thought was the ſubject of an Epitaph, which was written for him; and is as follows:

Hic liberorum plurimorum qui parens,
Parens librorum plurimorum qui fuit,
Situs JODOCUS BADIUS eſt ASCENSIUS.
Plures fuerunt liberis tamen libri,
Quod jam ſeneſcens cœpit illos gignere,
Ætate florens cœpit hos quod edere (16).

This Epitaph is not the ſame with that upon the tomb of Jodocus Badius in the Charnel-houſe of the Collegiate-Church of St. Bennet at Paris (17). He was buried there (18). If the verſes, which are quoted above, are a faithful account of him, he followed the maxim of the greateſt part of Scholars, by marrying late. See the Book entitled Valeſiana (19).

(16) Swert. Ath. Belgic. pag. 490. mentions this Epitaph as written by a friend of Badius. He ſhould have ſaid by his grandſon. See the following remark.
(17) You may read it in La Caille, Hiſtoire de l'Imprimerie, pag. 75.
(18) Rocoles, Hiſtoire veritable du Calviniſme, pag. 218.
(19) Pag. 5. Amſterdam edition.

[H] He had been a long time an Author, before he engaged in marriage. . . . I would not affirm that this was exactly true.] The Sieur de la Caille ſuggeſts this doubt to me; he informs me that Badius, upon his return from Italy, taught ſeveral Gentlemen at Lyons, and compoſed and printed a great many Books, at the houſe of John Trechſel, Printer at Lyons, whoſe daughter Thelif Trechſel he married . . . (20). It was to him, continues that Author, that the learned Robert Gaguin, the twentieth General of the Order of the Trinitarians, who knew his merit and capacity for correcting the preſs, wrote to print his works, as we ſee from the Letter, which that General addreſſed to him, and which the Franciſcan Monks. He tranſlated the firſt book, and compiled the ſecond, and illuſtrated both of them with marginal notes, which are extremely ſatyrical. He was a Printer and Author, and ſometimes amuſed himſelf with writing French Verſes. He wrote ſome againſt Noſtradamus (c). Three of his ſiſters were married to famous Printers [I]. I was for ſome time ignorant of what a modern Author meant, who ſeems to accuſe Henry Stephens for having cenſured Joſſe Badius [K]. I have nothing to ſay concerning one CONRADUS BADIUS, who died of the Plague with all his family at Orleans, where he was Miniſter in the year 1562 (d), and who had been a friend of Theodore Beza's from his youth (e).

(20) Hiſtoire de l'Imprimerie, pag. 72, 73.

(c) Du Verd'er Vau-Privas, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 237.

(d) Beze, Hiſtoire des Egliſes, liv. 6. pag. 149.

(e) Ant. Fayus, in Vita Th. Bezæ, pag. 45.

Mr. Chevillier, who has collected ſeveral elogiums upon Joſſe Badius, aſſures us, that he had been Profeſſor of polite Learning in the Univerſity of Paris, and afterwards in the city of Lyons, where he read public Lectures upon the Poets (f).

(f) Chevill. Orig. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 137.

There is probably an error in the title of one of the books, which Valerius Andreas aſcribes to him [L].

which is printed before his Epiſtles in quarto in the year 1498. This obliged Badius to go to Paris about the year 1499 or 1500, after the death of his father-in-law, as well to teach the Greek language, as to reſtore the Art of Printing, which began to decline there. It follows from this paſſage, that Badius was married in 1500. Now he was then but thirty years old; and therefore he cannot be ſaid to have delayed his marriage to old age, jam ſeneſcens cæpit illos gignere; and yet we are aſſured of this by Henry Stephens, his grandſon; for he was the Author of that Latin Epitaph, and of a Greek one, which turns upon the ſame thought. Jodoco Badio elegantiſſimis hiſce Epitaphiis parentavit ex filia nepos Henricus Stephanus, quæ propter elegantiam non potui non adſcribere (21). Theſe Epitaphs are printed in a book of Henry Stephens de Artis Typographicæ Querimoniâ. Mr. Almeloveen has given them both, with another Latin one of the ſame Author, in his curious Diſſertation de Vitis Stephanorum.

(21) Almeloveen de Vitis Stephanorum, p. 28.

[I] Three daughters of J. Badius were married to famous Printers.] Catherine Badius, daughter of Jodocus, was married to Michel Vaſcoſan (22). Perrette Badius, another of his daughters was wife to Robert Stephens (23). Jane Badius, her ſiſter, married John de Roigny (24), who took his father-in-law's mark, and ſet the Prelum Aſcenſianum on his editions for above twenty five years (25). Perrette underſtood the Latin tongue, either from her father's inſtructions, as Mr. Almeloveen thinks (26), and from hearing the language talk'd at her huſband's houſe. Theſe two opinions have each of them probable grounds to ſupport them; thoſe, who incline to the latter, may argue from this, that a ſiſter of Henry Stephens, and daughter to Perrette Badius, learned Latin without the aſſiſtance of Grammar, and only from uſe. For Robert Stephens's houſe was full of people, who always talk'd Latin, ſo that even the maids learn'd to ſpeak it. See the Epiſtle Dedicatory before Aulus Gellius by Henry Stephens; where you will find this mentioned; the Author addreſſes himſelf to his ſon. Aviæ tuæ eorum, quæ Latinè dicebantur, (niſi rarius aliquod vocabulum intermiſceretur,) haud difficilior erat intellectu, quam ſi dicta ſermone Gallico fuiſſent. Quid de ſuperſtite ſorore meâ, amitâ autem tuâ, nomine Katherinâ dicam? Illa quoque eorum, quæ Latinè dicuntur, interpretem non deſiderat; multa verò & ipſa eodem loqui ſermone poteſt; & quidem ita (licet nonnunquam impingat) ut ab omnibus intelligatur. Unde illi hæc Latinæ linguæ cognitio? Artem certe Grammaticam haud magiſtram habuit, nec alius illi hac in re quam uſus præivit. He explains what he meant by this uſe; which was that the Printers and Correctors of Robert Stephens ſpoke nothing but Latin.

(22) La Caille, Hiſt. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 102.
(23) Ibid. p. 96.
(24) Ibid. pag. 96.
(25) Chevillier, de l'Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 138.
(26) Almeloveen, de Vitis Stephanor. p. 28.

[K] I was for ſome time ignorant of what a modern Author meant who ſeems to accuſe Henry Stephens for having cenſured Joſſe Badius.] I was at a loſs in this point, by not being able to underſtand a French period of the Sieur de la Caille; but at laſt I think I have gained the ſenſe of it. This period contains theſe words: "Here is an Epitaph related by Henry Ste-" phens in his Book de Artis Typographicæ Querimonia, " printed by the ſame Stephens in 1569, wherein " there are ſeveral complaints addreſſed to this Ba-" dius both in Greek and Latin (27)." I thought at firſt that he meant that Henry Stephens reproached Badius in a ſevere manner both in the Greek and Latin tongues, with having injured the buſineſs of Printing; but reflecting that he was grandſon to him, and not finding any thing againſt Badius in the Querimonia Artis Typographicæ, which Mr. Almeloveen publiſhed, I continued very much in ſuſpence. Mr. Almeloveen having aſſured me, that he had retrenched nothing in the Querimonia, I was induced to read that period again, and then I apprehended that the words both in Greek and Latin ought not to be referred to Complaints but to Epitaph. At leaſt I had an opportunity of conſulting Henry Stephens's work itſelf (28); wherein I found, 1, a Preface in proſe againſt the ignorance of Printers; 2, a Poem, in which he introduces the Art of Printing complaining of its decay; 3, the Epitaph both in Greek and Latin, or in Latin only, of ſeveral learned Printers. I found there no complaints either againſt Badius, or addreſſed to Badius. This paſſage of the Sieur la Caille is a mere riddle to me, if it is not a miſtake. Is it any wonder, that the dead languages, with their various tranſpoſitions, which are permitted them, have ſo many obſcurities with regard to us; when our own language throws us into prodigious obſcurity, when we recede from the natural order of the words?

(27) La Caille, Hiſt. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 74.

(28) Mr. Almeloveen, who lends his books in ſo obliging a manner, was ſo kind as to ſend me the Artis Typographicæ Querimonia.

[L] There is probably an error in the title of one of the Books, which Valerius Andreas aſcribes to him.] He aſcribes to him a Book intitled, Navicula ſtultarum Mulierum (29), and does not mention either the place or time of its impreſſion. He only copies in this particular the Catalogue of Swertius. I have been informed (30), that Badius publiſhed in 1513 a Book intitled, Navis ſtultiferæ collectanea ab Jodoco Badio Aſcenſio vario carminum genere, non ſine eorundem familiari explanatione conflata. It is probable, that the Book mentioned by Valerius Andreas is not different from this; or at moſt, that it differs no more than a part from the whole. I believe likewiſe that the work publiſhed by Badius in 1513 was taken from that, which was intitled, Navis Narragoniæ, the Author of which was Sebaſtian Brandt (31), a native of Straſbourg, Profeſſor of Law, and a good Poet for that Age, which was about the end of the fifteenth Century. See Geſner's Bibliotheca (32) concerning Navis Narragoniæ, or Navis Stultorum.

(29) See Remark [C].

(30) By Monſieur de la Coſte, a Miniſter of Holland.

(31) Or Titio.

(32) Geſneri Bibliothec. folio 593.

BADUEL (CLAUDE) in Latin Baduellus, lived in the XVIth Century. He was of the Reformed Religion, as appears by his Latin tranſlation of ſeveral ſermons of John Calvin, which he publiſhed at Geneva, as alſo from the Acts of the Martyrs, which he printed in Latin in the ſame city, in 1566 (a). I doubt not but that he taught polite Learning in the College of Nîmes; for we find among his printed Works Oratio ad inſtituendum Gymnaſium Nemauſenſe de Studiis Literarum, and another piece intitled, De Collegio & Univerſitate Nemauſenſi. He wrote well in Latin, and he was a good Orator, a good Father, and a good Chriſtian. Theſe two laſt characters appear very eminently in his Epiſtola Paræneticæ ad Paulum filium de vero Patrimonio & Hæreditate quam Chriſtiani Parentes ſuis Liberis debent relinquere. I ſhall refer the reader, for the titles of his other books, to to the Epitome of the Bibliotheca of Geſner; but I ſhall mention ſomething relating to the Treatiſe, which he publiſhed of the Marriage of Men of Letters [A]; and ſhall obſerve that the abbreviators of Geſner have omitted ſome things, which they ſhould have mention'd; for they have forgot to tell us, that Baduel compoſed in Latin A Funeral Oration for the Lady de St. Veran (b). The Catalogue of the Oxford Library aſcribes to him Notes upon the Apocryphal Books, printed at London in 1660.

(a) Friſii Epitome, Bibliothecæ Geſneri, p. 150.

(b) She was daughter to the firſt Preſident of the Parliament of Toulouſe. This Funeral Oration, tranſlated into French by Charles Rozel, was printed at Lyons in 1546. See the Biblioth. of Du Verdier.

[A] I ſhall ſay ſomething of the Treatiſe, which he publiſhed of the Marriage of Men of Letters.] The title is as follows: De Ratione Vitæ ſtudioſæ ac literatæ in matrimonio collocandæ ac degendæ. It was printed at Lyons by Sebaſtian Gryphius in the year 1544 in 4to, and printed at Leipſic in 1577 and 1581 (1). This laſt edition contains 143 pages in 8vo. A Profeſſor of Leipſic, whoſe name was Gregory Breſman, wrote a Preface to it, in which he very much commends the Author and the Book itſelf. It is certainly a piece full of good ſenſe and morality. Baduel dedicated it to Mr. de Maſencal (2), firſt Preſident of the Parliament of Toulouſe. He extolls there the excellence of a married ſtate, and ſhews the diſorders, which generally attend that of a bachelor; and he refutes thoſe, who aſſert that marriage is not proper for Men of Letters, ſince it diverts them from their ſtudies, and prevents them from applying themſelves entirely to their books. He tells us (3), that he had choſen that ſtate himſelf, and he gives ſome directions for the choice of a wife to thoſe who are willing to join, as he earneſtly perſuades them to do, the pleaſures of a happy marriage with the profeſſion of letters. He ſays, that William Bigot, a man well ſkilled in the knowledge of Phyſic and Natural Philoſophy, had promiſed a Treatiſe, which was to ſhew that marriage was neceſſary; that is, according to Baduel's notion of it, that a man without marrying could not enjoy a good ſtate of health. Guillelmus Bigotius, ſays he (4), qui in medicis ac phyſicis diligenter verſatur, ſummam harum rerum habet ſcientiam, aliquando promiſit ſe de conjunctione matrimonii uſuque ejus neceſſario ſcripturum. Neceſſarium (opinor) intelligit, ſine quo homo non poteſt valere. Itaque eam partem naturæ, conjugium ad bonam corporis conſtitutionem appetentis, nos ei explicandam relinquamus: in quo valdè prudenter faciet, ſi eam commoditatem ex legitimâ uteri conjunctione, ejuſque moderatâ conſuetudine, petendam eſſe doceat; & ea incommoda oſtendat, quæ ex liberis illis ac diſſolutis ſcortationibus humanis corporibus multa & magna afferuntur.

(1) This occaſioned Mr. Konig to believe erroneouſly, that Baduel had written it in 1581. See his Bibliotheca vetus & nova.

(2) Ad Joannem Maſſecalum.

(3) De Ratione Vitæ ſtudioſæ in Matrimonio collocandæ, p. 3.

(4) Ibid. pag. 47, 48.

To give a proper notion of this work, I ſhall borrow ſomething from the Profeſſor of Leipſic, who procured a ſecond edition of it. He obſerves, that there is nothing of greater importance in the conduct of life, than to conſult the rules of prudence; but that very few perſons take this care, even when the queſtion is concerning Marriage, a circumſtance, which above all things is the moſt difficult to determine upon in a prudent manner (5). They engage in it from the impetuoſity of youth; they only conſult the dictates of paſſion or intereſt, &c. and yet it is an affair, in which miſtakes are irreparable. Plerique vigentis adoleſcentiæ annis, continues he (6), cum ineſt maxima conſilii imbecillitas atque imperitia, cæco quodam amoris impetu commoti ac fervore juvenili inflammati, ante implicantur conjugio, quam quod illud vitæ genus ſit judicare potuerunt. Multi formæ venuſtate allecti, plures dotis magnitudine ineſcati, neque pauci ſplendore generis faſcinati, his autoribus & conſuaſoribus agunt omnia. . . . Quos, meo quidem judicio, ſatius erat, cum animis ſuis conſiderantes, illud Publii Syri, Deliberandum eſt diu, quod ſtatuendum eſt ſemel; & hoc item alterum, Deliberare utilia, mora eſt tutiſſima. Diu ſecum multumque deliberare, atque ad naturæ ſuæ rationemque vitæ inſtitutum conſilium conferre omne, præſertim cum in diligendo matrimonio, ſi quid erroris acciderit (accidit autem ſæpiſſimè), non quod aliis in rebus facere in promptu eſt, cum quis forte ſe erraſſe intelligit, rationem & conſiliorum mutationem inſtituere cuiquam ſit integrum; ſed aut ſtultitiæ pœnam luere, aut negligentiæ culpam præſtare oporteat ſempiternam. As it is therefore ſo neceſſary, and at the ſame time ſo rare a thing to engage with prudence in that ſtate, it was thought to be a ſingular ſervice to the Public to reprint Baduel's Book, ſince it contains the beſt Inſtructions in the world, and particularly that Advice of having recourſe by earneſt prayers to the Holy Spirit for its aſſiſtance. The Author of the Preface affirms, that we ought to begin with that, when we are deliberating upon an affair of ſo much delicacy and danger. Qui hanc vitæ conjugalis viam ingreſſuri ſunt, operam ante omnia dabunt, ut Deum ſibi conſiliarium, atque in rei tam arduæ conſultatione atque effectione moderatorem, piâ ac religioſâ nominis divini imploratione aſciſcant . . . . de qua unius & trini Dei, in coeundo conjugio ardenti invocatione diligenter faciendâ, præter complura alia prudentiæ & circumſpectionis & cautionis in hoc vitæ genere conſtituendo, præcepta ſedulò tenenda, piè, ſapienter, & eruditè admodum, in hoc, quem tibi, Lector benevole, de alieno largientes offerimus, libello diſſeritur.

(5) In deliberatione de contrahendo matrimonio, quæ eſt una omnium difficillima. Gregor. Breſmanus, Præfatione ad Lectorem.

(6) Idem, ibid.

This work of Baduel was tranſlated into French by Guy de la Garde (7); but if he ſucceeded no better in the tranſlation of the Book, than in that of the title, it muſt neceſſarily be a mean performance. He intitled his tranſlation, printed at Paris in 1548 in 8vo, A very uſeful Treatiſe of the Dignity of Marriage, and of the honeſt Converſation of Men of Learning and Letters.

(7) A private Lieutenant in the Seneſchal's Juriſdiction in Provence at the ſiege of Arles. See the Bibliotheque de la Croix du Maine, pag. 134, and that of Du Verdier, pag. 532.

BAGNI (JOHN FRANCIS) lived in the 17th Century. He was made a Cardinal by Pope Urban VIII in the year 1629 at the recommendation of the Court of France (a). Moreri ſpeaks of him very fully; but not without ſeveral miſtakes, which it will be proper to remark [A]. This Cardinal had paſſed through more employments than Moreri mentioned, as (a) Under the Miniſtry of Cardinal Richelieu, in the beginning of the year 1630.

[A] Moreri ſpeaks of him. . . . . but has committed ſeveral miſtakes, which it will be proper to remark.] He ſays, I. That Cardinal Bagni was of the family of the Counts of Guidi. This is to intimate that the name of his family was Guidi; but we muſt not ſeparate the name of Guidi from that of Bagni or a Balneo. Naudé never ſeparates them. II. That he was born the 4th of October 1573. This does not agree with an Author, whoſe exactneſs is a thouſand times more certain ſecurity than Moreri (1). This Author places the death of Cardinal Bagni on the 24th of July 1641, and tells us, that he was then ſeventy ſix years of age. So that his birth muſt be placed in 1565. III. That Clement VIII ſent Bagni into France to congratulate Henry the Great upon his marriage with Mary de Medicis. This is not true, Moreri did not underſtand Thomaſini, whom he quoted. He might have read in that Author, that Cardinal Aldobrandini, who was ſent Legate of Clement VIII into France, in order to congratulate Henry IV upon his marriage, and to manage the peace with Savoy, had John Francis Bagni in his retinue. This is all that his pretended deputation conſiſted in. IV. Moreri multiplies more than he ought the Nunciatures of Bagni; he will have it that he was ſent twice Nuncio into France, once under Gregory XV, and another time under Urban VIII; and that beſides this, Gregory XV ſent him Nuncio into Flanders. Thomaſini does not ſay ſo much, and only tells us, that Bagni was ſent to Paris by Gregory XV as Nuncio Extraordinary, and that he went from Paris to Flanders, in the quality of Nuncio in Ordinary. Gaſſendi ſays even leſs than Thomaſini; he tells us, that Bagni, going to receive the character of Nuncio at Bruſſels, paſſed through Paris, and ſaw there incognito all that was to be ſeen. Tranſiit ſub id tempus, (that is in July 1621,) Pariſiis memoratus ſupra Vicelegatus a Balneo, Pontificis Nuncius DESTINATUS in Flandriam, qui cum vellet ſingularia quæque in urbe ſpectare, ſed tamen quaſi INCOGNITUS, commodum profectò convaluit Peireſkius, qui as will appear from our remarks. There is a thing said of him in the Sorberiana, which is false in many respects [B]. He had a brother, who was called the Marquis of BAGNI [C], and was General of the troops of the Pope in the Valteline in the year 1624.

(1) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, tom. 1. p. 119.

(2) Gassend. in vita Peireskii, lib. 3. ad ann. 1621, pag. 289.

qui ipsum variè deducerat ad eruditos, ad Musæa, ad opera omnia rariora (2). I know indeed that he was Nuncio in France, but it was at another time. The same Gassendi, giving an account of the acquaintance which Mr. de Peiresc contracted with illustrious men in the year 1614, writes thus of our John Francis Bagni. Unus fuit Joannes Franciscus Vidius a Balneo, Patracensis Archiepiscopus, & per ea tempora Avenionensis Vicelegatus. Singularis enim deinceps necessitudo intercessit, seu donec ille Avenione degit, seu cum est versatus perillustris Nuncius tam apud Principes Belgarum, quam apud Regem Christianissimum, seu postquam factus est Cardinalis raræ ac spectatæ Virtutis (3). It is very certain that Bagni was twice Nuncio; for Naudé, who was a long time his Domestic and Library-Keeper, writes thus to him in the dedication of his Coups de Etat: "My Lord, as you are now at Rome, enjoying the honours, which are the reward of your merits, and the retirement which you have gained by having discharged the most public offices, in seven Governments, one Vice-Legateship, and two NUNCIATURES, I thought, &c." He was sent Nuncio to Brussels by Gregory XV, and into France by Urban VIII. Thomasini and Moreri are both mistaken; they could not give a clear account of a matter, which was the easiest imaginable to relate. It was while he was Nuncio in France, that he was made Cardinal. Gassendi tells us, that in the spring of the year 1631, he passed through Provence in his return to Rome, and that he went to see his old friend Mr. de Pieresc. Vere novo Cardinalis a Balneo, utrâque sua Legatione functus, & accepto Parisiis purpurato Pileo, Romam rediit (4). He carried with him the learned Gabriel Naudé. He continued at Paris to discharge the functions of a Nuncio for above a year after he was raised to the Cardinalship, and interposed particularly in order to pacify the differences between the Queen-Mother and Cardinal Richelieu (5).

(3) Ibid. p. 281.

(4) Ibid. pag. 307.

(5) See Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, par Aubery, tom. 1. pag. 264 and 279. Dutch edit. in 12mo.

A manuscript memorial of Monsieur Baudrand informs us, I. That he was not made Cardinal at the recommendation of France, though we are assured so in the History of the Ministry of Cardinal de Richelieu; but merely by the Pope, as he was Nuncio of the Holy See; which dignity is very often conferred on the Nuncio's to France, Spain, and the Court of the Emperor: II. That there is an error in these words of Gassendi, which I quoted (6); Accepto Parisiis purpurato Pileo Romam rediit; "The Pope does not send the red Hat to those, whom "he makes Cardinals; but they are obliged to go to "Rome for it; for the Pope sends only the Calot at "first by the Courier, and afterwards the red Cap "by one of his Chamberlains. Thus the Cardinals "Richelieu and Mazarin never had the red Hat, be"cause they were never at Rome after their promo"tion. There has been for a hundred and twenty "years past only the Cardinal Infant, whom the "Pope sent the red Hat to in Spain; and this "was a particular favour, as he was brother to the "King of Spain." All this is very curious; but notwithstanding this Monsieur Baudrand should not have found fault with these words of Gassendi; for they do not mean that the Cardinal received the red Hat, but only that he received the red Cap at Paris. Gassendi uses the word pileo, and not galero. It is said, that Paul V receded from the custom introduced by Sixtus V, in favour of the Duke of Lerma, to whom he sent the Cardinal's Hat and Ring to Madrid in 1618, when that Duke was seventy years old (7). See the 11th chapter of the 15th book of The History of the Council of Trent by Pallavicini.

(6) Above, quotation (4).

(7) Mercure Galant of April 1706, pag. 109.

[B] There is a thing said of him in the Sorberiana, which is false in many respects.] It is pretended, that upon seeing the Councils printed at the Louvre in thirty seven volumes, he cried out, I am surprized that there are any Heretics in France still. Where is there a Christian, who can resolve henceforth not to be a Catholic? Sorbiere admires this thought: Optimè Cardinalis Banius in Galliâ Nuncius, says he, dum 37 vol. Concil. cerneret typis regiis impressa, aiebat, "Miror "unde jam in Galliâ hæretici fiant; quis enim hypo"thesium Christianarum servans potest non esse Catholi"cus (8)?" It is not true, that this Cardinal saw these thirty seven volumes. He died in the year 1641, and that edition of the Councils was in 1644. But if he had said what is imputed to him, he would have made a very false reflection; for there is nothing so improper for the conversion of Heretics, as a work of several volumes, as thirty seven volumes of Councils. Of ten thousand Protestants, scarce two can be found who can read a single page in this Louvre edition; and amongst those who understand Latin, the greatest part have neither the taste nor patience necessary to undertake so immense a reading. This inconvenience would not be removed by a translation of them into the vulgar tongue; for where are the ignorant persons, who would not lose themselves upon such a wide Sea as this? Without the grace of God, and the force of education, the reading of the Councils would make an hundred times more Unbelievers than Christians. There is no History which furnishes more subjects of scandal, nor a more shocking scene of passions, intrigues, factions, Cabals, and Artifices, than that of Councils (9). Those, who published the Menagiana, omitted a good jest, that I heard several times in the Mercuriales of Menage. A man of wit was mentioned there, who, when he was told, Such an one was condemned in such a Council, said, It is a sign that he did not understand how to cabal so well as his adversaries, or that he had not the support of the secular arm as they had. Must not those who know Mr. Sorbiere's religion, be much edified by his Optimè?

WHETHER the Councils in 37 volumes are capable of converting Heretics?

(8) Sorberiana, pag. 52. Dutch edition.

(9) See remark [B] of the article NESTORIUS.

[C] He had a brother who was called the Marquis of Bagni.] Mr. Baillet assures us, that this Marquis was brother to the Cardinal John Francis Bagni; and that having quitted the army, he raised himself in Ecclesiastical Dignities till he was made Cardinal in the year 1657 (10). He had been Nuncio in France during the Pontificate of Innocent X, and the two first years of Alexander VII. . . . . He died at Rome the 23d of August 1663, aged eighty years (11). Mr. Baillet thinks it probable that Monsr. Des Cartes went to see him in the Valteline; he grounds this conjecture upon that Marquis's inclination to the studies of Natural Philosophy (12). That which is very certain is, Des Cartes was well known and esteemed by Cardinal John Francis Bagni (13). The French Mercury informs us, that the Marquis de Bagni, to whom the Holy See had given the command of the soldiers in the Valteline, was known to be a partisan of Spain, being descended from the House of Colonna, which is entirely Spanish, Chief of the Gibelins in Romagna, and which has always been a Pensionary of Spain, having as such attended the Constable of Colonna in his voyage to Spain four years ago (14).

(10) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, tom. 1. pag. 161.

(11) Ibid. pag. 119, 120.

(12) Ibid. pag. 119. See likewise pag. 161.

(13) Ibid. pag. 253, 254, 300, 301, 302.

(14) Mercure François, tom. 10. pag. 179. in the year 1624, quoting the Venetian Gazette.

☞ BAILLET (ADRIAN) was born June the 13th 1649 at Neuville a village four leagues distant from Beauvais in Picardy. His father was not in very good circumstances, having only a small estate, which he cultivated with his own hands, so that he could have no thoughts of raising his son's fortune, or even of giving him a polite and learned education; yet he sent him to a little school in his neighbourhood. But young Baillet was soon tired with the few and trifling things, which they taught him there, and found means to learn a little Latin by visiting every day the Friars of a Convent near the village where he lived [A]. They, finding some marks of genius in him, presented him to the Bishop of Beauvais,

[A] He found means to learn a little Latin by visiting every day the Friars of a Convent.] Father Niceron's account of this particular, is fuller than what we find in Mr. de la Monoye's Life of Mr. Baillet. "There

(a) Where young perſons deſigned for holy Orders are taught Latin and Greek.

Beauvais, who put him into a little Seminary (a), where though he was generally the firſt of his form, yet he did not appear to any great advantage at firſt. However it was not long before his love of books, and his ſtrong inclination for learning appeared even to ſuch a degree, that he ſometimes took money privately from his father in order to buy books. Having gone through his courſe of Latin and Greek, he applied himſelf to Philoſophy, but not with much vigour, having more inclination for Hiſtory, Chronology and Geography, than for Philoſophy; yet he made ſuch a progreſs in this laſt ſcience, that he maintained his publick Theſes with applauſe before the whole city of Beauvais. In 1670 he went into the great Seminary (b), where he ſtudied Divinity with great ſucceſs [B]. In the year 1672 he was appointed by his Biſhop to teach the fifth form in the College of Beauvais, and two years after, the fourth. Whilſt he was engaged in this province, he did not neglect to improve himſelf. His employment procured him about ſixty pounds (c) a year, beſides his board; and as he ſpent little or nothing for his own pleaſure, he employed part of his income to help his poor relations, and the reſt in books, of which he had made a pretty large collection, when he left the College: for he had already written two volumes of obſervations upon ſuch Authors, as had diſguiſed their names, which he had diſcovered. His Diſſertations in Latin and French upon that ſubject, are ſtill extant in manuſcript. He has only publiſhed the Preface of that Work in one volume with the title of Auteurs Déguiſez, that is, "diſguiſed Authors." The whole Work, for which he had obtained a privilege, remained amongſt his Manuſcripts. In the year 1676 he received holy Orders [C], and the Biſhop of Beauvais, who was a ſtrict obſerver of the Canons, and never uſed to give Orders, unleſs a man had a Church or Pariſh to ſerve, preſented him to the Vicarage of Lardieres, a very poor pariſh, which afforded the Vicar only thirty pounds a year; yet Mr. Baillet, who had no eſtate of his own, and had beſides himſelf, a brother of his, and a footboy to maintain, found means to aſſiſt the poor, and had ſtill ſome money left, to go once a year to Paris, to buy books. This ſeems a little ſurpriſing; but his temperate way of living will render it leſs wonderful (d) [D]. The care of his flock

(b) A ſchool for Divinity: moſt of the Biſhops in France have eſtabliſhed ſuch Seminaries for the Clergy of their Dioceſſes.

(c) 600 Livres, which at that time were worth very near 60 l. of our money.

(d) Abregé de la Vie de Mr. Baillet, in the 2d volume of the Jugemens des Savans, edit. d'Amſterd. 1725 pag. 1-17.

(1) Mem. pour Servir à l'Hiſt. des Hom. Illuſtr. tom. 3. pag. 26, 27.

"There is near Neuville, ſays Father Niceron (1), a "Convent named la Garde, which belongs to the "Franciſcan Friars. Thither young Baillet went very "often; in the morning he aſſiſted the Prieſts, when "they ſaid Maſs, and the reſt of the day he employed "in doing all the little ſervices he could to the Sex"ton, or to the other Fathers of the houſe. The Sexton "pleaſed with the officious behaviour of the lad, en"tertained a great affection for him, and taught him "to read and write. Tho' Baillet was then but eight "or nine years old, yet he ſoon diſcovered the great "love, which he ſhewed ever ſince for books: he had no "reliſh for the ordinary diverſions of children; he "loved to be retired, and all the time he could ſpare, "he ſpent in reading or writing. The Superior of "the Convent taking notice of this ſtrong and extra"ordinary inclination in ſo young a lad, and perceiv"ing that in him it was joined with great ſprightli"neſs, a lively genius, and a very happy diſpoſition "for the ſciences, thought it would be very advanta"geous for the Order of St. Francis, if they could en"gage him to take the habit. He therefore aſk'd "him of his father; who was willing enough to give "his ſon to the Franciſcans. But the Curate of his "Pariſh, whom he aſk'd advice of, was not of that "mind; and the deſign of the Superior of the Fran"ciſcans made the Curate take the reſolution of "examining young Baillet; upon which he was "charmed with his wit, and the progreſs he had al"ready made; ſo that he took him into his own "houſe, and having taught him the firſt principles of "the Latin tongue, he placed him in the College of "Beauvais." This is the ſame ſeminary with that (2) Quotation (a). mentioned above (2). The reader will obſerve a ſmall difference between this account and that of Mr. de la Monoye. Mr. de la Monoye adds ſome circumſtances, relating to Baillet's manner of ſtudying, which deſerve to be taken notice of. Having learned by himſelf with the aſſiſtance only of the Grammar for the Latin tongue, written in French by Meſſieurs de Port-Royal, the Rules of Latin or French Poetry, he uſed to turn all his leſſons either into Latin and French verſe; and in this manner he treated every ſubject that pleaſed him, or made any impreſſion upon him. This he called his Comic Farce. He indulged himſelf in that poetical humour, till he entered into the great Seminary to receive holy Orders. He read all the Latin Poets, which he could find among his friends or acquaintance, from whom he borrowed them; as Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Juvenal, Seneca, &c. He was more cautious with regard to the French Poets, reading thoſe only, who are recommended in the Grammar of Port-Royal. As the reading the Poets diverted him, without requiring much application, he ſpent moſt of his time in them, except what he employed in making extracts, and turning into verſe what was read to him out of ſacred or profane Hiſtory. Theſe extracts he called his Juvenilia; and enlarged them ſo much, that they made two large volumes. He was but ſeventeen years old when he made them, in order that he might remember whatever he found remarkable in the Poets, concerning the Theology of the Heathens, their falſe Gods, ſacrifices, temples, public games, and whatever elſe had any relation to them. Theſe Juvenilia were afterwards of great uſe to Mr. de Lamoignon's ſon, and ſerved to direct him in his ſtudies, when Mr. Baillet was made Library-Keeper to his father (3).

(3) La Monoye, Vie de Baillet, pag. 7, 8.

[B] He ſtudied Divinity with great ſucceſs.] He applied himſelf chiefly to that part of Divinity, which is called poſitive, and which conſiſts in the expoſition of what has been taught by the Fathers and the Councils. He loved that ſtudy, becauſe it is connected with Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, in which he had already made a conſiderable progreſs (4). The love of truth, ſays Mr. de la Monoye (5), was the only motive of his ſtudy. Being averſe to trifles, curioſity and vain glory, he ſtudied only to improve himſelf in knowledge and virtue. He was ſo humble that he thought himſelf qualified only for retirement and learning; and reſolved to leave the world, and to live without the impediments and avocations of it. He had a brother, named Stephen, who often viſited him in the College, and conſtantly entertained him with thoſe thoughts of retirement; and they began already to take ſome meaſures in order to go to the Abbey called la Trappe (6), one of the moſt ſtrict and auſtere in all France; but he was prevented by his being choſen by the Biſhop, to teach the fifth form in the College of Beauvais.

(4) Niceron, ubi ſupra, pag. 28.
(5) Ubi ſupra, pag. 11.

(6) An Abbey of the Order of Citeaux, which is a branch of that of the Benedictines; that Abbey is ſituated in the Province of Perch, on the borders of Normandy.

[C] He received holy Orders.] The Biſhop and others who examin'd him, tho' very learned men, found in him not only all the learning neceſſary for a Clergyman, but much more than was uſually met with in perſons of his age. But notwithſtanding his great learning, they were ſo ſtrict, that they would not have admitted him into holy Orders, if they had not diſcovered in him ſuch a degree of humility, as would keep him free from that vanity, which is ſo common amongſt the learned. This is what Mr. de la Monoye tells us (7).

(7) Ubi ſupra, pag. 16.

[D] His temperate way of living will render it leſs wonderful.] After our Baillet's death, his brother Stephen flock did not make him leave his ſtudies; yet the unavoidable avocations, which it occaſioned continually, obliged him to petition his Superiors, in order to be diſcharged from the care of ſouls. His petition was granted, and he was preferred to another living (e), in which he was only obliged to ſing at Church, and to explain the Catechiſms. The reſt of his time he employed in his ſtudy amongſt his books. He did not continue long in that employment; for the next year (viz. 1680) he was made Library-keeper to Mr. de Lamoignon [E], not the firſt Preſident of the Parliament at Paris, as Father Niceron ſays (f), for that Gentleman was then dead; but his ſon, who was then only the Advocate General (g). Mr. Baillet, though troubled with a great pain in his legs, which ſometimes grew very violent, and notwithſtanding the many viſits he received, which continually interrupted his labours, applied himſelf with ſo much diligence to the drawing up of an Index of all the ſubjects treated of in the books in Mr. de Lamoignon's library [F], that he finiſhed it in Auguſt 1682. That Index grew to ſuch a length, by the additions, he continued to make to it, that it contains thirty five volumes (b) in folio, all written by Mr. Baillet himſelf. When he had finiſhed that laborious but uſeful Work, he wrote a Latin Preface to it, which he publiſhed. We find there an account of the manner, in which he drew up that Index. He alſo promiſed in the ſame place, to write an Index or Catalogue of all the Authors, whoſe books were in Mr. de Lamoignon's library. That Preface has been ſeverely cenſured, not only by Mr. Menage (i), but alſo by an anonymous Author *. But theſe cenſures relate only to his ſtyle [G], and not to his obſervations, nor to the manner in which he treats his ſubject. When Mr. Baillet had finiſhed this arduous taſk, he put the laſt hand to the four volumes of his Jugemens des Savans, and gave them to the Bookſeller with ſo much generoſity, and at the ſame time with ſuch a diſtruſt of their ſale, that he was contented to have nothing for them, except a few copies, which he deſigned to make (e) Niceron, Memoires pour Servir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 3. pag. 29.

(f) Ubi ſupra, pag. 29.

(g) Vie de Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 22, 23.

(b) And not 32, as F. Niceron ſays, ubi ſupra, pag. 30.

(i) In his Anti-Baillet, pag. 2. ch. 109. p. m. 382, &c.

* See the remark [N].

Stephen declared, that they uſed to drink nothing but water at his houſe; that they eat brown bread, without any butcher's meat, but only a little bacon, and ſometimes a few herbs out of his garden boiled in water with ſalt, and whitened with a little milk. Thus they lived almoſt in the ſame manner as they do at la Trappe, whither Baillet and his brother had always an inclination to retire, being already inured to the auſterity, which is there practiſed. It happened once on a Sunday, that this Stephen had a mind to make a more delicate meal than uſual. Baillet going to ſay Maſs, ſmelled the ſauce; he was naturally quick and haſty; ſo that in the height of his paſſion he threw the pot down, and ſeverely reprimanded the Cook (8), who never ventured to ſerve him in that manner any more (9).

(8) His own brother Stephen, for he had no other Cook.

(9) Vie de Baillet, pag. 18.

[E] He was made Library-Keeper to Mr. de Lamoignon.] Mr. de Lamoignon, who had been inſtructed by his father how to put a proper value upon learned men, and diſtinguiſh thoſe, who were able to give him good advice, addreſſed himſelf to Mr. Hermant, an eminent Doctor of the Sorbonne, deſiring him to procure him a perſon who might be his Library-Keeper, and at the ſame time aſſiſt him in his office of Advocate-General, upon all the ſubjects, which he had to treat of, and for which he had occaſion to find hints and materials in the books in his Library. I know a perſon, ſaid Mr. Hermant, who will ſuit your purpoſe, if you be not ſhocked at his aukwardneſs. I want a man of learning, anſwered the Advocate, and do not mind the outward appearance. The air of this place and a little diſcretion will ſoon poliſh him. Upon this Mr. Haillant preſſed Mr. Baillet to come and offer his ſervice to Mr. de Lamoignon. Baillet loved Paris, ever ſince he had been in that city to buy books. The Bookſellers were then extremely civil and courteous, which he thought a very great advantage. But when Mr. Hermant made the propoſal to him from Mr. de Lamoignon, he was ſo ſurprized at it, that he fancied his friend had only a mind to try him, or at leaſt, that he had miſtook his meaning. When he knew that he was in earneſt, he found a thouſand new difficulties; his pretended incapacity, his unpromiſing appearance, his aukwardneſs, the offence, which this would give to thoſe, who recommended him, and to the perſon who expected him. Mr. Hermant anſwered, that he would take all upon himſelf, deſiring Mr. Baillet not to put any conſtraint upon himſelf in any thing, but only with regard to the manners of the city, and to behave himſelf diſcreetly towards ſuch perſons, as he ſhould ſee at the Advocate's houſe (11). Thus Mr. Baillet was prevailed upon to accept the place, which was offered to him.

(11) Vie de Baillet, pag. 23, 24.

[F] An Index of all the ſubjects treated of in the books in Mr. de Lamoignon's Library.] Mr. Baillet obſerves in the Latin Preface (12), which he publiſhed concerning this Index, that in moſt of the catalogues of Libraries, we find only the name of the Author, with a very inaccurate account of the ſubject he treats of. He owns that Dr. Hyde's Catalogue of the Bodleian Library does not labour under that defect; but then as he follows the alphabetical order of the Author's names, and not of the ſubjects, which they treat of; this renders his Catalogue in that reſpect very defective. And indeed to make uſe of that Catalogue, we ought to know, not only that there are books upon ſuch or ſuch a ſubject, but alſo the names of the Authors, who wrote thoſe books; otherwiſe we ſhall never be able to find them in the Catalogue, except by chance. This is the reaſon why Mr. Baillet undertook another Index, in which the names of the Authors were placed in an alphabetical order. Thus, if you know the ſubject treated of, but not the name of the Author, you find it in the firſt Index; if you know the Author's name, and not the ſubject, which he wrote upon, you find it in the ſecond Index. The firſt Index, which Mr. Baillet made, was ſo much eſteemed by all the learned, that ſeveral Prelates and Magiſtrates, who had ſeen in it Mr. de Lamoignon's Library, deſired to have a copy of it; and others an exact abſtract. In that Index were found in a very good order all the ſubjects treated of in the books of the Library, with references to the places, where theſe ſubjects were handled. This was a great conveniency for the Advocate-General, who by means of that Index, found immediately what he wanted upon any ſubject whatſoever. This was an advantage ſo much the more conſiderable, as there was almoſt nothing wanting in his Library of all that had been written upon the Law either ancient or modern, or upon the Decrees of the Courts of Judicature. And Mr. Baillet had taken a particular delight, and the utmoſt care to range thoſe ſubjects in the beſt order poſſible. This part of the Catalogue, which made it ſo uſeful, gained the Author the applauſe, not only of his patron, but of all thoſe, who came to conſult that Index. The order, in which he placed the ſubjects relating to Religion and the Church, has likewiſe given equal ſatisfaction. Several learned men have ſo much applauded this work of Baillet, that the Bookſellers have often deſired him to have it printed (13).

(12) Jugem. des Savans, ed. de 1726, Amſterd. tom. 2. p. 143.

(13) Vie de Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 28, 29.

[G] Thoſe cenſures relate only to his ſtyle.] The Author of the four Letters, which contain critical reflections upon Mr. Baillet's Jugemens des Savans (14), cenſures the following paſſage in his Latin Preface. Alterum, quod tu jam pridem in votis habebas, ut ne in illud vitium aut incommodum concurreretur, quo laborant omnes

(14) Jugem. des Sav. Amſt. ed. 1725, tom. 15. pag. 334, &c.

make a preſent of to his friends. The Bookſeller had not ſo ill an opinion of the Work; he haſtened the publication of it as much as he could, and printed a vaſt number, which he ſold in ſo ſhort a ſpace, that he ſcarce gave the Author time to recollect himſelf, in order to finiſh the five volumes that were to follow. The Author had written a particular account of his deſign [H], but he did not care to print it, fearing leſt his firſt eſſay ſhould not meet with a good reception from the publick; ſo that the four volumes were printed without it, in 1685, with this title, Jugemens des Savans ſur les principaux Ouvrages des Auteurs (k): That is, "The Judgment of the Learned concerning the principal Works of Authors," printed at Paris in four volumes 12*mo*. As ſoon as this book was publiſhed in France, Mr. Bayle ſpoke of it (l) in this manner. "We expect very ſoon a curious book entitled, "Jugemens des Savans &c. If we conſider, that Mr. Baillet, who gives us this Work, "is Librarian to the Advocate General Mr. de Lamoignon, who inherits the virtue and "learning of the celebrated firſt Preſident de Lamoignon (that very name is an elogium) "we ſhall infer from thence a very good omen, eſpecially if we remember thoſe learned "conferences, in which the greateſt wits of Paris, guided by the wiſdom and taſte of "the late firſt Preſident de Lamoignon, could ſo well diſtinguiſh the merit of every thing, "and pointed out with ſo much learning the niceſt and moſt delicate ſubjects in polite literature." Some time after Mr. Bayle gave a very favourable account of Mr. Baillet's Work [I]. But notwithſtanding the great uſefulneſs of that compilation, and though the Author

(k) Vie de Baillet, ubi ſupra, p. 29, 30.

(l) Rep. des Lett. 1685. Sept. p. 1026.

nes ferè quotquot hactenus Bibliothecarum contexti ſunt Catalogi, qui ſolam ac rudem voluminum frontem & antipagmentum vix enunciantes, incoctam ac indigeſtam rerum, quæ in iis jacent, molem nihil fere juvant (15). "Is not this, ſays the Author of the Reflections, very "bad Latin, and the moſt exquiſite nonſenſe, that "ever was writ? In what Author of note has Baillet "found, concurritur in vitium, inſtead of currere, in-"currere in vitium? And what does he mean by theſe "words, Catalogi, qui vix enunciantes frontem ſolam "ac rudem, & Antipagmentum voluminum, nihil fere "juvant molem incoctam, & indigeſtam rerum, quæ in "iis jacent? I deſire Baillet to give us a tranſlation "of this paſſage, which ſhall be faithful, intelligible "and reaſonable." There are ſome other paſſages in the ſame Preface which are deſervedly criticiſed upon; but we are obliged in juſtice to Mr. Baillet, to obſerve that theſe paſſages are but few; and that his Preface, tho' not written in a very Ciceronian ſtyle, is yet for the moſt part plain and intelligible, and full of excellent obſervations relating to the manner of drawing up the Catalogue of a Library; and Mr. Menage's criticiſms (16) are for the moſt part mere cavils; as for inſtance when he aſſerts, that the following phraſe is a mere Galliciſm. Priorem indicem, qui de rebus ſive argumentis agit, menſium novem ſpatio confeceram. Mr. de la Monoye very well obſerves (17), that Mr. Menage ought to have pointed out that Galliciſm. He thought perhaps it was in the word res; but as it is here oppoſed to perſons, or to the names of Authors, it may very well paſs, ſince it has been employed in that ſenſe by very good Latin Writers. We may add here what Mr. Bayle ſays, of the Index, which Mr. Baillet had made. "One may eaſily "judge, ſays he (18), by this Preface, that Mr. Baillet has drawn up that Catalogue in a very well contrived method."

(15) Ibid. tom. 2. pag. 143.

(16) Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. Part 2. ch. 109. p. m. 382.

(17) Ibid. not. 2.

(18) Repub. des Lett. 1685, Decemb. p. 1376.

[H] The Author had written a particular account of his deſign.] That account is printed in the ſecond volume of the Amſterdam edition of his Jugemens des Savans. And that the reader may know how great an undertaking Mr. Baillet had engaged himſelf in, we ſhall give here an abſtract of his Plan. He began firſt with ſome obſervations upon the manner of judging of books, and the good and bad qualities of thoſe, who paſs their judgment upon them. He then treated of men's prepoſſeſſions concerning Authors and Books. Theſe were only the preliminaries of his work, which was to be divided into ſix parts. I. In the firſt he was to treat of thoſe Printers, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their learning, ability, accuracy and fidelity. Of Critics, that is, of thoſe who acquaint us with Authors, and their Books, and in general thoſe, who give us an account of the ſtate of Literature, and of all that belongs to the Republic of Letters. Of Philologiſts, and all thoſe, who treat of polite Literature. Of Grammarians and Tranſlators of all kinds. II. The ſecond part was deſigned for the Poets ancient and modern; for writers of Romances and Tales in proſe; for Rhetoricians, Orators, and Writers of Letters, either in Latin, or in any of the modern languages whatſoever. III. In the third part he was to ſpeak of the Hiſtorians, Geographers, and Chronologiſts of all ſorts, IV. The Philoſophers, Phyſicians, and Mathematicians, were to be the ſubject of the fourth part. V. The fifth was to contain the Authors, who wrote upon the Civil and Canon Law, upon Politics, and upon Ethics. VI. In the ſixth and laſt part, he was to ſpeak of the Writers on Divinity; as particularly thoſe, who wrote upon the Scripture, the Fathers, School-Divinity, upon Heretics of all kinds &c. All theſe different articles are divided into ſeveral branches, which are again ſubdivided into others, and that ſometimes more than one. The reader will eaſily judge, that this was too great a Plan for a ſingle man to execute; it required an extenſive learning, and almoſt an infinite reading. Mr. Baillet himſelf was ſenſible of it, and ſaid (19), that tho' he had his whole deſign in view, yet he was almoſt determined to drop it; which he actually did; for of the ſix parts, of which his work was to conſiſt, he publiſhed only the firſt, and half the ſecond. We ſhall give in the following remark a farther account of that work; but we may obſerve here, that Mr. Baillet ſeemed impartial enough with regard to the Proteſtants. "I hope, ſays he (20), "that thoſe of the other communion, (meaning the "Reformed) will do me the favour to think, that I "never had any deſign to diſoblige them, much leſs "to inſult them, when I have ſaid any thing againſt "ſome of their Miniſters. This is the reaſon why I "almoſt every where uſe the word Proteſtants, even "when I ſpeak of the Huguenots of France, and of "the other Calviniſts of the Low-Countries, or of "England, tho' the name of Proteſtants belong more "properly to thoſe of Germany. But I know that "the others are not offended, when they are called by "that name."

(19) Jugem. des Sav. tom. 2. pag. 139.

(20) Ibid. tom. 1. Avertiſſement, § 12. pag. xli.

[I] Mr. Bayle gave a very favourable account of Mr. Baillet's work.] "This book, ſaid he (21), is "not only very proper to ſatisfy the curioſity of Men "of Letters, but it will alſo be very uſeful to them, "becauſe they will find here the good and ill, that "has been ſaid of the books, they intend to read. I "own, that many perſons would reap a greater advantage from it, if they found every where a peremptory judgment upon the different opinions, "which have been held concerning Authors; but it "muſt not be expected that a private man, if he has "good ſenſe, will take it upon him to paſs ſuch a "judgment. It would be expoſing one's ſelf too much, "and uſurping an authority which would ſoon be ſhaken "off, and would not ſucceed at Rome, even with regard "to a Council of Trent. Mr. Baillet ſays ſomething "very reaſonable with great modeſty upon this ſubject "in his Preface to the Reader; where he gives us an "account of his conduct in that reſpect, as well as "with regard to ſome other points. Yet he does not "leave us entirely undetermined with regard to the "judgment, which we are to paſs upon the Authors "he mentions; for he ſometimes points out to us "what opinion we are to chooſe, either by his own "reflections, or by the manner in which he relates

(21) Rep. des Lett. 1685. Dec. pag. 1366, &c.

Author ſeldom ſpoke his own opinion, relating only the judgment of others, yet it made a great deal of noiſe in the world. It was not free from errors [K], as may eaſily be imagined; but it was not this that moſt exaſperated the Critics, it was the liberty which the Author had taken of relating not only what was favourable to the authors, whom he mentions, but alſo what had been cenſured in them. This, eſpecially with regard to authors ſtill living, raiſed the indignation of ſeveral perſons, who could not bear to ſee a great many writers, for whom they had a great eſteem, thus blamed and cenſured: ſo that their friends, and particularly thoſe of Mr. Menage, of whom Mr. Baillet had ſpoken in a manner which bordered upon ridicule (m), made a great clamour; the Poets exerted their (m) See particularly Jugem. des Sav. tom. 5. pag. 230, 231.

" and places the judgment of others. It his certain " that his book will undeceive thoſe, who think, " that the Republic of Letters groans in France un- " der a grievous ſlavery, oppreſſa gravi ſub religione, " and that the Gentlemen of the Clergy both ſecular " and regular, whom they look upon as the profeſ- " ſed enemies of the liberty of the ſciences, have at " laſt oppreſſed it under the heavy weight of their " deſpotic authority. They, who think ſo, are miſ- " taken; things are not yet reduced to that extremity " in France; and this book, printed with a privilege, " ſhews ſuch remains of the ancient liberty, that we " may infer from thence a good omen for the time to " come." It would be too long to tranſcribe here Mr. Bayle's whole account of this work, our deſign is only to let the reader know what opinion he had of it, for which reaſon we ſhall tranſcribe but two paſſages more. " The preliminary diſcourſe, ſays Mr. " Bayle (21), contains a thouſand very good obſerva- " tions, and ſome very remarkable facts. The ge- " neral ſcope of the Author is to teach us how to " judge well of the books we read." And when Mr. Bayle ſpeaks of the three volumes, which contain the judgment of the Learned upon the Critics, Printers, Grammarians, and Tranſlators, he ſays (22), that " we find here a large collection of a thouſand things " very curious, and neceſſary for thoſe, who have a " mind to be thoroughly acquainted with Authors, " and their writings. It abounds with a great num- " ber of particulars, ſome of which relate to Authors " ſtill living, and which will be ſoon tranſcribed in " other books by means of quotations, to which it is " well known, that our Northern Writers are not yet " very averſe."

(21) Ibid. pag. 1367, 1368.

(22) Ibid. pag. 1376.

[K] It was not free from errors.] Let us hear Mr. de la Monoye's opinion concerning this work. " It " is true, ſays he (23), that Mr. Baillet's deſign of " collecting the judgments of the Learned upon all " ſorts of Authors, was very well contrived. He " was in the right to think, that nothing could be " more uſeful nor more agreeable to the lovers of " Literature, than to be thus acquainted with what " has been judged concerning the moſt famous books. " He knew that if the number of Authors is very " large, thoſe who judge of them are almoſt infinite, " ſince there are as many judges as there are readers. " He was not ignorant how much thoſe, who with " a very little ſkill in Literature pretend to cenſure " both the ancient and the modern, had been ridicul- " ed by Perſius among the Latins, by Caperal amongſt " the Italians, and by Regnier and Boileau amongſt " the French. To teach therefore theſe proud Critics " how to diſtruſt their own taſte, he firſt treated tho- " roughly of thoſe prejudices, againſt which we are " to be upon our guard, when we read any book " whatſoever; and as he would not expoſe himſelf to " the reproach of vanity and conceit, he preferred " the deciſions of others to his own. He thought that " the ſafeſt way to acquire a thorough knowledge of " Authors was to examine their own judgment. With " this view he propoſed to collect their teſtimonies " concerning thoſe Writers, who have acquired ſome " reputation by their Works either upon the Sciences " in general, or upon the liberal Arts. This was, no " doubt, a very great undertaking; and to render it " more acceptable to the generality of his readers, he " did not think fit to begin with his collections upon " the Lawyers, Phyſicians, or Mathematicians, but " choſe to ſet out with that part of his deſign, which " ſeems beſt ſuited to the majority of the publick. " After he had given a ſufficient account of the moſt " eminent Printers, he added to it ſeveral volumes " concerning the Critics, Grammarians, Tranſlators, " and Poets. No ſuch work had ever been ſeen be- " fore in the Kingdom (24); it was a kind of Mo- " ſaic-work, compoſed of different pieces, cut out by " ſeveral hands, and artfully diſpoſed by him. Co- " lomies, who might be thought to have given him " the hint in his France Orientale, had not put his ab- " ſtracts together with the ſame ſkill; he had ſpread " them through his work without any order or con- " nection, leaving them in French or in Latin, in " ſhort, rough and unpoliſhed, ſuch as he found " them, if I may ſo ſay, in the mine, whence he had " drawn them. Mr. Baillet has not done the ſame; " he has given his work more regularity and a " more noble air. He makes all the Authors he " quotes, ſpeak French, and to avoid an ungraceful " mixture of Greek, Latin, Italian, and Spaniſh quo- " tations, he choſe to expoſe himſelf to all the incon- " veniences and difficulties which attend a tranſlation, " either when ſomething material is left out, or added " to the original, or when in any ways the true ſenſe " of it is altered by an erroneous tranſlation. It is " very difficult for a Tranſlator in a voluminous work " always to avoid theſe faults; and as Mr. Baillet has " ſometimes been guilty of them, it was ſo much the " more neceſſary to correct them, as an unwary " reader might be in danger of being miſled by his " authority. Pope-Blount, Morhof, and the Conti- " nuators of Moreri have already too much copied " the errors of Mr. Baillet; and it were to be feared " that they would thus be propagated to poſterity, if " care was not taken to prevent it. Among theſe er- " rors ſome are very ancient, and have been in books " long ago, ſo that they belong to Mr. Baillet only " by way of adoption, becauſe he has tranſcribed " them. Others he has committed himſelf, and muſt " be accountable for them. . . . It appears that origi- " nally his deſign in collecting the judgments of o- " thers was not to give his own opinion. This law " he preſcribed to himſelf, and for want of having " kept cloſe to it, he has been engaged in a great " many diſputes, the iſſue of which has not been very " much to his advantage; which ſhews that his work, " in order to become uſeful, wanted to be exactly re- " viſed. This, adds Mr. de la Monoye, I have done, " and without meddling with the text, the order, or " number of chapters and articles, I have confined " myſelf to point out, in notes printed under the text, " the errors which Mr. Baillet had committed, in " names, in chronology, or with regard to the paſſa- " ges he quotes, or the facts he relates. I have alſo ad- " ded ſome remarks, to explain ſuch paſſages in his " book, as I thought wanted to be cleared up. . . . . " I have alſo defended him againſt his adverſaries, " when their criticiſms ſeemed to me to be ill-ground- " ed. One of the moſt impertinent cavils of Mr. " Baillet's adverſaries, was that of thoſe, who pre- " tended that his book was entirely uſeleſs, becauſe " upon the ſame Author he relates opinions very often " oppoſite to one another, and which deſtroy one an- " other. But the Critics, who object this, ſhould " have obſerved, that ſince Mr. Baillet had intitled " his book, The Judgments of the Learned, and not " An Examination of thoſe Judgments, he was only " obliged to relate them faithfully, without being " bound to correct them, or to make them agree with " one another. Beſides, who is there that does not " know what a vaſt difference there is between the " taſte of ſeveral men? And do we not acknowledge " every day, that the Learned, who have paſſed dif- " ferent judgments upon the ſame Writers, have " ſometimes all of them been in the right. For con- " ſidering the faults which are found in every work, " the beſt, after all, is, generally ſpeaking, but the " leaſt imperfect (25)."

(23) Preface to the new edit. of Baillet's Jug. des Sav. in tom. 1. pag. viii, &c.

(24) Of France.

(25) Ibid. p. xv.

their wits againſt him, and Father Commire in particular wrote a ſhort poem in Latin, in defence of Mr. Menage, to whom he addreſſed it. It was intitled, Aſinus in Parnaſſo [L], that is, "The Aſs upon Mount Parnaſſus." Notwithſtanding the railleries of the Poets, and the more grave cenſures of other learned men, Mr. Baillet's Work ſold ſo well, that the Bookſeller preſſed very hard upon him to publiſh the following volumes; ſo that he employed all his time to finiſh them, and in the year 1686, came out his five volumes upon the Poets. The Author prefixed to it a kind of Preface (n), in which he owns and corrects ſome miſtakes he had committed, anſwers his adverſaries, and defends himſelf. The account we ſhall give of this piece, after Mr. Bayle, will give the reader a true notion of it, and of what had been objected againſt Mr. Baillet [M]. Soon after the judgments

(n) It is intitled, Diſcours pour Servir d'Eclairciſſement, à quelques endroits, qui ont pû arrêter quelques perſonnes dans les premiers Volumes de cet ouvrage, & de Preface au Recueil ſuivant des Poëtes.

[L] Aſinus in Parnaſſo.] We have enquired after that Poem, in order to give ſome account of it here, but have not been able to find it, ſo that we muſt content ourſelves with tranſcribing here only a paſſage, which will give the reader a notion of M. Commire's Latin Poetry. He addreſſes himſelf to Mr. Menage, and tells him, that being aſleep, he dreamt that he was upon one of the heaths of Mount Parnaſſus, where the moſt famous Greek, Latin, and French Poets were preſent, and that they all with one accord gave Mr. Menage the firſt place after Apollo.

In alto ſedere Parnaſſi jugo
Videbar. Aderant ingenii & ſcientiæ
Quos laude claros fama ſuper aſtra extulit,
Græcique, Romanique; & utriuſque æmulos
Quos litterarum Gallia eduxit parens:
Omnes decorum floribus vincti caput.
His miſtus aderas tu quoque, & Phœbo locum
Tibi omnis ultro proximum dederat Chorus (26).

(26) Anti-Baillet, pag. 1. § 29. p. m. 85.

This piece conſiſts of above ſixty lines (27).

(27) Bayle, Rep. des Lett. 1686. Dec. pag. 1436.

The ſame Father wrote alſo two other pieces againſt Mr. Baillet, the one intitled Aſinus ad Lyram, i. e. "The Aſs playing upon the Harp;" the other Aſinus Judex, i. e. "The Aſs Judge." This laſt piece not being very long, we preſume the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find it here. It is as follows:

Mellis artifices, vagæ volucres,
Queis Phœbi per amæna fas vireta,
Hortoſque Aonidum volare pictos;
Cur ceſſatis, Apes? Ad arma, ad arma:
Arcas hoſtis adeſt. Aſellus ille
Portitor Satyri ebrius protervi,
Quem facto agmine nuper expuliſtis,
In Cyrrham redit ultor, atque tanto
Pares dedecori vires minatur.
Auditis fremitus feros rudentis?
Ut pede, ô ſcelus! atterit petulco
Inſcriptos foliis ſuperba Regum
Flores nomina, lividoque dente
Dis ipſis petit arbores amatas.
Et jam cerea diſſipare caſtra,
Veſtros perdere jam parat labores.
Illoque ore ſuo vepreta, & hircos
Sueto rodere carduos, Olympi
Miſſum munere Nectar inquinabit!
Et ceſſatis adhuc? Adeſte, adeſte.
Tela ſtringite quotquot eſtis omnes.
Nares, labra, oculos, & hinc, & illinc
Ferite; ſtimuloſque calcitranti
Alte figite; duplicate plagas.
Ut durâ cute ſit, tamen
Ictus ſentiet intimis adactos:
Capiſtro & cupiet, molæque reddi (28).

(28) Anti-Baillet, ubi ſupra. pag. 89. § 30.

Another Poet wrote Aſinus Pictor, i. e. "The Aſs "turned Painter." Theſe four Poems gave occaſion to the following epigram, in which Grammarians are adviſed not to offend the Poets any more, as Mr. Baillet had done.

Grammaticum de plebe unus, ludique Magiſter,
Expers judicii, Doctrinæ BAJULUS expers,
Vateſque, & Vatum ſanctos carpebat amores,
Non tulit Vatum princeps COMMIRIUS. Ipſum
Carmine ſublimi, victuro carmine in ævum,
Ilicet in ſtolidum vindex mutavit Aſcellum.
Et nunc ecce vocat Lutetia tota rudentem;
Contemptorem illum Vatum, Vatum illum inimicum.
Diſcite, Grammatici, doctos non temnere Vates (29).

(29) Ibid. § 29. pag. 86, 87.

Mr. Bayle ſpeaking of the Aſinus in Parnaſſo, ſays (30), "It has been thought, that the Aſinus in Par-
"naſſo, ad Clar. V. Ægidium Menagium, was ano"ther Satyr againſt the ſame Author (Boileau); but "we have heard ſince, that it is againſt Mr. Baillet,
"and that the Jeſuit Commire, an eminent Latin
"Poet, wrote that piece. Mr. Amelot has openly de"clared himſelf in favour of Mr. Baillet, in his Pre"face to his Morale de Tacite. He is a man of merit,
"ſays he, and very learned, notwithſtanding all the "poetical ſentences that have been given to baniſh him
"from Parnaſſus. It is ſaid, adds Mr. Bayle, that "the following part of the Jugemens des Savans,
"which concerns the Poets, is Printing. Mr. Baillet
"will in all probability reply there to the Poet, who "has attack'd him, and will be ſo honeſt and ſincere,
"as not to deny him the glory of writing very good
"verſes."

(30) Rep. des Lett. 1686, Juin. pag. 709.

(37) Ibi

[M] An account . . . which will give the reader a true notion of this piece, and of what has been objected againſt Mr. Baillet.] "This is, ſays Mr. Bayle (31)
"ſpeaking of the Jugemens ſur les Poetes (the Judgment
"upon the Poets), the continuation of the work, of "which I ſpoke a year ago, and of which I ſaid,
"that it contained ſome remains of the ancient liber"ty, and was proper to undeceive thoſe who think
"&c. (32). The great noiſe, which theſe remains of "liberty have made, do clearly prove, that it is im-
"poſſible for an Author to pleaſe every body. People "have complained, that Mr. Baillet often relates ſome "things, which are not favourable to the learned
"men, whom he mentions, and every day I am "blamed for not ſpeaking ill of the books, of which "I give an account. This is the way of the world.
"Men will find fault with every thing; and con"demning both extremes, they will not ſuffer us to "keep a juſt medium between them. . . . Yet if Mr.
"Baillet will conform to the majority of votes, he "will not alter his method. He makes a very cu"rious and agreeable apology for it in the explanation,
"which he has prefixed to this work. This was ne-
"ceſſary after the great clamour of his adverſaries,
"ſome of whom are men of great merit, and diſ-
"ſtinguiſhed reputation. An Author ought in reaſon
"to give an account of his conduct, and to ſet right
"thoſe, who have miſunderſtood him. This he owes "to himſelf and to the public. It cannot be doubted,
"but that ſome of thoſe, who have exclaimed againſt
"him, did not take notice, that Mr. Baillet never in"tended to warrant the truth and exactneſs of the opi"nions and judgments which he relates. It was "therefore neceſſary, that he ſhould again ſet this "particular in a true light, and with this he begins
"his Apology; he even ſays (33), that he endeavoured
"in ſeveral places to make the reader obſerve, that the o- "pinions of the Judges whom he mentions were ſo far from "being irrevocable ſentences, that they are often nothing "more than a proof of their own ignorance, or ill na- "ture, and contribute more to the glory and reputation
"of thoſe, whom they cenſure, than if they had com-
"mended them. He adds (34), that it is impoſſible for
"a man, who is in the leaſt acquainted with books, not
"to know how little credit criticks have always had with
"the public, when the queſtion has been either to eſta-
"bliſh or to ruin the reputation of an Author. I ſpeak
"even of the beſt criticks, of thoſe who have the greateſt
"authority amongſt the learned. He quotes ſeveral in-"ſtances of this from antiquity, and ſays (35), that "it is not eaſy to point out one ſingle Author, whoſe
"good or bad reputation could depend upon the judgment,
"which an Eraſmus, a Scaliger, a Lipſius, a Salma-
"ſius, or any other Critic might paſs upon him. Mr.
"Baillet

(31) Ibid. Sept. 1686. pag. 1430, &c.

(32) See above, Rem. [I].

(38) I

(33) Jugem. des Savans, tom. 6. pag. 2.

(34) Ibid. p. 3.

(35) Ibid. pag. 4.

ments of the Learned upon the Poets were printed, Mr. Menage publiſhed his Anti-Baillet, in which he pretends to correct a great many errors, which Mr. Baillet had committed. Another Author publiſhed four Letters [N], in which the ſtyle and manner of writing of Mr. Baillet are ſeverely cenſured. It muſt be owned, that ſeveral of theſe cenſures are very well grounded. But there are ſome that are mere cavils, and even the Author, who cenſures him, is ſometimes guilty himſelf of falſe reaſoning, as we ſhall ſhew with

" Baillet examines afterwards a point of greater deli" cacy; ſome perſons have found fault with him, for " having related the favourable and unfavourable
" judgments, which have been paſſed upon Authors
" ſtill living. If he had collected only their elogiums, he " would have been the man according to their own
" heart; he would have entirely fulfilled their deſire.
" But this mixture of good and ill has ſpoiled all.
(36) Ibid. p. 5. " To this he anſwers (36) among other things, that " the Authors, who are ſtill alive, may make uſe of
" the judgment which is paſſed upon their works;
" they may confute thoſe who cenſure them; or at
" leaſt it will give them a fair opportunity of ſhew-
" ing the greatneſs of their mind by being equally
" unconcerned, whether they are prais'd or cenſured. . .
" Some Authors have given Mr. Baillet to underſtand, " that they wanted their reputation, in order to write (37) Ibid. p. 10. " with ſucceſs (37), and that if their works were cen-
" ſured, they would not publiſh any more the labours
" of their brains. To this he anſwers, 1. That in " what manner ſoever an Author is criticiſed, it can
" be prejudicial only to an ill grounded and unjuſt re- " putation; but it will be wonderfully uſeful to confirm
" ſuch a reputation, as is eſtabliſhed upon a ſolid foun- " dation. 2. That an honeſt man ought not to pro-
" poſe to himſelf his reputation as the chief end of his " labours. 3. That if an Author thinks his reputa" tion is neceſſary to prompt him, he ought alſo to " know, that his readers want to employ their time
" in an uſeful manner, and to improve their genius,
" and that he ought not to trifle with either in order
" to acquire that fantaſtic reputation. That if an au" thor be not diſintereſted enough, not to require praiſes,
" he muſt ſuffer others to examine whether he deſerves
" what he requires. With regard to that dreadful threat-
" ning not to write any more, nor to reſiſt the encroach-
" ments of the ancient darkneſs, Mr. Baillet anſwers
" it in a manner which approaches near to ridicule (38) Ibid. p. 12. " (38); he thinks the threatning too dreadful to be " effectual, and that theſe Gentlemen would have " been very much puzzled, if they had been ſolemnly
" challenged to put it in execution. But, adds he,
" tho' they ſhould be determined to this fatal extre" mity, the danger of ſeeing the world without books
" is not much to be feared, ſince it is very probable,
" that there will always be more writers than men of " ſenſe. He applies to this purpoſe a thought of St.
" Auguſtin. Thoſe, who obſerved that he very ear-
" neſtly exhorted every body to continency, thought
" themſelves obliged to repreſent to him the inconve-
" niencies which might follow from thence, and that
" if all men would keep their virginity, mankind
" muſt ſoon periſh entirely. St. Auguſtin laughed
" at them, becauſe he knew very well, that his exhor" tations would never be generally practiſed, and that " there would always be perſons enough of both ſexes,
" who would not for the world renounce their ſhare
" of the pleaſure of matrimony. Whatever may be " ſaid in favour of continency, it does not prevent " child-bearing; it may in like manner be affirmed,
" that whatever is ſaid or done againſt Authors, it
" will never hinder them from producing book after " book. Superfetation is infinitely more frequent a" mongſt them, than amongſt women; for how often
" do they enter upon a new deſign, before they have " finiſh'd that, which they have begun? So that we " are not to be frightened by their threatenings. It " is true, that when they find that their books are
" cenſured, they form the ſame project which Apollo
" did, when his ſon Phaeton had been killed by a " thunder-bolt: I mean, that they take a reſolution
" not to communicate their light any more to the " world. But this is not laſting; they ſoon recover
" from their paſſion, and, as Mr. Baillet obſerves,
" they would be ſadly puzzled, if they were taken
" at their word. They would chuſe rather to be treat" ed, as Apollo was, who was humbly deſired not to " leave the world in the dark,

" ——— Neve velit tenebras inducere rebus
" Supplice voce rogant.

" They would even be glad if theſe prayers were " attended with an expreſs command, and with
" threatnings, as it was done with regard to Apollo,

" ——— Precibuſque minas regaliter addit.

" Mr. Baillet makes afterwards ſome reflections upon
" the ſatyrical verſes that had been wrote againſt him,
" and particularly upon thoſe of Father Commire.
" He then examines what has been objected to him in " the Journal des Savans of Nov. the 12th, 1685, and " chiefly juſtifies himſelf in regard to the imprudence
" which ſome perſons accuſed him of, concerning the " Jeſuits. It had been pretended, that he ought to have " talked in a manner more ſuitable to the diſtance,
" which there is between a private man, as he is, and
" ſo large a body, a ſociety ſo conſiderable and ſo
" powerful both in Church and State (39). They, (39) Ibid. p. 27.
" who talk after this manner, may as well be the ene" mies as the friends of the Jeſuits; for if it be natu" ral for the friends of a powerful body to alledge
" immediately its credit, and that a man muſt be very
" bold, if he does not ſhew them the utmoſt com-
" plaiſance; it is not leſs natural for the enemies of " ſuch a body, to endeavour to render it odious by " the ſame means. For it is certain, that one can " hardly traduce a religious ſociety in a more malici-
" ous manner, than by affecting to ſpread abroad,
" that a man has every thing to fear, if he has been
" ſo imprudent, as to offend ſuch a Society. Since
" therefore the objection, which Mr. Baillet examines,
" may come from the enemies, as well as from the " friends of the Jeſuits, one cannot infer from thence,
" that the Jeſuits have any ſhare in this objection, or
" that they much regard what Mr. Baillet has ſaid of " them. When a certain Author, diſguiſed under the " name of Cleanthe, publiſhed his Critical Obſervati-
" ons upon Father Bouhours's Dialogues, it was ſaid,
" that he had been ill adviſed, and had not gone into
" the way to preferment. He anſwered, that ſuch a
" diſcourſe, and ſuch inſinuations were injurious to the " King, and that the Jeſuits themſelves could not bear
" them. However Mr. Baillet, being willing to play
" a ſure game, and ſeeing on the other hand that he " was falſly accuſed, did not think fit to keep ſilence.
" He unfolds carefully what he has ſaid in favour of " the Jeſuits, and explains the obſervations he has re" lated concerning the Fathers Sirmond, Petavius,
" and Bouhours. What he ſays upon theſe ſubjects
" is very ſenſible and curious: nor does he forget to
" cloſe his defence by anſwering what had been object-
" ed to him with regard to the Gentlemen of Port-
" Royal, whom they accuſed him with having praiſ-
" ed too much. The paſſage where he ſpeaks of Mr.
" Menage, is very artfully written. He highly ex" tols the learning, wit, politeneſs and virtue of that " great man; but at the ſame time criticiſes him up-
" on ſeveral accounts, and ſometimes renews his cen-
" ſures in his Preface."

[N] Another Author publiſhed four Letters &c.] They are intitled, Reflexions ſur les Jugemens des Savans, envoyées à l'Auteur par un Academicien. That is, "Re" flections upon the Judgments of the Learned ſent to
" the Author by a Member of the French Academy."
They were printed in the year 1691, not at the Hague, as was put in the title-page, but ſecretly in France. Father Niceron ſays (40), that Father le Tellier a Jeſuit was the Author of them; and Mr. Bayle ſays (41), (40) Hommes Illuſtr. tom. 10. Part 2. pag. 127.
" It is eaſily found that they come from the Jeſuits, (41) Let. CXI. pag. 423.
" who were exaſperated againſt Mr. Baillet, becauſe
" he

with regard to what Mr. Baillet ſays of Giovanno Della Caſa [O], Archbiſhop of Benevento, and the reputed author of a poem De Laudibus Sodomiæ, ſive Pæderaſtiæ. In the year 1688 Mr. Baillet publiſhed his book entitled, Les Enfans devenus celebres par leurs Etudes & par leurs Ecrits: That is, "Of Children, who are become famous by their "Study, and their Writings." Mr. Baillet was ſorry to ſee a great many perſons of Quality, prepoſſeſſed with this notion, that ſtudy is hurtful to the health and wit of children. He knew ſeveral, who were of the ſame age and quality with young Mr. de Lamoignon, his pupil, and who by their parents indulgence grew up in ſloth and indolence, for fear of impairing their health. This obliged him to ſhew by ſeveral inſtances both ancient and modern, that children may be in a very good ſtate of health, though they apply themſelves to the Sciences (o). He deſigned this book at firſt only as a Dedication, which was to be prefixed to a larger Work; but this growing under his pen, he reſolved at laſt to publiſh it by itſelf (p), and addreſſed it to his pupil, for whoſe inſtruction and emulation it was chiefly written. This Work was very well received by the Publick, the Profeſſors of the Univerſities adviſed their ſcholars to purchaſe it, and made them read ſuch paſſages of it, as ſeemed moſt proper to excite their emulation. When Mr. Menage's Anti-Baillet was publiſhed, the two firſt words ſurpriſed our Author. The word Anti being joined to that of Baillet gave him the notion of a perſonal ſatyr, which attacks not the works of a man, but his very perſon. This gave him the hint to write a book concerning ſuch ſatyrs, in which a man's name was connected to the word Anti, beginning from the Anti-Cato of Cæſar, which is the firſt and moſt ancient of the Anti's, to the Anti-Baillet, which is the laſt. He publiſhed it in 1689 with this title, Des Satyres perſonelles, Traité Hiſtorique & Critique de celles, qui portent le Titre d'Anti: That is, "Of perſonal "Satyrs, or, an Hiſtorical and Critical Treatiſe of thoſe Satyrs, which bear the Title of "Anti." Paris 2 voll. in 12mo. We ſhall give ſome account of it in the Note [P]. He afterwards applied himſelf to a very large Work, in which he intended to diſcover the true name of thoſe Authors, who had diſguiſed themſelves under fictitious names. He had gathered a great many materials for this Work, and about the year 1678 he had already compoſed a Latin piece upon this ſubject, which he had entitled, Elenchus Apocalypticus Scriptorum Cryptonymorum, &c. That is, "A collection of diſguiſed Authors whoſe "names are diſcovered." But though he had his materials in a manner ready, as they were in Latin, and he did not care to print them in that language, he publiſhed only a ſort of Preliminary Treatiſe to his great Work, and entitled it, Auteurs deguiſez ſous des noms étrangers, empruntés, ſuppoſés, feints à plaiſir, abregés, chifrés, renverſés, retournés, ou changés d'une langue en un autre; Tome I, contenant le Traité preliminaire, ſur le changement

(o) Vie de Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 34.

(p) Adverti-ſement prefixed to it.

"he had ſhewn himſelf a little partial in favour of "the Gentlemen of Port-Royal, and ſpoken in a diſ-"obliging manner of ſome of the Jeſuits." Upon which Mr. Marchand the Editor of Mr. Bayle's Letters obſerves in a note, that theſe Letters really came from the Jeſuits; that they have been printed at Roan, and are generally aſcribed to Father Michael le Tellier, Confeſſor to Lewis XIV. But the Author of the Advertiſement, prefixed to the Amſterdam edition of Baillet's Jugemens des Savans, printed in 1725, ſays, that ſome perſons pretend, that theſe Letters were written by a Jeſuit, who had a great deal of wit and genius, and who died very young at la Fléche, a little city in the Province of Anjou.

[O] Falſe reaſonings, ... concerning what Mr. Baillet ſays of Giovanno della Caſa.] Mr. Baillet aſcribes (42) to that Archbiſhop the Poem, which we have mentioned in the text of this article, and ſays, "It is needleſs now to pretend to conceal the name, "ſubject and fate of that famous and abominable "Poem, of which the Author thought he could juſtify himſelf before men; for the ſcandal it gave "at firſt, is now over, and the Proteſtants have not "thought proper to let that piece be buried in obli-"vion." We ſhall perhaps examine in another place, the reaſons which Mr. Baillet alledges, to prove that Della Caſa is really the Author of that piece, and Mr. Menage's confutation of them (43); and ſhall only lay here before the reader the falſe reaſoning of one of Mr. Baillet's adverſaries. Having related the words which we quoted above (44), he adds (45), "Upon this Mr. Baillet renews the ſcandal; he gives "us the title of that ſcandalous Poem; tells us the "place where it was printed, the name of the Printer, "and the year in which it was publiſhed; and as if "it were doing the world a ſervice, to acquaint it "thoroughly with ſo brutiſh a work, he relates the "two points that are treated of in it. If he had "known more of it, he would not have bluſhed to "tell it, nor would he have regarded his reader's mo-"deſty. I own that if it were not for the reſpect we "owe to Baillet's protectors and friends, we ſhould "make him ſenſible, that he ought to have ſpared a "perſon who is ſacred, and that charity, prudence "and modeſty ſhould have obliged him not to ſpeak "of a work, that treats of thoſe things, which St. "Paul forbids us to name, and of which the ve-"ry name is ſhocking to a good man." That is to ſay, in plain Engliſh, that becauſe a man is a Biſhop or an Archbiſhop, his character muſt be ſacred, and when we are writing his Life, or giving an account of his works, we ought not to mention what he has done or written amiſs. Is this conſiſtent with the character of a faithful Hiſtorian? And would not Mr. Baillet have juſtly been accuſed of partiality, if ſpeaking of this Prelate, he had omitted to mention a piece of his, which is ſo much to his diſhonour, and which is publicly known to have been aſcribed to him by all Authors, Catholics as well as Proteſtants? For it muſt be obſerved, that tho' Mr. Menage denies, that Della Caſa ever wrote a Poem entitled De Laudibus Sodomiæ or Pæderaſtiæ, yet he confeſſes, that he wrote a Poem intitled Capitolo del Forno, wherein there are ſome verſes, in which he approves and praiſes the love of boys (46). Why then ſhould ſuch a circumſtance be omitted in his Life, tho' he was an Archbiſhop?

[P] We ſhall give ſome account of it.] His deſign is not to anſwer directly to Mr. Menage, but rather to prepoſſeſs the public in his favour, by ſhewing that thoſe Satyrs, in which the word Anti is joined with a man's name, are not levelled againſt the errors, which he may have committed, but attack his perſon and his reputation, and for that reaſon ought to be look'd upon as mere libels (47). This book is full of excellent obſervations; and the anſwer to Mr. Menage, who was the occaſion of it, contains only a few pages. Mr. Baillet was in a pleaſant humour when he wrote it; for finding fault with the title of Anti-Baillet, which ſavours too much of a perſonal ſatyr, he ſays, that Mr. Menage might have intitled his Book, Contre-Jugemens, or if that title being entirely French, did not ſhew any learning, he might have given it a Greek turn thus, Anti-critique des Gnoſtiques (48).

(42) Jugem. des Sav. tom. 8. p. 224.

(43) Anti-Baillet, Part ii. § 119, 120. p. m. 449, &c.

(44) Quotat. 42.

(45) Reflex. ſur les Jugem. des Sav. in tom. 15. of theſe Jugem. pag. 353.

(46) Anti-Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 464.

(47) Niceron, ubi ſupra, p. 32.

(48) Satyres Perſonel. in Jugem. des Sav. tom. 13. p. 160.

changement & la ſuppoſition des noms parmi les Auteurs. That is, "Authors diſguiſed under names foreign, borrowed, ſuppoſed, feigned, abridged, cyphered, turned, as by way of anagram, or tranſlated from one language into another. Vol. I. which contains a preliminary Treatiſe concerning the alteration and ſuppoſition of names amongſt Authors," printed firſt at Paris, in 1620, 12mo. This preliminary Treatiſe is all that has been publiſhed of that Work. It appears by this title, that Mr. Baillet's deſign was very like that of Mr. Placcius, who wrote a Latin Treatiſe De Anonymis & Pſeudonymis, "Of anonymous and diſguiſed Authors," and had heard of Mr. Baillet's undertaking [Q]. In the year 1691 he publiſhed in French the life of Carteſius in two volumes in 4to. This life has been ſeverely criticiſed upon [R], and Father Niceron ſays (p), that the Author might have left out ſome things, which have no relation to Carteſius, and ſeveral trifles, though they have a relation to him. However this life ſold very well, and the Bookſeller was going to print a ſecond edition of it, when he was prevented by death. But as the Publick deſired to have a life of Carteſius, that ſhould be ſhort and cheap, and ſome perſons intending to abridge that, which Mr. Baillet had publiſhed, he undertook the taſk himſelf, and reduced the two volumes in 4to to one volume in 12mo (q). Several of his friends deſired him alſo for his own ſatisfaction, and for theirs, to write the life of Edmund Richer, Doctor of the Sorbonne, which he did, but he did not publiſh it [S]. In 1693 he publiſhed an Hiſtory of Holland [T], from the peace concluded between the Seven Provinces and Spain in 1609 to the peace of Nimmegen in 1679. The next year he publiſhed De la Devotion à la Sainte Vierge & du Culte qui lui eſt du. That is,

(p) Ubi ſupra, pag. 33.

(q) Vie de Baillet, ubi ſupra. pag. 41.

[Q] Placcius had heard of Mr. Baillet's undertaking.] Mr. Lipſtorpius, a learned Phyſician of Germany, being at Paris, ſome years before Mr. Baillet publiſh'd his Diſguiſed Authors, went to viſit him, and deſired him to ſhew him what he had already collected upon that ſubject, in order to know whether his deſign was like that of Placcius. It was found to be ſo; and Mr. Placcius being acquainted with it, and having ſeen Mr. Baillet's Elenchus, wrote to him in 1688 a long letter in Latin, to thank him for the obliging manner, in which he had communicated his Plan to him, and offered him his own obſervations upon that ſubject. He importuned him likewiſe to publiſh immediately his work in Latin, that it might be uſeful to all the learned in Europe. Mr. Baillet intended certainly then to print his work in French (50). But, if we may give credit to Father Niceron (51), he dropt his deſign, becauſe it was repreſented to him, that ſuch an undertaking would raiſe him a thouſand enemies; ſo that he reſolved at laſt to publiſh only the preliminary diſcourſe, tho' the whole work was finiſhed, and he had already obtained a privilege for it (52).

(50) Vie de Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 40.
(51) Ubi ſupra, pag. 33.
(52) Vie de Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 38.

[R] This Life has been ſeverely criticiſed upon.] There were two Letters privately printed in France in the year 1691, though in the title-page it was ſaid at the Hague. They were intitled, Reflexions d'un Academicien ſur la vie de Mr. Des Cartes, envoyées à un de ſes amis en Hollande; i. e. "Reflections of a Member of the French Academy upon the Life of Carteſius, ſent to a friend of his in Holland," in two Letters. F. Le Long aſcribes this piece to Mr. Gallois, though Mr. Merchand ſays, that F. Le Tellier was the Author of it (53). Mr. Bayle ſpeaking of that piece ſays (54), that Mr. Baillet is there ridiculed in a very ſevere manner. This will appear to be true, by two or three paſſages which we ſhall tranſcribe from it. "When Mr. Baillet, ſays the Author (55), "ſhall undertake to write the life of ſome "eminent perſon, let a Writer of the firſt rank "take the ſame life, we ſhall then have a compleat "hiſtory of ſuch a man; for whatever the excellent "Author ſhould think fit to leave out, Mr. Baillet "would certainly acquaint us with it, &c." The Author then criticiſes Mr. Baillet's trifling accounts, and his perpetual digreſſions; "I was delighted, ſays he (56), when caſting my eyes upon ſeveral paſſages "of the firſt and ſecond book, I found here the wars "of Prince Maurice; in another place thoſe of Bohemia; then thoſe of Hungary, and a great many "more military expeditions. I was not leſs pleaſed, "when I happened to read an account of the Synod "of Dort, of the Aſſemblies of Francfort, Nurembergh, and Ulm. I then ſaid to myſelf, I muſt "certainly have been miſtaken; I looked upon Carteſius as a man entirely taken up with the ſtudy of "Nature, who only travelled as a private man for a "few years through Europe, before he ſhut himſelf "up in his cloſet. But I find by the bare titles of "his Hiſtory, that he had a ſhare in all the greateſt "actions that have been performed in the wars in "Flanders, Holland, Germany, Bohemia, Hungary, "Italy, and France. I find him employed in political affairs, in the Synod of Dort, in the Aſſemblies in Germany, and eſpecially in that of Ulm. "Therefore I begin with the utmoſt curioſity to "read the account of thoſe wars, and of thoſe aſſemblies. I expect to ſee the young warrior at the "head of a ſquadron of Hollanders, break through "the army of the Spaniards; in Bohemia, commanding under the Duke of Bavaria, ſuppreſſing the rebellion of the revolted Germans; in Hungary in "imitation of the brave Count du Bucquoy, making "the Uſurper Bethlen-Gabor tremble, diſtinguiſhing "himſelf at the ſiege of Rochelle. But I find my "ſelf very much diſappointed; the Hiſtorian tells "me, that Carteſius was at all thoſe wars only as a "mere ſpectator, and not as an actor; firmly determined to view every thing like a Philoſopher, and "never to do any thing like a ſoldier. This makes "me almoſt ſwear againſt the Hiſtorian. I aſk, to "what purpoſe does he give ſo many accounts of military actions, in the life of a very quiet and pacifick man? The reaſon he gives for it calms my "reſentments. The Hero had ſeen all thoſe tranſactions during his life; it is therefore the duty of an "Hiſtorian to relate them in his Hiſtory." The whole piece runs in the ſame ſtrain; it is a continued ridicule upon Mr. Baillet, and it muſt be owned that he too much deſerved it by his continual digreſſions, which are entirely foreign to his deſign.

(53) Avertiſſement à la Tete des Jugem. des Sav. ed. d'Amſt. 1725.
(54) Let. cxi. pag. 423.
(55) In the Jug. des Sav. tom. 15. pag. 414.
(56) Ibid. pag. 421.

[S] The Life of Dr. Richer . . . . but he did not publiſh it.] "I am here, ſays he in a Letter to a friend, "in a very great but agreeable ſolitude, and divert "myſelf with writing the life of the famous Richer, "on whoſe account your Sorbonne has had ſo much "trouble. But it will not be a work proper for a "privilege in this Kingdom." The life of Carteſius had made a great deal of noiſe; but that of Richer ſeemed to Mr. Baillet of ſuch a nature, as to cauſe a greater clamour ſtill, both in France and in Italy (57). It was printed ſeveral years after his death at Liege in 1714, in 12mo (58).

(57) Vie de Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 42.
(58) F. Niceron, ubi ſupra, p. 35.

[T] He publiſhed an Hiſtory of Holland.] It was intended as a continuation of that of Grotius, and it was expected that it would be written with the ſame impartiality. It contained four pretty thick volumes in 12mo, of a ſmall letter. The Author publiſhed it under the name of Balthaſar d'Hezenail de la Neuville, which is the anagram of Baillet de la Neuville en Hez. (La Neuville en Hez is the place of his birth.) No body except a few of the Author's particular friends were acquainted with the ſecret. The ſtyle of the Hiſtory, adds the Author of his Life (59), ſeemed clear and correct enough, to be thought to come from the pen of one Mr. de la Neuville, who had already publiſhed ſome other Hiſtories with ſucceſs. But F. Niceron ſays (60), that Hiſtory is not much eſteemed, and contains very groſs miſtakes.

(59) Vie de Baillet, p. 43.
(60) Ubi ſupra, pag. 34.

is, " Of the Devotion towards the holy Virgin, and of the worſhip which is due to her." It was only a ſmall volume in 12mo, deſigned for the inſtruction of the Roman Catholicks; it had been approved by four Doctors of the Sorbonne, whereupon it had been licenſed by the Chancellor (r). Yet it was ſoon attacked from two different quarters, in two pieces, the one intitled, Mémoire addreſſé à la Sorbonne, touchant le livre de la Devotion à la Sainte Vierge. That is, " A Memorial directed to the Sorbonne, concerning the book of the " Devotion towards the holy Virgin;" in 12mo. The title of the other is, Lettre à Mr. Hideux, Curé des SS. Innocens, ſur ſon approbation au nouveau livre de la Devotion à la Vierge. That is, " A Letter to Mr. Hideux, Curate of the Holy Innocents, concerning " his approbation of the new book upon the Devotion to the Virgin." Printed at Liege in 1694, in 12mo. We ſhall give a ſhort account of the other books, which Mr. Baillet wrote in the Note [V]. It appears by his works, and eſpecially by his Judgments of the Learned, that he was a man of vaſt projects. Another inſtance of it is, that he formed the deſign of writing a compleat ſyſtem of Divinity upon the points of the Chriſtian Faith, upon Morality, and upon the Church Diſcipline, and all this ſupported by the authority of the holy Scripture, and the conſent of the Interpreters or Commentators, by the Councils, and the authentic Records of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; by the Fathers of the Church, and laſtly by the example of the Saints. He propoſed to give to this Compilation the title and form of an Univerſal Eccleſiaſtical Dictionary, in which Students in Divinity, and even the Learned, as well as the Unlearned might eaſily find in an alphabetical order whatever relates to theſe three points, viz. Doctrine, Morality, and Diſcipline. This he called already his great and laſt work; and looked upon it as finiſhed, either becauſe he had the plan of it, or becauſe he flattered himſelf to have it compleated in three years time, if God ſhould grant him his uſual health. That work was to contain three volumes in folio. But his death, which happened after a lingering illneſs, the 21ſt of Jan. 1706, in the 56th year of his age, put an end to all his deſigns. We ſhall give his character in the Note [X].

(r) Ibid. pag. 44.

(61) Niceron, ubi ſupra, p. 34.

(62) Nouvell. de la Repub. des Lett. 1701. Juillet, pag. 109.

(63) Apud Niceron, Hom. Illuſt. tom. 10. Part 2. pag. 128.

[V] An account of the other books which Mr. Baillet wrote.] In 1695 he publiſhed a little piece intitled, De la conduite des Ames, i. e. " Of the care of Souls," in 12mo; it contains twenty ſeven chapters, he publiſhed it under the fictitious name of Daret de la Villeneuve, and under that diſguiſe he eſcaped the criticiſm of his adverſaries. In 1700 he publiſhed Diſcours ſur la vie des Saints, i. e. " A Diſcourſe upon the " life of the Saints." Paris 8vo; it is alſo printed at the head of the following book, Les Vies des Saints, i. e. " The Lives of the Saints," in three volumes in folio, and twelve in 8vo, Paris, 1701 (61). This work was ſo well received by the publick, that the Bookſellers ſaid, the two editions would be ſold off in ſix months time. The Author had retrenched ſome part of it, and it was then ſaid, that he would ſoon acquaint the world with what he had retrenched, and the reaſons he had for it (62). This book has been printed four times; the firſt and ſecond editions in folio and 8vo are the beſt; the third in 1704, is pretty well printed, but ſeveral things have been altered in it, as appears by the great number of ſeparate leaves with which it abounds. The laſt is very mean, in bad letter, and upon bad paper. " Theſe Lives of the Saints, ſays Mr. Langlet (63), " are written with a very great " exactneſs, with regard to Hiſtory. The ſtyle of " them is natural, but ſtrong and lively. This is " one of thoſe works which have been long wiſhed " for, and which may be very uſeful hereafter. The " Author is a judicious Critic, who does not let any " miracle paſs, without a thorough examination. " This is the beſt work that Mr. Baillet ever wrote. " It has been cenſured; but what book ever eſcaped " cenſure? One fault, which may juſtly be found in " it, is, that the Author did not write with that de- " votion which was requiſite in a book deſigned for " the uſe of the faithful." In 1703 Mr. Baillet publiſhed the Hiſtory of the moveable Feaſts; the Lives of the Saints of the Old Teſtament, and the Chronology and Topography of the Saints, Hiſtoire des Fêtes mobiles; Les Vies des Saints de l'ancien Teſtament, la Chronologie & la Topographie des Saints, printed at Paris in one volume in folio, and five in 8vo. Les maximes de St. Etienne de Grammont; i. e. " The Maxims " of St. Stephen of Grammont," Paris, 1704, in 12mo; it is a tranſlation from the Latin. La Vie de Godfrey Hermant, Docteur de Sorbonne, & Chanoine de l'Egliſe de Beauvais; i. e. " The Life of Godfrey " Hermant, &c." printed after the Author's death at Amſterdam, in 1717, in 12mo. Hiſtoire des demeles du Pape Boniface VIII avec Philippe le Bel Roy de France; i. e, " The Hiſtory of the Diſputes between " Pope Boniface VIII and Philip the Fair, King of " France," Paris 1718, in 12mo. This Hiſtory is very well drawn up, it contains a faithful extract of original pieces (64).

(64) F. Niceron, tom. 3. pag. 34, 35.

[X] We ſhall give his character in the note.] Mr. Baillet had a very lively genius, and a capacious underſtanding. He had an admirable skill to diſtinguiſh truth, from what has only the appearance of it, and a ſolid judgment; and his taſte with regard to works of wit and genius was ſuch, as might ſafely be depended upon. But above all he had an inſatiable ardour for the Sciences, and an unwearied application in his ſtudies. His knowledge was not confined to one Science only, as ſufficiently appears by his writings; but through his eagerneſs to know every thing he had not time to apply himſelf to the poliſhing of his ſtyle. He regarded the things themſelves more than the manner of ſaying them; and the firſt expreſſion which offered itſelf to him, was generally that which he made uſe of; and there never was any blot or raſure to be ſeen in his Writings (65).

(65) Idem, ibid. pag. 29, 30.

☞ BAINBRIDGE (JOHN), an eminent Phyſician and Aſtronomer in the XVIIth Century, and author of ſeveral tracts [A], was born of a good family at Aſhby de la Zouch

[A] Author of ſeveral Tracts.] I. An aſtronomical Deſcription of the late Comet from the 18th of November 1618 to the 16th of December following. London 1619, 4to (1). Dr. Thomas Smith tells us (2), that this piece was only a ſhort epitome of a larger work, which he deſigned to publiſh in the Latin tongue under the title of Cometographia; tho' it is not known whether he ever finiſh'd that deſign. The ſame author obſerves, that he was induced by the importunity and curioſity of the Public to publiſh this Deſcription ſeparately from the reſt of his work. It muſt be confeſſed, that our Author paid too great a regard to the vulgar notions concerning Comets, as preſages of dreadful calamities; with which view he has ſubjoined to his Treatiſe certain moral Prognoſtics. II. He publiſhed Procli Sphæra. Ptolomæi de Hypotheſibus Planetarum Liber ſingularis, &c. London 1620, 4to; and he has given us a Latin Verſion of Proclus's Sphere. In his Introduction he tells us, that this piece, tho' it bears the name of Proclus, is rather to be aſcribed to Geminus, a celebrated Geometrician and Aſtronomer, from whoſe Iſagoge upon the φαινόμενα Proclus exactly tranſcribed

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 34. 2d edit. 1721.

(2) Commentar. de Vitâ & Studiis Jo. Bainbridgii, pag. 5.

Zouch in Leiceſterſhire in the year 1582, and educated at the public ſchool of that town; from whence he was tranſplanted to Emanuel College in Cambridge, and put under the care of Dr. Joſeph Hall, afterwards Biſhop of Norwich, to whom he was related (a). He took the degrees in Arts, and ſtudied Phyſic there; after which he retired into his own country, where he taught a grammar ſchool for ſome years, and practiſed Phyſic with great ſucceſs (b). He employed his leiſure hours in the ſtudy of mathematics, and particularly of Aſtronomy, which he had been extremely fond of from his earlieſt years. By the advice of his friends, who thought that his diſtinguiſhed merit and abilities ought not to be confined to the obſcurity of a country life, he removed to London, in order that he might improve himſelf in his ſtudies by converſation and the advantage of books, and was admitted a Fellow of the College of Phyſicians (c). His Deſcription of the Comet, which appeared in 1618, raiſed him a very great character, and introduced him to the acquaintance of Sir Henry Savile, who having founded two Lectures, one for Geometry, and the other for Aſtronomy, in the Univerſity of Oxford in Auguſt 1619, preferred Mr. Bainbridge to the Profeſſorſhip of the latter, without any ſolicitation; upon which he removed to Oxford in 1620 [B], and was enter'd a Maſter-Commoner of Merton-College (d). He was likewiſe incorporated Doctor of Phyſic, as he had ſtood at Cambridge (e), and reſided for (a) Thomæ Smith Commentariolus de Vitâ & Studiis Joannis Bainbridgii, pag. 3. publiſhed in his Vitæ quorundam eruditiſſimor. & illuſtr. viror. London 1708, in 4to.

(b) Idem, ibid. and Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 34. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Smith, pag. 4.

(d) Idem, pag. 5, 6. and Wood, ubi ſupra.

(e) Wood, ubi ſupra.

it. Alteram titulo quidem Procli, jure tamen Gemini, Geometræ & Aſtronomi nobiliſſimi, ex cujus in Φαινόμενα Iſagoge eam totam & ad verbum λογιστικος excerpſit Proclus. To this he joined an edition of Ptolemy περὶ ὑποθέσεων Πλανωμένων, and his Κανὼν Βασιλείων, or Canon of the Kingdoms; with a Latin Tranſlation of the former. He ſuppoſes that Ptolemy brought down this Canon to the time of Antoninus Pius the Emperor; and that the reſt was added by Theon, the Interpreter of Ptolemy. Our Author collated theſe pieces with ſeveral manuſcripts, and illuſtrated them with figures. III. Canicularia; Oxford 1648, in 8vo. This piece treats of the Canicular Year, or the natural year of the Egyptians, which began with the heliacal riſing of the dog-ſtar, and of the canicular-days, and the riſing of that ſtar, and the Sothiacal period. He has enlivened this ſubject with a great variety of agreeable learning from the ancient Greek and Latin Authors, whoſe opinions he relates and corrects. Dr. Bainbridge wrote this Treatiſe at the requeſt of Archbiſhop Uſher; but left it imperfect, being prevented either by the breaking out of the civil war, or by death, ſo that he was not able to finiſh his Demonſtration of the Heliacal Riſing of the Dog-Star, which, as Mr. John Greaves obſerves, was the only Pillar of that Diſcourſe; and which was ſupplied for the parallel of Lower-Egypt by that Gentleman, who publiſhed this treatiſe of our Author. V. Cl. Johannes Gravius commentarios Bainbridgii de anno Caniculari, h. e. de Ægyptiorum anno naturali, à Caniculæ ortu heliaco incipiente, ſuaſu ac impulſu reverendiſſimi Archiepiſcopi Armachani conſcriptos, A. D. MDCXLVIII. Oxonii edidit; in quibus etiam de diebus canicularibus, ortuque ipſius ſplendidiſſimæ ſtellæ, & de periodo Sothiaca, non ſine varia amœnioris literaturæ ex Græcis Latiniſque veteribus Auctoribus, quorum ſententias exponit & caſtigat, admixtione, agitur. Hos verò Bainbridgius, ſive turbatiſſimis illis, flagrante rebellione Parlamentariâ, rebus impeditus, ſive morte in ipſis viridis ſenectæ initiis præreptus, imperfectos reliquit, ad iſtius ſtellæ ortûs heliaci demonſtrationem, quod unicum erat, uti Gravius loquitur, iſtius Diatribæ columen, neutiquam progreſſus (3). Since that time we have had none of our Author's writings publiſh'd; tho' ſeveral Diſſertations of his compoſition were prepared for and committed to the preſs the year after his death, with the Approbation of the Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford; but the edition of them was never compleated. The titles of them are as follow: Antiprognoſticon, in quo μαντικῆς Aſtrologicæ, cœleſtium domorum, & triplicitatum commentis, magniſque Saturni & Jovis (cujuſmodi anno 1623 & 1643 contigerunt, & viceſimo ferè quoque deinceps anno, ratis naturæ legibus, recurrent,) conjunctionibus innixæ, vanitas breviter detegitur: i. e. "Antiprognoſtics, in which is briefly "ſhewn the vanity of Aſtrological Predictions, which "depend upon the falſe ſuppoſition of the celeſtial "houſes and triplicities, and the grand conjunctions "of Saturn and Jupiter (ſuch as happened in 1623 "and 1643, and will recur once in almoſt every "twenty years hereafter, agreeably to the ſtated laws "of nature)." De Meridianorum ſive Longitudinum differentiis inveniendis Diſſertatio: i. e. "A Diſſertation concerning the method of finding out the differences of the Meridians or Longitudes." De Stellâ Veneris Diatriba: i. e. "A Diſſertation concerning "the Star of Venus." To theſe pieces was to be added the ſhort Oration ſpoken at his funeral by Mr. William Strode, the public Orator of the Univerſity. Theſe learned Tracts fell into the hands of Dr. Thomas Smith, who promis'd to publiſh them, if the avarice of the Bookſellers, as he terms it, would ſuffer him. Cum verò eruditæ hæ lucubrationes mihi in manus felicissimo caſu inciderint, ne penitus interirent, quantum in me erit, & ſi per Bibliopolarum avaritiam liceat, tandem aliquando curabo (4). A Specimen of celeſtial Obſervations, which Dr. Bainbridge made at Oxford, may be ſeen in Iſmael Bullialdus's Aſtronomia Philolaica (5) publiſh'd at Paris, in 1645. But theſe pieces are very inconſiderable in compariſon of thoſe other Tracts of his, which were never publiſhed, but left in his Will to Archbiſhop Uſher, among whoſe manuſcripts they are preſerved in the Library at Trinity-College at Dublin. Dr. Smith (6) mentions the following Treatiſes extant there among others; a Theory of the Sun; a Theory of the Moon; a Diſcourſe concerning the Quantity of the Year; two Volumes of aſtronomical Obſervations; and nine or ten volumes of miſcellaneous papers relating to the Mathematics. And that Gentleman obſerves, that it would be of great ſervice to the Public, if any of the Mathematicians in Ireland, who have the opportunity of examining thoſe manuſcripts, would communicate to the learned World what they find in them of importance to Aſtronomy. For tho' every intelligent perſon muſt confeſs, that a great many noble diſcoveries unknown to him, have been made ſince Dr. Bainbridge's time in that ſcience, by Gaſſendus, Hevelius, Ricciolus, Bullialdus, Caſſini, and our countrymen Dr. Ward, Hook, Flamſted, Halley, and others (7); yet it is not only a pleaſure but even an advantage to learn from the writings of the former Aſtronomers, what obſervations they have made, and by what ſteps and methods the ſcience has been brought to perfection; ſince their imperfect notices, conjectures, and hints may give occaſion for the diſcovery of many things, which might otherwiſe be never thought of. Quid Aſtronomi tempore priores obſervaverint, quibuſque mediis, ratione, & methodo ſideralis hæc ſcientia ad culmen aſſurrexerit, ex illorum ſcriptis deducere, id quidem non ſoli ſtudioſorum voluptati, ſed commodo inſervire poſſit; ansâ ex illorum imperfectis notitiis, conjecturis, & ſuggeſtionibus, plura, quibus non aliter veniſſent in mentem, inveniendi & excogitandi inde arripiendâ (8). He undertook likewiſe a Deſcription of the Britiſh Monarchy, diſtinguiſhed into three columns, in order to ſhew the advantages of the Union of England and Scotland under one Monarch; as appears from his Dedication of the Deſcription of the Comet in 1618, to King James I; but this Treatiſe is loſt or was ſuppreſſed by him (9).

(3) Ibid. pag. 14.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Lib. 12. p. 467.

(6) Pag. 15.

(7) Dr. Smith ought undoubtedly to have mentioned Sir Iſaac Newton upon this occaſion, with peculiar honour and diſtinction.

(8) Smith, pag. 15.

(9) Idem, pag. 15, 16.

[B] Removed to Oxford in 1620.] Dr. Walter Pope in his Life of Seth Ward Lord Biſhop of Saliſbury (10) mentions a very odd ſtory relating to our Author, after he had entered upon his Profeſſorſhip. He tells us, that he was a learned and good Mathematician; "yet "there goes, ſays he, a ſtory of him, which was in "many ſcholars mouths, when I was firſt admitted "there;

(10) Cap. 3. p. 10, 11. edit. London, 1697.

for ſome years in that College, the Society of which conferred upon him the place of junior Reader of Linacre's Lecture in 1631 (f) and of ſuperior Reader of the ſame Lecture in 1635 (g). In this calm retirement, which he enjoyed for the purſuit of his ſtudies, he reſolved upon publiſhing correct editions of the antient Greek Aſtronomers, as well thoſe, which had not yet been printed, as thoſe, which had already ſeen the light, agreeably to the Statutes of the Founder of that Profeſſorſhip (h); and in order to make himſelf maſter of the diſcoveries of the Arabian Aſtronomers, he began the ſtudy of the Arabic Language, when he was above forty years of age (i). He died at his houſe over againſt Merton-College November 3d 1643, in the 62d year of his age; and his body was conveyed to the public ſchool, where an Oration having been pronounced in honour of him by Mr. William Strode, the Univerſity Orator, it was carried to Merton-College Church, and there ſolemnly depoſited on the left ſide of Mr. Henry Briggs's grave, near the Altar (k); and an Epitaph was inſcribed upon his Monument [C]. Dr. Smith (l) tells us, that as his unaffected piety and humanity procured him an univerſal eſteem among his contemporaries; ſo his great ſkill in the Mathematics and polite Learning will ſecure him to poſterity the character of one of the greateſt men of his age.

(f) Smith, pag. 6.
(g) Idem, ibid. and Wood, ubi ſupra.
(h) Smith, pag. 6.
(i) Idem. pag. 10, 11.
(k) Idem, pag. 12. and Wood, ubi ſupra.
(l) Pag. 16.

"there; that he put upon the ſchool-gate an Affiche "or written paper, as the cuſtom is, giving notice "at what time, and upon what ſubject the Profeſſor "will read; which ended in theſe words, Lecturus de "Polis & Axis; under which was written by an un- "known hand, as follows;

"Doctor Bambridge (11) came from Cambridge,
"To read de Polis & Axis:
"Let him go back again, like a Dunce as he came,
"And learn a new Syntaxis."

(11) Dr. Pope likewiſe calls him erroneouſly Bambridge, inſtead of Bainbridge.

Dr. Smith takes notice of this imputation caſt upon him; and tells us, that his reputation had ſuffered, tho' upon a trifling account, from the falſe and malicious calumny of ſome perſons, who charged him with a fault in Syntax in one of his Lectures; which abſurd and ridiculous ſtory he ſhould have omitted as unworthy of any reply, if a certain eminent buffoon, ſays he, had not introduced that ſtupid epigram in a late book of his. In vindicias illius famæ, quam, licet in re leviculâ, læſit mendaciſſima quorundam obtrectatio, quaſi in prælectione habitâ contra Grammaticæ Syntaxeos regulas ex ignorantia ſemel peccâſſet; quam, utpote ſcomma abſurdum ridiculumque, & quod ſeriò refutetur, prorſus indignum, penitus omiſiſſem, niſi inſignis quidam ſannio in nupero libello epigramma iſtud inficetum, rythmis Anglicanis olim conſcribillatum, ad captandum puerorum plauſum, irriſorium plane in modum inſeruiſſet (12).

(12) Smith, pag. 16.

[C] An Epitaph was inſcribed upon his monument.] It is as follows: Si cupias, Viator, quis & quantus hic jacet, alibi quæras, oportet, dicere ſatis nequeo. Britannia tota Viri famam non capit. Ne cætera tamen ignores, in rem tuam pauca hæc accipe. JOANNES BAINBRIDGIUS, Vir famæ integerrimæ, & doctrinæ incomparabilis, Medicinæ Profeſſor & Matheſeos, morborum tam felix expugnator novorum, quam ſagax indagator ſyderum. Quem primum Aſtronomiæ Profeſſorem, & dignum Collegam, in mathematicis prælecturis, quas magnifice erexerat, prudens hominum & librorum æſtimator elegit; Savilius. Quem Cantabrigiæ educatum, Academia Oxonienſis fovit, ut ſuum, defunctum publice deflevit, ut par utriuſque ornamentum. Qui Scaligerum felicius correxit, quam Scaliger tempora; in non levem literarum jacturam immaturus obiit MDCXLIII. Abi jam; cætera quære vel ab Exteris. i. e. "If you deſire, Paſſenger, to know who and "how great a man lies here, you muſt enquire elſe- "where; for I cannot ſufficiently inform you; for "even all Britain itſelf cannot contain his fame. "However, that you may not be ignorant of the o- "ther circumſtances relating to him, read the follow- "ing account of him. JOHN BAINBRIDGE, a man "of the cleareſt character and incomparable learning, "Profeſſor of Phyſic and Mathematics, as ſucceſsful "in removing new diſeaſes, as ſagacious in his ob- "ſervation of the Stars; who was appointed by that "excellent Judge of men and books, Sir Henry Sa- "vile, his firſt Profeſſor of Aſtronomy, and the worthy "Collegue in thoſe Lectures of Mathematics, which "he had founded in a magnificent manner; who being "educated at Cambridge, was entertained by the "Univerſity of Oxford as her own ſon, and honour- "ed by her with a public funeral, as an equal orna- "ment to both the Univerſities; who corrected Sca- "liger with more ſucceſs, than Scaliger had done "Chronology. He died too early for the intereſts "of learning in 1643. Go now, Paſſenger, and "learn even from foreigners what elſe relates to his "character." Dr. Smith tells us (3), that he is not certain, whether this Epitaph was written by Mr. Greaves his ſucceſſor in the Profeſſorſhip of Aſtronomy, tho' ſome aſſert it; but that he had tranſcribed the following Epitaph from a manuſcript written by Mr. Greaves. Quid ſupereſt clariſſimi viri, D. Joannis Bainbridge, in Academiâ Oxonienſi publici Aſtronomiæ Profeſſoris, ſub hoc marmore clauditur. Quod verò amavimus, quod ſuſpeximus, quod mæſti deſideramus, fruſtra hic quæras: illud cœlo, cui vivus animo cogitationeque incubuit, receptum eſt. Obiit A. D. CIↃ. IↃC. XLIII. IX.bris III. ætatis ſuæ LXII. Horâ ſextâ matutinâ. i. e. "The remains of the cele- "brated Dr. John Bainbridge, public Profeſſor of A- "ſtronomy in the Univerſity of Oxford, are incloſed "under this marble. But that part of him, which "we loved, which we admired, and which we la- "ment the loſs of, it is in vain to ſeek for here; "ſince it is raiſed to heaven, which his mind and all "his thoughts were fixed upon, while he lived. He "died in the year 1643, November 3d, in the 62d "year of his age, at ſix a clock in the morning."

(13) Pag. 13.

T.

BAIUS (a) (MICHAEL) Profeſſor of Divinity at Louvain, was born at Melin in the territory of Aeth in the year 1513. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſuch a manner by his progreſs in learning, and his prudent conduct, during the courſe of his ſtudies at Louvain, that as ſoon as he was paſſed from the ſtation of a Scholar, he was made Principal of the Houſe of Standonck (b). After he had diſcharged this office for three years, he applied himſelf to teach Philoſophy, and when he had filled that Profeſſorſhip for ſix years, he obtained the Office of Principal of the Pope's College in the year 1549 (c). The ſame year he took his Degree of Licentiate in Divinity. Two years after he received his Doctor's Degree, and was made Regius Profeſſor of the Scriptures. In 1563 he was one of the Divines, who were ſent by the King of Spain from Louvain to Trent [A]. He made himſelf

(a) He is better known under this Latiniz'd name, than under that of De Bay, which was his true name.
(b) This is the Founder's name.
(c) I correct Valerius Andreas ſo; for his number CIↃ IↃXCV is a very abſurd error of the Printers.

[A] He was ſent by the King of Spain from Louvain to Trent.] See in Cardinal Pallavicini the ſeveral ſprings, which retarded or advanced the deputation of Michael Baius (1). The author of the Life of Commendon has paſſed very lightly over this, and with too much flattery (2); but the Author of the Hiſtory of the Council

(1) Pallav. Hiſtoria Concil. Trident. lib. 15. c. 7.
(2) Antonio Marie Gratiani, Vie de Cardinal Commendon, tranſlated by Monſ. Flechier, pag. 158.

(d) Ex Valer. Andreæ, Bibliotb. Belgic. pag. 670.

(c) See remark [H].

(f) Swert. in Athen. Belg. Valer. Andr.

self greatly admired in the Council. He obtained the Deanery of St. Peter's in Louvain in 1575. About three years after he had the dignity of Conservator of the Privileges of the University conferred upon him (d). His Epitaph informs us, that he was Chancellor of that University, and Inquisitor General of the Low Countries. He was a man of great abilities, and no less commendable for his exemplary life, piety, and modesty, than for his genius and knowledge (e). He had read St. Augustin's Works nine times over (f): he composed several books in Divinity [B], which have a tincture of that reading (g), and in which it was pretended there were found a great many propositions, that were censured by Pope Pius V [C]. He wrote likewise some controversial pieces against those of the Reformed Religion [D]. He had so much deference for the Pope's Censure [E], that though he did not think that he had taught any heterodoxy, he would not suffer the books, in which those censured propositions were pretended to be contained, to be reprinted (b). Valerius Andreas has committed several errors in speaking of this Censure [F]. There is expected a new edition of the Works of Michael Baius; which will contain

(g) See remark [E].

(b) Valer. Andr. Bibliotb. Belg. pag. 671.

Council has very clearly unfolded all the intrigues of Commendon, and gives him nothing but what belongs to him. This Nuncio being at Brussels in the year 1561, took notice of the disputes which had been agitated at Louvain, because Baius and Hessels did not follow the common way of thinking in the doctrine of free-will, and works, and in some other points. These two Doctors had been silent for some time, out of deference to those who advised them to it; but when they found that the Sorbonne, at the sollicitation of the Franciscans, had censured eighteen propositions, and they were importuned by their scholars to maintain that cause, they prepared for their defence. Commendon stopped this war of Pens, not by his fine discourses, as Gratiani affirms, but because the Letters which he wrote occasioned the Pope to give orders to Cardinal Granvelle to enjoin them silence (3).

(3) Pallavic. Hist. Concil. Trident. lib. 15. cap. 7. num. 2.

[B] He wrote several books in Divinity.] He published some of them, the titles of which, as we find them in Valerius Andreas, are as follow. De meritis operum lib. II; de primâ hominis Justitia & Virtutibus impiorum lib. II; de Sacramentis in genere, contra Calvinum; de formâ Baptismi. All these Treatises were printed together at Louvain in 1565. The year following were printed these in the same city: de libero hominis arbitrio liber I; de Charitate, Justitiâ, & Justificatione libri III; de Sacrificio liber I; de peccato Originis liber I: de Indulgentiis liber I; de Orationepro defunctis liber I.

[C] . . . . in which it was pretended there were found a great many propositions, that were censured by Pope Pius V.] I say, as it was pretended, for the question of fact is not yet determined; and I find, that Michael Baius is far from granting, that he had taught what was ascribed to him. Notwithstanding, says he (4), amongst these propositions (5), there were some very far from our sentiments; others, which we had never maintained nor treated of in any sense; but all, or at least the greatest part of them, were turned or expressed in so malicious a manner, that the expressions alone might make them suspected, especially in the minds of those, who had not directly studied those kinds of questions. This is the perpetual management of the ODIUM THEOLOGICUM. This passion, which has long been turned into a proverb, discovers heresies wherever it has a mind to find them; it forms extracts so artful, and so proper to inflame the people, that it changes into pernicious heresies that, which is not so much as heterodox, when it is considered with its principles, and the proper restrictions and applications. This passion is contagious; a Physician, who shall affect to appear as an informer only from a principle of zeal, is immediately seized with the sacerdotal spirit; he brings sophisticated extracts; he separates what he ought to join; he joins what he ought to separate; he gives the propositions such a turn as is most likely to surprize the religion of the Judges. The Physician Francis Blondel will soon give us an instance of this. This is not the only injustice which is observed in persons actuated by this passion; their double weights and measures is another iniquity which attends them. Bid them to censure those who put them upon this affair, those inveterate persons, who prompted their resentments; shew them ever so plainly the justice of your cause; they will yet turn a deaf ear to you, or pay you with nonsense: in that case their charity will bear all things, excuse all things.

(4) In his Letter to Cardinal Simonetta, quoted by Gery, Apologie des Censures, pag. 42.

(5) He speaks of those, which the Franciscans shewed to Cardinal Granvelle, and which were sent afterwards to Rome. See Apologie des Censures, pag. 42, 43.

THE method of extracting propositions from a book, which one would have censured.

[D] He wrote some controversial pieces against those of the reformed Religion.] The same Valerius Andreas gives us the titles of them, which are as follow: Responsio ad Quæstiones Phil. Marnixii de Ecclesia Christi & Sacramento Altaris, at Louvain in 1579; Apologia pro Responsione contra Objectiones ejusdem de veritate Corporis Christi in Eucharistia, at Louvain in 1581; Epistola de Statuum Inferioris Germaniæ unione cum iis, qui se desertores Romanæ Ecclesiæ vocant, & de Juramento, quod eorum jussu à Clero & Monachis exigitur, at Louvain, and at Cologne in 1579. He wrote likewise a letter de Juramento, jussu Ducis Alenzonii Antwerpiæ in prætorio concepto & comprobato.

[E] He had a great deal of deference for the Pope's censure.] To give a just comment upon this text, I shall make use of the words of the Sieur Gery, Bachelor in Divinity. This pious and learned Doctor, says he, speaking of Baius (6), in the midst of his great reputation, saw of a sudden a Bull issued out against seventy six propositions, which those who sollicited that censure ascribed to him entire, though there were some which did not belong to him; others which had been turned in a malicious manner, in order to expose them to censure; and others, which the Bull itself owned might be maintained in a Catholick sense. They were not satisfied with sending it to Louvain in the usual form in 1570, but they published it again nine or ten years after; and they affected to have it done by a Jesuit in 1580, which the Society had without doubt sollicited to make a shew of their credit. What did Baius, and the Faculty do upon this? Nothing but submit themselves humbly, and suppress, for peace sake, and the edification of the faithful, all the justifications and all the explications which they might have made use of, and every thing that they might have represented in their favour. However we are not to conclude, that Baius wrote nothing in justification of himself; his Letter to Cardinal Simonette (7) proves the contrary; for he shews there that Doctor John Hessels and himself put into the hands of Cardinal Granvelle their answer to certain propositions, which that Cardinal had communicated to them. The Scotists, in order to run down these two Doctors, formed these propositions, and presented them to some persons of great dignity, without naming either Hessels or Baius. If it be asked why they wanted to run down these two Professors? I answer, because they made use of a method which had the appearance of a dangerous innovation. After the explication of the Master of Sentences, they endeavoured to reduce the study of Divinity to the holy Scriptures, and to the writings of the ancient Fathers (8), and especially to those of St. Augustin. This was by no means pleasing to persons accustomed to different sentiments, and especially to those, who being unwilling to give themselves the pains of studying much, thought it better to follow the opinions, which were received by the majority, than those, which were established with a great deal of care upon the solid foundation of the Scriptures; and these persons imagined that there was a design to reproach and stigmatize them, as often as any person in Lectures or Disputations spoke otherwise than they did, or taught any thing different from what they had been used . . . . to read in certain Authors. Baius was not contented with writing this Letter (9); but he sent an Apology for his Opinions to the Pope in the year 1569.

(6) Gery, Apologie Historique de deux Censures de Louvain & de Douai, pag. 26, Cologne edition in 1688.

(7) The Sieur Gery, pag. 40. produces a part of it, which he had translated from the Latin, which is printed in the Fasti of the University of Louvain, p. 366.

(8) Gery, Apologie des Censur. pag. 40, 41.

(9) It is quoted in the Bibliotheque Universelle, tom. 14. pag. 198, as being printed at the end of Apologia de Baius, at Roan in 1666.

[F] Valerius Andreas has committed several errors in speaking of the censure of Pius V against Baius (10).] I. He tells us as a certain fact, that the Bull of Pius V against contain ſeveral pieces, which have never been printed yet. The perſon, who has collected them, will illuſtrate them with a great many theological and hiſtorical Notes. He has compared the editions of the Works of this Author with the Manuſcripts, which are found in good Libraries. It was reported that Michael Baius, in order to revenge himſelf upon the Jeſuits, whom he believed to be the promoters of the Cenſure of his Doctrine, employed all his intereſt at Louvain, to obtain a Cenſure upon the Doctrines of Leonard Leſſius (i). I muſt not paſs over in ſilence that care was taken of his honour in the Bull of Pius V [G]. His Will was a proof of his great charity [H]; for he left all his againſt the LXXVI propoſitions was confirmed by Gregory XIII. It will be proved in the new edition of Baius, that this is falſe (11). II. He affirms, that the greateſt part of theſe LXXVI propoſitions was extracted from the books of Baius. The contrary of which will be proved in the new edition. III. He contents himſelf with ſaying, that the Bull of Pius V was publiſhed at Louvain the 17th and 19th of April 1570. But beſides that he ſhould have ſaid the 16th of November, he has fallen into ſeveral faults of omiſſion. He has not told us, that the Bull was publiſhed, not by order of the Pope, or by that of Cardinal Granvelle, but by that of the Duke of Alva, and of the Synod of Mechlen. This was an irregularity, ſince the Pope had commiſſioned Cardinal de Granvelle, to notify the Bull to the Divines of Louvain in the manner, which he thought moſt proper. However Valerius Andreas ſhould have told us who they were, that gave orders for publiſhing the Bull. He ſhould likewiſe have obſerved, that on the days, which he mentions, I mean the 17th and 19th of April, Michael Baius declared publicly what his opinion was upon the propoſitions condemned. The retractation, which was drawn from him, was extorted by ill methods. The new edition will treat of all thoſe particulars. IV. He relates, that perſons of credit told the Pope, that there were ſome Divines at Louvain, who were making an apology for the propoſitions condemned. It will appear from the teſtimony of Tolet, that they were impoſtors, who told thoſe reports to the Pope. V. He aſſerts, that Gregory XIII condemned again the ſame propoſitions. This will be ſhewed to be falſe. VI. He places the death of Baius on the 16th of December; it ſhould be placed on the 16th of September (12). I ſhall not repeat what I have already obſerved (13) relating to the falſe Chronology of his Printers. I ought not to add to it the year 1551, which he mentions as the firſt year of his being Regius Profeſſor in Divinity; he is not miſtaken; but the Epitaph of Baius was not formed on that date, ſince it makes that Profeſſorſhip continue forty years, two years longer than the calculation of Valerius Andreas requires. That, which might occaſion a great many perſons to multiply the Bulls againſt Michael Baius, is, that they imagine, there is no difference between condemning a doctrine, and cauſing the condemnation, which another had made of that doctrine, to be publiſhed. In that ſenſe it may truly be ſaid that Gregory XIII condemned the LXXVI propoſitions; for he not only iſſued out a Bull, in which he inſerted the conſtitution of Pius V, declaring that he had found it in the Regiſters of that Pope, and that an entire faith ought to be given to it; but likewiſe he commanded that his Bull ſhould be publiſhed ſolemnly at Louvain by the Jeſuit Tolet in the year 1580. Morillon, Great Vicar of Mechlen, notified that of Pius V to the Divines of Louvain in 1567. He notified it again to them with a little more formality in 1570.

(10) Valer. And. in Fastis Academicis Studii Lovaniensis.

(i) See l'Apologie des Cenſures des deux Univerſitez, publiſhed by Mr. Gery, in the year 1688.

(11) What I ſay here, as well as in the body of the Article, with reſpect to the new edition of Baius, is taken from a memorial which is fallen into my hands, and which comes from a good hand.

(12) He had done ſo in his Bibliotheca Belgica.

(13) In the quotation (c).

[G] There was care taken of his honour in the Bull of Pius V.] The Letter of Baius, which has been quoted (14), adds, that after many long ſollicitations, which began from the Pontificate of Pius IV, they obtained at laſt of Pius V a Bull dated the 1ſt of October 1567, which condemned 76 (15) propoſitions (16). It is true that he, who brought the Bull by commiſſion from Cardinal Granvelle, ſaid before every body in the Aſſembly of the Faculty of Divinity at Louvain, that the firſt LX of theſe propoſitions had been extracted from the writings of Baius (17); but at laſt the Bull did not name them, and beſides it ſoftened the note of the condemnation, ſince it intimated that part of thoſe propoſitions were capable of a favourable ſenſe. Cardinal Pallavicini informs us, that in order to treat Baius with the greateſt lenity, Pope Pius V contented himſelf with cauſing his Bull to be privately notified to the Univerſity of Louvain by the Archbiſhop of Mechlen; but as the evil did not ceaſe, Gregory XIII thought proper to publiſh it ſolemnly, and deputed for that purpoſe the Jeſuit Francis Tolet his Preacher, who did not oblige Baius to a public retractation, and leſt him without any ſcandal: Hic ſtuduit Baium removere à pravis illis opinionibus, cohortatus, ut Sedis Apoſtolicæ judicio acquieſceret; & perpaucis colloquiis id obtinuit, privatâ illius retractatione contentus: atque hoc pacto Baius non ſolum illæſus perſtitit, ſed ipſius etiam nomini verba Diplomatis pepercere; quin per illud ejus errores manum tam mitem experti ſunt, ut vix viderentur errores, cum aliquæ ex proſcriptis poſitionibus, nullis certis in hac exceptione adnotatis, dicerentur poſſe ſuſtineri in aliquâ minus propriâ ſignificatione (18). We have obſerved in another place (19), the inconveniency of cenſuring an heap of propoſitions in ſo general and uncertain a manner, that the word reſpectivè does not help us to diſtinguiſh them. The Bull of Pius V had this inconvenience; and beſides that, it threw people's minds into an uncertainty on another account; for without marking any particularly, it aſſured them, that among the propoſitions condemned there were ſome, which might be allowed in ſome ſort. This was the leaſt thing, that the Bull permitted, and there was no calling in queſtion that permiſſion; but it might be pretended that it permitted much more. The arrangement of the words occaſioned this perplexity; a comma was omitted; this omiſſion made the words capable of two very different ſenſes; and this was the ſource of prodigious diſputes. See the Latin, which I am going to quote, and admire the adventures and hazards of controverſies. Quas quidem ſententias ſtricto coram nobis examine ponderatas, quanquam nonnullæ aliquo pacto ſuſtineri poſſint in rigore & proprio verborum ſenſu ab auctoribus intento hæreticas, erroneas, ſuſpectas, temerarias, ſcandaloſas, & in pias aures offenſionem immittentes, reſpectivè & præſentium autoritate damnamus (20). That, which the Pagans called the Sports and Caprices of Fortune, is not excluded from this ſanctuary; the pretended infallible Oracle of Rome does not remedy the diſorder. After he has taken the greateſt pains in concerting every ſyllable of his anſwer, he may ſee that his Copier or Secretary by omitting a comma, will be the cauſe of the damnation of an infinite number of people. Nay further; the comma ſignifies nothing there; put it after the word poſſint, or not, the equivocation ſtill ſubſiſts. The cuſtom of Writers, or Printers, does not prove that a comma after poſſint connects what follows to the word damnamus. We may find in the moſt correct book a hundred thouſand comma's placed as that which ſhould be put after poſſint; and yet from ſuch a comma to the next point, the words do not relate to the word poſſint, or to ſuch another.

(14) Above in quotation (7).

(15) Pallavic. Hiſt. Concil. Trident. lib. 15. cap. 7. num. 12. ſays Septuaginta novem Baii poſitiones; that is, 79 poſitions.

(16) Gery, Apologie des Cenſures, pag. 43.

(17) Idem, ibid. pag. 44.

(18) Pallav. Hiſt. Conc. Trid. lib. 15. cap. 7. num. 12.

(19) In remark [E] of the Article (THOMAS) ANGLUS.

A BULL, in which the placing of the words, occaſioned an obſcurity, which was encreaſed by the omiſſion of a comma.

(20) Journal de St. Amour, P. 2. pag. 64. quoted in the Bibliothèq. Univerſelle, tom. 14. pag. 201. See likewiſe Difficultez propoſées à Mr. Steyaert, Part 9. pag. 180. and the new edition of the Works of Baius, Part 2. pag. 235, &c.

[H] His Will was a proof of his great charity.] The author of the Apology for the Cenſures of Louvain and Doway oppoſes this virtue of Michael Baius to the pretended miracles of Leſſius. It is a great miracle, ſays he (21), to ſee ſo great an humility joined with ſo noble a genius and ſo profound a knowledge; which made even Tolet himſelf ſay this of him, which is ſtill preſerved at Louvain by a tradition; MICHAELE BAIO NIHIL DOCTIUS, NIHIL HUMILIUS. It is a great miracle to ſee ſuch a ſubmiſſion and patience, as appeared in him, notwithſtanding the uſage he received with regard to the Pope's Bull. It is a great miracle to ſee ſo holy a Prieſt as he was, whoſe ſtudies and whoſe infinite occupations did not abate of his piety, and who ſhed tears at the altar, being warmly affected with the ſacredneſs of our myſteries. In ſhort it is a great miracle to ſee ſo great a charity to the poor as he was poſſeſſed with, ſo that he would not have any other heirs to his eſtate than them, and with that reſolution extinguiſhed all the ſenti- his eſtate to the poor (k). He founded a College at Louvain, under the protection of St. Auguſtin (l). He died the 16th of September 1589, in the 77th year of his age, and was interred in the College of the Pope, of which he had been a long while Principal. JAMES BAIUS his nephew, a Doctor of Divinity, erected a Monument for him, with a fine inſcription (m). This nephew followed the ſteps of his uncle. He was promoted to the Degree of Doctor of Divinity in the year 1586 (n). He was frequently deputed for the affairs of the Univerſity of Louvain, and diſcharged thoſe commiſſions with great prudence and addreſs (o). He was Dean of St. Peter's in that city, and Regius Profeſſor of the Catechiſm (p). He publiſhed ſeveral treatiſes [I]. He gave all his eſtate for the uſe of the College [K], and died the 5th of October 1614 (q).

(21) Gery, Apologie des Cenſures, pag. 37, 58.

(l) Idem, ibid.

(k) Swert. in Athenis Belgicis, pag. 565.

(m) You will find it in Swertius, pag. 565.

(n) Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 401.

(o) Swert. in Athen. Belgicis, pag. 355.

(p) Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 401.

(q) Idem, ibid. Swertius ſays the 9th of October.

The new edition of the Works of Baius, which I ſpoke of as a thing to come, has been publiſhed ſince the firſt edition of this Dictionary [L], and been condemned at Rome by the Congregation of the Index Expurgatorius. It contains ſeveral inſtructive particulars, and ments of Nepotiſm, how lawful ſoever they might have been in him. It is this will render Baius amiable to poſterity; whereas a reputation, which is only ſupported by an artificial report of miracles and wonders founded upon nothing, decays in a little time, and vaniſhes into ſmoak. Cardinal Pallavicini tells us, that Commendon, giving an account to the Cardinal of Mantua of the ſtate in which he found the Univerſity of Louvain in the year 1561, informed him that Michael Baius and John Heſſelius had taught ſome new doctrines concerning Free-Will, and that they were two perſons very commendable for their learning and exemplary life (22); that Ruard Tapper had taken umbrage at their union, and thought they valued their learning too much, tho' they were in other reſpects modeſt and virtuous. "But, continues he, every one "places his vanity in the art, which he profeſſes, and "eaſily bears other things." Compertum ſibi eſſe Ruardum in theologicis diſciplinis præclarum, dum is in illâ Academiâ docens in his duobus adhuc ætate juvenili obſervaret infauſtam conjunctionem ingenii & audaciæ, ſolitum eſſe dicere ſe nonniſi ſchiſma ab illis expectare, & theologicam lauream diu ipſis diſtuliſſe; eos profecto videri ſcientiæ ſuæ nimis amantes, quamvis alioquin probos & modeſtos; & hæc ille verba ſapienter uſurpavit, digna quæ à nobis repetantur; ſed cujuſque ſuperbia in eâ arte quam profitetur ſita eſt, cetera facile ſuffert (23).

(22) Erant ambo & ſcientiâ & exemplo vitæ conſpicui. Pallav. Hiſt. Concil. Trident. lib. 15. cap. 7. num. 7.

(23) Idem, ibid. num. 9.

[I] JAMES BAIUS . . . publiſhed ſeveral Treatiſes.] A Panegyric upon the Arrival of Archduke Albert and the Infanta of Spain; a Catechiſm, ſive Inſtitutionum Chriſtianæ Religionis libri IV; & de venerabili Euchariſtiæ Sacramento & Sacrificio Miſſæ libri III (24).

(24) Ex Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 401.

[K] He gave all his eſtate for the uſe of a College.] Swertius informs us, I. That James Baius left the adminiſtration of his eſtate to Giles Baius, his nephew, Doctor and Profeſſor of Divinity, and that he charged him to employ it wholly in the building of a college for young perſons of his country. II. That Giles Baius in execution of his uncle's Will, built a fine college, which is juſtly called BAIANUM. III. That this college had been built but a few years; he mentions the place where it ſtands. Obſecutus patrui deſiderio, auguſtiſſimum (collegium) abhinc paucis annis exſtruxit è regione Pædagogii Falconis, & BAIANUM meritò indigitatur (25). But Aubertus Miræus, who could not be ignorant of what Swertius writes above, contents himſelf with aſſuring us, that he had read, that James Baius had thoughts of building a college for the entertainment of Students in Divinity: De altero collegio ſacrarum literarum ſtudioſis adoleſcentibus pariter alendis piè prudenterque cogitâſſe ſcriptum invenimus (26). In this manner we ſpeak, when we can only praiſe a man for the good intentions, which an Author, whom we have read, aſcribes to him; for when we know that they have been put in execution, we mention it expreſly. So that it is plain, that Aubertus Miræus knew nothing of the building of the Collegium Baianum. Now this ignorance of ſo notorious a fact is ſomewhat prodigious, in ſuch a man as he, who knew ſo well his own country, the Spaniſh Netherlands.

(25) Swert. Ath. Belg. pag. 355. This book was printed in 1628.

(26) Mir. de Scriptor. Sæculi 16. pag. 134.

[L] The new edition of the Works of Baius . . . has been publiſhed ſince the firſt edition of this Dictionary.] The title is as follows: Michaëlis Baii, celeberrimi in Lovanienſi Academia Theologi, Opera, cum Bullis Pontificum, & aliis ipſius cauſam ſpectantibus, jam primum ad Romanam Eccleſiam ab convitiis Proteſtantium, ſimul ac Arminianorum, cæterorumque hujuſce temporis Pelagianorum impoſturis vindicandam collecta, expurgata, & plurimis, quæ hactenus delituerant, Opuſculis aucta, ſtudio A. P. Theologi. Coloniæ Agrippinæ, ſumptibus Balthaſaris ab Egmont & Sociorum, MDCXCVI. It is a thick volume in quarto, divided into two parts; the firſt of which contains beſides the writings of Baius, which had been already printed, ſix or ſeven pieces of that Author, which had never been printed before. The ſecond almoſt entirely conſiſts of writings, which were never publiſhed till then, and which relate to the cenſure of ſeveral propoſitions of Baius. One of theſe pieces is a chronological Narrative of the Proceedings in that cauſe, and was drawn up by the perſon, who had the care of that edition. We are informed by that Narrative, amongſt other things, that two reaſons engaged Michael Baius to form his method of teaching Divinity upon the Scriptures and the Fathers, and eſpecially St. Auguſtin (27). The firſt was, that the Proteſtants of the Low-Countries boaſted of having the Scriptures and the ancient Fathers on their ſide. The ſecond was, that ſeveral Catholic Writers (28), by abandoning the hypotheſis of St. Auguſtin, approached very near to the Pelagian ſchemes. Ruard Tapper and Tiletan, Profeſſors of Divinity at Louvain, diſapproved of this new method of Baius, when they took notice of it after their return from the Council in 1552; and we are aſſured that Ruard Tapper cried out one day, What Devil has brought this doctrine into our ſchool, during our abſence? This was the beginning of a furious ſtorm againſt Michael Baius: the Franciſcans chiefly fell upon him. The Guardian of Nivelle, and that of Aeth ſent eighteen articles to the Sorbonne at Paris in 1560, and deſired them to give their judgment upon them. The Sorbonne condemned all of them; three, as falſe and contrary to Scripture, and the reſt as heretical. Baius made remarks upon that cenſure, and had a mind to communicate them to ſome Doctor at Paris; but he quitted that deſign, when he ſaw, that it was impoſſible to procure a copy of that Decree of the Sorbonne (29). He communicated them to the Provincial of the Franciſcans. He ſhewed plainly that they had cenſured as heretical what was clearly contained in St. Auguſtin. The year following there was preſented to Cardinal Granvelle a liſt of propoſitions extracted from the writings of Baius, as was pretended; and yet ſome of theſe propoſitions were contrary to his ſentiments; and he had never diſputed either for or againſt ſeveral others; and almoſt all of them were drawn up with ſo much art, that the mere turn of expreſſions might render him ſuſpected either of falſity or hereſy (30). The Cardinal communicated them to Michael Baius who wrote an Anſwer to them, which is not to be found. The ſame Cardinal received orders to enjoin both parties ſilence; and by that means the conteſt was appeaſed: but it was revived in the year 1564; for Tiletan endeavoured to procure the Univerſities of Spain to cenſure the writings of Baius (31), and ſent Extracts to Pope Pius V in order to get them condemned. Other Extracts were added to theſe, and were ſent to Pius V, who iſſued out a Bull the firſt of October 1567, in which he condemns LXXVI propoſitions. This Bull was neither publiſhed nor fix'd up; it was only read to Baius, and to the Faculty of Divinity at Louvain the 29th of December 1567, by Maximilian Morillon, Vicar General to the Archbiſhop of Mechlen (32). This Vicar General

(27) Oper. Mich. Baii, Part 2. pag. 192.

(28) As Bartholomew Camerarius, Albert Pighius, Francis Horantius, a Spaniſh Franciſcan, Ruard Tapper.

(29) Baii Oper. Part 2. p. 193.

(30) Ibid. pag. 194.

(31) The cenſures of the Univerſities of Salamanca and Alcala were not made till after the death of Tiletan. See Baii Oper. Part 2. pag. 195.

(32) Baii Oper. Part 2. pag. 197.

and many things, which would afford a large ſcope to thoſe, who have a talent at reflections. The remark, which I ſhall give, concerning this edition, contains a good Supplement to this Article. The perſon, who procured it, was extremely ill treated by Father neral being deſired to grant a copy of that Bull, refuſed to give it. He declared that he had an order to prohibit all the printed books, from which it was ſaid the greateſt part of the LXXVI propoſitions were extracted. The Dean of the Faculty repreſented, that for weighty reaſons it was very neceſſary, that the books of Michael Baius ſhould not be prohibited; ſo that they ſell not under that prohibition. This Doctor wrote to the Pope the 8th of January 1569, and ſent him an Apology, in which he ſhews, that he had not taught thoſe LXXVI propoſitions, and that moſt of them, in a certain ſenſe, were true and agreeable to St. Auſtin's doctrine. The Anſwer, which the Pope wrote to him the 3d of May the ſame year, contains an exhortation to ſubmit himſelf to the cenſure. Baius was extremely ſurprized, when he received that letter of Pius V, to ſee himſelf treated as a rebel, who had incurred the penalty of excommunication and irregularity. He deſired of Morillon to be abſolved from that penalty, and he could not obtain it but by abjuring the articles, which the Bull had condemned. Summopere autem miratus eſt Baius ſecum agi ac ſi ſuas Vindicias & Apologiam ſcribendo Pontifici, in eum fuiſſet rebellis, ac excommunicationis & irregularitatis cenſuras incurriſſet; à quibus cum peteret abſolvi, Morillonus abſolutionis beneficium ei impertiri noluit, quin prius articulos per Bullam confixos ejuraverit (33). From that time every body was permitted to caſt their invectives againſt that Doctor, as if he had really taught thoſe LXXVI articles. He was declaimed againſt both in Sermons and Lectures: he ſupported this misfortune without ſaying any thing; but there were three Biſhops, who adviſed him in 1570 to defend himſelf. He therefore explained his opinions in his Divinity-Auditory, and declared, that among thoſe LXXVI propoſitions, there were ſome, which deſerved to be condemned; but that he had never maintained them; that there were others, which were maliciouſly forged; that he did not admit them in the bad ſenſe, which they might be capable of, tho' otherwiſe they were ſuſceptible of a ſound interpretation. Cæpit in Scholis Theologorum quid circa hujuſmodi Articulos ſentiret, cum multâ humilitate ac modeſtiâ aperire; declarans nonnullos ipſorum eſſe falſos ac jure confixos; ſed à ſe nunquam traditos; alios eſſe arte ac dolo confictos, qui prævum ſenſum pati poſſunt, quem nunquam tenuit, licet & in ſano intelligi quoque facile poſſent (35). In the month of June the ſame year 1570 the Biſhops of the Low-Countries held a Council at Mechlen, where at the inſtance of the Duke of Alva they engaged to publiſh ſolemnly the Bull of Pius V at Louvain, and to have it ſigned by all the Profeſſors of Divinity. The commiſſion was given to Morillon, who executed it the 16th of November of the ſame year. He could not however procure the ſigning of the Formulary, by which he required the approbation of the cenſure of the LXXVI propoſitions. The Faculty of Divinity at Louvain imagined there was ſome ſnare under it; and though they were aſſured by letters from the Biſhop of Boiſle-duc, and the Biſhop of Ghent, that there was no deſign to ſurprize them, it does not appear that they ever agreed to ſign it; but the year following they made a Decree, declaring that the LXXVI propoſitions ſhould be conſidered as condemn'd; and that all the Members of the Faculty ſhould abſtain from teaching them; and that all the books, in which they were maintained, ſhould be taken away from the Students in Divinity (36). We may obſerve that Morillon did not deliver any copy of the Bull, which he notified ſolemnly. This gave occaſion to ſome to aſſert, that it was a falſe one, or that having been obtained by indirect methods, it would be recall'd. Others maintained the contrary with great warmth. Pope Gregory XIII, being ſollicited by the Spaniſh Embaſſador, in the name of his maſter, or by Father Tolet in the name of ſeveral Divines of Louvain, to apply a ſpeedy remedy to theſe diſputes, made a conſtitution the 28th of January 1579, in which he inſerted the Bull of Pius V, without approving or confirming it, and without condemning again the LXXVI propoſitions. He contented himſelf with ſaying, that he had found it in the Regiſters of his predeceſſors, and with ordering that credit ſhould be given to it. He ſent the ſame Father Tolet to Louvain in 1580. That Jeſuit ſolemlny notified there the conſtitution of Gregory XIII, and aſked Baius whether he condemned the LXXVI articles. Baius anſwered, I condemn them according to the intention of the Bull (27). All the Doctors, Licentiates, Batchelors, &c. declared that they ſubmitted to this Bull. Tolet, in ſeveral converſations, which he had with Baius, told him, that he was accuſed of teaching privately his Scholars the doctrines, which Pius V had condemned. Baius denied it, and ſubmited to all manner of puniſhments, if he ſhould be convicted legally of what he was accuſed of. No perſon attempting to prove it upon him, Tolet promiſed to give a good teſtimony of him at the Court of Rome, and declared that it was falſe, that the reading of Baius's writings was prohibited. He propoſed to him the ſigning of a Formulary, which was very ſevere; however Baius did not refuſe it, that he might procure himſelf ſome reſt. He was obliged to acknowledge in writing, that he had taught a great many of the LXXVI articles, which were condemned, and that they were condemned in the ſenſe, which he had taken them in. Ei præſcripſit (Toletus) quandam confeſſionis formulam, in quâ fateri debuit multos ex damnatis 76 Articulis à ſe eſſe traditos, ac eo ſenſu proſcriptos, quo eos docuiſſet; cui formulæ optimus hic Doctor undique laceſſitus ac calumniis obrutus, ut tandem pace aliquâ frueretur, ſubſcripſit die vigeſimâ quartâ Martii hujus anni 1580 (38). He wrote a letter to the Pope, in which he gave an account of the calumnies, which had been caſt upon him for twelve years paſt, on account of thoſe articles, and deſired a copy of the Bull of Pius V. This was granted him in June 1580. Father Horantius publiſhed a book againſt him the ſame year. He complained of two things; one was, that Baius had anſwered Philip de Marnix in too civil terms (39); Conquerens, quod ejus Epiſtolæ Marnixio ſcriptæ nimis benignæ fuiſſent (40), the other was, that Baius had ſaid agreeably to the doctrine of St. Auguſtin, that in order to judge of the Church, we ought only to conſult the Scripture: 2. Quod Baius Auguſtinum ſecutus dixiſſet judicium de Eccleſiâ eſſe ex ſolâ Scriptura petendum (41). Baius juſtified himſelf in a Letter, which he prefixed to his Apology againſt Philip de Marnix in 1581. He was diſquieted again in the year 1585, for his enemies complained of him to the Pope's Nuncio, and deſired that he might be interrogated upon ſeveral articles, which they had drawn up (42). It is not known whether he underwent that tryal.

The author of this Chronological Narrative takes a great deal of pains to inform us, that Mr. Leidecker, and ſome other Miniſters are in the wrong to conclude from this Bull of Pius V, that the Romiſh Communion condemned the doctrine of St. Auguſtin, and favoured the new Pelagians (43). He ſhews clearly enough, in my opinion, the invalidity of this Bull, the inſincerity of thoſe who made the extracts, the negligence of this Pope, and his raſhneſs in condemning the articles before he had examined the works, from which they were pretended to be taken, &c. This negligence appears alſo from this conſideration, that the rules of Grammar were not obſerved in that Bull (44). It may be alledged that Urban VIII in his Bull againſt Janſenius's book, publiſhed in 1642, confirmed the Bull of Pius V, and that of Gregory XIII; but the author anſwers, that Urban VIII did not confirm theſe Bulls but upon the ſuppoſition of facts, which were falſe; and ſo his confirmation was invalid. Quandoquidem ergo Urbanus eas non confirmaverit, niſi ſupponendo quæ falſa ſunt, ex iſtâ confirmatione nullum robur accedit iſtis ſuorum prædeceſſorum conſtitutionibus; quod enim in ſuâ origine vitioſum ac nullius roboris eſt, rati-habitione non ſit validum, vel ut jura loquuntur *, quod initio vitioſum eſt, non poteſt tractu temporis convaleſcere; nec firmatur tractu temporis, quod jure ab initio non ſubſiſtit (45). This Pope, being deceived by Francis Albizzi, Aſſeſſor of the Holy Office, and Penſionary of the Jeſuits, imagined that the Bull of Pius V had been confirmed by that of Gregory XIII. Theſe were two falſe

(27) Damno ſecundum intentionem Bullæ, & ſicut Bulla eos damnat. Baii Oper. Part 2. pag. 206.

(33) Ibid. pag. 199.

(34) Martin Richtovius, Biſhop of Ipres: Francis Sonnius Biſhop of Bolduc; and Cornelius Janſenius Biſhop of Ghent.

(35) Baii Oper. Part 2. pag. 200.

(36) Ibid. pag. 202, 203.

(38) Baii Oper. Part 2. p. 207.

(39) Æquo animo ferre non potuit, quod Baius humaniori ſtilo ſuas ad Marnixium ſcripſiſſet Epiſtolas. Baii Oper. Part 2. pag. 208.

(40) Ibid. Compare this man with the French Miniſter, who complained publickly in 1698 of the Letters of Mr. Jaquelot to the French Biſhops.

(41) Baii Oper. Part 2. pag. 208.

(42) Idem, ibid. pag. 209.

(43) Idem, ibid. pag. 210, & ſeq.

(44) Ibid. pag. 235.

* ff. de Reg. Jur. & VI Decret. eod. Tit.

(45) Baii Oper. Part 2. pag. 239, 240.

(r) Quibus eam asserat Baii nuperus Editor.

ther Dez a Jesuit, in a Work written expresly in defence of the Church of Rome against the reproaches of that Editor (r).

suppositions; for Pius V did not cause his Bull to be fixed up, nor published it solemnly at Rome; and with respect to that of Pope Gregory, he only says that he found it in the Registers of his predecessors. They made therefore Urban VIII assert a falsity, when they inserted in his Bull, that the articles condemned by Pius V had been censured again by Gregory XIII; and to conceal from the Public the knowledge of this imposture, they took care not to insert the constitution of Gregory XIII in the Bull of Urban VIII, though they inserted there the Bull of Pius V. Animadvertendum est quod Urbanus VIII in Bullâ superius memoratâ enunciaverit quidem à Gregorio XIII confirmatam fuisse Pii V Constitutionem, Articulosque in eâ confixos denuò fuisse damnatos. Verum hæc Urbani VIII Bulla aperte falsi eâ saltem in parte convincitur, sicut & ab Joanne Sinnichio Lovanienſis Academiæ delegato Romæ convicta est, ex ipsomet Gregorii XIII diplomate, in quo nihil de ista confirmatione, aut de iterata hujusmodi articulorum disjunctione habetur. Ne autem id innotesceret, Albizzius, Jesuitarum stipendiarius, qui Bullam Urbani VIII conscripsit, in ea quidem Pii V Bullam integram inseruit, sed non Gregorii XIII constitutionem, ex qua singulis patuisset ejus mendacium, & quam falsè in Bulla Urbani dicatur Pii V Bulla à Gregorio XIII confirmata, proscriptique in ea articuli, iterum à Gregorio XIII prohibiti: cum Gregorius XIII duntaxat testificetur tenorem Bullæ, quam inserit, esse plane conformem tenori Bullæ, quam in Pii V regiſtro invenit; & isti tenori eam fidem adhibendam, quæ ipsius Bullæ protographo debetur (46). All this is much more proper to shew the frauds, which are made use of in condemning books, than to refute Mr. Leidecker's reasoning; for in short, for one Roman Catholic, who believes Baius innocent, there are above a thousand, who believe him justly condemned; so that we may accuse the Church of Rome upon the most probable grounds, of holding the opinions of this Doctor to be heretical, which notwithstanding were the most agreeable to those of St. Augustin. This should make us pity the fate of some men. Tho' passion, irregularity, and injustice appear plainly in the proceedings against them, yet they are however in the wrong still, in the opinion of a great many. It is sufficient that there has been a judgment given against their doctrine, to oblige the Public to continue prejudiced against them. Their adversary will enjoy the fruit of his frauds and intrigues; and he will for ever take his advantage of the folly of the populace, who almost always presume in favour of the Tribunals.

(46) Ibid. pag. 242.

We are promised (47) a large work of Baius, if this new edition meets with a good sale. It will be his Commentary upon the Master of the Sentences, and his Explication of the Psalms of David.

(47) In Præfat.

☞ BAKER (THOMAS) an eminent Mathematician, and Author of the Geometrical Key [A], was son of James Baker of Ilton in Somersetshire, Steward to the family of the Strangways of Dorsetshire. He was born at Ilton, and became a batler of Magdalen Hall in the beginning of the year 1640, when he was about fifteen years of age. He was elected a Scholar of Wadham College on the 27th of April 1645, and did some service to King Charles I in the garrison at Oxford. He was admitted Bachelor of Arts April the 10th 1647, and left the College without compleating that Degree by Determination, and was neither Chaplain nor Fellow of that College. He was afterwards Minister of Bishops Nymphton in Devonshire, where he lived many years in a very retired and studious manner, and prosecuted his studies in the Mathematics. He died there June the 5th 1690, and was buried in his own Church. A little before his death the Members of the Royal Society sent him some mathematical queries; to which he returned so satisfactory an answer, that they gave him a Medal with an inscription which was very honourable to him (a).

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 850, 851. 2d edit. London 1721.

[A] Author of the Geometrical Key.] The title of it is as follows; The Geometrical Key; or the Gate of Equations unlock'd, or a new Discovery of the Construction of all Equations, howsoever affected, not exceeding the fourth degree, viz. of Linears, Quadratics, Cubics, Biquadratics, and the finding of all their Roots, as well false as true, without the use of Mesolabe, Trisection of Angles, without Reduction, Depression, or any other previous preparations of Equations, by a Circle, and any (and that one only) Parabole, &c. London 1684, 4to, in Latin and English. We have an account of this book in the Philosophical Transactions, Number 154, March the 20th 1683-4. T.

☞ BAKER (RICHARD), Author of the Chronicle of the Kings of England [A], was the son of John Baker of London Gentleman, and Katherine, daughter of Reynold Scot of Scots-Hall in Kent, Knight. His Grandfather, Sir John Baker, of Sissingherst in Kent, was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and one of the Privy Council to King Henry VIII. Our Author was born at Sissingherst, and entered a Commoner of Hart-Hall in Oxford in 1584, and matriculated in Michaelmas Term, being then in the 16th year of his age. Having prosecuted the studies of Logic and Philosophy about three years in that House, where he had for his Chamber-fellow the famous Sir Henry Wotton (a), he removed to one of the

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 623. 2d edit. London 1721.

[A] Author of the Chronicle of the Kings of England.] It was published at London in fol. 1641, with the title of a Chronicle of the Kings of England from the time of the Roman Government unto the Death of King James, &c. The Author tells us, that it was collected with so great care and diligence, that if all of our Chronicles were lost, this only would be sufficient to inform posterity of all passages memorable or worthy to be known. But Mr. Wood observes upon this (1), that "it being reduced to method, and not according to "time, purposely to please Gentlemen and Novices, "many chief things to be observed therein, as name, "time, &c. are egregiously false, and consequently "breed a great deal of confusion in the peruser, espe-"cially if he be curious or critical." There was another edition of it published in 1653, and another in 1658, and another in 1660; to which was added The History of the Reign of King Charles I; and a Continuation from his death to 1658, written by Mr. Edward Philips, nephew to Milton the Poet, and formerly a Student of Magdalen Hall. Afterwards in 1661 there was published another edition, in which was contained an addition of The first thirteen years of King Charles II, that is, from the Death of King Charles I, to the Coronation of King Charles II, with the Occurrences of his Restoration by George late Duke of Albemarle, extracted from his Excellency's Papers, &c. (2). Mr. Wood tells us (3). that he was informed, that these papers were the most part drawn up by Sir Thomas Clarges, whose sister the Duke of Albemarle had married, and who put them into the hands of Mr. Philips; who attributing more to the Duke's glory than was true, he got the ill-will of him. He added likewise to the reign of King James I. and King Charles I, the names of the Noblemen, whom

(1) Athenæ Oxon. vol. 2. col. 72.

(2) See Bishop Kennet's Register pag. 595. edit. London, fol. 1728.

(3) Col. 72, 73.

the Inns of Court, and afterwards travelled into foreign countries in order to compleat his Education. In 1594, after the celebration of a moſt ſolemn Act, he was, with other perſons of Quality, created Maſter of Arts, and May the 17th 1603 he received the honour of Knighthood from King James I at Theobalds. About this time he lived at Highgate near London, and was univerſally eſteemed a man of excellent genius and great learning; "the "benefit of which, as Mr. Wood obſerves (b), he reaped in his old age, when his conſi- "derable eſtate was, through ſuretiſhip, very much impaired." In 1620 he was High-Sheriff of Oxfordſhire, and in the Commiſſion of the Peace, and was Lord of the Mannor of Middle-Aſton (c). He wrote ſeveral books beſides his Chronicle [B]. The Hiſtorian quoted above tells us, that he was a perſon tall and comely, of a good diſpoſition and admirable diſcourſe, religious, and well read in various faculties, eſpecially in Divinity and Hiſtory, as appears from thoſe books, which he compoſed for the moſt part, when he was obliged to fly for ſhelter to his ſtudies and devotions. At laſt after a long ſeries of cares and anxieties, he departed this life in the Fleet-priſon in London on the 18th of February $164\frac{4}{5}$, and was (b) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 72.

(c) Idem, ibid

whom they created, with ſeveral other particulars. There was likewiſe another edition of the Chronicle publiſhed by Mr. Philips in 1684 (4). Mr. Nicholſon in his Engliſh Hiſtorical Library (5) having obſerved, that the firſt edition of the Chronicle in 1641, and the ſecond in 1653 contained nothing but our Author's own work to the end of King James the Firſt's reign, tells us, that Mr. Philips in his Continuation of it to the Reſtoration of King Charles II, having the peruſal of ſome of the Duke of Albemarle's papers, might have ſet that great revolution in its true light, had not ambition and flattery carried him beyond truth and his copy. In the year 1672 was publiſhed at Oxford a little piece intitled, Animadverſions upon Sir Richard Baker's Chronicle and its Continuation, wherein many errors are diſcovered, and ſome truths advanced; by T. B. Eſq; The Author of it, Mr. Blount, tells us in his preface, "that ſince Chronicles are the public records of a "Nation, he wondered not a little to ſee Sir Richard "Baker's twice printed by itſelf, and three times "with a Continuation, and no perſon learned in our "Hiſtory of England, or concerned in the actions of "the late rebellion, or in the adulteration of his own, "or his anceſtor's name or title, ſhould impugn it, "being ſtuffed with ſo many contradictions and re- "petitions, ſo many miſtimings and miſtakings, as "of other things of moment, ſo eſpecially of the "pedigrees, names, and place of our antient Nobi- "lity, Biſhops, Baronets, Gentry, &c." He ſtiles the Continuator a perſon of incompetent parts for ſo great an undertaking; and obſerves, that finding in all this time no ſtop put to ſo great a ſtream of error by any better hand, he thought himſelf obliged to lay theſe few Animadverſions in the way, leſt ſuch muddy waters ſhould at laſt totally overflow the Land of Truth. However that he had not preſumed to meddle with the affairs of State and thoſe great revolutions in the reign of King Charles I, though he was well aſſured the Continuator has in many paſſages neither done right to his ſacred Majeſty nor to thoſe of his ſubjects, who moſt faithfully ſerved him. He allows, that with regard to the errors which ſlipped Sir Richard Baker's pen, ſome excuſes may be aſſigned, as old age, and the confinement of a priſon, &c. (but none, for that his confident aſſertion,) upon which the Continuator builds much in his preface. "That this great Chronicle was col- "lected with ſo great care and diligence, that if all "other Chronicles were loſt, &c. Sir Richard, continues Mr. Blount, acknowledges his work to be a collection out of other Authors, wherein he took up ſome coin upon content, which was not ſterling; and that wherein he onely excelled, was the digeſting the whole into a better method. Yet he confeſſes ſome paſſages (he might have ſaid many) are omitted in the reign of King James, which was the tyme he liv'd in, and had bin fit for the Continuator to have ſupply'd; who inſtead thereof has fowel'd the Continuation into ſuch a bulk of indigeſted matter, as is not at all futable to the reſt of the Hiſtory. Mr. Blount examines (6) Sir Richard Baker's Catalogue of Writers both antient and modern, out of whom this Chronicle hath been collected, and ſhews his miſtakes and anachroniſms in it, and obſerves (7), that our Author "thinking to give a greater reputation to his "book, has (not without much ſuſpicion of vanity) "prefixed a catalogue of ninety three Authors antient "and modern, ... of which number it may be juſtly "ſuſpected he never ſaw above the one half, other- "wiſe he could not, without great inadvertence, ſo "groſly have miſtaken what is here noted. Beſides "if his Wine had been good, it would not have need- "ed ſuch a Buſh." Mr. Nicholſon (8) tells us, that this ſpecimen, which Mr. Blount gave of the many and groſs errors in the Chronicle, ought to have ſhaken its credit. And yet, ſays he, ſo little regard have we for truth, if a ſtory be but handſomly told, the Chronicle has been reprinted ſince that time, and ſells as well as ever, notwithſtanding that no notice is taken of the Animadverſions, but all the old faults remain uncorrected. In 1730 there was publiſhed at London in fol. a new edition of this Chronicle, with a continuation to the year 1660, by E. Philips, and a ſecond Continuation containing the reigns of King Chartes II from his Reſtoration, King James II, King William III and Queen Mary II, Queen Anne, and King George I; by an impartial Hand. The Editor tells us in the preface, that this edition is very much altered from thoſe which had been publiſhed before; and that in the firſt place in Sir Richard Baker's part a great many miſtakes in the names of places and perſons have been corrected, which before were not only an eye-ſore, but ſometimes an hindrance to the reader. However that it was not poſſible to make theſe corrections in every place, becauſe the Author himſelf, being, as it ſhould ſeem, little acquainted with the modern Languages, has diſguiſed ſome foreign names in ſuch a manner, that it is not eaſy to know where to look to ſet them right. But that this happens very ſeldom, and where it does, it is upon occaſions of little importance. The Editor then obſerves, that the Continuation by Mr. Philips to the year 1660 has been contracted, though without any prejudice to the reader, ſince that Writer appears plainly not to have rightly underſtood the nature of the work which he was upon; ſo that he, quite contrary to the method which he ſhould have followed, inſerted many public pieces, liſts of names, and other things of little moment, at full length, when he ought to have given only the ſubſtance of them; and this he has done not only in matters of conſequence, but in ſuch as are not ſo. However that the account, which that Author has given of King Charles's reſtoration, tho' much more prolix than was neceſſary, being taken from the papers of Sir Thomas Clarges, who had a great part in theſe tranſactions, and alſo from thoſe of the Duke of Albemarle, is juſt left as it was: only ſome papers that were inſerted at length, and whoſe ſubſtance might as well be given in few words, have been omitted. Laſtly, that the book might contain an entire ſeries of Engliſh Hiſtory, a ſecond Continuation has been added of the Reigns of ſeveral Princes of our Country till the Death of King Gorge I. Mr. Nicholſon (9) paſſes a very ſevere judgment upon our Author; for tho' he allows, that he was a perſon of thoſe accompliſhments in wit and language, that his Chronicle has been the beſt read and liked of any hitherto publiſhed; yet he tells, that his method is new, and ſeems to pleaſe the rabble; but learned men will be of another opinion; for it is the ſame with that of Suetonius, which is juſtly complained of by (k) Mr. Dodwell.

(4) Idem, col. 1118.

(5) Part 1. pag. 196, 197.

(8) Ubi ſupra, pag. 197. See likewiſe Wood, col. 73.

(9) Hiſt. Litt. pag. 196.

(6) Animadverſions, pag. 1, & ſeq.

(7) Pag. 10.

(k) Prælection. Camden. p. 36.

[B] He wrote ſeveral Books beſides his Chronicle.] I. Cato variegatus, or Cato's moral Diſtichs varied. London 1636. This is a Poem. II. Meditations and Diſquiſitions on the Lord's Prayer. London 1637 in 4to. The fourth edition was publiſh'd there 1640 in was the day following interred in the South-Iſle of St. Bride's Church in Fleet-ſtreet. By his wife Margaret, daughter of Sir George Manwaring of Ightfield in Shropſhire, Knight, (for the payment of the debts of which family he was engaged,) he had iſſue Thomas, Arthur, Cecilia, Anne, Margaret, &c. (d).

(d) Idem, ibid. col. 72, 74.

4to. A copy of this book being ſent to his old chamber-fellow Sir Henry Wotton before it was ſent to the preſs, he returned this judgment of it: "I much admire the very character of your ſtile, which ſeemeth unto me to have not a little of the African idea of St. Auſtin's age, full of ſweet raptures, and of reſearching conceits; nothing borrowed, nothing vulgar, and yet all flowing from you (I know not how) with a certain equal facility." III. Meditations and Diſquiſitions on the three laſt Pſalms of David, London 1639. IV. Meditations and Diſquiſitions on the L Pſalm. London 1639. V. Meditations and Diſquiſitions on the ſeven penitential Pſalms. London 1639, in 4to. VI. Meditations and Diſquiſitions on the firſt Pſalm. London 1640, in 4to. VII. Meditations and Diſquiſitions on the ſeven conſolatory Pſalms of David, namely the 23, 27, 30, 34, 84, 103, and 116. London 1649 in 4to. VIII. Meditations and Prayers upon the ſeven Days of the Week. London 1640, in 16mo; which Mr. Wood (10) ſuppoſes to be the ſame with his Motives of Prayer on the ſeven Days of the Week. IX. Apology for Laymen's writing in Divinity. London 1641, in 12mo. X. Short Meditation on the Fall of Lucifer, printed with the Apology. XI. A Soliloquy of the Soul, or a Pillar of Thoughts, &c. London 1641, in 12mo. XII. Theatrum redivivum; or the Theatre vindicated, in anſwer to Mr. Prynne's Hiſtrio-maſtix, &c. London 1662, in 8vo. XIII. Theatrum triumphans, or, a Diſcourſe of Plays. London 1670, in 8vo. He likewiſe tranſlated from the Italian into Engliſh the Marquis Virgilio Malvezzi's Diſcourſes upon Cornelius Tacitus. London 1642, in fol. and from French into Engliſh the Letters of Monſieur Balzac in IV Parts. London 1638, in 8vo, and 1654, &c. with additions in 4to (11). There is alſo an edition at London in 1654 in 8vo under the following title: Letters of Monſieur de Balzac, I, II, III, and IV Parts. Tranſlated out of French into Engliſh, by Sir Richard Baker Knight, and others. Now collected into one volume, with a methodical Table of all the Letters. The firſt part is dedicated by Sir Richard Baker to the honourable the Lord of Newburge, one of his Majeſty's moſt honourable Privie Councell, and Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaſter. The three firſt parts of this tranſlation have our Author's name prefixed to him; but the laſt ſeems to be done by another hand; and the preface to it is ſigned F. B. Sir Richard Baker wrote his own Life, which he left in manuſcript behind him; but it was burnt or made waſte paper of by one Smith of Pater-Noſter-Row, who married one of his daughters (12). T.

(10) Col. 72.

(11) Idem, col. 74.

(12) Idem, ibid.

BALBUS. This word makes ſo great a figure in the ancient Roman Hiſtory, that it is ſtrange, that the Hiſtorical Dictionaries have done ſo little honour to it [A]. If I attempt to repair their fault, it is chiefly with regard to Lucius Cornelius Balbus, who was Conſul in the year of Rome 714, and who had a nephew, whom I ſhall ſpeak of occaſionally, either in the text or remarks. This Conſul was born at Cadiz. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour in the wars, which the Romans carried on in Spain againſt Sertorius, and againſt the Luſitanians; ſo that Pompey being extremely pleaſed with his great ſervices, declared him a Citizen of Rome. Lucius Gellius, and Cn. Cornelius, who were Conſuls a little after, made a law declaring, that all thoſe, whom Pompey had made Citizens of Rome, with the conſent of the Council of War, ſhould be confirmed as ſuch. By this means, Balbus entred fully into poſſeſſion of the privileges of a Roman Citizen (a). He aſſumed from one of theſe two Conſuls the prænomen of Lucius, and from the other the name of Cornelius [B]. He made himſelf ſo well eſteemed at Rome, that he gained the friendſhip of the greateſt men in the Commonwealth, Pompey, Craſſus, Ceſar, Cicero;

(a) See Cicero in Oratione pro Cornelio Balbo, and Manutius and Nicholaus Abramus upon that paſſage.

The Origin of the firname Balbus. Whether Charles Stephens has given it juſtly to the Atilii?

[A] The Hiſtorical Dictionaries have done but little honour to this word.] They are prodigiouſly barren upon the word Balbus. Charles Stephens obſerves that it was the firname of the Atilii, and that the firſt of that family, who was firnamed Balbus, was called ſo on account of his ſtammering; from whence his deſcendants retained that firname. It is very probable that this title began in this manner in divers families, as it is certain that it was for a like reaſon, that there are in all countries ſo many perſons, who are named White, Black, &c. And ſince there has been an Emperor of the Eaſt (1), and an Emperor of the Weſt (2), who had the firname of Balbus or the Stammerer, on account of an impediment in their ſpeech, why is it not credible, that in the time of the Roman Commonwealth, ſuch a defect might introduce this firname into divers noble families? This is not the point therefore, that Charles Stephens deſerves to be criticized in; but becauſe he has taken the Atilii for the Accii or Atii, and expreſſed himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he ſeems to ſay the Atilii had no other firname but this; and yet there were the Regulus's, the Serranus's, and the Calatinus's among them. Nay there was one C. Atilius Balbus, Conſul in the year of Rome 508 and 518, who perhaps was the occaſion of Charles Stephens's miſtake. It ſhould have ſatisfied Mr. Lloyd to have corrected this article; but he thought it more proper to ſuppreſs it entirely, in imitation of thoſe Chirurgeons, who inſtead of healing a wound, cut off the part, which is wounded; or of thoſe controverſial writers, who cut the knot of an objection, when they find themſelves in the ſame perplexity that Alexander was in with regard to the Gordian knot. Mr. Hofman has neither cured nor cut it off; he has retained this article juſt as he found it in Charles Stephens.

(1) Michael II who was Emperor of Conſtantinople from the year 820 to 826.

(2) Lewis III of that name, who was likewiſe King of France, and died in 879.

[B] He aſſumed on account of theſe two Conſuls, the prænomen of Lucius, and the name of Cornelius.] The Roman cuſtom was, that thoſe, who obtained the freedom of the city, took the name of him, who procured them that honour. It was upon this account that the Hiſtorian Theophanes and his poſterity bore the name of Pompey. It will be aſk'd then; Why did not Cornelius Balbus take upon him likewiſe the name of Pompey? I anſwer, becauſe he choſe rather to ground his right upon a Law, than upon the kindneſs of that General. The law, which I ſpeak of, is that which was made by the advice of the Senate by L. Gellius and Cn. Cornelius the Conſuls in the year of Rome 682. It declared that all thoſe, to whom Pompey with the conſent of the Council of War had given the freedom of the city of Rome, ſhould be accounted Roman Citizens. Naſcitur, Judices, cauſa Cornelii ex eâ lege quam L. Gellius, Cn. Cornelius ex Senatus ſententia tulerunt; quâ lege videmus ſatis eſſe ſanctum, uti cives Romani ſint ii, quos Cn. Pompeius de conſilii ſententia ſingillatim civitate donaverit (3). Balbus, conſidering theſe two Conſuls as the true authors of the honour, which he enjoyed, took from one of them the prænomen of Lucius, and from the other the name of Cornelius. This is much more probable than what Manutius ſays, that tho' Balbus had been made a Roman Citizen by Pompey, yet he was obliged for that honour to Cornelius Lentulus, whoſe prænomen and name he aſſumed according to cuſtom (4). He conjectures likewiſe, that this L. Cornelius Lentulus is the ſame, who was Conſul the

What name thoſe took upon them, who obtained the freedom of the City of Rome?

(3) Cicero pro Balbo.

(4) Manut. in Argumento Orat. pro Cornel. Balbo. See likewiſe the note upon the 9th book of Cicero's Epiſtles to Atticus, pag. 8. of Grævius's edition, where there ſeems to be an error of the preſs.

Cicero; and was adopted by one Theophanes (b), who was very particularly beloved and esteemed by Pompey. It was on account of this adoption that Capitolinus calls him, Balbus Cornelius Theophanes [C], when he tells us that the Emperor Balbinus affirmed that he was descended from him (c). The prosperity of Balbus raised him enemies, who began a law-suit against him with relation to his freedom of the City. Crassus, Pompey, and Cicero pleaded his cause (d), and carried it for him. He found himself very much perplexed during the war between Cesar and Pompey; he was under great obligations to both parties. It appears that he gave the preference to Cesar, but in such a manner as that he endeavoured to bring matters to a reconciliation (e). Velleius Paterculus remarks it as a great rashness, that Balbus ventured to go over to Pompey's cause, in order to confer with the Consul Lentulus, who was hesitating at what price he should sell himself (f). It was by this means, continues he, that Balbus, though a Spaniard, opened his way to a Triumph, the Pontificate, and the Consulship. Pliny in effect observes that Balbus was Consul, and the first of all the foreigners, who obtained that dignity (g); but with regard to the honour of a Triumph, he says it was another Cornelius Balbus, a nephew to this, who obtained the freedom of Rome, the first of all the foreigners (h). We shall see wherein the error of Paterculus lies [D]. These two Cornelius Balbus's were so rich, that the uncle at his death left 25 drachms to every Roman Citizen (i); and the nephew caused a new city (k) to be built at Cadiz (l). The uncle wrote a History of Julius Cesar in the manner of a Journal (m). This is he without doubt, who had such an intimate friendship with Pomponius Atticus [E]. Some

(b) Cicero, ibid. and Epistol. 7. ad Attic. lib. 7.

(c) Capitol. in Balbino.

(d) See Ciceron. Oration. pro Cornel. Balbo.

(e) See the remark [G].

(f) Velleius Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 51.

(g) Plinius, lib. 7. cap. 43.

(h) Idem, lib. 5. cap. 5.

(i) Dio, lib. 48.

(k) Strabo, lib. 3. pag. 116.

(l) He was born there, as well as his uncle.

(m) Sidonius Apollinaris, lib. 9. Epist. 14.

the first year of the Civil War, that is, in the year of Rome 704. Besides this shews us, that Cardinal Baronius has made too long an enumeration of Titus's favours to Josephus, when he tells us particularly, that besides the right of the freedom of the city, Titus conferred on him the name of the family Flavia (5). For in the first place it was Vespasian, and not Titus, who made him a Citizen (6); and then again the name of Flavius came to him of course.

(5) Baronii Annal. ad ann. 36. num. 12.

(6) Joseph. in Vitâ suâ.

[C] Capitolinus calls him Balbus Cornelius Theophanes.] That author's words are as follow: Familiæ vetustissimæ, ut ipse (Balbinus) dicebat, à Balbo Cornelio Theophane originem ducens, qui per Cn. Pompeium civitatem meruerat, quum esset suæ patriæ nobilissimus, idemque historiæ scriptor (7). Casaubon imagines that this relates to the Historian Theophanes, who was born at Mitylene in the Isle of Lesbos (8). Vossius (9), Mr. de Tillemont (10), and a great many others are of the same opinion. I believe they are mistaken, and that it is better to understand this of the adopted son of Theophanes, than of the Father. Cornelius Balbus was son to Theophanes by adoption; it is to him, that the three titles, which Capitolinus makes use of, belong; and the last only agrees to Theophanes. If it be said that Balbus was not the most noble Gentleman of his country, I answer that Theophanes had not likewise the same rank of honour in Mitylene. It is true, Strabo assures us, that Theophanes had a share in the public offices, and that he made himself the most illustrious of all the Greeks (11); but this is not sufficient to confirm the words of Capitolinus; this does not ascribe to him an antiquity of birth and nobleness of blood, which raised him above all the rest of the Mitylenians; and this is the point in question in Capitolinus. The objection then signifies nothing, since it proves too much; and it is sufficient for me that Balbus's enemies did not deny but that he was born of a very honourable family. Hunc in eâ civitate, in quâ sit natus, honestissimo loco natum esse concedis (12). It is probable, they did not acknowledge all that he ascribed to himself in that point. There is another objection to be apprehended. Balbus was Consul, and Theophanes was not so; how comes it then that Capitolinus, who takes notice of his character as an Historian, forgot that of Consul, which was much more proper to raise the idea of Balbinus's nobility? I answer, that Capitolinus is not a writer, from whom we are to expect much exactness and judgment. The worst that can happen would be to say, that he applied the pretensions of Balbinus wrong, and imagined that Cornelius Balbus Theophanes, from whom this Emperor said he was descended, was the same Theophanes of the Isle of Lesbos, whose chief honour was that of an Historian. I would not absolutely reject this conjecture; writers of much greater abilities than Capitolinus might be imposed upon in this point; but I should choose rather to say, that he knew that Balbus of Cadiz was the author of an History.

(7) Capitol. in Balbino, p. 147.

(8) Casaubon. upon this passage of Capitolinus.

(9) Vossius, de Hist. Græcis, pag. 147.

(10) Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. 3. pag. 439.

(11) Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 425.

(12) Cicero pro Cornel. Balbo, non procul init.

[D] I shall shew wherein the error of Paterculus lies.] Let us give his own words; Tum Balbus Cornelius, says he (13), excedente humanam fidem temeritate ingressus castra hostium, sæpiusque cum Lentulo collocutus, Consule dubitante quanti se venderet, illis incrementis fecit viam quibus non Hispaniensis natus, sed Hispanus in Triumphum & Pontificatum assurgeret, fieretque ex privato consularis; that is, "Then Balbus Cornelius, "with a rashness, that exceeds the belief of mankind, "going over to the enemy's camp, in order to draw "off Lentulus, whose particular friend he was, dis- "coursed several times with him, who deliberated "for some time at what price he should sell himself. "By this means Balbus opened himself a way to rise "by degrees to the highest dignities, so that tho' he was "not only born in Spain, as several Romans and "Italians were, but even of parents, who were na- "tives of that country (14), yet he raised himself at "Rome to the honour of a Triumph and the Ponti- "ficate, and from a private man as he was before, "was at last made Consul." I omit here to speak of this action of Balbus, concerning which we have great light from the passages of Cicero, which I quote in the margin (15). I shall only insist a little upon that of Paterculus. He either says nothing that is reasonable, or else he affirms that Balbus was raised to the Consulship, as well as to the honour of a Triumph, and the dignity of the Pontificate; and it would be to no purpose to deny it, under pretence that he does not say & Consulatum, as it would seem more naturally to signify that Balbus had been Consul. We have no right to regulate the expressions of so polite an author as this; he had his reasons for changing the turn of his phrase, when he had a mind to denote the Consulship. But he was mistaken in the fact itself, and confounded the honours of the uncle with those of the nephew. That Balbus, who negotiated with Lentulus at the beginning of the Civil Wars, was the nephew, as appears from the Letters of Cicero, which I quoted above. It was Balbus the nephew, who triumphed over the Garamantes, the first of the foreigners, who was honoured with a Triumph, as Pliny informs us (16); but it was Balbus the uncle, who had the honour of the Consulship, the first of all the foreigners as the same Pliny assures us (17). These two Balbus's were distinguished at Rome by the title of Major, which was given to the uncle, and that of Minor to the nephew. I am surprized that Salmasius, who has extremely well distinguished the honours of the one from those of the other (18), has left this error of Paterculus unobserved.

(13) Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 51.

(14) This explication of the difference, which Paterculus makes between Hispaniensis and Hispanus, (if his text said so), seems as just as that of Lipsius, who by Hispaniensis understands an inhabitant of Spain, and by Hispanus, a native Spaniard.

(15) Epist. 32. lib. 10. ad Familiar. & Comment. upon the 9th Epist. lib. 8. ad Attic.

(16) Plin. lib. 5. cap. 5.

(17) Idem, lib. 7. cap. 43.

(18) In Solinum cap. 9.

[E] He had a very intimate friendship with Pomponius Atticus.] This will appear unquestionable, when we consider that Atticus, having resolved to put an end to his life by abstaining from eating, sent for his son-in-law, and L. Cornelius Balbus, and Sextus Peduceus, to declare this last resolution of his to them (19). I think I have read in a Letter of Cicero's, that Balbus was one of those, who eat very frequently at Atticus's table (20). This will shew, that he was pleased with hearing good discourses read (21).

(19) Cornel. Nepos in Vitâ Attici, cap. 21.

(20) I cannot find the place; but I think it is in his Letters to Atticus.

(21) See above the remark [F] of the Article of ATTICUS.

Some authors have confounded Cornelius Balbus with Cornelius Gallus [F]. We ſhall ſhew that Voſſius was miſtaken in his cenſure of Savaro [G]; that Lloyd and Hofman deſerve a little cenſure [H]; that Paulus Manutius ought not to be entirely exempt from it [I]; that Glandorp has multiplied beings without neceſſity [K]; that the diſtinction of the greater and [F] Some authors have confounded Cornelius Balbus with Cornelius Gallus. This is about a circumſtance, which does no honour to his memory. They tell us he died in the very act of venery (22). Without doubt the original of this miſtake was from an error of the preſs. Upon the authority of Pliny (23), Cornelius Gallus was ranked amongſt thoſe, who died in that manner; and the Printer by putting a B for a G, occaſioned ſeveral authors to miſtake one perſon for another. I find this error in ſeveral editions of the Commentary of Tiraquellus upon the Laws of Matrimony.

(22) Balthaſar Bonifacius, Hiſt. Ludicra, lib. 16. cap. 16. ex Tiraquello, Leg. Connub. 15. num. 27.

(23) Lib. 7. cap. 53.

[G] Voſſius was miſtaken in his cenſure of Savaro.] While he was endeavouring to ſhew an error, which he imagined he had found in Savaro's Commentary upon Sidonius Apollinaris, he was deceived himſelf (24). Savaro had affirmed, that Balbus, to whom Sidonius Apollinaris aſcribed the Journal of Julius Ceſar's Life (25), is the ſame with Balbus Cornelius Theophanes, of whom Julius Capitolinus ſays in the Life of Balbinus, that he obtained the freedom of Rome by the favour of Pompey, and that he was beſides the moſt noble of his fellow Citizens, and an Hiſtorian. Voſſius refutes this pretence of Savaro, I. Becauſe Balbus, the Author of the Journal, was an intimate friend of Julius Ceſar, as appears from Suetonius (26), and Aulus Gellius (27); whereas Theophanes was an intimate friend of Pompey's, and this was repreſented as a crime in his deſcendants, as Tacitus obſerves in the ſixth book of his Annals: II. Becauſe Theophanes being of Leſbos wrote in Greek, whereas Balbus lived at Rome, and wrote in Latin.

(24) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, lib. 1. cap. 23. pag. 148.

(25) Sidon. Apollinar. Epiſt. 14. lib. 9.

(26) Sueton. in Cæſar. cap. 81. wrong quoted cap. 71. by Voſſius, and cap. 74. by Moreri.

(27) Aul. Gellius, lib. 17. cap. 9. where he ſays that Julius Cæſar and Balbus wrote to each other in cypher.

If I had a mind to be very critical, I might urge in oppoſition to theſe reaſons, I. That the ſame Balbus, who was one of the intimate friends of Ceſar, was likewiſe a good friend of Pompey's, and honoured with ſo great a ſhare of his confidence, that the other friends of Pompey were jealous of him (28). It is true, the union, which was then between Pompey and Ceſar, having permitted Balbus to cultivate the friendſhip of the latter, without violating his obligations to the former, he found at laſt that Ceſar's favours were ſuperior to thoſe of Pompey; and yet Balbus procured leave of Ceſar not to follow him againſt Pompey, and retired to Rome during the civil war (29). It is true likewiſe, that he was an agent of Ceſar's, and that in his attempt to bring matters to an agreement, he did not appear wholly free from partiality. But after all, it is not ſufficient, in order to form a juſt oppoſition between Balbus and Theophanes, to ſay on the one hand with Suetonius, that Balbus was an intimate friend of Julius Ceſar, and with Aulus Gellius that Balbus was at Rome as one of Ceſar's agents during his abſence; and to ſay on the other hand, with Tacitus, that Theophanes was an intimate friend of Pompey, and that Tiberius urged this as a crime in the deſcendants of Theophanes; for conſidering the cruel diſpoſition of that Emperor, he was capable of perſecuting a family, under pretence that they had obtained the freedom of Rome by Pompey's favour. Now this would be literally true with regard to Theophanes, though he ſhould be confounded with Cornelius Balbus; ſince it is certain, that Pompey not only gave him this freedom, but even pleaded for him when it was conteſted, and that he heaped a great many favours upon him. So that Voſſius's firſt reaſon is falſe. II. It may be urged in the ſecond place, that the Theophanes, whom Voſſius means, lived at Rome as well as Balbus; and ſince ſeveral Romans have written Hiſtories in Greek, it does not follow that Balbus is not Theophanes, becauſe Theophanes wrote in Greek. Beſides how do we know whether the Balbus in diſpute is not the Cornelius Balbus whoſe 18th book of the Ἐφημερικῶν is quoted by Macrobius (30)? Simler makes no manner of doubt of it (31).

(28) Cicero ad Attic. lib. 9. Epiſt. 13.

(29) Epiſt. Balbi ad Ciceron. lib. 9. ad Attic. p. 36. edit. Grævii.

(30) Macrob. Saturnal. lib. 3. cap. 6.

(31) Simler, in Epitome Bibliotb. Geſneri.

But not to amuſe myſelf with theſe diſputes which may be thought too minute and particular, here is the Jugulum Cauſæ, the deciſive point of the whole affair in three words. Voſſius imagined that Savaro had confounded Cornelius Balbus with Theophanes, who was born in the Iſle of Leſbos, and was the Author of an Hiſtory of the Mithridatic War. But this is not fact. He has only confounded him with the Theophanes, mentioned by Capitolinus, who is a different perſon from that of Leſbos, though he has this in common with the other, that he received the freedom of a Roman Citizen from Pompey. Now nothing is more reaſonable than to take the Theophanes of Capitolinus for the Cornelius Balbus of Suetonius, and for the Balbus of Sidonius Apollinaris; for it is certain that this ſame Cornelius Balbus, who was a native of Cadiz and received the honour of a Citizen of Rome from Pompey, was adopted at the recommendation of the ſame Pompey, by Theophanes of Leſbos (32); after which, according to cuſtom, he named himſelf Lucius Cornelius Balbus Theophanes, as Paulus Manutius and Corradus have obſerved; the former, in the ſummary of Cicero's Oration for the ſame Balbus; the latter, in his Notes upon Cicero's Epiſtles to Atticus; and both of them have taken this Balbus for the Hiſtorian Cornelius Balbus Theophanes, mentioned by Capitolinus. So that if there had been any thing to criticize upon in that paſſage, Voſſius ſhould have attacked thoſe two learned Italians, rather than Savaro, who came a long while after them.

(32) Et adoptio Theophanis agitata eſt. Cicero, pro Balbo. Placet igitur etiam me expulſum & agrum Campanum petiiſſe, & adoptatum patricium a Plebeio, Gaditanum a Mitylenæo. Cicero Epiſt. 7. ad Atticum, lib. 7.

[H] Lloyd and Hofman deſerve a little cenſure.] I ſay nothing of Charles Stephens; he has been a little too dry upon our Cornelius Balbus; but what he has touched upon is not ill choſen. Mr. Lloyd has cut off ſome words which were not ſuperfluous; as for inſtance, that we have ſtill an Oration of Cicero for this Balbus; for theſe are two very different facts, firſt, that Cicero pleaded ſuch a cauſe, and the other, that we have his pleading ſtill extant; and it is the latter of theſe two that the readers are moſt concerned in. Mr. Hofman has extended the Article (33), in order to acquaint us, that there was another Cornelius Balbus of Leſbos, ſirnamed Theophanes; that is, to acquaint us with a mere falſity. Lucius Cornelius Balbus Theophanes is no ways different from him of Cadiz, whom we are ſpeaking of in this Article.

(33) In the firſt vol. of his Continuation, he has given ſome good Additions with relation to Cornelius Balbus.

[I]..... Paulus Manutius ought not to be wholly exempt from it.] I have already touched upon ſome of his miſtakes; here are two more. One is in the Summary of Cicero's Oration for Cornelius Balbus, and in the Notes upon the paſſage of that Oration, where the adoption of this Balbus is mentioned. He ſays very falſely that Theophanes was a freedman of Pompey (34); for it was not liberty, but the freedom of Rome, that Pompey gave to Theophanes. Quid magnus hic noſter, ſays Cicero (35), qui cum virtute fortunam adæquavit: nonne Theophanem Mitylenæum ſcriptorem rerum ſuarum in concione militum civitate donavit? The other error of Manutius is, that he refers us with regard to the triumph of young Cornelius Balbus, the nephew of him whom we are ſpeaking of, among other authorities, to the ſeventh book of Pliny, ch. 43. (36); for Pliny ſpeaks only of the Conſulſhip of the Uncle in that paſſage. It is eaſy to miſtake in ſuch things as theſe: Father Hardouin, upon this paſſage of Pliny, refers us to a place in Paterculus (37), where he ſpeaks only of Balbus the nephew.

(34) He repeats it in his notes upon the 12th Epiſtle to Atticus, lib. 5.

(35) Orat. pro Archia: Valerius Maximus ſays as much, lib. 8. cap. 14.

(36) P. Manutius, in Argument. Orat. Ciceron. pro Balbo, where inſtead of quoting chap. 43 of the 7th book of Pliny, he quotes the 37th, and inſtead of chap. 29. of Solinus he quotes 42. This edition of Manutius is of Cologne, in 1582, in 8vo.

(37) Lib. 2. cap. 51.

[K] Glandorp has multiplied beings without neceſſity.] He ſhould not have produced three Conſuls, who were named L. Cornelius Balbus. This is multiplying beings without neceſſity. The firſt is, according to him, Balbus the Elder, whoſe Conſulſhip is placed in the year of Rome 713. The ſecond is Balbus the Younger, with regard to whoſe Conſulſhip he ſays nothing preciſely, repeating only the words of Paterculus. The third is one L. Cornelius Balbus, who he ſays, was made Conſul for ſome days, about the end of the year, by Auguſtus and Mark Anthony, and was ſo prodigiouſly rich, that he left by will twenty five drachms to every Citizen of Rome (38). Theſe three Conſuls in reality are to be reduced to one; for Balbus the uncle is not differeht from him, whoſe Conſulſhip was of ſo very ſhort a continuance. This appears from Dion Caſſius. Father Hardouin, to give us an idea of this Conſulſhip, ſays very ingeniouſly, that Balbus was Conſul under the Conſulſhip of Cn. Domitius and leſſer Conſulſhip is chimerical [L]; and that Moreri has committed a great many errors [M], though his article of Balbus is very ſhort and very dry.

(38) Glandorp, Onomaſtic. Roman. pag. 277.

I ſhall ſay but little of ſome other Balbus's mentioned by ancient authors. Lucius Lucilius Balbus, Scholar to Mutius Scevola, and Preceptor to the famous Servius Sulpitius, was an excellent Lawyer. He flouriſhed about the year of Rome 670. Cicero ſays that Sulpitius ſurpaſſed his Maſter [N], who had joined to his learning a certain character of maturity, which rendered him a little ſlow, whereas his Scholar was lively and expeditious. The Writings of Balbus are loſt, to which perhaps his Scholar Sulpitius contributed not a little, by inſerting the greateſt part of them in his own (n). We muſt not confound this Balbus, as Glandorp has done, with Quintus Lucilius Balbus, a Stoic Philoſopher, one of the Interlocutors in his Cicero's books of the Nature of the Gods (o). Publius Octavius Balbus was contemporary with Cicero, who commends him for his knowledge of the Civil Law, for his genius, probity, and many other excellent qualities (p). Cicero gives no leſs praiſes to Lucius Octavius Balbus, who lived at the ſame time (q). One of theſe two Octavius Balbus's is plainly the ſame, that Valerius Maximus ſpeaks of, when he tells us, that having eſcaped through a back-door, during the rage of the Triumviri, and hearing that they killing his ſon in his houſe, he returned back again, and gave himſelf up to the aſſaſſins (r). Appian relates the ſame ſtory with a little difference in the circumſtances (s).

(n) Pomponius, lib. 2. de Origine Juris.

(o) Glandorp, Onomaſtic. p. 522. In p. 637. Glandorp takes the Interlocutor in the Treatiſe de Natura Deorum, and him, who is commended in the Oration for Cluentius, and him, who is praiſed in the 7th Oration againſt Verres, for the ſame perſon.

(p) Cicero, Orat. pro Cluent. fol. 114. C.

(q) Idem, in Verrem, Orat. 7. fol. 40. B.

(r) Val. Maxim. lib. 5. cap. 7.

(s) Appianus, de Bello Civili, lib. 4. pag. 601.

Calvinus and C. Aſinius Pollio, in the year of Rome 714. Conſul hic fuit, quoniam ita neceſſe eſt dicere, Cn. Domitio Calvino ſecundum, C. Aſinio Pollione Coſs. anno Urbis DCCXIV (39). To conclude, if Glandorp had known the leaſt of the paſſage of Pliny (40), where Balbus the Elder is called the uncle by the father's ſide, Patruus, to Balbus the Younger, he would not have had recourſe to a quotation from ſo bad an authority as that of Volaterranus, in order to inform us, that one of theſe Balbus's was brother's ſon to the other.

(39) Hard. in Plin. lib. 7. cap. 43. pag. 64. tom. 2.

(40) Lib. 5. cap. 5. pag. 545.

[L] The diſtinction of the greater and leſſer Conſulſhip is chimerical.] Let us ſee a little what irregularity of mind people are ſubject to. There are ſome Authors who upon occaſion of theſe words of Pliny, fuit & Balbus Cornelius Major Conſul, have run into a ſtrange chimera of two degrees of the Conſulſhip, and pretended that Balbus was the great Conſul, or firſt Conſul (41). It is very obvious, that Major in this paſſage is not to be referred to Conſul.

(41) See Salmaſ. Exercitat. Plin. pag. 383.

[M] Moreri has committed a great many errors.] I. It is only upon an it is ſaid, that he tells us Cornelius Balbus wrote a Journal or Ephemerides of what happened every day to Cæſar. If he had known that Sidonius Apollinaris ſpoke of this Journal as a book then extant, and that he even ſpoke of it with commendation (42), he would have rejected this it is ſaid. Some are of opinion that Symmachus ſpeaks of the ſame book, where he writes to his friend, Si impar eſt deſiderio tuo Livius, ſume EPHIMERIDEM C. Cæſaris decerptam Bibliotheculæ meæ ut tibi muneri mitteretur. Hæc te origines, ſitus, pugnas, & quicquid fuit in moribus aut legibus Galliarum docebit (43): that is; "If "Titus Livy is not ſufficient to gratify your inclina- "tion to know the Hiſtory of ancient Gaul, you may "take the Journal or Ephemerides of Cæſar, which I "have made you a preſent of, &c." But others pretend, that the author means only the Memoirs, which Ceſar wrote himſelf, and which we have ſtill extant under the title of Commentaries of the War in Gaul (44). It is true however, that he wrote other Memoirs under the title of Ephemerides, as we are informed by Servius. Why is it not probable then that Symmachus ſpoke of them? II. The advice to take care not to confound, as Savaro and others have done, this author, with one of the ſame name, who was ſurnamed Theophanes, and was of Leſbos, contains two errors. We have ſhewn the firſt by vindicating Savaro from the cenſure of Voſſius. The ſecond conſiſts in ſuppoſing, that there was an Hiſtorian, a native of the Iſle of Leſbos, who was named Cornelius Balbus Theophanes; whereas nothing is more falſe. Theophanes the Hiſtorian, born at Mitylene in the Iſle of Leſbos, was named Cn. Pompeius Theophanes, on account of Pompey's having conferred upon him the Freedom of the city of Rome; but he never added to the name of his family that of Balbus or Balbus Cornelius; and it is very ſtrange, that Voſſius ſhould ſay, that the Hiſtorian Cornelius Balbus Theophanes, mentioned by Julius Capitolinus, was the Theophanes of the Iſle of Leſbos, who wrote the Mithridatic War (45). III. But once more, why muſt we take care not to do as Savaro has done? It is becauſe Cornelius Balbus lived at Rome, and Theophanes was of Leſbos. Are not theſe two attributes incompatible in the ſame perſon; and can we deſire better proofs of a perſonal diſtinction? Thus we ſee how errors increaſe. Moreri having a mind to abridge the proof of Voſſius, has rendered it incomparably worſe than it was before. IV. I think, continues he, that he is the firſt whom Cicero defended againſt thoſe, who accuſed him of having unjuſtly aſſumed the character of a Roman Citizen. Beſides that the expreſſion is ſo obſcure (46), that it ſeems at firſt to intimate, that Cicero begun this kind of pleadings with the perſon whom we are ſpeaking of; which is not what he intended, nor what he ſhould have ſaid; there is this fault in theſe words, that this ſhould not have been mentioned as a doubtful fact; which it was very eaſy to ſatisfy himſelf of by reading the Summaries of Paulus Manutius, Father Abram, &c upon Cicero's Oration pro L. Cornelio Balbo.

(42) Quis opera Suetonii, quis Juvenci, Martilis Hiſtoriam, quiſve ad extremum Balbi Ephemeridem fando adæquaverit? Sidon. Apollinar. Epiſt. 14. lib. 9.

(43) Symmach. Epiſt. 17. lib. 2.

(44) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latin. pag. 64. where he aſcribes to Suetonius what belongs to Symmachus.

(45) See in the remark [C] Caſaubon and others who have committed the ſame error.

(46) If we were to remark the faults of this kind, which are in Moreri's ſtyle, we might reckon them by thouſands.

[N] Cicero ſays that Sulpicius ſurpaſſed Balbus his maſter.] The reader will much better comprehend Cicero's thought from his own words than from mine. Let him read then what follows: Cum dicendi cauſâ duobus paritiſſimis operam dediſſet (Servius) L. Lucilio Balbo, C. Aquilio Gallo, Galli hominis acuti & exercitati promptam in agendo & in reſpondendo celeritatem ſubtilitate diligentiaque ſuperavit. Balbi docti & eruditi hominis in utraque re conſideratam tarditatem vicit, expediendis conficiendiſque rebus. Sic & habet quod uterque eorum habuit, & explevit quod utrique deſuit (47).

(47) Cicero in Bruto cap. 42.

BALBUS, BALBI, or BALBO (JOHN) a Dominican Friar, flouriſhed in the XIIIth Century. He underſtood Greek, which was a very uncommon qualification in that age, and more Latin, than all his brother Monks together could boaſt of. He was no leſs eſteemed for his exemplary life, than for his learning; and there have been ſome perſons who have called him Bleſſed [A]. It was upon this account that his image was placed in St. Thomas's Church at Pavia. The title of his Works may be ſeen in Moreri, who, inſtead of referring us to Voſſius's book concerning the Latin Hiſtorians, would have done

[A] There have been ſome perſons, who have called him Bleſſed.] This will appear from the following paſſage: Non vi hà mancato chi lo riponga nel numero de' Beati, e come tale ſi vede dipinto nel Tempio di S. Tomaſo di Pavia, in luogo eminente vicino al ſoffitato (1).

(1) Alfonſo Fernandez, apud Michaelem Juſtinianum, in Libro de gli Scrittori Liguri, p. 312.

done right to obſerve, that John Balbus is incomparably better known by the name of Joannes de Janua, or Joannes Januenſis, than by any other title. We ſhall ſhew why he bore that name, and examine whether he is the ſame with Jacobus de Voragine [B]. We ſhall

[B] We ſhall ſhew why he bore that name, ... and whether he was the ſame with Jacobus de Voragine.] John Balbus, a noble Genoeſe, was called Januenſis, or de Janua, becauſe he was of Genoa. He ſays himſelf in his Catholicon, in the word Janua, that he was of a city called Janua; which is no other than that of Genoa. From the time of Luitprand it was rather called Janua than Genua; either that they had a mind to intimate more clearly that Janus was the founder of it; or that they had a regard to the reaſon alledged by Jo. de Janua, which was, that this city is the gate of Provence, Lombardy, and Tuſcany. He informs us himſelf, that he was called Frater Johannes Januenſis de Balbis, and that he had written ſeveral other books. At the end of the Catholicon, he acquaints us, that after many years intenſe application, he finiſh'd it the day of the nones of March, that is, on the 7th of March 1286.

WHETHER John de Janua, and Jacobus de Voragine, are one and the ſame Author.

Mr. Oudin, formerly a Monk of the Order of Premonſtratenſes, and at preſent joined to the Proteſtant Church to the prodigious ſatisfaction of the whole body, who have the greateſt reaſon to congratulate themſelves upon ſo noble a conqueſt, and who are in expectation of ſeveral fine pieces from his pen: this Gentleman, I ſay, aſſerts, that Jacobus de Voragine the author of the Golden Legend, and Joannes de Janua the author of the Catholicon, are one and the ſame perſon (2). He founds his opinion upon this, that it is agreed that they lived at the ſame time, that they both were Dominicans, both of Genoa, and upon that account both of them called Januenſis. It was an eaſy matter therefore for thoſe, who ſaw at the beginning of ſeveral manuſcripts the name Januenſis, preceded by the letter I, the initial letter of the Chriſtian names Joannes and Jacobus, to aſcribe them ſometimes to Jacobus Januenſis, and ſometimes to Joannes Januenſis, by which means they might make two authors of one.

(2) Oudin, Supplem. de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. p. 561.

But that Gentleman will give me leave to obſerve, that his conjecture receives a very ſevere ſhock from the Catalogue, which the author of the Catholicon has given of his works under the word Janua; for tho' the time when he finiſhed his Catholicon, might be very diſtant from that, when he finiſh'd the article of Janua, it is by no means probable, that if he had writen any books during the time, which paſt between his compoſing of that article, and the cloſing of his Dictionary, he would not have added them to the others in the ſame article. Thus it may be ſuppoſed, that the Catalogue, which he gives us in the word Janua is of the year 1286, in which he finiſh'd his Catholicon. Now it is certain that Jacobus de Voragine publiſh'd in 1270 an Italian Tranſlation of the Bible. What probability is there, that if at the end of ſixteen years he had mentioned the Books, which he had publiſh'd, he would have forgot a performance of his, which was ſo late, and in every reſpect ſo remarkable as his Tranſlation of the Scripture into the vulgar tongue? It is not therefore at all probable, that the author of the Catholicon was the ſame with Jacobus de Voragine. I ſhall wait for farther information upon this point from the learned, and eſpecially from Mr. Oudin. Dr. Cave ſtill continues in uncertainty about it (3).

(3) Cave, de Script. Eccleſiaſt. pag. 750.

This is the manner in which I ſpoke in my plan; but now I can ſpeak in a more deciſive tone againſt Father Oudin's conjecture. I ſhall proceed upon ſeveral good arguments, which have come to me very ſeaſonably (4). The following is an extract from a Memorial ſent from Dijon. "I believe that it may "be poſitively determined, that Joannes de Janua "ought not to be confounded with Jacobus de Voragi- "ne. The former, who is the author of a Dictio- "nary intitled Catholicon, has never been quoted by "the name of Jacobus. The latter, who is the au- "thor of the Golden Legend, has never been quoted by "the name of Joannes. The former is always cal- "led Joannes de Janua, or Januenſis, becauſe he was "in fact of Genoa, of the family of Balbi. The "latter, whoſe family is unknown, is almoſt univer- "ſally called Jacobus de Voragine, very ſeldom Ja- "cobus Januenſis; and then Archiepiſcopus is to be "underſtood, or elſe we muſt ſuppoſe that he was "ſtiled ſo on account of the nearneſs of the Borough "of Liguria, called Voragine, where he was born, to "the city of Genoa. The former was only a mere "Dominican Monk. The latter was raiſed to the "Archbiſhoprick of Genoa. All Authors, and the "Dominicans amongſt the reſt, have conſtantly diſ- "tinguiſhed the names, the country, and the works "of theſe two Writers. This has been particularly "obſerved by Leandro Alberti in his Deſcription della "riviera di Genoua di Ponente. James Bracelli, a "Genoeſe, who wrote in the year 1431, and of "whom we have a ſmall tract de claris Genuenſibus, "that is, of the famous men of Genoa, makes no men- "tion of Jacobus de Voragine, becauſe he was not of "Genoa; but he ſpeaks there with great commenda- "tion of the Author of the Catholicon, Joannes Balbus, "to whom he would undoubtedly have given the ti- "tle of Archbiſhop of Genoa, if he had ever had it, "as he muſt, according to the opinion of thoſe, who "confound him with Jacobus de Voragine."

(4) From the learned Mr. de la Monnoie.

A MULTIPLICATION of Joannes de Janua into ſeveral Authors.

Simler is ſo far from confounding two authors in one, in this caſe, that on the contrary of one he has made three; for he ſpeaks of Joannes de Janua, Joannes Januenſis, and Joannes Balbus, as three different authors (5). Beſides he is miſtaken in putting Baldus for Balbus; an error, which Quenſtedt has followed in his treatiſe of the Countries of illuſtrious Men (6). Martinius likewiſe has fallen into errors of multiplication. It is in the Catalogue of Dictionaries, which he made uſe of to form his own; in the beginning of his Lexicon Philologicum, printed at Bremen in 1623, and afterwards enlarged at Francfort in 1655, and reprinted at Utrecht in 1697. He cites the Catholicon, finiſh'd the day of the nones of March 1286, and quotes the very words at the end of the Dictionary of Joannes de Janua. Immediately after he cites a Summa quæ vocatur Catholicon, publiſhed by Friar John de Janua, and printed at Venice in 1487. It is plain that theſe are only two different editions of one and the ſame book, and that the former ought to be equally aſcribed to John de Janua with the latter. Martinius would not have fallen into this miſtake, if he had known what is in the article JANUA, in the Catholicon finiſh'd in 1286.

(5) Epitome Bibliotb. Geſneri.

(6) Pag. 307.

OF the book intitled Catholicon.

I find that it is not yet generally agreed, who was the author of the Dictionary, which was firſt intitled Catholicon. Mr. du Cange aſcribes it to our John de Janua, and affirms that neither Papias, nor Ugutio, who had made ſome compilations prior to it, had made uſe of that title (7); but Mr. Borrichius, who wrote after having read the Preface of Mr. du Cange, notwithſtanding affirms that Papias is the author of the Catholicon, and that he finiſh'd that work in the year 1286 (8). He had ſeen that it was aſſerted in that Preface, that Papias flouriſhed, not in 1200, as Trithemius aſſures us, but in 1053, as the Chronicle of Albericus proves; and yet he affirms it as a certain fact that Papias finiſhed his Dictionary in 1286. He ought either to have refuted Mr. du Cange, or at leaſt ſhewn, that he was miſtaken. This conduct, and this ſilence, ſerve only to perplex the reader. However, it is a ſtrong preſumption againſt Mr. Borrichius, that he has placed the concluſion of Papias's Dictionary preciſely in the ſame year 1286, in which Joannes de Janua finiſhed his Catholicon. The Memorial above mentioned aſſures me, that Papias did not compoſe the Catholicon, which was finiſhed in 1286, and that John Baldus was the firſt, who made uſe of the title of Catholicon in the front of a Dictionary.

(7) Du Cange, Præfat. Gloſſarii Latin.

(8) Borrich. Append. de Lexicis Græcis & Lat. at the end of his Analecta ad Cogit. de Ling. Lat. 1682.

THE age of Papias, according to Barthius.

It was a long while ago, that Barthius, without having conſulted the manuſcript Chronicle of Albericus, was of opinion that Papias was more ancient than he is repreſented to have been. Platina affirms it as an undoubted fact, that he lived under Pope Innocent III, that is, in the beginning of the thirteenth Century: but Barthius in the third chapter of the third book of his Adverſaria, places him under the Emperor Henry II (9), becauſe that author does not carry the liſt, which he gives under the word ætas of all the Princes of ſhall make but one ſingle remark for all this, and whatever elſe may offer it ſelf upon this head.

(9) He died in the year 1024; ſo that Barthius's reaſon ſeems to prove too much.

of the paſt ages, any further, than Henry II, whom he calls minorem; which he would not have done, if there had been before above two Emperors of the name of Henry. It is true that Barthius raiſes a doubt, which is generally ſpeaking juſtified by the prodigious negligence of thoſe, who continue or enlarge any compilations; and that is, that perhaps Papias left the article ætas juſt as he found it in ſome old Dictionary, without carrying on the Catalogue to his time. Thus we find in the Chronicle of the Abbot of Urſperg, in one place, that the author was at Rome in the year 1102 (10); and in another, that he was very young, in minore ætate, in 1198; and in another, that he was choſen Abbot in 1215. If the Continuator had cleared thoſe things which related to his additions, the reader would not have met with ſuch a confuſion as this.

(10) See Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat. lib. 2. cap. 57. and Bellar. de Script. Eccleſ. pag. 335. falſely accuſed by Zeiler, de Hiſt. pag. 155. of having believed that the number 1102 was falſified.

THE negligence of the Continuators of Compilations.

BALDUS, a famous Lawyer in the XIVth Century, was ſon to Francis Ubaldus [A], a Phyſician of Perugia. He ſtudied under Bartolus, and when he was but fifteen years old, he propoſed to him ſuch a perplexing objection, that he was obliged to deſire time to conſider of it, and he did not give his anſwer to it till the next day. So that thoſe, who tell us that Baldus began his ſtudies very late, are extremely miſtaken [B]. A little after he was promoted to his Doctor's Degree, he maintained ſome Theſes, which Bartolus attacked for five hours ſucceſſively, without being able to gain the victory. He very frequently pleaded Cauſes againſt Bartolus, and there roſe between them ſuch an emulation, as ſoon degenerated into a mutual hatred. This appears unqueſtionable, when we conſider that Baldus endeavoured to eclipſe the reputation of his Maſter. As for what is ſaid, that the Pandects of Piſa having been conſulted upon occaſion of a diſpute, which they had about the reading of a Law, Baldus was convicted of ſeveral falſifications, and that he was puniſhed for it in a very ignominious manner, it ought to be conſidered as a mere fable [C].

He

[A] He was ſon to Francis Ubaldus.] We may obſerve therefore that Baldus is this Civilian's Chriſtian name, and Ubaldus his ſirname. Moreri calls him beſides Peter; which is confounding the elder brother with the younger. Petrus Ubaldus was the third ſon of the Phyſician Franciſcus Ubaldus, and was an excellent Civilian. Angelus Ubaldus his brother was likewiſe a great Lawyer. See Panzirolus Chap. LXX and the following of the ſecond Book de claris Legum Interpretibus.

[B] Thoſe, who ſay, that Baldus began his ſtudies very late, are extremely miſtaken.] It has been ſaid, that he was forty years old, when he began to ſtudy the Law, and that upon Bartolus's ſaying to him, tarde veniſti, Balde, that is, You come late, Baldus, he replied, citius recedam, that is, I ſhall go away the ſooner (1). La Mothe le Vayer adds ſomething to Bartolus's ſpeech to him, You come late, Baldus; you will be an Advocate in the other world: Serò venis, Balde, eris Advocatus in alio ſæculo. I do not think, that if Bartolus ſaid this, he made any alluſion to Cato's raillery. That cenſor, in ridicule of Iſocrates's ſchool, uſed to ſay, That his ſcholars grew old there, that they might exerciſe their eloquence in hell, by pleading at the bar of Minos (2). The ſtory in diſpute here is without foundation. Panzirolus proves that Baldus at fifteen years of age propoſed a very difficult objection to the famous Bartolus; that at the age of ſeventeen he read public Lectures; and that four years after he wrote a Book de Pactis, and another de Conſtituto (3). The words of that writer are as follow: Opinioni Bartoli adeò argutè contradixit, ut ille argumenti acumine perterritus reſpondere non potuerit, commendatoque juvene tempus ad ſolvendum petiit, & ſequenti mane reſpondit. Deinde 17 annum ingreſſus, ſolenni interpretatione difficillimam legem publicè Baldus explicuit; unde fabuloſum eſt quod vulgo fertur, Baldum quadragenarium ad legum ſtudia acceſſiſſe (4). Zaſius the Civilian relates the ſame ſtory upon the authority of Paul Citadin; but Tiraquellus rejects it as a mere fable (5). Adducerem, (ſays he (6), quod de Baldo vulgo dicitur . . . niſi ſcirem hæc eſſe commentitia & prorſus fabuloſa, ut ex iis conſtat, quæ ſupra diximus. Mr. Baillet obſerves that la Mothe le Vayer and Father Bartoli ſeem to have adopted this opinion, as if the fact was well atteſted, and not a mere tale formed at random. He refers them to the Preſident Taraquellus, and to the eighth chapter of the Elogia of Paulus Jovius (7). He quotes la Mothe le Vayer Letter XXXII p. 420, and Bartoli Car. Hom. lit. p. 248. I never read that Tiraquellus was Preſident. Paulus Jovius obſerves that Baldus was a perſon of a very forward genius, and which continued in its vigour a long time; Præcoci ingenio pene puer, non ad optimam modo frugem, ſed rariſſimo etiam naturæ dono ad longam ſenectutem pervenit (8).

(1) Panzirol. de claris Leg. Interp. lib. 2. cap. 70. pag. 201.

(2) Plutarch. in Catone, pag. 350.

(3) Panzirol. de claris Legum Interpret. p. 203.

(4) Ibid. pag. 200, 201.

(5) Zazius apud Tiraquil. de Jure Primigenior. Præf. num. 206.

(6) Tiraq. de Jure Primig. Præf. num. 206.

(7) Baillet, Enf. celebr. pag. 420.

(8) He lived till he was 76 years old.

[C] As for what is ſaid . . . . that he was convicted of ſeveral falſifications . . . . it ought to be conſidered as a mere fable (α).] Some tell us, that the diſgrace, which he fell under, obliged him to baniſh himſelf, and to ſay, as Scipio Africanus did, that he would not ſuffer his ungrateful country to bury him. Publicè traductum patriâ exceſſiſſe ferunt, & abeuntem Scipionis Africani verba protuliſſe, ingrata patria, ne oſſa quidem mea habebis, ac in voluntario exilio ſenem defunctum fuiſſe (9). Others ſay, that he was condemned to be ſtigmatized with an hot iron in the fore-head, and that Bartolus protected him. Jaſon had this by hear-ſay; but he did very wrong to perpetuate ſuch a report upon hear-ſay in his works. We ought never to do ſuch an honour to reports of that kind but in two caſes; one is, when they are very probable; the other, when we have a mind to brand them with a note of reprobation, that is, to confute and explode them. In the latter caſe it is very uſeful to relate ſuch kinds of traditions, becauſe nothing is more proper to raiſe a diſtruſt againſt the reports of common fame, than to ſhew the age we live in the abſurd and ridiculous credulity of the former. To prove demonſtrably that the hear-ſay of Jaſon is a fiction, we want no other reaſon but this. Jaſon knew nothing of this but by hear-ſay; if the thing had been true, he would have read of it in an hundred places. Baldus lived a very long time in the greateſt glory; he wrote books; he confuted whatever he thought proper; he had very formidable antagoniſts and enemies. We may take it for granted, that if ſuch a reproach and infamy could have been caſt upon him, it would have been done in more books than one. From thence Jaſon and all the world would have learned that diſgrace of Baldus. This is the misfortune of men of learning, who diſtinguiſh themſelves much, and write a great deal; the moſt inconſiderable errors of their youth are ſooner or later publickly objected to them. They raiſe themſelves enemies amongſt authors; this is ſufficient; they muſt expect ſatyrical romances againſt themſelves, rather than any mercy from their adverſary. In this manner Panzirolus ſhould have made an apology for Baldus; he ſhould expreſly and in plain terms have made uſe of ſuch a remark, and not have ſatisfied himſelf with ſaying, Quæ omnia falſa eſſe & alii potius eveniſſe non dubito, cum nulla de hoc certa extet auctoritas, & eum Ticini deceſſiſſe conſtet (10); that is, "I do not queſtion that all this is falſe, or that it "happened to ſome other perſon, ſince we have no "good authority for it, and it is certain that he died "at Pavia.

(9) Panzirol, de claris Legum interpretib. p. 201.

IN what manner an Author ought to relate an Hear-ſay.

(10) Panzirol. de claris Legum Interpret. p. 202.

§ (α). The falſification, which Baldus was accuſed of, related to the Law Creditor, the firſt in the Digeſt de diſtractione pignorum, in which, it is ſaid, he was convicted of having ſuppreſſed an n. Bartolus took upon

He taught at Perugia, where he had for one of his Scholars Cardinal Beaufort, who was afterwards Pope Gregory XI. He was ſent for to Padua about the year 1378; but he quitted that Univerſity, when Galeazzo Viſconti having a deſign to reſtore that of Pavia, drew by very ample penſions the ableſt Profeſſors he could meet with to ſettle there. A quick repartee, which Baldus made, the firſt time he appeared in the College of Pavia, made him admired [D]. He had there a formidable Collegue, whoſe name was Philip Caſſolus. He was a man, who had an excellent memory joined to a very great genius; but the conceit, which he had of his own abilities, having tempted him to make a challenge, he failed in the attempt, and his glory was ſacrificed to that of Baldus [E]. The death of this Philip did not deliver his antagoniſt from trouble, for there was ſo warm an emulation between the Profeſſor, who ſucceeded him, and Baldus, that they introduced the ſhameful and pernicious cuſtom of bribing the auditors by ſupplications. Baldus gained a very large fortune [F]. He wrote a great many books, and there is no manner of probability that he ſtudied but two hours a day [G]. He is not an Author who can be propoſed as an inſtance of one without faults: had he only had that of contradicting himſelf, he would be very far from perfection; but he had a great many others [H]. The excuſes, which he made uſe of to palliate his contradictions, deſerve to be conſidered [I]. He died the 28th of April 1400.

upon him the defence of Baldus, not by denying the fact, but by alledging in favour of the perſon accuſed the Law Ad beſtias 31 in the Digeſt de pœnis, which imports, that when the guilty perſon is in other reſpects a man of great merit, or one, who has extraordinary talents in his art, the rigour of the laws is to be mitigated in his favour. See John Niveſan, l. 5. n. 25 of his Forêt Nuptiale. CRIT. REM.]

[D] A quick repartee of Baldus .... made him admired.] He was very ſhort in ſtature, ſo that when they ſaw him in the auditory, they cried out, Minuit præſentia famam. i. e. "His preſence leſſens his reputation." He replied without any concern, augebit cætera virtus; i. e. "Virtue ſhall raiſe the value of every thing that belongs to me." Panzirolus adds, Quo dicto omnibus ſui admirationem injecit (11); i. e. "By which expreſſion he made every perſon admire him prodigiouſly."

(11) Ibid. pag. 203.

[E] The glory of Caſſolus was ſacrificed to that of Baldus.] Caſſolus had engaged to anſwer upon the ſpot every thing that could be aſked him concerning the laſt wills. The day and hour were fixed to try whether he had reaſon for his boaſts. The Aſſembly was numerous; Baldus roſe up, and propoſed a queſtion, which the other could not anſwer, ſo that he was obliged himſelf to quote the law which he aſked for. We may judge how prodigiouſly the challenger was mortified. Philippus, qui, ut memoriâ cæteris antecellebat, ſe ex omnibus ultimarum voluntatum quæſtionibus ex tempore reſponſurum profeſſus eſt. Statutâ ad dicendum die, cum in magnâ expectatione eſſet, ſurgens Baldus interrogavit, ubi in jure cautum reperiretur, parem non eſſe ejus, qui non vult, ei, qui non poteſt, conditionem. Ad primam interrogationem hæſitante Philippo, cum Baldus de præpoſitâ quæſtione legem oſtendiſſet, magnam gloriam retulit (12).

(12) Idem, ibid.

[F] Baldus gained a large fortune.] The counſels which he gave only upon the ſubject of ſubſtitutions were worth to him above 15000 crowns. He was poſſeſſed of ſeveral lands. De Jure reſpondendo immenſam pecuniam coegit, qui ex ſolis ſubſtitutionum ſpeciebus plus quindecim millia aureorum lucratus fuiſſe traditur. Aliunde præterea ex innumeris aliarum ſucceſſionum criminumque cauſis & contractibus peramplas opes accumulavit (13). He lived in a pleaſant country-houſe near Pavia, from whence he came upon a mule to the Auditory. Domus, continues Panzirolus (14), vetuſtate vitiata adhuc hodie pro re memoranda oſtentatur; that is, "The houſe, though decayed by length of time, is ſtill ſhewn as a remarkable curioſity.

(13) Panzirol. de clar. Leg. Interpret. pag. 204.
(14) Ibid. pag. 203.

[G] There is no manner of probability that he ſtudied but two hours a day.] Panzirolus, confuting this, ſays among other things, that Balbus going a journey, which hindered him from ſpending the time in reading, which he uſed to dedicate to that employment, ſaid, "Every ſtep that my horſe makes, ſo many laws ſlip out of my memory." Quot gradus equus ambulabat, tot leges ſibi excidere querebatur (15). This ſhews, that he had acquired and kept his learning by much reading.

(15) Idem, ibid.

[H] He had a great many faults.] He advances a thouſand things, which are ſingular, and contrary to the ſentiments of other Civilians, and he advances them without quoting any law. Theſe are mere fancies of his own. He quotes laws, which are nothing to the point in queſtion; he treats of many things out of their proper place; he is too dry upon neceſſary occaſions, and too prolix, where there is none. He anſwers queſtions which no perſon ever ſtarted; and he ſays nothing to what every body wants an anſwer to: he confounds himſelf by his own ſubtilties, and he gives himſelf too great a liberty. The vivacity of his genius is the cauſe of the want of uniformity in his opinions; Cum parum ſibi conſtans ſæpenumero contrarius reperiatur, id tamen non levitate, ſed ingenii ſubtilitate eveniſſe Paulus Caſtrenſis autumat (16). Thoſe, who have a lively imagination, have generally a ſhort memory; and this makes them forget, when they conſider a queſtion on one ſide, that they formerly maintained it in a contrary ſenſe. They contradict themſelves without being ſenſible of it. Add to this, that a ſubtle genius eaſily invents methods of proving and refuting the ſame things. But it is a great defect not to be able to ſuſpend the defects of this ſubtilty, till one can fix his mind in a ſteady manner.

(16) Idem, ibid.

[I] The excuſes which he made uſe of to palliate his contradictions, deſerve to be conſidered.] He ſaid that our underſtanding changes, ſo that it reaſons one day in one manner, and another day in another. I believe that in petto he reſerved to himſelf the privilege, which he aſcribed to Legiſlators. The Biſhop of Pavia aſked one day why the Laws were ſo changeable: Baldus anſwered him, that the ſame thing became lawful or unlawful according to the times. That is allowed in war which is prohibited in peace; upon which account juſtice turns upon every thing, which becomes proper to the times. Such a conduct is agreeable to the preſent conjuncture of affairs; therefore it is juſt. Thoſe, who make Laws, imitate Phyſicians; who permit, order, and forbid the ſame things according to the times and ſeaſons; and it is the time, which they regard. Ipſe quoque ſe excuſat, quod intellectus, qui ratiocinatur, non ſemper ſit idem, ſed varius; & Epiſcopo Ticinenſi ſæpe interroganti, cur toties leges mutarentur, reſpondit, flagrante bello permittitur, quod pacis tempore non licet; id ita juſtum eſſe, quod cuique ſuo tempore expedit, exemplo enim medicorum tempora à legum latoribus dicebat obſervari (17). This was the anſwer of Baldus; and here we have either implicitly or explicitly the principle, upon which thoſe Authors reaſon, who confute themſelves, when they are to diſpute againſt two ſorts of enemies. This propoſition is true and juſt, to day, while I am diſputing againſt Pelagius; a year hence it will not be ſo, if I ſhall diſpute againſt Calvin. See what has been ſaid above (18) relating to the contradictions of advocates, and the apology which Cicero made. I remember to have read, that certain controverſial writers, not being able to deny that the church commanded ſome things, which did not appear conformable either to the Scripture, or the primitive Church, maintained that they were notwithſtanding juſt and true, becauſe the Holy Ghoſt, who guides the church, inſpires it in every age with ſuch interpretations, as are moſt proper for the ſalvation of ſouls. Scripturas eſſe ad tempus adaptatas & variè intellectas, ità ut uno tempore ſecundum

(17) Apud Panzirol. ibid.

(18) In the remarks [B] and [C] of the Article (MARK) ANTHONY the Orator.

1400 [K]. The manner of his death was ſhocking; he was extremely fond of a little dog, which he very often careſſed and kiſſed. He was bit on the lip by the dog while he was playing with him in that manner; and as the creature was mad at that time, the ſubtile poiſon diſperſed it ſelf over Baldus's whole body; and though it had no ſenſible effect for a long time, yet at laſt it produced in him the fear of water, and occaſioned an incurable diſeaſe (a). Baldus lived 76 years (b), and left two ſons, who were excellent Civilians (c). Zenobius the elder of them was Biſhop of Tipherno (d).

(a) Panzirol. de clar. Leg. Interpretib. lib. 2. cap. 70. p. 201, & ſeq.

(b) Paul. Jovius Elog. cap. 8. pag. 27.
(c) Panzirol. de clar. Leg. Inter. pag. 203.
(d) Idem, ibid.

dum currentem univerſalem ritum exponerentur, mutato ritu iterum ſententia mutaretur (19). Non eſt mirum ſi praxis Eccleſiæ non tempore interpretatur Scripturam uno modo, alio tempore alio; nam intellectus currit cum praxi (20). I love ſuch ſincerity as this.

(19) Nicolaus Cuſanus, Epiſt. 2. ad Bohemos.

(20) Idem, Epiſt. 7.

[K] He died the 28th of April 1400.] His epitaph aſſures us of this. Bellarmin is therefore miſtaken in placing Baldus's death in the year 1420 (21). Trithemius, who has placed it in 1423, has committed an error; but Moreri, who ſaid that according to Trithemius the death of Baldus ought to be placed in the year 1423, was not in the wrong. The Dutch edition ſhould not have changed 1423 into 1403.

(21) Bellarmin. de Script. Eccleſiaſt. pag. 382.

BALDUS (JAMES), one of the beſt Latin Poets that Germany produced in the XVIIth Century, was born at Enſiſheim in 1603. He turned Jeſuit in the year 1624. He taught Rhetoric and polite learning for ſix years: he was a preacher for many years, and preached even at the Elector of Bavaria's Court, and raiſed himſelf a prodigious reputation by his Poems. Even the Proteſtants themſelves commended him in a ſingular manner [A]. One of his laſt Works was his Urania victrix, ſeu Animæ Chriſtianæ certamina adverſus illecebras quinque ſenſuum corporis ſui. Pope Alexander VII was ſo pleaſed with it, that he ſent his gold medal to the Author. Father Baldus conſecrated it to the Holy Virgin [B]. Several Senators of Nuremberg diſputed who ſhould have his pen [C]; and it is ſaid that he, to whom it fell, kept it in a ſilver caſe. This Poet died at Neubourg the 9th of Auguſt 1668. His Poems are of different kinds. They conſiſt of Panegyrics, and Treatiſes of Morality, Theatrical [D], and Devotional Pieces, Miſcellanies, Odes, &c. (a).

(a) Sotuel, Bibliotb. Script. Soc. Jeſu, p. 356.

[A] The Proteſtants . . . . have commended his Poems in a ſingular manner.] Father Southwel expreſſes himſelf in theſe terms: Ipſis Acatholicis etiam adeò placuerunt, ut publico typo eum Horatium Germanum nominare non dubitarint. That is, His Poetry pleaſed even thoſe, who were not Catholics, ſo much, that they did not ſcruple to call him in print the Horace of Germany. If I am not miſtaken, this is founded upon a Letter of Barlæus. Father Baldus having ſeen the verſes, which Barlæus wrote in praiſe of the Duke of Bavaria, he wrote him a very obliging letter, and ſent him a volume of his poems. Barlæus returned him thanks with prodigious compliments, and wrote to him among other things, Reſtituiſti nobis lyram neglectam diu & intermiſſam, ut jam meritò vocari poſſis lyricorum ſcriptor, aut potius Bojorum fidicen lyræ, ut ad Horatii verba alludam (1). That is, "You have reſtored to us "the long neglected lyre, ſo that you may with the "greateſt reaſon be ſtiled a Lyric Writer, or rather "the Prince of the Bavarian Lyre, to allude to the "words of Horace. This letter was written the firſt of March 1644. The Jeſuit was then Rector of the College of Munich (2).

(1) See the 467th Letter of Barlæus, p. 911. See likewiſe the 487th Letter, which is written to the ſame Baldus.
(2) See the Table of Barlæus's Letters.

[B] He conſecrated a Medal of Alexander VII to the Holy Virgin.] This is what Southwel ſays: Hanc verò Jacobus Deiparæ Virgini anathema appendit, ut palam faceret cui Palladi ipſe ſuos labores conſecraret (3).

(3) Sotuel, Bibliotb. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 356.

[C] Several Senators of Nuremberg diſputed who ſhould have his pen.] I cannot tell, ſays Mr. Baillet (4), whether he, who kept it in a ſilver caſe made on purpoſe for it, "did not commit a kind of Sacrilege; be- "cauſe it ſeems to me that Father Baldus had conſe- "crated it to the Holy Virgin; and that his inten- "tion was that it ſhould be affixed to one of her ima- "ges, or altars, as Lipſius did before upon the impulſe "of ſuch like devotion."

(4) Jugem. ſur les Poet. tom. 5. num. 1507. pag. 42.

[D] His Poems conſiſt of Theatrical Pieces, &c.] There is one with this title; Poeſis Oſca, ſive Drama Georgicum de Belli malis & Pacis bonis, carmine antiquo, Atellano, Oſco, Caſco (5). How ruſtic ſoever this piece was with the Oſcan and Caſcan Jargon, in which it was compoſed, I do not queſtion but it coſt the author more time and wit, than a ſerious piece in good Latin. We muſt take care therefore not to ſuppoſe that it was printed at Munich in 1617, as Father Southwel aſſures us; ſince James Baldus, at fourteen years of age, was not capable of executing ſuch a deſign as this.

(5) Compare this with the Dialogue of (Mariangelus) Accurſius, which I mentioned in the remark [F] of his article.

BALDUS (a) (BERNARDIN) Abbot of Guaſtalla, born at Urbino in the year 1553, was one of the moſt learned men of his time. He made ſo great a progreſs under his firſt maſters, that he was able to tranſlate the Phænomena of Aratus into Italian verſe, while he was but a young ſcholar. His father finding by theſe eſſays that his ſon was capable of proceeding a great way in learning, ſent him to Padua in the year 1573 [A]. Bernardin ſtudied Homer there under Emanuel Margunius (b), and in private almoſt all the Greek Poets, and gained a very accurate knowledge of them. He compoſed at Padua a book concerning the Engines of War (c), which ſpread his name beyond the Alps; and this gave him an inclination to learn French and High Dutch; for he thought it was a point of civility to underſtand the language of thoſe, whoſe affection he had gained. He learned theſe two languages with a prodigious facility. The Plague obliged him to leave Padua, and returning to Urbino, he applied himſelf for five years to Frederic Commandin, an excellent Profeſſor of the Mathematics, of whom he learned all the branches of that ſcience. He felt an extreme regret upon the death of that ingenious man: and having (a) His great great grandfather left the name of Cantagallina, a noble family of Perugia, which he was deſcended from, and aſſumed this. Fabr. Scharloncin. See below quotation (e).

(b) He was a native of Crete, and Profeſſor of Greek at Padua.
(c) De Tormentis Bellicis & eorum Inventoribus.

[A] His father finding his capacity by theſe Eſſays, ſent him to Padua.] We may correct by this an error of Nicius Erythræus. I am well aſſured that he had no intention to leſſen in any point the glory of our Baldus; and yet he has extremely leſſen'd it; this was for want of reflection, and regard to the order of time. He ſays that it was after the Lectures of Margunius (1), that Baldus thought himſelf able to tranſlate Greek Poems into his mother-tongue. Apud quem tantum profecit, ut eo duce & cereum quodammodo lucente obſcuriſſima Græcorum quorundam poetarum loca penetraverit. . . . . Quamobrem ea eſt incenſus animi alacritate atque fiduciâ, ut auſus ſit poemata Græca in noſtrum ſermonem convertere (2). He had tranſlated a Poem of Aratus, before he went to Padua.

(1) It ſhould be written ſo, and not Margranius, as it is in Erythræus.

(2) Nic. Erythr. Pinac. 1. p. 4.

ing undertaken to write his life, he was induced by that means to attempt the lives of all the Mathematicians. He laboured at this Work for twelve years. The Commentaries, which he publiſhed in the year 1582 upon the Mechanics of Ariſtotle, ſhew his capacity in that kind of knowledge. To relax his mind from theſe painful ſtudies, he wrote a Poem in his mother tongue of the Art of Navigation. Ferdinand de Gonzaga, Prince of Molfetta, and Lord of Guaſtalla, having a great reſpect for Mathematicians, engaged our Baldus to live with him. It was at his Court that Baldus began to write upon Vitruvius, and compoſed his book de Verborum Vitruvianorum ſignificatione. Being hindred by ſickneſs from taking a voyage into Spain with his patron, he employed the leiſure, that Ferdinand de Gonzaga's abſence gave him, in writing a very methodical treatiſe of the Court (d), and ſeveral other Works [B]. He was made Abbot of Guaſtalla in the year 1586, without having ever aſked for it; and from that time he applied himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of Canon Law, to the Fathers and Councils, and to the Oriental Languages, without even excepting the Arabic [C]. Having compoſed in the year 1595 five books de nova Gnomonice, he tranſlated the year following the Chaldee Paraphraſe of the Pentateuch, and illuſtrated it with a Commentary; after which he tranſlated from the Hebrew the Book of Job, and the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and added Notes to them. He ſpent ſome hours in explaining a plate, which is at Eugubio [D], and which contains ſome inſcriptions in the old Tuſcan Language. He began very late a prodigious Work in the year 1603, I mean a Deſcription of the World. His plan was no leſs hiſtorical than geographical, and extended even to the ſmalleſt boroughs, which modern Writers have made any mention of. He finiſhed this Work with regard to the matter [E]; but he reduced only part of it to its proper order. He died Oct. 12, 1617, after a great defluxion of Rheum, that had continued upon

(d) Libros ſex de Aulâ eruditiſſimos methodo analyticâ conſcripſit. Scharloncinus. See the following quotation.

[B] He wrote ſeveral works.] This remark will contain only the titles of ſome of the writings of our Baldus. I mean thoſe, which are not mentioned in the text of this article, whether the author compoſed them during his patron's voyage, or at any other time. I ſay then, that he tranſlated Hero de Automatis & Baliſtis, the Paralipomena of Quintus Calaber, and the Poem of Muſæus; and that he wrote a book of Mathematical Paradoxes, another de Scamillis imparibus Vitruvii, another de Firmamento & Aquis, another upon the Deſcription of the Temple, which Ezechiel has left us, another de Hiſtoriæ ſcribendæ Legibus, another of the Antiquities of Guaſtalla, the Life of Frederic, and that of Guy Ubaldus, Dukes of Urbino, Oeconomia Tropologica in S. Matthæum; ſeveral Poems, ſome in Latin, others in Italian, among which that intitled Deiphobus is an imitation of the Caſſandra of Lycophron. The following remarks will give the title of ſome other of his books. I ſhall obſerve here that Nicius Erythræus had reaſon to ſay, that the Deſcription of the Temple is a very difficult ſubject; but he was miſtaken in taking Jeremiah for Ezechiel: Ferosolymitani, ſays he (3), Templi . . . . deſcriptionem per Hieremiam literis conſignatam & traditam, rem involutam & multis difficultatibus obſeſſam evolvit, illuſtravit, atque hominum intelligentiæ aperuit.

(3) Idem, ibid.

[C] He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Oriental Languages, without even excepting the Arabic.] He ſtudied it at Rome with John Baptiſta Raimondi, and applied himſelf in ſuch a manner to it, and to the Sclavonian Tongue, that he enquired after ſcarce any news: Romæ dum viveret ferè neſcivit quid gereretur in Aulis: Arabicæ enim Linguæ cum Jo. Baptiſta Raimundo diligentiſſimè ſtuduit, & arcana induſtria Sclavonicæ, quam perfectè callebat (4). He tranſlated from the Arabic the Geographical Garden of an anonymous Author, and compoſed a Dictionary of that language. He believed that this anonymous Author lived about the end of the tenth Century. If Marcus Velſerus had not died, he would have cauſed the tranſlation of that geographical work and the other writings of Baldus to be printed (5).

(4) Fabritius Scharloncinus, in ejus Vitâ.

(5) Idem, ibid.

[D] He laboured upon the explanation of a plate, which is at Eugubio.] Schoockius remembring in a confuſed manner ſomething of this work of Bernardin Baldus, aſcribes to him another, which does not belong to him. "E ſterquilinio Anniano Bernardinus Baldus "nuper collegit Antiquitates Ethruſcas anno 1637, "Florentiæ evulgando volumen typis perquam ele"gantibus, cujus hæc inſcriptio: Ethruſcarum Anti"quitatum Fragmenta, quibus urbis Romæ aliarumque "gentium primordia, mores, & res geſtæ indicantur, "à Curtio Inghiramio reperta Scornelli prope Vulter"ram, anno Salutis M.D.C.XXXVII; Ethruſco verò "CIↃ CIↃ CIↃ CCCCXCV" (6). That is, "Bernardin "Baldus has lately collected from Annius Viterbo the "Etruſcan Antiquities in the year 1637, and publiſhed at Florence a book in a very beautiful character, "intitled; Fragments of the Ethruſcan Antiquities, in "which the origin, manners, and hiſtory of the city of "Rome, and other nations are ſhewn, found at Scor"nelli near Vulterra, in the year of the Chriſtian Æra "M.D.C.XXXVII; and of the Etruſcan CIↃ CIↃ CIↃ "CCCCXCV." Could any perſon, who knew that Baldus died in the year 1617, commit ſuch an error as this? What is moſt ſurprizing is, that the ſame Schoockius, after he has ſpoken in this manner in pag. 67, ſpeaks as he ought in page 217; Simili ratione egit Bernardinus Baldus, vir cæteroquin longe doctiſſimus, annis abhinc fermè quinquaginta evulgando ſuam quaſi divinationem in tabulam æneam Eugubinam linguâ Etruſcâ veteri perſcriptam, ſimul abutendo operâ Marci Velſeri viri cæteroquin judicioſiſſimi (7). That is: "In "like manner acted Bernardin Baldus, a man in other "reſpects of very great learning, who about fifty years "ago publiſhed his Conjectures upon a braſs plate at "Eugubio, which had an inſcription in the antient "Tuſcan Language, and likewiſe induced Marcus "Velſerus, a man otherwiſe of great judgment, to "join with him in that abſurd work." Why then did not he correct his former miſtake? He forgot it perhaps, as it too often happens to thoſe, who value themſelves upon writing a great deal. They cannot ſupport this character without copying haſtily whatever they find in all kinds of Books. This is what Scharloncinus ſays of this work of Baldus: Tabulam Etruſcam Eugubinam interpretatus fuit: in eâ autem divinatione, ut aiebat, ſubciſivas unius menſis horas conſumpſit. That is: "He explained the Etruſcan Table at Eu"gubio; in which, as he ſaid, he ſpent his leiſure "hours for one month." Our Baldus has been mentioned in the new edition of the Eponymologium of Magirus, as having publiſhed a book in the year 1637, the ſame that Schoockius aſcribes to him. Does not this ſhew a great deal of judgment?

(6) Schoockius, de Fabulâ Hamelenſi, pag. 67.

(7) Idem, ibid. pag. 217.

[E] He finiſhed his Deſcription of the World, with regard to the matter.] What his Hiſtorian tells us of this is as follows: Totum opus ad umbilicum perduxit; non digeſſit tamen univerſum, quatuor, aut ni fallor quinque tantum tomi fuerunt ordine alphabetico diſpoſiti; ſupereſſent ſeptem aut octo diſponendi, quantum ex chartarum & faſciculorum mole conjicere licet. That is: "He finiſh'd the work; but he did not digeſt the "whole of it: there were but four or five volumes "diſpoſed in an alphabetical order: and ſeven or "eight volumes remained to be diſpoſed in that man"ner, as well as could be conjectured from the pa"pers which he left." I do not believe, that Fabritius Scharloncinus has given us a defective liſt of Baldus's works; but according to the bad cuſtom of moſt perſons, who give us ſuch kinds of liſts, he does not diſtinguiſh the books, which have been printed from thoſe, which have not (8). I have not copied his whole Catalogue.

(8) See above the beginning of the remark [E] of the article AUREOLUS.

upon him for forty days (e) [F]. He was prodigiously laborious [G], without ambition, or vain glory always ready to excuse the faults of others, and grounding his conduct in that point upon a very good reason [H]; extremely devout, not only for a Mathematician, but even for an Ecclesiastic [I].

(e) Taken from a letter of Fabritius Scharloncinus ad illustrissimum Dominum Lælium Ruinum Episcopum Balneoregiensem, exnuntium Apostolicum ad Poloniæ Regem. See likewise Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. 2. p. 4. and the Funeral Oration of Baldus by Mark Anthony Virgilius, printed not in 1607, as Mr. Teissier says in Catalogo Biblioth. p. 229, but in the year 1617.

[F] He died . . . . . after a great rheum, which had continued upon him for forty days.] It is thus I think I may translate the words of Scharloncinus, Posteaquam dies 40 vehementi distillatione vexatus fuisset. Vossius understood by Distillatio a Catarrh, and he was not mistaken in pretending that these two words are synonymous. That of rheum seems to me most proper; for generally catarrhs do not last forty days. Moreri out of a prodigious mistake found here an apoplexy of forty days.

[G] He was extremely laborious.] He rose at midnight to his studies, and read even while he was eating. In studiis sic assiduus fuit, ut sæpè & legeret & comederet. S. Augustini de civitate Dei ter inter prandium evolvit; statim à noctis meridie, dum ei vires firmiores essent, ad lucubrandum surgebat (9). He considered Euclid translated into Arabic as one of his books of diversion. A prandio Euclidem Arabicè editum, vel libellum aliquem Germanicum, aut Gallicum, in manus sumebat (10). Happy those, who can study with such application without prejudice to their health:

(9) Scharloncin. in Vitâ Baldi.

(10) Scharloncinus, ibid.

Felices quibus ista licent, miramur & illos,
Et nostri miseremur.

"Thrice happy those,
"Who have this pow'r: their fortune we admire,
"And pity our own severer lot."

A Reflection upon secret faults.

[H] He was always ready to excuse the faults of others, and grounded his conduct in that point upon a very good reason.] "If we were to see those without disguise, said he, whom we take for the best of men, "we should find not one of them, who did not de-"serve to be chastised." Facile parcendum esse dicebat iis maximè, qui in re levi impegissent, quoniam si quos censemus optimos, nudos conspiceremus, nullum eorum non judicaremus multis dignum verberibus (11). This may be carried too far: it will be better perhaps to keep to Cardinal Mazarin's maxim. He used to say, that the most able men were like victims, which, tho' ever so carefully chosen, had always something bad, when their entrails were examined (12). I remember to this purpose a passage in Father Rapin, which seemed to me very sensible the first time I read it. It is a thought, which he makes use of as an Apology for Cicero: There are, says he (13), in the bottom of the greatest men's souls some things, which if they could be seen, they would be found to be as weak as others; . . . and that frequently the reputation of Heroes does not rise so much from the address, with which they shew their good qualities, as from that, with which they conceal their bad ones, and do not suffer themselves to be penetrated.

(11) Idem, ibid.

(12) See the Preface to the Memoires of Mr. Chanut.

(13) In his Comparison between Demosthenes and Cicero.

[I] He was extremely devout, not only for a Mathematician, but even for an Ecclesiastic.] He fasted twice a week; he communicated every holy-day (14), and he was very charitable to the poor. His mother said, that when he was but a year old he look'd upon the altars and images not only with joy, but even with veneration (15). With joy, I do not doubt; for it is common with infants to start at the sight of gildings, and ornaments, and images; but as for Veneration, that is another point: they have at most but mere machinal motions, to which they are accustomed. Our Baldus died well fortified with all the Sacraments of the Church, and in the arms of the Monks. Spiritum Deo reddidit Sacramentis Ecclesiæ omnibus rite munitus (16). Quemadmodum sanctissime vixerat, ita etiam sanctissime in complexu cucullatorum patrum extremum vitæ spiritum edidit (17).

(14) Thus I translate Diebus festis omnibus sacrum faciebat: Words which perhaps mean only that he officiated every Holy-Day. But there is no doubt that what I say is contained in the Latin of Scharloncinus.

(15) Scharloncinus in ejus Vitâ.

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) Nic. Erythræus, Pinacoth. 1. pag. 7.

☞ BALE (JOHN) in Latin Balæus, an eminent English Bishop and Historian in the XVIth Century, was born at Covie about five miles from Dunwich in Suffolk Nov. the 21st 1495. His father's name was Henry, and his mother's Margaret (a). His parents having a very numerous family of children, our Author at twelve years of age was entered into the Convent of Carmelite Friars at Norwich (b). He was likewise a Scholar at Jesus College in the University of Cambridge (c); and was converted from Popery, as he informs us himself (d), by the procurement of Thomas Lord Wentworth [A]. Soon after this he married; and met with a great variety of persecutions at York under Archbishop Lee, and at London under Bishop Stokesley; but the Lord Cromwell, who had a great interest with King Henry VIII, always secured him from any danger. But after the death of that Nobleman, Bale retired from the rigours of the Bishops to the Low-Countries, where he continued eight years, and wrote several books in the English Language (e). He was recalled by King Edward VI, and consecrated Bishop of Ossory in Ireland at Dublin February 2d 1552; in which See he had not sat six months, when Queen Mary's accession to the Crown obliged him to fly, and conceal himself for some time at Dublin; from whence he embarked about Michaelmas 1553, but was taken by the Pirates, and sold. However being ransomed afterwards he went to Basil (f), where he published a new edition of

(a) Balæus, Script. illustr. Majoris Brytanniæ, Cent. 8. pag. 628 and 702. edit. Basil. 1557.

(b) Idem, ibid. cap. 100. p. 702.

(c) Nicholson's English Historical Library, Part 2. pag. 228. edit. London 1697 in 8vo.

(d) Pag. 702..

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Jac. Waræus, de Script. Hibern. pag. 135. apud Pope-Blount, Censur. Celebrior. Authorum, pag. 683. edit. Genevæ 1694. in 4to.

[A] Was converted from Popery, as he informs us himself, by the procurement of Thomas Lord Wentworth.] He tells us, that he was involved in the most profound ignorance of all true learning and the greatest blindness of mind, while he continued at Norwich and Cambridge, without any tutor or patron, till the Word of God began to appear in its proper lustre, and the Churches were brought back to the pure fountains of all true Divinity. That the instrument of his conversion was not a Monk or a Priest, but the most noble Lord Wentworth (1); by whose means he was induced to leave the monstrous corruptions of Popery, and to embrace the purity of the Gospel. In omni literarum barbarie ac mentis cæcitate illic (Nordovici) & Cantabrigiæ pervagabar, nullum habens tutorem aut Mecænatem, donec lucente Dei verbo, ecclesiæ revocari cæpissent ad veræ theologiæ purissimos fontes. In eo autem splendore ortus novæ Hierusalem, non à monacho aut sacrifico vocatus, sed illustri Domino Vuenfordo, tanquam à centurione illo, qui ab Christum Dei Filium esse dicebat, serò excitatus, deformitatem meam quam primum vidi & agnovi. Protinusque divinâ bonitate ab arido monte in floridam ac fæcundam Evangelii vallem transferebar; ubi omnia reperi non in arenâ, sed suprà solidam petram ædificata (2). He observes then, that he immediately divested himself of the characteristic of Antichrist, and cast off all the yokes of that impostor, that he might gain the liberty of the sons of God. In short, that he might be no longer a slave to that detestable beast, he married his wife Dorothy, a woman zealous for the true Religion, in obedience to St. Paul's direction, that he, who has not the gift of continency, should marry. Unde scelestissimi Antichristi characterem ilico obrasi, jugaque ejus omnia à me longè projeci, ut essem in sortem & libertatem datus filiorum Dei. Et ne deinceps in aliquo essem tam execrabilis Bestiæ creatura, uxorem accepi Dorotheam fidelem, divinæ huic voci auscultans, Qui non continet, nubat (3). Mr. Nicholson in his English Historical Library (4) has a very invidious reflection upon this occasion, without mentioning the least ground for it. "He was (as he says) converted from Popery by "the procurement of Thomas Lord Wentworth, tho' "(in truth) his wife Dorothy seems to have had as "great hand in that happy work."

(1) Thus Mr. Fuller in his Worthies in Suffolk, pag. 60, 61. and Mr. Nicholson, Hist. Library, Part 2. pag. 228. translate Dominus Vuenford.

(2) Balæus, Script. Illustr. Maj. Brytanniæ Catal. Cent. 8. cap. 100. p. 702. edit. Basileæ 1557.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Part 2. pag. 228.

of his Centuries of the illuſtrious Britiſh Writers [B]. He returned from his exile in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, but did not think proper to return any more to Ireland, contenting himſelf with a Prebend of Canterbury, where he died in November 1563, being ſixty

[B] Where he publiſhed a new edition of Centuries of the illuſtrious Britiſh Writers.] He had before publiſhed Summarium illuſtrium majoris Britanniæ Scriptorum, printed in 4to Ipſw. and Weſal. 1549, which contained only five centuries of writers, and which was firſt preſented to King Edward VI (5). But in 1557 he publiſh'd his Scriptorum illuſtrium majoris Brytanniæ, quam nunc Angliam & Scotiam vocant, Catalogus, à Japheto per 3618 annos uſque ad annum hunc Domini 1557, ex Beroſo, Gennadio, Beda, Honorio, Boſtone Burienſi, Frumentario, Capgravo, Boſtio, Burello, Triſiâ, Tritemio, Geſnero, Joanne Lelando, atque aliis authoribus collectus, & IX Centurias continens. i. e. "A Catalogue of the "illuſtrious Writers of Great Britain, now called "England and Scotland, from Japhet for the ſpace of "3618 years to the preſent year of our Lord 1557, "collected from Beroſus, Gennadius, Beda, Honorius, Boſton of Bury, Frumentarius, Capgrave, Boſtius, Burellus, Triſſa, Trithemius, Geſner, John "Leland, and other authors; and containing IX "Centuries." There is a picture of the author prefixed to it with a Latin Diſtich by Ægidius Synegorus, and a Tetraſtich by another hand. This work is dedicated by Bale to Otho Henry Prince Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of both the Bavaria's, and Elector of the Roman Empire; and the Epiſtle Dedicatory is dated from Baſil in September 1557. In that Epiſtle he endeavours to juſtify the acrimony of ſtyle, which he makes uſe of, and obſerves, that this was not the effect of any intemperance of tongue or ill nature in him, but that he thought himſelf obliged to exhort mankind to virtue with zeal and ſpirit, to remonſtrate againſt vice with aſperity, to commend perſons of merit very fully, and to reproach bad men with ſharpneſs. And he was of opinion, that a writer ought not to pay ſo much regard to his readers, as to the ſubject itſelf and to truth, which by no means ſhould be in the leaſt violated. That the language of truth is ſimple and plain, expreſſing every thing in its proper terms, without any deference to the delicate ears of mankind, or adapting itſelf to their cuſtoms and vices. Si qui vero ſint, qui meam in accuſando acerbitatem reprehendent, ii hoc reſponſi à me ferant, non ex linguæ petulantiâ, aut naturæ morbo id proficiſci. Sed hæc eſt ratio mea, & ſic animum induco meum, ad virtutem oportere cohortari ardenter, vitia notare acriter, laudare ampliè, vituperare improbos aſpere; & ſcriptorem non tam auditorum aut lectorum rationem habere, quam rei ipſius & veritatis debere, à quâ nullo modo vel latum unguem eſt recedendum. Simplex veritatis & aperta oratio, ſuis quamque rem terminis circumſcribit, ſuis meritis ornat, non auribus ſerviens, nec hominum vitiis ac moribus ſe accommodans. He obſerves afterwards, that he generally makes uſe of the very words of thoſe authors, whom he quotes, in order to give not only the greater ſanction, but likewiſe the greater grace and ornament to his work; ſince he was conſcious to himſelf, that he wanted the advantages of politeneſs and eloquence, having been engaged from his earlieſt youth in the ſtudy of things and in a diligent ſearch after books, in ſuch a manner, that he had no opportunity of forming his ſtyle to any degree of elegance. Quanquam pleriſque in locis authorum, quorum fide nitor, ipſa verba refero, non mea; quo plus non authoritatis ſolum & fidei, ſed ſplendoris etiam & gratiæ orationi meæ accederet. Quam enim hæc doctrinarum adjumenta & præſidia eloquentiæ me deficiant, jamdudum ſentio & agnoſco; quippe qui ſemper ab ineunte ætate in perveſtigatione rerum atque librorum verſatus, nunquam ſatis ſedulò ac ſeriò ad poliendam orationem, comparandamve ſtyli elegantiam animum meum adjecerim. After this Dedication follows an Epiſtle to the reader by Cælius Secundus Curio, who recommends Bale for the great perſpecuity of his ſtyle, his integrity, and indefatigable diligence. Magna eſt orationis perſpicuitas, par fides, indefeſſa diligentia. In February 1559 Bale publiſhed Scriptorum illuſtrium majoris Brytanniæ poſterior pars, quinque continens centurias ultimas, quas author Joannes Baleus Sudovolgius Anglus, ex Lelando Antiquario, aliiſque probis authoribus, non parvo labore collegit. i. e. "The latter part of the illuſtrious Writers of Great "Britain, containing the five laſt Centuries, which "the author John Bale of Suffolk collected with great "pains from Leland the Antiquary, and other valuable authors." He dedicates this volume to Count Zkradin, and Dr. Paul Scalichius of Lika; and in his Epiſtle Dedicatory ſhews what his deſign was in that work. He obſerves, that having ſeen a great number of books of different authors in the Monaſteries and Convents of England, which were not publiſhed or commonly known, he reſolved to write down the titles and beginnings of thoſe books, and to prevent them from falling into oblivion, and being deſtroyed. To theſe he added an account of the more celebrated Engliſh Writers, who had been publiſhed; without omitting thoſe of the loweſt claſs, who, notwithſtanding their obſcurity and barbarity, yet contain ſome things of value and importance. He tells us, that he had collected thoſe accounts with the utmoſt labour from Leland and other authors. Quos ergo licuit, velut diſjectas tabulas ac laceras è naufragio eripui, & ab oblivione vindicavi. Atque his impreſſos etiam Anglicos Scriptores illuſtrioresque celebrioreſque adnexui; ex quibus hoc opus noſtrum & conflatum eſt hucuſque & amplificatum. Rem verò nunc ad gregarios perduximus, pervenimuſque ad infimæ claſſis homines, qui in poſtremis merito numerari & collocari queant. Non rarò tamen hi quoque licet obſcuri nonnulli ſint & barbari, res cognitu dignas acri ingenio chartis mandârunt. Hos ego ex Lelando noſtro Antiquario aliiſque ſcriptoribus, quanto maximo potui ſtudio, collegi. Theſe five laſt Centuries are an Appendix to the eight preceding ones, which he publiſh'd before. He has prefixed to them an Account of the Writers before the Flood and the Incarnation of our Saviour, with a Deſcription of England from Paulus Jovius, George Lilly, Leland, Andrew Althamerus, and others. He dedicates the thirteenth Century to Conrade Geſner, Conrade Lycoſthenes, and Joſias Simler; the fourteenth Century concerning the Scots Writers to Alexander Ales and John Knox; and the fifteenth Century concerning the Writers of Ireland to Mr. William Williams. Geſner in his Bibliotheca gives him the title of a man of great diligence, vir diligentiſſimus; and Biſhop Godwin ſtiles him a very laborious enquirer into the antiquities of Britain. Antiquitatum Britannicarum diligentiſſimus perſcrutator (6). Laurence Humphrey, afterwards Preſident of Magdalen College in Oxford, repreſents him as an invincible adverſary to the Church of Rome, and tells us in his Vaticinium de Româ, that Luther and Platina had diſcovered many things, and Vergerius ſome, but that Bale has detected them all.

Plurima Lutherus patefecit, Platina multa, Quædam Vergerius, cuncta Balæus habet (7).

Valentine Henry Vogler in his Introduct. Univerſal. in Notit. Scriptor. (8) tells us, that our Author's zeal againſt the Papal tyranny is not ſo much ſurprizing, if we conſider that England ſuffered more from it than other countries, and therefore he excuſes the vehemence of his ſtyle in his preface to his Acta Romanorum Pontificum; and obſerves that tho' he is extremely hated by the Papiſts, yet they are obliged to commend his catalogue of the Engliſh Writers. But Pitſeus treats him with the utmoſt ſeverity imaginable, and tells us, that Bale did not ſo much enlarge the catalogue of Leland, as corrupt it in a moſt prodigious manner; and that he has filled his work with the moſt ſcandalous lies and calumnies, and deſtroyed all the beauty of Leland's ſtyle with his own barbarous expreſſion. In ſhort, that he has given us a great many particulars worthy the mind and mouth of an Heretic, but abſolutely void of all civility and moral honeſty, and ſome things even unworthy of a Chriſtian ear. Hic Lelandi catalogum non tam prolixè auxit, quam prodigioſè depravavit. Omnia namque fœdiſſimus Scurra mendaciis & calumniis replevit, & opus Lelandi politiſſimum pollutiſſimo ſtylo turpitèr conſpurcavit. Multa habet ille digna quidem hæretico ſpiritu & ore, ſed ab omni urbanitate, & morali honeſtate prorſus aliena, & Chriſtianis auribus nonnulla plane indigna (9). He informs us afterwards, that beſides his ſlanders

(5) Nicholſon, pag. 228.

(6) De Converſ. Britan. ad Chriſtian. Relig. apud Pope-Blount, Cenſur. Celebrior. Authorum, pag. 683. edit. Genevæ 1694, in 4to.

(7) See Pope-Blount, ubi ſupra.

(8) Cap. 22. apud Pope-Blount, ibid.

(9) Joan. Pitſei Relation. Hiſtor. de Rebus Anglic. tom. 1. pag. 53. edit. Pariſ. 1619, in 4to.

sixty eight years of age. He was interred in that Cathedral (g). We shall give his character in the Note [C]. He published a great number of books both in the Latin and English tongues, of which he gives us a catalogue in his Scriptorum illustrium majoris Britanniæ Catalogus (b). Several of them were written before he left the Popish Religion; and many of his Works were composed in English verse. His account of the condemnation of Sir John Oldcastle was published at London in 8vo 1729, under the following title; A brefe Chronycle concerning the Examinacyon and Death of the blessed Martyr Syr Johan Oldecastell the Lorde Cobham, collected togyther by Johan Bale. To which is added, An Appendix of original Instruments. This was first printed at London 1544, vi. die Augusti. The editor of the last edition tells us in his preface, that Bale has written this narrative with all the warmth of one that had escaped the flames.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(b) Cap. 100. p. 703, 704.

slanders against men, and his blaspemies against God and the Saints, there was nothing of his own, which deserved any notice. Nam ille miser homuncio præter calumnias in homines, & blasphemias in Deum & sanctos, nihil habet suum, quod notatu dignum judico (10). He gives us afterwards some instances of the severity of Bale's style; and observes, that besides the enormous crimes, which he objects to a great many writers, he treats the Bishops, Monks, and all the Priests of Learning with great scurrility, and accuses them of hypocrisy, superstition, error, and other vices (11). He stigmatizes our Author by the name of Bal or Baal, and styles him an apostate Carmelite Monk, and a married Priest. Idolum apud simpliciores Anglos Joannes Bal, qui se Latinè Balæum cognominat, fuit hæreticus Anglus; ab ordine Carmelitarum apostata Monachus, & sacerdos (salvâ lectoris reverentiâ) maritatus. Valerius Andreas likewise in the preface to his Bibliotheca Belgica calls him an impious man, and an infamous Apostate. But the reader need not be told how little regard is to be paid to zealous Papists, when they declaim against a Protestant Writer, who has treated of the History of their Religion with a peculiar warmth and asperity. However we find, that even some Protestant Writers represent him as a man of too much acrimony in his writings. Bishop Mountague in his Apparatus Prim. (12) censures him for the intemperance of his zeal in general, though he owns that he ought not to be rejected in a great many cases. Impotentis linguæ & calami plerumque Scriptor, sed in multis non rejectitius. Vossius in his book de Historic. Latin. (13) tells us, that our Author is not to be depended upon in his account of the most antient Writers; and that this is likewise the case of Pitseus, whose custom it is to transcribe Bale, except where the point turns upon the difference of religion, in which it is no wonder that they disagree extremely. Unum scio, in priorum seculorum scriptoribus non rarò Balæi fidem claudicare. Idem de Joanne Pitsæo dictum velim, qui exscribere Balæum solet, præterquam in iis, quæ ad dissidium in sacro religionis negotio pertinent; ubi nihil mirum, si pugnantissima hi duo habeant. We may observe here, that Vossius asserts, that Pitsæus generally transcribes our Author, though he speaks of him with the utmost contempt, and tells us, that tho' he had read Bale over in hopes to find some jewel amidst his dunghil, yet he was disappointed. Nam in illo sterquilinico sperabam saltem aliquam antiquitatis gemmam me inventurum. Sed Æsopico Gallo infortunatior spe meâ frustratus sum (14). Mr. Wharton in the preface to his Anglia Sacra (15) assures us, that Bale had little regard for truth, if he could but enlarge the number of the enemies of the church of Rome. Veritas Balæo parum curæ erat, dummodo Romanæ Ecclesiæ inimicorum numerum augere posset. And he observes in another place (16), that he generally had his eyes shut, when he fixed the ages of the English Writers. Clausis plerumque oculis Scriptorum Anglicorum ætates definivit. Mr. Nicholson likewise (17) having remarked, that the ground plot of his work was borrowed from Leland, tells, that the chief of his own superstructure is malicious and bitter invectives against the Papists; and that the character which Mr. Wharton gives of him and his writings, is too just. "Some "have thought, continues he, his making (b) "Books of some little Saxon Epistles excuseable, "and what would admit of an apology; but if "we mark him well, he is continually multiply- "ing the writings of all his Authors at a very un- "sufferable and unjustifiable rate." The same Author likewise remarks in another place (18), that it is Bale's way to give accounts of men and their labours at random. Mr. James Harington of Christ Church Oxon, in his preface to the first volume of Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses has passed a severe sentence upon our Author; for having observed, that all good Antiquaries, men of enlarged souls and of an even temper, however of divers professions, have always been of the same principle, and that they all equally sacrificed to truth and learning, and suffered not their private opinions to put a bias on their History; he tells us, that whoever will compare the Cento's of Bale and Pits with the excellent works of Leland and Camden, must necessarily discern how near an alliance there is between zeal and ignorance, and between learning and moderation. The same Gentleman likewise in his Introduction to the second volume of the Athenæ Oxonienses, having remarked, that Leland, by the command of King Henry VIII, undertook to survey and perpetuate books of the antient monasteries, after the dissolution thereof; assures us, that "he compleated that work with so great "exactness, that BALE and PITS, who have since "attempted the same, have only made use herein of "the Gorgon's common eye, and have reflected that "single light only upon posterity." Our Author's books are particularly prohibited by the Church of Rome; and the Index published in folio at Madrid in 1667, stiles him a most impudent and slanderous Writer against the See of Rome, the Mass, and the Eucharist, perpetually breathing out his poisonous malice; upon which account it orders, that no part of his writings shall be suffered. Scriptor fuit impudentissimus ac maledicentissimus adversus Romanam Sedem, Missam, & Eucharistiam, virus nunquam non spirans; nihil propterea ex ejus operibus unquam permittendum.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Idem, pag. 58.

(12) Sect. 83. apud Pope-Blount, pag. 684.

(13) Lib. 2. cap. 16.

(14) Pitseus, ubi supra, pag. 53.

(15) Vol. 1. p. 31. apud Nicholson, ubi supra, pag. 229.

(16) Ibid. p. 47.

(17) Ubi supra, pag. 228, 229.

(b) H. Spelm. Concil. tom. 1. pag. 210.

(18) Hist. Library, Part 1. pag. 177.

[C] We shall give his character in the Note.] We have represented in the preceding note the different judgments passed upon him as a Writer, and therefore we shall now consider the other parts of his character. Sir James Ware in his book de Scriptor. Hibern. (19) tells us, that he was a man of Learning, a frequent Preacher, and one who made very curious researches into Antiquity, though he owns that he took an unbounded liberty in his Writings. Vir doctus fuit, in concionibus assiduus, & antiquitatis studiosissimus; in Scriptis vero (ut alibi dixi) effrænatâ usus libertate. Dr. Fuller in his Worthies (20) observes, that it appears a little wonderful, that a man of his learning, who had suffered so much for the Protestant Religion, should not have been raised to some considerable preferment under Queen Elizabeth, when men of abilities were wanting to fill the vacant Bishopricks. But that it is probable, that our Author was a person more learned than discreet, and fitter to write than govern, being unable to command his own passion; and that Biliosus Balæus passes for his true character. T.

(19) Pag. 135, 136. apud Pope-Blount, p. 683.

(20) In Suffolk.

BALESDENS (JOHN) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris and in the Council, was born at Paris. He was received into the French Academy about the year 1647 in the room of Malleville; and if he had not given up his pretensions to Mr. Corneille [A], he would have [A] He gave up his pretensions to Mr. Corneille.] This is what the Author of the History of the Academy tells "us: Mr. Corneille was afterwards received in the "room of Mr. Mainard. Mr. de Balesdens had been "proposed likewise; and as he had the honour to "belong to the Chancellor, the Academy had such a "regard have ſucceeded Mainard, who died before Malleville. He had the Chancellor Seguier for his Mecænas (a). He publiſhed divers Works, which he was not the author of [B]. He lived I think till about the year 1676 (b). I do not find his name in the Requeſt of the Dictionaries; yet it ought to have been there, according to the Menagiana [C]. He had lived in the College of Harcour [D].

(a) See l'Hiſtoire de l'Academie Françoiſe, pag. 230 and 258.

(b) L'Etat de la France in 1680, in the liſt of the members of the Academy, places Baleſdens between Conrart and des Marets. Conrart died in Sept. 1675.

" regard for their Protector, that they deputed five of " their members to wait upon him, to know whether " theſe two propoſitions were equally agreeable to " him. The Chancellor aſſured them, that he left " the Academy entirely to their liberty; but when " they began to conſider that matter, the Abbé de " Ceriſy preſented a Letter from Mr. de Baleſdens, " full of compliments to them and Mr. Corneille, " whom he deſired the Academy to give the preference " to before himſelf, proteſting that he reſigned that " honour to him, as due to him upon all accounts. " The letter was read, and commended by the Aſ- " ſembly; and afterwards he (1) was received upon " the firſt vacancy, which was that of Mr. de Malle- " ville; but I do not find on what day; for from " that time the long and frequent indiſpoſitions of the " Secretary of the Academy occaſioned a conſiderable " blank in the regiſters (2).

(1) Mr. Baleſdens.

(2) Peliſſon, Hiſtoire de l'Academie Franç. p. 229, 230. edit. of 1672, in 12°.

(3) Ibid. p. 358.

[B] He publiſhed divers works, which he was not the author of himſelf.] Mr. Peliſſon has given us a liſt of all that Baleſdens publiſhed (3), which is as follows. " He tranſlated the book intitled Le Miroir du Pecheur " Pénitent, and publiſhed the following manuſcripts out " of many others, which he collected. Cartiludium Logi- " cæ, ſeu Logica memorativa, vel poetica, R. Patris Tho- " mæ Murner, cum Notis & Conjecturis. Rudimenta " cognitionis Dei & ſui, Petri Segulierii Præſidis infu- " lati. Elogia clarorum virorum Joannis Papirii Maſ- " ſonis, in two volumes. Gregorii Turonenſis Opera " pia, cum vitis patrum ſui temporis, in two volumes. " The Acts of the Conveyance of Dauphiné made over " to the Crown of France. A Treatiſe of Aqua Vitæ, " by M. John Bronaut, Phyſician to the King. He pub- " liſhed likewiſe the Fables of Eſop in French, corrected " by himſelf, for the inſtruction of the King, with " Political and Moral Maxims." Mr. de Marolles relates, that Baleſdens gave him divers Letters written in a figurative ſtyle, without mentioning a great number of others, of which he propoſed to make ſeveral volumes, the number of them was ſo prodigious (4).

(4) In his Denombrement de ceux, qui lui avoient donnè de leurs Livres.

[C] His name ought to have been in the Requeſt of the Dictionaries, according to the Menagiana.] We find theſe words there: The firſt verſes, which I made, (it is Mr. Menage who ſpeaks) were the Requeſt of the Dictionaries. I was looking for Rhimes to finiſh it. Mr. Du Puy ſent me Claquedent, to rhime to Baleſdent (5). Mr. Menage had the happieſt memory in the world; but notwithſtanding he ſometimes miſtook one thing for another even in matters, which perſonally regarded himſelf. I do not think, that he aſked for the rhime in queſtion to finiſh his Requeſt of the Dictionaries; for that incomparable Satyr was finiſhed before Baleſdens was admitted into the Academy. He was not received till the year 1647 or 1648; and that Requeſt was finiſhed about the year 1642. I prove this from the Hiſtory of the Academy. Mr. Peliſſon relates, that Mr. Menage ſuppreſſed this Requeſt after he wrote it: it continued, adds he, above ten years concealed among his papers, till a perſon, who had the cuſtody of them, ſuffered himſelf to be robbed of it by one, whom we know, and who immediately gave out ſeveral copies of it (6). Mr. Peliſſon had ſaid in the ſame page, that a Printer had lately publiſhed that Requeſt in a ſmall form, with a great many errors, and that it was printed more correctly in quarto. Without doubt by this more correct edition he means that of the Miſcellanea of Mr. Menage, which was publiſhed in 1652. However the year 1652 is the Epocha of Mr. Peliſſon's book; and conſequently the Requeſt of the Dictionaries was finiſhed in 1642 (7). It may be ſaid, that when Mr. Menage was weary with keeping that piece ſuppreſſed, and reſolved to publiſh it himſelf among his other Poems, he had a mind to enlarge it, and introduce the new Members of the Academy; and if we do not find Baleſdens there, it is becauſe the rhime ſent him by Mr. du Puy did not pleaſe him, or was too difficult to be placed there. Upon that foot, Baleſdens was obliged to his name for not receiving a dreadful blow in the Requeſt of the Dictionaries; and this name, which was ſo intractable with reſpect to rhimes, produced a much more favourable effect, than that of Tuticanus (8), and that of Earinus (9); but I do not think we ought to have recourſe to that ſuppoſition; for the Requeſt printed in the year 1652 does not contain the name of any Member of the Academy, who was admitted after the year 1640. And yet amongſt thoſe who were admitted after that year, there were ſome, who were expoſed to Mr. Menage as much as he could deſire. Was Mr. du Rier a Tranſlator without reproach?

(5) Menagiana, pag. 190. of the edition of Holland.

(6) Peliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Acad. Franç. pag. 72.

(7) Concerning this Requeſt of the Dictionaries ſee ſeveral curious facts in the Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. ch. 82.

(8) Quod minus in noſtris ponaris, amice, libellis, Nominis efficitur conditione tui. Lex pedis officio, fortunaque nominis obſtat, Quaque meos adeas eſt via nulla modos. Ovid. de Ponto, lib. 4. Eleg. 12.

(9) Nomen nobile, molle, delicatum, Verſu dicere non rudi volebam. Sed tu ſyllaba contumax repugnas. Martial, Epig. 12. lib. 9.

[D] He had lived in the College of Harcour.] Mr. de Marolles, who informs me of this, adds, that the landlord of Baleſdens was a good man, whoſe name was le Landez, afterwards Doctor of Divinity, and uncle to the two Mazures, Curates of St. Paul ſucceſſively (10). He ſays that Baleſdens was at that time of a gay temper, and diverting converſation.

(10) Memoires de Marolles, p. 32. under the year 1616.

☞ BALEY or BAILEY (WALTER), ſon of Henry Baley of Warnwell in Dorſetſhire, was born at Portſham in that county, and educated at Wincheſter School. He was admitted perpetual Fellow of New College in Oxford, after he had ſerved two years of probation in 1550, and took the Degrees of Bachelor and Maſter of Arts. He afterwards entered upon the Phyſic Line, and was admitted to practiſe in that faculty, while he was Proctor of the Univerſity in the year 1558; and about that time was made Prebendary of Dultingcote or Dulcot in the Church of Wells, which he reſigned in 1579. In 1561 he was made the Queen's Profeſſor of Phyſic at Oxford, and took his Degree of Doctor of that faculty two years after, and at laſt was appointed Phyſician to her Majeſty. He was very eminent for his ſkill in phyſic, and was prodigiouſly reſorted to for his practice. He wrote ſeveral treatiſes [A]. He died March 3d 159$\frac{2}{3}$, being 63 years of age, and was interred in the inner Chapel of New College (a).

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 255. 2d edit. London 1721.

[A] He wrote ſeveral Treatiſes.] I. A Diſcourſe of three kinds of Pepper in common uſe. This piece was printed in 1558 in 8vo, and dedicated to Sir John Horſey. II. A brief Treatiſe of the Preſervation of the Eye-ſight; printed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth in 12mo, and at Oxford in 1616 and 1654 in 8vo. In the edition of 1616 is added another Treatiſe of the Eye-ſight, collected from Fernelius and Riolanus; but by whom, is not known. They both paſs under the name of our author. III. Directions for health, natural and artificial, with medicines for all diſeaſes of the eye, in 4to 1626. IV. Explicatio Galeni de potu convaleſcentium, & ſonum, & præcipue de noſtræ alæ & biriæ paratione, &c. i. e. " An Explication upon Galen concerning " the proper drink for perſons, who have been ſick, " and thoſe in years; and particularly concerning the " preparation of the Engliſh ale and beer, &c." This piece, as Mr. Wood informs us (1), was in MS. in 4to in the Library of Robert Earl of Ayleſbury. T.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 255.

☞ BALIOL (JOHN) King of Scotland, was by his mother's ſide great-grandſon of David Earl of Huntington, grandſon of King David I, the brother of King William, by his father's ſide. He was deſcended of an ancient and noble Family [A]. Alexander III dying in 1285, was to be ſucceeded by Margaret, commonly called the Maiden of Norway, who was the daughter of Eric King of Norway, and of Margaret Alexander's daughter; and a marriage was concluded between the young Princeſs, and Edward the ſon of King Edward I of England. By this marriage the two Kingdoms were to be united, and the articles of it ſhew (a), that the Scots were very cautious, and did as much as lay in their power, to hinder their country from being any way ſubjected to England [B]. Yet this union was not acceptable to all the Scots, and ſoon occaſioned a formidable party, headed by Robert Bruce, who declared themſelves open enemies to the union or contract of marriage, as appears from a letter, which the Biſhop of St. Andrews wrote to King Edward (a) Tyrrel, vol. 3. pag. 61. apud Abercromby's Martial Atchiev. of the Scots Nation. vol. 1. pag. 461.

[A] Baliol was by his father's ſide of an ancient and noble family.] He was deſcended of Guy de Baliol, a Norman Lord, who in the reign of William Rufus the Conqueror's ſon, came over to England, and was infeoffed of the Barony of Biwel in Northumberland; for which lands his ſon Bernard de Baliol did homage to David I King of Scotland, then in poſſeſſion of that country. But being, together with Robert Bruce, ſent to that Prince, who had invaded England, and penetrated as far as the river Teiſe, to perſuade him to retreat; and his overtures of peace being rejected, he renounced his fealty, returned to the Engliſh camp, and ſhared in the glory of the victory obtained over the Scots near Northallerton. He was alſo one of thoſe that afterwards ſurprized King William at Alnwick; and having very much enlarged his paternal eſtate, in the North of England, is ſaid to have founded the ſtrong fortreſs, called from his name Bernard-Caſtle, on the bank of the Teiſe. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Euſtace; and he again by Hugh de Baliol, whoſe eldeſt ſon John married Dervegild, the daughter of Alan Lord of Galloway, and of Margaret the eldeſt daughter of David (1) Earl of Huntington, in whoſe right he was poſſeſſed of Galloway in Scotland, and of Thorkeſey, Gernemuth, and Luddingland in England. Beſides which, upon the death of Chriſtian, Counteſs of Albemarle, ſiſter to Dervegild his wife, he was aſſigned to her part of Chriſtian's inheritance, in the counties of Northampton and Lincoln. He had alſo a large eſtate in France. But as he was great by his Royal Match, and the conſiderable lands he poſſeſſed; he was no leſs ſo by his perſonal merit. He did moſt eminent Services to both his Sovereigns; I mean Alexander III of Scotland, and Henry III of England. In obedience to them he bravely withſtood the illegal ordinances and prevailing power of the rebellious Barons, inſomuch that when all the reſt of England, nay King Henry himſelf, were forced to ſubmit to the arbitrary uſurpation of the Earl of Leiceſter, he by the orders of King Alexander kept the North fixed in its allegiance to the captivated Sovereign (2). It is he who founded Baliol College in Oxford (3); and not his ſon King John Baliol, as Leſley (4), and after him Mr. de Rapin (5) erroneouſly aſſert. He died in the year 1269 (6).

(1) Son of King Alexander III.

(2) Patric Abercromby, Martial Atchievements of the Scots Nation, vol. 1. pag. 477.

(3) Chronic. de Mailros, in Rer. Angl. Script. Vet. tom. 1. pag. 241.

(4) De Reb. Geſt. Scotor. lib. 6. pag. 235.

(5) Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 3. liv. 9. pag. 58. See alſo Mr. Tindal's notes upon that paſſage, where he confutes Mr. de Rapin.

(6) Chron. de Mailros, ubi ſupra.

(7) Vol. 2. p. 60.

(8) Ubi ſupra, pag. 460.

(9) Ubi ſupra, pag. 25.

[B] The Scots did as much as lay in their power to hinder their country from being ſubjected to England.] As there is ſome difference between theſe articles of marriage, as we find them in Mr. Rapin, and as they are related by Mr. Abercromby, and as the latter has made ſome obſervations upon them, we think the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find ſome of theſe articles with that Writer's obſervations here. It was ſtipulated I, That the rights, laws, liberties, and cuſtoms of Scotland ſhall for ever remain entire and unalterable, and the Kingdom continue ſeparate, divided, and free in itſelf from the Kingdom of England, without any ſubjection, by its true bounds and limits, as it has been before. This was granted, ſays Mr. Tyrrel (7), yet with a ſaving to the King's right, which he had before this. Upon which Mr. Abercromby obſerves (8), that Mr. Tyrrel ſhould have ſaid, Saving the right of the King of England, and of any other perſon, which before this agreement was, or ſhall afterwards in juſtice be competent, to any lands upon the borders or elſewhere. "Deluſive words indeed, adds the Hiſtorian, and however diſguiſed, yet ſo far plain, as to ſhew, that "King Edward kept ſomething in petto, as a reſerve "for an after-game." Mr. de Rapin makes a ſeparate article of this ſalvo related by Mr. Abercromby; whereas it is plain that it was only an inſinuation of King Edward, by which he probably intended to claim at a proper time a right over the whole Kingdom of Scotland, as being a fief of the Crown of England. II. It was agreed, that if Edward and Margaret ſhall die without iſſue of the body of Margaret, the Kingdom ſhall revert entire, free, abſolute and independent, to the next immediate heir. III. That no perſon, either eccleſiaſtic or laic, ſhall be compelled to go out of the Kingdom, to aſk leave either to elect, or to preſent their elects, nor to do their homage, fealty, and ſervices, nor to proſecute law-ſuits, nor, in a word, to perform any thing uſually performed in Scotland. IV. That the Kingdom of Scotland ſhall have its Chancellor, Officers of State, Courts of Judicature, &c. as before; and that a new Seal ſhall be made and kept by the Chancellor, but with the ordinary arms of Scotland, and the name of none but the Queen of Scotland engraven upon it. V. That Parliaments, when called to treat of matters concerning the State or inhabitants of Scotland, ſhall be held within the bounds of the Kingdom. "And by the by, ſays Mr. Abercromby, this is the firſt "time, for ought I know, that the word Parliament "was uſed among us." VI. That no duties, taxes, levies of men, &c. ſhall be exacted in Scotland, but ſuch, as being uſual in former times, ſhall be conſiſtent with the common intereſt and good of the Nation. VII. That the King of Scotland ſhall oblige himſelf and his heirs in a bond of a hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, payable to the Church of Rome, in aid of the Holy Land, to make reſtitution of the Kingdom in the caſes aforeſaid; and that he ſhall conſent, that the Pope may reſtrain him and his heirs, by excommunicating them, and interdicting their Kingdom, both to the aforeſaid reſtriction, and payment of the ſaid ſum of money, if he or they do not ſtand to the premiſes. It appears plainly from theſe articles, that the Scots were at that time very far from thinking, that the Kingdom of Scotland was a fief of England, as Mr. de Rapin very well obſerves (10). They alſo evince, according to Mr. Abercromby (11), "That the Scots "were not at all thoſe rude, illiterate, and unpoliſhed "people, they have been repreſented; that on the "contrary, they very well knew both their public and "private intereſt; and that the ends and arts of Go"vernment were by them perhaps better underſtood, "in thoſe earlier and thought barbarous Ages, than at "any time ſince. This was the firſt ſcheme of an "union condeſcended upon between the two King"doms; and it was a ſcheme ſo very reaſonable, that "had it taken effect, both Nations had been long ere "now (what even the preſent Age can ſcarcely hope "to ſee them) united in their joint intereſt, mutual "inclinations, and uniform Religion. Yet, as ho"nourable and advantageous, as the then concluded "union appears to have been, it is certain that all "thoſe of the Nation were not pleaſed with it. Per"haps the Diſſenters had by-ends of their own; or "they were loth to loſe the preſence of their Sove"reign, and the warm influence of a Royal Court; "or, they did not entirely confide in the fair pro"miſes of King Edward. They knew his deceitful "temper; and tho' the ſalvo, added to the firſt arti"cle, did relate more to that King's pretences, than "to thoſe of any other perſon, and tho' by it no new "right could be acquired; nay, altho' by that very "ſalvo he in a great meaſure diſclaimed all title to "the whole, and only ſuppoſed, that it was poſſible, "he or ſome body elſe might lay ſome claim to lands "upon the borders or ſomewhere elſe in Scotland; "yet they did not like thoſe inſidious reſerves, "and juſtly feared, that as ſoon as he ſhould by the "treaty be put in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, though "only in the name of his daughter-in-law, he ſhould "find in the ſalvo abundance of reaſon and juſtice to "keep it. The event has ſhewn that theſe fears were "but too well grounded, tho' they vaniſhed for a lit"tle time, upon the death of the young Queen Mar"garet."

(10) Hiſt. d'Ang. ubi ſupra, p. 25.

(11) Ubi ſupra, pag. 461.

Edward [C], not long after the concluſion of the treaty. This Prelate, and John Baliol with his party, were for the union and in King Edward's intereſt; the former becauſe he was careſſed by him, and preferred to be one of his Chaplains; the latter becauſe he was aſſured of, or at leaſt made to hope for, more than ordinary favours (b) [D]; and it was probably hinted to him, that if Margaret ſhould die without iſſue, Edward would ſupport his pretenſions to the Crown of Scotland (c). Margaret dying ſoon after the concluſion of her marriage, there happened a great conteſt about the ſucceſſion to the Crown. The chief pretenders were John Baliol, and Robert Bruce, whoſe different titles to the Crown were by no precedent nor poſitive law to be determined [E], and between whom by reaſon of their numerous alliances, and vaſt poſſeſſions both at home and abroad, the whole Kingdom was divided. Beſides theſe two irreconcileable enemies, and juſtly contending rivals, eight other perſons either acted by their own ambition, or, as is more probable, wrought upon by the clandeſtine practices of King Edward [F], did at the ſame time aſpire to what one only could obtain (d). The Barons or Freeholders of the Kingdom were then, as it was afterwards declared they ought to be, the proper judges of a controverſy, in which none were concerned but themſelves, and the competitors. But by reaſon of the great power of thoſe, who pretended to the Crown, as alſo of the plauſible grounds of their pretenſions, the Barons could not agree amongſt themſelves, nor were the competitors like to ſubmit to their determination. Therefore, according to moſt authors, they unanimouſly reſolved

(b) Abercromby, ibid. p. 461, 462.

(c) See the remark [D].

(d) Abercromby ibid. pag. 463.

[C] The Biſhop of St. Andrew's wrote a Letter to King Edward.] " He gives his Majeſty thanks (12), in " the name of the Convention of the Nobles at Perth, " for the many good offices he had done them; then " he tells him, that they were juſt ſetting out, together " with the Engliſh Embaſſadors, in order to wait on, " and receive their Queen in Orkney, when, to the " unexpreſſible terror and grief of the Nation, an uncertain report of her being dead was ſpread abroad. " That upon this news, Robert Bruce, and thoſe of his " party, had, contrary to expectation, come to the Aſſembly; but what he meant to do, was not yet " known. That the Earls of Athole and Mar were " drawing their men together, and the whole Nation " was divided in factions; and that a war was inevitable, if not prevented in time, by the goodneſs of " God and his Majeſty's endeavours. He therefore " intreats, that if the Queen ſhall chance to die, he " will inſtantly come to the borders, in order to awe the " contending parties by his preſence, to prevent effuſion of blood, and to enable loyal ſubjects to keep " their oaths to the rightful heir, whoever he be, " provided the heir ſhall be willing to acquieſce in his " Majeſty's determination. He had a little before recommended John Baliol to the King's favour, and " in the beginning of his letter deſigned himſelf his " Chaplain." " It is a pity, adds Mr. Abercromby, that " only this one letter has been found upon record, to " guide us through the Cimmerian darkneſs, which by " obſcuring the myſterious tranſactions, and hidden " contrivances of thoſe times, has hitherto led all " authors into almoſt as many miſtakes, if not " downright falſities, as they have periods, I may almoſt ſay words, upon the ſubject." The conſequences that may be inferred from this letter, we refer to the following remark.

(12) Rymer's Fœdera, tom. 2. p. 1090, 1091, ad ann. 1290. apud Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 461, 462.

[D] John Baliol was made to hope for more than ordinary favours.] This is one of the inferences which Mr. Abercromby draws from the letter we have mentioned. He alſo obſerves (13), " That Robert Bruce " and his friends were againſt the Union; elſe why " ſhould they not have been preſent at an Aſſembly, " deſigned for nothing elſe, but to welcome home " their Queen, and countenance her marriage. That " in caſe the treaty of marriage and union ſhould, by " the death of the Queen, be rendered ineffectual, " there was a previous concert between King Edward, and the Scots Unioners agreed upon, by vertue of which the firſt was by his power to awe and " bear down the oppoſite faction; and theſe laſt, to " give him the power of nominating a ſucceſſor, and " that John Baliol was pointed out as the man. That " upon the certainty of the rumour that was ſpread " of the Queen's death, the animoſities of parties " muſt needs be heightened, and the Nation be thereby neceſſitated, or, to undergo all the calamities of " a civil, and at the ſame time probably of a foreign " war, (for it was not to be ſuppoſed, that a neighbour of the character and power of King Edward " would ſtand by an idle ſpectator) or, to ſubmit their " differences to the determination of a Prince, who, " had they declined his arbitration, was, together " with the party he had among themſelves, able to " force it upon them.

(13) Ubi ſupra, pag. 462.

[E] Their titles to the Crown were by no precedent nor poſitive law to be determined.] They were both deſcended from David Earl of Huntington, the brother of King William, whoſe branch now failed. David left three daughters. Margaret, the eldeſt of the three, was the mother of Dervegild, who was married to John Baliol, by whom ſhe had a ſon, the ſame John Baliol who now pretended to the Crown, and was by his mother's ſide great grandſon of Earl David. That Earl's ſecond daughter was Iſabel, who being married to Robert Bruce, had by him this Robert, who diſputed the Crown with John Baliol. This latter founded his right on his being the grandſon of David's eldeſt daughter; and Robert Bruce grounded his pretenſions, not only upon his being nearer by one degree to the Earl David, whoſe grandſon he was, but alſo upon his being the firſt male deſcended from him; pretending that in the ſame degree of relation, a male was to be preferred to a female; and therefore he was to be preferred before Dervegild, in whoſe right only John Baliol could claim the Crown (14).

(14) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 464. and Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 27.

[F] Wrought upon by the clandeſtine practices of King Edward.] Buchanan tells us, that Edward conſulted ſecretly with a few perſons, how he might ſubject the Kingdom of Scotland to himſelf. This was not thought difficult, the Kingdom being then divided into two powerful factions. But to render the accompliſhment of his deſign more eaſy, and at the ſame time to hide his intentions, he engaged eight other perſons, beſides Baliol and Bruce, to claim a right to the Crown; that out of ſo great a number he might draw one or more over to his intereſt and party. Buchanan's words are; Secreto, & inter paucos agitabatur, quomodo Scotiam ſuæ ditionis faceret. Id cum facile exiſtimaretur, Regno in duas factiones diviſo, tamen, quo res eſſet expeditior, & fraus occultior, præter Bruticum & Baliolum, octo alios competitores excitavit, ut e majore numero facilius unum aut etiam plures in ſuas partes traduceret (15). Upon which Mr. de Rapin obſerves (16), that this is very probable, becauſe of all the competitors, none but John Baliol (and Robert Bruce) had the leaſt right to the Crown, if we ſuppoſe, as there is reaſon to do, that they were deſcended from baſtards. Yet, when John Haſtings, who was the ſon of the youngeſt of Earl David's three daughters, pleaded that the Kingdom of Scotland, ſince holden of the Crown of England, was like all other lands, tenements, &c. diviſible, and that therefore it ought to be divided between John Baliol, Robert Bruce, and himſelf; Edward would not conſent to it. Upon which, Mr. Abercromby obſerves (17), " I very much wonder, that King Edward did " not aſſent to the favourable overture, and lay hold, " as he might have done, on the opportunity to tear " the Scots Monarchy into pieces. He meant to reign " over the whole; and the maxim is, divide ut regnes (18). It was in all probability an eaſier taſk to " keep three Lords, though very great ones, under " ſubjection

(15) Buchan. Rer. Scotic. lib. 8. p. m. 254.

(16) Ubi ſupra, pag. 35.

(17) Ubi ſupra, pag. 474.

(18) Or rather, Divide, & impera.

reſolved to refer the whole matter to the arbitration of Edward King of England [G], who readily accepted it, and took hold of this opportunity, to make the Scots acknowledge his pretended right over that Kingdom. The States of Scotland were convened at Norham upon the borders of the two Kingdoms [H]; King Edward came thither with an army, and in the aſſembly held the tenth of May * he declared, that as he was ſuperior and direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, ſo he hoped they would willingly acknowledge him to be ſuch [I]. This unexpected declaration ſtruck the Scots with amazement [K]; they told him that they knew nothing of any ſuperiority belonging to him; that they could not anſwer

* Anno 1291.

" ſubjection, than one King. But Providence order" ed it otherwiſe: the iniquity had been too viſible;
" and he deſigned to name ſuch a King, as by his birth
" had a very good title to be ſuch, and by his na" ture was diſpoſed to continue, what he profeſſed him-
" ſelf, a ſubject."

[G] They reſolved to refer the whole matter to the arbitration of King Edward.] He was thought, ſays Boetius (19), the moſt proper perſon to determine the diſpute, not only as he was a very powerful King, but alſo becauſe being their neighbour he was at hand to aſſiſt them in caſe of diſtreſs. Buchanan ſays (20), that the Scots did not diſtruſt him, becauſe he was born of a father, whom the late King always found a very loving father-in-law, and a very equitable and juſt guardian. Beſides Edward had lately received from the Scots a very noble proof of their good-will towards him, in the readineſs with which they conſented to the marriage of their Queen with Edward's ſon. King Edward, ſays Mr. Abercromby (21), was a wiſe man, and upon account of his relation to the Scots, and the innumerable obligations, and thoſe as yet freſh in his memory, he had received from them, bound to be juſt; and who could diſtruſt him, ſince he was equally unconcerned with all the competitors? His father Henry III and the Barons of England had in the like manner referred their differences to the determination of a foreign Prince, St. Lewis of France. But Edward was not, like Lewis, a Saint; he had views of his own, which none, even of the great party which he had gained over to an entire confidence in his friendſhip, could penetrate.

(19) Scotor. Hiſt. lib. 14. fol. m. 292 verſo.

(20) Ubi ſupra.

(21) Ubi ſupra, pag. 464.

[H] The States of Scotland were convened at Norham upon the borders of the two Kingdoms.] We uſe this general expreſſion, becauſe Authors do not agree, whether the Scots Nobility aſſembled of their own accord, or, whether they were called together by King Edward. Boetius ſays (22), that the Scots having ſent Embaſſadors to King Edward, he received them very graciouſly, and told them that he would be in a few days at Berwick, where he ordered them to aſſemble. Ut ibi concilium præſto eſſet edixit. Buchanan ſays (23), that Edward being arrived at Berwick, wrote to the Regents of Scotland, and to the Deputies of the States to come and meet him. Edwardus, cum primum Bervicum venit, eò Rectores Scotiæ, & Ordinum Legatos per literas evocat. Boetius does not mention the Aſſembly of Norham, and ſeems to have confounded it with that which was afterwards held at Berwick, not by the States, but by the Commiſſioners appointed to hear the petitions of the Commiſſioners. Buchanan indeed mentions the Aſſembly of Norham, which met, ſays he, the year after Edward had ſummoned the States to meet at Berwick. And, according to Mr. Abercromby, " Edward to keep all parties in the dark,
" with regard to his private deſigns, and to remove
" all manner of jealouſy concerning his after intenti" ons, invited and earneſtly entreated, that the Pre-
" lates and the great men of Scotland would meet him
" at Norham, on the confines of both Kingdoms, to " which place he himſelf declares that they came at " his earneſt requeſt (24). So falſe it is, what by his " public Notary he afterwards aſſerted, that as ſupe-
" rior and direct Lord of Scotland he had called a " Parliament of the Scots Nation at Norham: for in " no record extant is any ſuch thing ſo much as inſi-" nuated. Nay, that one, I have juſt now cited, to " me is a plain proof of the contrary. Nor did the " Scots know that he deſigned to take any ſuch title
" or authority upon him, till he had, by the moſt
" plauſible pretences imaginable, decoy'd them, tho'
" not quite out of the Kingdom, yet to ſuch a place,
" in which he very well knew they neither could nor
" durſt withſtand his commands." The Engliſh Writers, ſays Mr. de Rapin (25), don't agree to this; they maintain that King Edward ſummoned the States of Scotland to meet at Norham, not as a friend or an arbitrator, but by virtue of his right, as ſovereign Lord of Scotland. They add, that the ſituation of Norham, which is a town of England, ſhews that Edward exerted an Act of Sovereignty, when he ſummoned the States of Scotland to meet in his own Kingdom. To this the Scots reply, that this argument is of no force at all, becauſe on this very occaſion King Edward granted to the Scots a Charter, by which he declared, that their coming over Tweed into England ſhould be of no pernicious conſequence to the Nation, and that for the future they ſhould not be obliged, for any affairs whatſoever, to paſs that river in order to treat with him. Mr. de Rapin obſerves in another place (26), that it cannot well be determined, whether that Aſſembly was ſummoned by Edward's own authority, or at the entreaties of the Scots.

(22) Ubi ſupra.

(23) Ubi ſupra.

(24) Fœdera Anglic. tom. 2. pag. 528.

(25) Ubi ſupra, pag. 28.

(26) Abregé Hiſtor. des Actes publics d'Angl. tom. 1. p. m. 172.

[I] He hoped they would willingly acknowledge him to be ſuch.] He firſt ſhewed a great concern for the miſerable condition in which the Scots then were. His Juſticiary told them (27), " That his Majeſty did " moſt ſincerely commiſerate the diſtempered ſtate of " the Scots nation; that he had ever a ſingular regard
" for Scotland, and all its inhabitants, whoſe ſafety
" and protection was well known to belong to him; that " he had come and called them thither in order to " diſcharge his duty; that he would do impartial ju-
" ſtice to the competitors for the Crown, and would " not at all uſurp or encroach upon the liberties of " the ſubject; but that as he was ſuperior and direct
" Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, ſo he hoped,
" they would willingly recognize and acknowledge
" him to be ſuch; and that if any of them ſcrupled
" the thing, he was willing to evidence his title from " undoubted chronicles and monuments, every where " to be found in the monaſteries of England. That by " this means a ſolid and laſting peace would be eſta-
" bliſhed between the two nations, and he would not " fail in the nomination of a King of Scotland, as
" in every thing elſe concerning that Kingdom, to aſk
" the advice of the preſent Aſſembly.

(27) Prynne's Collect. tom. 3. pag. 488, &c. Tyrrel. vol. 3. pag. 62, 63. Echard, p. 310, &c. apud Abercromby, ubi ſupra. p. 465.

[K] This Declaration ſtruck the Scots with amazement.] Let us hear what Mr. Abercromby ſays upon this ſubject. " This unexpected harangue, ſays
" he (28), ſtruck the Scots with amazement, indig-
" nation, and terror; and no wonder; ſuch another
" piece of Supercherie is, I believe, no where to be found " in hiſtory. An honeſt Heathen would have been a-
" ſhamed to venture upon it; and it is ſurpriſing,
" that Chriſtian Authors ſhould yet relate it, without
" ſtigmatizing the memory of a Prince, that was ca" pable to act a part ſo derogatory to the character " of a man of honour. Had he ever before, (and this " was the nineteenth year of his reign,) laid claim to
" the ſuperiority of Scotland; nay, had he not of" ten diſclaimed it, as I have ſhewed; or had he " only fomented the diviſions of the Kingdom, and " laid hold on the opportunity to invade it openly,
" and appeared, what he was, an enemy above board;
" he had done, but what has been, by ungenerous
" Princes, practiſed in all ages. But for one, who in " a great meaſure owed his grandeur to the repeated
" aſſiſtances he had received from Scotland; who had
" ſo often, and ſo ſolemnly owned its independency;
" who had expreſſed ſo much gratitude, ſuch for" ward zeal for its honour and welfare, thus to entrap
" its Nobles, upon the faireſt and moſt plauſible pre" tences imaginable, and then, and never till then to " tell them (the ſpeech I have related, and all his
" after-conduct implied no leſs) that now he had them
" in his hands, and they muſt reſolve to lay down
" their lives, or to give up their liberties; as " it was unprecedented before, ſo I know not if it " has ſince been imitated. Not but that Princes and " their

(28) Ubi ſupra, pag. 466.

anſwer ſuch things without a head and King, whoſe buſineſs it was to inquire into theſe matters; and that as for their part, they were bound by an oath, which they had made to one another after the death of King Alexander, to own no Sovereign but his legal heir; and that they were to obſerve that oath under pain of excommunication. Upon which the King ſaid, that he would give them time to think on it, and ſo adjourned the meeting till next day, the eleventh of May, when according to appointment they went over to the pariſh church of Norham, and entreated that a longer time might be allowed them, to conſult with their abſent countrymen, concerning a matter that was wholly new to them, and yet of ſuch importance, as was not to be raſhly determined. The King, for his own intereſt [L], was willing to prorogue the Aſſembly (e) for three weeks (f) [M]. Accordingly they met the ſecond of June following; but it does not appear that they alledged any thing againſt the King's pretenſions (g), who thereupon took his Sovereignty for granted, and obliged the Competitors, and the Guardians of the Kingdom, together with a great many Prelates and Barons, who called themſelves the Community of Scotland, to recognize and acknowledge him, as their ſuperior and direct Lord (b). John Baliol was not at this Aſſembly, and his abſence is by Mr. de Rapin conſidered as a piece of policy. He acknowledged indeed the King's Sovereignty the next day; but his deſign was, that if he aſcended the Throne, he could not be charged with having been one of the moſt forward in

(f) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Ang. tom. 3. liv. 9. pag. 29, 30.

(g) See the note [M].

(b) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, p. 469.

(e) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 465, &c.

" their Councils may have been ſufficiently diſpoſed " to reach the ſcandalous part; but all the Grandees " of a Nation have never been ſo mad as to afford " the like opportunity. The Scots Nobility ſaw their " error, when it was too late, and ſome write (28), " that as great as their ſurpriſal was, they courageouſly aſſerted the independency of their country, " and abſolutely refuſed to acknowledge any ſuperior " but God, above him, that ſhould be found to be heir " of their crown. Robert Wiſhart Biſhop of Glaſgow is ſaid to have taken upon him to maintain " that argument, and to have done it, as indeed it was " eaſy, beyond the poſſibility of a reply. Yet ſince " Engliſh Authors and Records, whom I more incline " to follow than Scots or Foreigners, are ſilent upon the " matter, I ſhall be ſo too. This is certain, they " ſeemed very much diſſatisfied, and not at all inclinable to comply with the King's demands; and " he was thereby ſo far incenſed, that he ſwore by St. " Edward, the greateſt oath he ever uſed, that he " would loſe his life in the proſecution of his juſt right."

(28) Pere d'Orleans, pag. 467. Dr. Mackenzie's Life of John Blair, vol. 1. pag. 250.

[L] The King for his own intereſt was willing to prorogue the Aſſembly.] He had a mind to palliate, in ſome meaſure, by this condeſcenſion, the violence which he had offered, and which he was determined to proſecute. He knew very well that in ſo ſhort a time they could neither meet, nor conſult with their friends; much leſs raiſe an army, put the country in a poſture of defence, make up their domeſtic quarrels, and agree upon a Head, capable to unite and protect them. By theſe means they might yet have warded off the threatned miſchief. But ſuch means were then impracticable. And King Edward, to divert their thoughts from any attempt of that kind, and to engage them to return to a ſecond conference, gave them the Charter we have mentioned above (29), by which he declared, amongſt other things, that they might return with honour and ſafety. And to perſuade them, that after all he had no intention to invade their liberty by force, but only to aſſert his own right, in caſe it ſhould appear that he had any, he deſired them (30) to make ſearch for any writings, evidences, or antiquities, that might exclude him from the right and exerciſe of his ſuperiority and direct dominion, and overthrow his reaſons and arguments for it; proteſting that he was ready to grant, what law and juſtice had eſtabliſhed. And that they might the better underſtand his title, and make their objections againſt it, he appointed the Biſhop of Durham to ſet it forth to all preſent. The Prelate obeyed, and was himſelf, or ſome others for him, at the greateſt pains imaginable to overturn his Maſter's cauſe, by ſupporting it with diſingenuity, fiction and calumny. He begins with the exploded fables of Brutus, Albanactus, Camber, and the like imaginary founders of old Britain, Albany and Wales; nor does he forget the equally ridiculous Legend of St. John of Beverly, nor the Pageantry of King Edgar, and his Royal Sailors. The acknowledg'd ſubjection of William King of Scotland to Henry II of England he tells pretty fairly; but then, he has not a word of the authentic acquittance granted by King Richard, by which alone it would have appeared, how vain and frivolous the claim had ever been, and then was. Mr. de Rapin makes ſeveral very good obſervations upon the reaſons and arguments alledged in King Edward's favour. He aſks, among other things, Why did not the King produce authentic inſtances of the homage paid by the ancient Kings of Scotland to the Kings of England, as he produced that which King William paid to Henry II? If the queſtion had been only to prove, that homage had been paid for the County of Huntington, he would not have been obliged to ſearch the Hiſtorians; he would have found ſufficient proofs of this in the Records of England. How then came it to paſs that no record could be found of the homage paid for Scotland? Was it more difficult to preſerve theſe than the former (31)? Since then there was no record extant of the homage paid for Scotland, ſave only that of King William, which was reverſed, it is a ſtrong proof in favour of the Scots, that their Kingdom was not ſubject to England.

(29) In the note [H].

(30) Prynne, Tyrrel, and Echard, ubi ſupra.

(31) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 3. liv. 9. pag. 42.

[M] For three weeks.] Mr. Abercromby ſays (32), till the ſecond of June next coming. But, according to Mr. de Rapin (33), the King granted them a delay of three weeks to begin from the tenth of March. It is true they met the ſecond of June, but it does not appear that on that day they treated of King Edward's ſovereignty over Scotland. For the Biſhop of Bath and Wells, Chancellor of England, who ſpoke for the King, having ſummed up what had been done in the foregoing meeting, added, that ſince the three weeks, which the King had granted to the States to anſwer his reaſons, were paſſed, and they had not been able to produce or alledge any thing that was capable to overthrow the King's right, he was reſolved to exert his acknowledged ſovereignty over Scotland. This is taken from a Journal or Diary extant in Rymer's Fœdera §, and Mr. de Rapin obſerves, that how good ſoever an opinion we may have of King Edward's ſincerity, and of the honeſty of the Notary, who drew up this Journal, yet we muſt obſerve that there is ſomething inaccurate or wanting here. In the two preceding meetings Edward produces his pretenſions to the ſovereignty over Scotland; the States far from acknowledging immediately this pretended Sovereignty, aſk ſome time to conſult together upon ſo nice a ſubject. The King grants them three weeks, which being expired, in the firſt ſeſſion, which the Journal mentions, the Chancellor ſpeaks firſt, and ſays, that the States have alledged nothing againſt the King's pretenſions. He ſhould, it ſeems, have firſt required the States to produce their anſwer, which ought to have been mentioned in the Journal, either by relating their objections, or their conſent, or at leaſt it ought to have been there obſerved, that they had nothing to anſwer; in this caſe the Chancellor's diſcourſe would have been ſeaſonable and to the purpoſe; whereas he begins with declaring, that ſince the States have oppoſed nothing againſt the King's pretenſions, his Majeſty is determined to make uſe of his right. This muſt needs make us ſuſpect, either that the account of what paſſed that day is curtailed, or that the day before the States produced their reaſons and arguments, of which the

(32) Ubi ſupra, pag. 467.

(33) Ubi ſupra, pag. 30.

§ Tom. 2. pag. 542, &c.

in ſubmitting to Edward, and that he might plead in his defence, that he only did what had already been done by all his competitors, and even by the moſt eminent men of the Nation (i). Boetius (k) and Buchanan (l) ſay, that Robert Bruce refuſed to recognize King Edward's Sovereignty, though he is upon record found to be the firſt man, who being interrogated, whether in claiming his right to the Scots Crown, he would demand and receive juſtice before the King of England, as ſuperior and direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, publickly, expreſly, and without contradiction, anſwered, that he would, and actually did (m); yet this ſeeming inconſiſtency can be accounted for in a very probable manner [N], as we ſhall ſhew hereafter. Thus King Edward, without drawing his ſword, and perhaps (i) See Rapin, ubi ſupra, p. 49.

(k) Scotor. Hiſt. lib. 14. fol. 293.
(l) Rer. Scotic. lib. 8. p. m. 255.

(m) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 469.

the author of the Journal did not think fit to take any notice. And indeed, according to the delay granted by the King for three weeks (35), there ought to have been a meeting the firſt of June; but I give this only as a conjecture, upon which I don't pretend to lay any ſtreſs. The greateſt difficulty is, that it ſeems ſurprizing, that after three weeks deliberation and conſulting, the States of Scotland ſhould not have found any argument or reaſon to anſwer the King's pretenſions. It is certain that till then the ſovereignty of the Crown of England over Scotland had never been ſo generally acknowledged, nor ſo evidently known as to ſilence all the members of the State. Witneſs the articles of marriage we have mentioned above (36), in which the Scots took ſo many precautions to maintain their independency. Secondly, the time they required to conſult upon the King's pretenſions ſhews, that they were not perſuaded of his right. Laſtly, this very precaution of Edward, who requires this acknowledgment from them, is a proof that his right was at leaſt doubtful. It is not the cuſtom to act in ſuch a manner, when one's right is unqueſtionable and generally acknowledged. If then it be true that the States anſwered nothing to the King's pretenſions, we muſt believe, either that they were awed by his power, or that the two chief pretenders to the Crown agreed together, and caballed amongſt the members of the States, to prevent their oppoſing the pretenſions of the King of England. They were in all likelihood afraid, that this difficulty would retard the deciſion of the principal buſineſs, in which they were more nearly concerned.

(35) Beginning the tenth of May.

(36) In the note [B].

[N] This inconſiſtency can be accounted for in a very probable manner.] Let us firſt hear how Boetius and Buchanan relate the matter. The former tells us, that Edward knowing that Robert Bruce was a man of great merit, who was extremely beloved by his country-men, on account of his noble ſpirit, and other virtues, firſt attempted to gain him, by promiſing him the crown, if, when he ſhould be King, he would acknowledge himſelf a Vaſſal of England: but that Robert, zealous for his own liberty and for that of the Kingdom, anſwered, that he would not ſubject to the yoke of England a country, which till then had been free from all ſubjection. Boetius's words are; Quoniam Robertum virum fortem, ac apud ſuos propter ingenii magnanimitatem cæteraſque virtutes carum acceptumque cognoverat, eum prius tentare aggreditur [Edvardus], ut ſi accepto Regno in verba jurare ipſius vellet, eum præferret. . . . . Verum Robertus libertatem & ſuam & Regni turpitudine & ſervitute pluris habens, reſpondit, ſe nolle patriam ſuam, hactenus ab omni ſervitio immunem, in ſervitutem Anglis dedere (37). Buchanan's account is as follows: When the Scots were aſſembled at Norham, Edward firſt gently tried, whether he could not engage them willingly to ſubmit to him, as their anceſtors had often done, as he pretended. But finding that they all conſtantly refuſed it, he called to him thoſe pretenders to the crown, whom he had himſelf ſet on, and by mighty promiſes engaged them to acknowledge his title: he alſo engaged the Aſſembly of Norham to remove to Berwick, as to a more proper place. When they were there, he choſe twelve Judges or Arbiters, whom he ſhut up by themſelves in a church, commanding that no perſon be admitted to them; and there he charged them to deliberate upon the matter in diſpute. But finding that they proceeded very ſlowly, he went in himſelf now and then, and by ſpeaking to ſeveral of them privately, he found, that according to the majority, John Baliol had the beſt right, but that his party and friends were not ſo numerous as thoſe of Robert Bruce. Thereupon he ſpoke to the latter, thinking, that as his right was not ſo evident and clear, he would eaſily be prevailed upon to enter into his views; he promiſed him the Kingdom of Scotland, if he would acknowledge it a fief of England. But Bruce anſwered, that he was not ſo fond of a crown, as to give up the liberty of his country to obtain it. Here follow Buchanan's own words, of which we have given the ſenſe. Ibi (Norami) Eduardus per homines idoneos leniter Scotorum animos pertentat, num ſponte in ditionem ejus vellent concedere; quod ab eorum majoribus ſæpe factum fuiſſe contendebat. Id cum conſtanter omnes abnuerent, Competitoribus Regni, quos ipſe excitaverat, convocatis, promiſſis ingentibus ab eis exprimit, ut ipſi in verba ejus jurent; cæteris perſuadet, ut Conventus Bervicum in locum magis idoneum transferatur. Ibi viginti quatuor Judices illos ſelectos, in templum ſine arbitris incluſos, de controverſia cognoſcere jubet; vetito interea ne quiſquam ad eos propius accedat. Cum lentius res procederet, ipſe ſolus identidem ingrediebatur, & alios atque alios compellando, cum comperiſſet pluribus videri, jure priorem eſſe Ballıolum, gratiâ & factione inferiorem, Bruſſio prius convento, quem, quod jure eſſet inferior, facilius ſuis rationibus aſſenſurum putabat, Regnum ei Scotorum pollicetur, ſi ſe in Regum Anglorum clientelâ, eorumque ditioni ſubditum profiteri vellet. Ad hæc Bruſſius ingenue reſpondit, ſe non ita cupidum regnandi, ut eâ de cauſâ libertatem, à majoribus relictam, imminueret (38). We might make ſeveral obſervations upon this account, which is very unaccurate, as may eaſily be underſtood by what we have already related in this article. But for brevity's ſake, we ſhall omit our own reflections, and only relate what we find in other authors, concerning this anſwer of Robert Bruce, to reconcile it with what has been ſaid of him in the text of this article. Let us hear again Mr. Abercromby; whoſe words are theſe (39), after he had obſerved that Robert Bruce acknowledg'd King Edward's ſuperiority over Scotland, he adds; "To ſay the truth, I cannot but "own in this place, that I am heartily ſorry, to find "myſelf obliged to ſcore Robert Bruce out of the liſt "of Scots Heroes, and that I cannot ſay of him, "what all the Scots writers have hitherto tenaciouſly "aſſerted, viz. that the King of England called him "aſide, cloſeted him, and offered to prefer him to the "crown of Scotland, if he would promiſe to hold it "of that of England; but that the noble Bruce was "proof againſt the glittering temptation, and that "with a ſcornful diſdain he replied; No; I value the "dignity of a King at a very high rate, but my honour "I value yet more; nor will I betray my country to "reign over it. A noble anſwer indeed; and I wiſh "he, or any of the competitors, had expreſſed ſuch "a greatneſs of ſoul. But as much convinced as I am "of the diſingenuity of King Edward, and the falſe "repreſentations given to the world of this tranſacti-"on, by him, his Council, and Hiſtoriographers; "nay, even by the public Notary he commanded "to draw up the Inſtrument, from whence we have "theſe accounts; yet I cannot offer to diſprove a deed "ſo authentic and public as this; which, if falſe, "thouſands of witneſſes had, during the courſe of "the enſuing war, atteſted the calumny. Nor did "the after-conduct of this ſame Robert Bruce, the "grandfather of the afterwards moſt heroic Scots "King of that name, prove contradictory to his in-"glorious ſubmiſſion. It is true, that from the begin-"ning he had been an obſtinate ſtickler in oppoſition "to the Engliſh intereſt, and that he had been an ene-"my to the Queen's match, and the union of the "Kingdoms. He very well knew that John Baliol "had more intereſt at the Court of England than "himſelf; and it is not improbable, but that at firſt "he may, conſequentially to his former behaviour, "have rejected ſuch terms, as were derogatory to the "royal dignity he aimed at: But it ſeems, that upon "ſecond

(37) Boetius, ubi ſupra, fol. 293.

(38) Buchanan, ubi ſupra, pag. 255.

(39) Ubi ſupra, pag. 469.

perhaps without ſo much as an objection made, or a proteſtation entered againſt his title, procured himſelf to be acknowledged, and began in all his writings, to take upon him the deſignation of ſuperior and direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland [O] (n). It was now time to come to the principal affair, then in agitation; I mean the determination of the claim of the ſeveral pretenders to the Crown. It was agreed between them, that John Baliol, and John Cumin, Lord of Badenock, who was alſo one of the competitors, ſhould chooſe forty perſons, and that Robert Bruce ſhould name forty others, who all together ſhould examine the different pretenſions of the competitors. It was alſo agreed, that to theſe eighty Commiſſioners the King might add, if he pleaſed, twenty four more; and after a due enquiry they were to make their report to the King. The ſecond day of Auguſt, in the year 1292, was appointed for the meeting of theſe Commiſſioners. They met accordingly that day at Berwick upon Tweed, and King Edward, conſidering that this affair would take up ſo much time, as might be prejudicial to his private intereſt, propoſed to begin with examining the right of John Baliol and Robert Bruce; which was agreed to by the Commiſſioners, without prejudice to the other pretenders, whoſe reaſons were to be examined afterwards. The firſt queſtion that was propoſed to them was, what laws and cuſtoms were to be followed in this affair? The Commiſſioners could not agree amongſt themſelves upon the anſwer they were to make; ſo that Edward thought fit to grant them a longer term to conſider upon this, and prorogued the Aſſembly to the fourteenth of October

(n) Idem, ibid. pag. 470.

" ſecond thoughts, he altered his meaſures, and find- " ing it impoſſible to obtain what he judged his right, " without ſubmiſſion, he reſolved not to loſe it for a " punctilio of honour, which the poſſeſſion of the " crown would enable him to retrieve. William the " Lion had made the like ſubmiſſion before, and as " William the Lion did, ſo he hoped to fall upon " means of getting free of it." It ſeems then that Robert Bruce refuſed at firſt to accept the crown upon King Edward's terms; but that finding how this would be prejudicial to his pretenſions, he was at laſt prevailed upon to comply with the King's demands, tho' he did not gain much by it; for his reſiſtance made a deeper impreſſion upon King Edward's mind, than his ſubmiſſion could do afterwards (40). However this is ſufficient to ſhew, that Boetius's and Buchanan's account, with regard to this particular, is not inconſiſtent with what is found in the Record, quoted by Mr. Abercromby.

(40) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 49.

[O] He began in all his writings to take upon him the deſignation of ſuperior and direct Lord of Scotland.] He did more; for he even acted as an abſolute Sovereign of the Kingdom. No ſooner had the competitors to the crown acknowledged his title, but his Chancellor read aloud the following Declaration, which the King repeated word for word; " That tho' the King of " England acted on this occaſion as ſovereign Lord of " Scotland, yet he did not intend to give up the heredi- " tary right, which he might claim to the crown of that " Kingdom, nor renounce the property of it. But " that he expreſly reſerved to himſelf the liberty of " proſecuting his right, in what manner and when he " ſhould think it proper (41)." It ſeems, by this Declaration, that King Edward deſigned to make himſelf abſolute maſter of Scotland; nor do I ſee why he let the opportunity ſlip, which offered immediately after. For having repreſented to the competitors, that it would be needleſs for him to adjudge by his ſentence the crown to any of them, if he were not in a condition to ſee his ſentence performed, he required, that they would put him in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, that he might deliver it up to the perſon, who ſhould be declared King. This was granted (42). The competitors, ſtill jealous of one another, and all made to believe, that he who ſhould firſt comply, ſhould be firſt preferred, did not at all ſcruple to ſubſcribe a paper, importing, " That in order to impower King Edward " to put his ſentence in execution, they had freely " and without compulſion given to him, as ſovereign " Lord, the actual poſſeſſion or ſeaſine of all the lands " and ſtrength of Scotland; upon condition that he " ſhould reſtore all things as he found them, within " two months after he ſhould have determined the " right of ſucceſſion; ſaving to the crown of England " the homage of him, that ſhould be King." This done, it is not to be doubted, but detachments were immediately ſent from the Engliſh army that lay ſtill in the neighbourhood, to ſeize upon and garriſon all the caſtles and fortreſſes in Scotland. But it ſeems they got not an eaſy acceſs to all of them; their own Governors and Proprietors were not at all willing to yield their places to ſtrangers, according to Mr. Abercromby (43).

(41) Idem, ibid. pag. 32.

(42) Idem, ibid.

(43) Ubi ſupra, pag. 470.

But Mr. de Rapin ſays the contrary; he tells us (44), " That tho' whatever had been done till then in fa- " vour of King Edward, might be look'd upon only " as the acts of ſome private men; yet, ſince Bruce " and Baliol were amongſt them, whoſe parties divid- " ed the whole Kingdom of Scotland, their approba- " tion was in a manner that of the whole State. In " theſe times of anarchy and confuſion the Regents had " but very little authority, and durſt not even do any " thing which might diſoblige the King, or either of " the two competitors, who was to be their Maſter. " As for the States, Edward did not conſult them any " more, ſince he had found that they were little diſ- " poſed to ſupport his pretenſions. They were aſſem- " bled without the borders of Scotland, and in the " King's power, ſo that they were not at liberty to " take ſuch meaſures as they could have wiſhed. So " that the King found little or no oppoſition from the " Governors of caſtles, or other ſtrong places, when " he put himſelf in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom." Only Gilbert de Umfraville, who commanded in the caſtles of Dundee and Forfar, made a difficulty of parting with them, becauſe, ſaid he, they were intruſted to him, not by the King, but by the Community of Scotland, to whom he was obliged to reſtore them. But his plea was repelled, in regard that the Community, that is the Convention of Barons, had no power to give them, if there had been a King at the time; and that now, altho' there was no King, yet ſome one of the competitors muſt needs be King in a ſhort time; and conſequently, ſince he was warranted by all the competitors, to give up theſe caſtles, he was warranted by the King (45). Yet this was not enough to ſatisfy the Earl; he look'd upon the Act we have mentioned above, as a very irregular piece, nor could he be determined, upon ſuch a warrant, to deliver up the places which had been committed to his care, neither by the King of England, nor by the pretenders to the crown. He required therefore that they, and the Regent, and even the King himſelf, ſhould bind themſelves by an Act, to indemnify him, in caſe he ſhould ever be called to an account afterwards (46). King Edward now fairly, as he thought, acknowledg'd Superior of Scotland, and as ſuch put in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, concluded that henceforth he ſhould meet with no manner of oppoſition, in the proſecution of his further deſigns. He therefore went boldly on, and declared himſelf by a public Deed (47) ſovereign Lord of Scotland; yet was graciouſly pleaſed to promiſe, that he would decide the controverſy in hand within the bounds of the Kingdom contended for (48). This he did at the requeſt of the Regents, who had petitioned for it; the King look'd upon this ſtep of the Regents as a kind of acknowledgment of his Sovereignty, becauſe the petition was expreſſed in ſuch a manner, as not to oppoſe it; and therefore he readily condeſcended to grant them his Letters-patents according to their requeſt (49). He afterwards made a progreſs through moſt of the Low-Countries of Scotland, receiving every where the acknowledgments and oaths of the Nobility, Clergy, and Burghers, who were now evidently enſlaved (50).

(44) Ubi ſupra, pag. 32.

(45) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 470.

(46) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 33.

(47) Fœdera Angl. tom. 2. pag. 532.

(48) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 471.

(49) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 33.

(50) Abercromby, ubi ſupra.

ber following. The Commiſſioners being met that day, Edward added to the former queſtion the two following: "What rule they were to follow, in caſe the cuſtoms of England "and Scotland happened to be either uncertain, or oppoſite to one another? Whether a "different judgment ought to be paſſed concerning the Kingdom of Scotland, than what is "cuſtomary with regard to Counties, Baronies, and other Fiefs held of the Crown of Eng-"land?" The delay, which Edward had granted to the Commiſſioners procured them a knowledge, which they wanted before. They who in Auguſt could not agree amongſt themſelves concerning the firſt queſtion, were in October following all of the ſame opinion concerning all the three queſtions. They anſwered upon the firſt, that if there were unqueſtionable laws or cuſtoms in the King's dominions, they were to ſerve as a rule in the preſent caſe. Upon the ſecond, they ſaid, that if there were no ſuch laws, the King could make a new one. Upon the third, they decided, that the ſame judgment was to be paſſed concerning the Kingdom of Scotland, as concerning all other indiviſible fiefs. It is plain by theſe anſwers, that the preliminary queſtions had been propoſed with no other view, than to eſtabliſh the King's Sovereignty over Scotland. Edward having received theſe determinations ſent for Bruce and Baliol, and aſked them whether they had any thing to add to the reaſons they had alledged in the petitions, which they had laid before the Commiſſioners. They both ſaid, that they had ſome other arguments to offer, which they did accordingly [P] (o). Then the King propoſed to the Commiſſioners the following queſtion, as if the force of all the arguments had been ſummed up in it; Whether the more remote, by one degree in ſucceſſion, coming from the eldeſt ſiſter, ought, according to the laws of both Kingdoms, to exclude the nearer by one degree, coming from the ſecond ſiſter? Or, Whether the nearer by one degree, coming from the ſecond ſiſter, ought to exclude the more remote by one degree, coming from the eldeſt ſiſter? By this King Edward's partiality for John Baliol was viſible, as will appear to any one, who will examine Robert Bruce's reaſons (p). But his arguments met with no regard nor conſideration; the Aſſembly was obliged to anſwer preciſely to the queſtion, as King Edward had ſtated it, and their anſwer was ſuch as he deſired, in favour of him, who, though more remote by one degree, was deſcended from the eldeſt ſiſter; that is, in favour of John Baliol (q). We may obſerve here, that according to Buchanan, Edward conſulted the Civilians of France upon this controverſy [Q], though neither Mr. Abercromby, nor Mr. de Rapin take any notice of this. The Aſſembly

(o) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 44-46.

(p) See the note [P].

(q) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 473.

[P] They had ſome other arguments to offer, which they did accordingly.] Robert Bruce ſpoke firſt, and alledged the four following reaſons. I. That the ſucceſſion to a Crown muſt be regulated by the Law of Nature, by which King's reign, and not by thoſe Laws, which are in uſe with regard to the ſubjects; and that by the Law of Nature the neareſt ought to ſucceed. II. That for the ſame reaſon, though the inheritance of private men, be partible, and the eldeſt ſons uſed to have ſome advantage above the others by the Laws obſerved between the ſubjects, yet it was not ſo with regard to a Kingdom, where the neareſt heir ought to ſucceed without any partition. III. He maintained that even in Scotland the Crown had often been adjudged to a collateral branch, preferably to the direct line, and that the ſucceſſion was not ſo well eſtabliſhed in the family of the eldeſt children, as to prejudice his right, ſince he could produce ſeveral inſtances of brothers, who had been preferred before the ſons, even in that ſame Kingdom of Scotland. IV. He took it for granted, that though he was in the ſame degree with Dervegild, yet he was to ſucceed, becauſe he was the neareſt heir male. John Baliol ſpoke afterwards, and having firſt eſtabliſhed his right upon his being deſcended from the eldeſt daughter, he undertook to anſwer the reaſons alledged by his competitor. He ſaid, that according to the common Law of England, as well as of Scotland, one, who was deſcended from the eldeſt daughter, though more remote, was always preferred to one, who though nearer, was deſcended from a younger daughter. With regard to what Bruce had alledged concerning the Law of Nature, and the right of Kings, the ſubſtance of his anſwer was, that the King of England was to determine this point, as the Sovereign Lord, who time out of mind had held the Kingdom of Scotland as dependent from his Crown. As to the inſtances which Bruce had produced of brothers, who had been preferred before the ſons, he maintained that it never happened in Scotland, but by uſurpation and force of arms; that even when ſuch a caſe had happened, the Kings of England, as Sovereigns, had reformed that abuſe, by reſtoring the ſons to the throne; to prove which, he quoted the inſtance of Edgar, whom William Rufus put in poſſeſſion of the Crown which had been uſurped by Donald. Laſtly, he maintained, that though what Bruce had alledged ſhould be beyond contradiction, yet he could not infer from thence any thing in his favour. It appeared indeed that ſometimes the neareſt heir had been excluded, and the remoter placed upon the throne, ſince it is certain that a brother is more remote than a ſon (51); but theſe inſtances could not have the force of a Law.

(51) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 45, 46.

[Q] According to Buchanan, Edward conſulted the Civilians of France upon this controverſy.] Neither Mr. Abercromby, nor Mr. de Rapin take any notice of this particular; and yet what Buchanan ſays is very probable. He tells us, that the King, being willing to ſhew that he did not act raſhly in an affair ſo great and ſo weighty, reſolved to conſult thoſe men in France, who were eſteemed the moſt pious and wiſe, and to have the greateſt knowledge in the law. And as this ſort of men are never of the ſame opinion, he did not doubt but that ſome of them would give ſuch an anſwer as would ſuit with his deſign. An Engliſhman therefore, who had the whole management of this affair in France, propoſed the queſtion to the French Civilians in this captious manner; "A certain King, who is neither crown-"ed nor anointed, but only placed in a certain ſeat, "and proclaimed King; and yet is not ſo independent "as not to be under the protection of another King, "whoſe feudatory he acknowledges himſelf to be, "died without children. Two relations, deſcended from "Sempronius, the late King's great uncle, claim the "inheritance: namely, Titius great grandſon of Sem-"pronius's eldeſt daughter, and Sejus, grandſon of "the younger daughter. Which of them two is to "be preferred to an inheritance which cannot be di-"vided?" The queſtion having been propoſed in this manner, moſt of the Civilians anſwered, that if there was any Law or Cuſtom concerning this in the Kingdom which was claimed, it ought to be obſerved; if not, it was uſual to follow the cuſtom of that Kingdom, of which the other was a fief. That in determining queſtions relating to fiefs, the cuſtom did not aſcend, but deſcend; that is, that the cuſtom of the ſuperior ought to be a Law to the inferior. It would be too long to relate all the opinions of the Civilians; but to ſum up all in a word, almoſt all of them diſputing concerning the right, gave undetermined and contradictory anſwers; agreeing only in this, that they all allowed Edward a ſovereign power to determine the matter, bly having thus given their anſwer, it was determined that Robert Bruce's pretenſions were ill grounded, and that according to law he had not the leaſt right to the Crown of Scotland (r). Yet the affair was not finiſhed by this ſentence, for there were not only other pretenders to the Crown [R], but even Robert Bruce, together with John Haſtings, put in another claim [S]. However this new difficulty was ſoon removed, and on the 19th of November 1292, the King of England, as ſuperior and direct Lord of Scotland, having repelled all objections to the contrary, decided, That John Baliol ſhould have ſeiſin and poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Scotland, with all its appurtenances, upon condition that he ſhould juſtly and rightly govern the people ſubject to him, that none might have occaſion to complain of injuſtice, nor the King of England, as ſuperior Lord of the Kingdom, be obliged to interpoſe his authority; always reſerving the right of the King of England, and his heirs in ſuch caſes, when he would make uſe of it (s); or, as Mr. de Rapin expreſſes it (t), reſerving to himſelf and his ſucceſſors the right of proſecuting their pretenſions upon the ſame Kingdom, whenever they ſhould think fit. On theſe conditional and ſervile terms did John Baliol matter, being impoſed upon by the falſe light, in which the queſtion had been put to them. Let the reader judge, whether we have given the true ſenſe of Buchanan's words. Ne tanta res, ſays he (49), temere acta videretur, conſultatio eis eſt propoſita, qui in Gallia pietate, prudentiâ, & juris ſcientiâ tum primi habebantur. Neque dubitabat (Rex Eduardus) (ut eſt id genus hominum nunquam inter ſe ſatis concors) aliquod ſe reſponſum, quod in rem ſuam faceret, relaturum . . . . Juris peritis vero ab Anglo, qui totius negotii apud eos auctor & moderator erat, falſa ſpecies in hunc modum eſt propoſita. " Rex quidam, nec coronari, nec inungi ſolitus, ſed in ſede quadam a ſuis collocari, ac Rex denunciari, neque tamen ita libere Rex, ut non in Clientelâ ſit Regis alterius, cujus ſe Beneficiarium fateatur, ſine liberis deceſſit. Duo propinqui e Sempronio, magno Regis defuncti patruo, prognati, hæreditatem petunt, Titius videlicet, ex majore Sempronii filia pronepos, Seius ex minori filiâ nepos. Uter, in hæreditate impartibili adeundâ, alteri præferendus?" Hac conſultatione, his fere verbis propoſitâ, prope omnes reſponderunt, ſi qua lex vel conſuetudo ea de re, in regno, quod petitur, eſſet, ei ſtandum; ſin minus, verum eſſe, conſuetudinem ſequi ejus, in cujus tutela ſunt; quod in Feudis dijudicandis conſuetudo deſcendat, non autem aſcendat; hoc eſt, Conſuetudo ſuperioris inferiori pro lege habenda eſt, non contra. Longum eſſet omnium ſententias ſigillatim referre; ſed ut paucis colligam, prope univerſi, de jure litigantium, incerta & controverſa reſponderunt; poteſtatem vero judicandi ſummam, juxta falſam ſpeciem propoſitam, Eduardo tribuerunt.

(r) Idem, ibid. and Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 46.

(s) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 475.

(t) Ubi ſupra, pag. 47.

(49) Ubi ſupra, pag. 254, 255. See alſo Boethius ubi ſupra, fol. 293, where he tells us, that moſt part of the Civilians adjudged the Crown to Robert Bruce, not only on account of his great and generous ſoul, but alſo becauſe he was an heir-male.

[R] There were other pretenders to the Crown.] They were the following. Florence Earl of Holland, who pretended to the Crown of Scotland in right of his mother Ada, the eldeſt lawful ſiſter of William, who was formerly King; as did Robert de Pynkney in right alſo of his grandmother Marjory, ſecond ſiſter of the ſame King William. Patrick Galightly was the ſon of Henry Galightly, a baſtard of King William. William de Ros was deſcended of Iſabel; Patrick Earl of March, of Ilda or Ada; and William de Veſcy, of Marjory; all three daughters, though unluckily for their offspring, only natural daughters, of the ſame King William. Roger de Mandevil did the like, and had much the ſame reaſon, being, as well as the former, deſcended of Aufrick, a baſtard daughter of the ſaid King. Nicholas de Soules's right, if baſtardy could give right, was nearer to the lateſt Kings; for his grandmother Marjory, the wife of Alan de Huſer, was a natural daughter of Alexander II, and conſequently the ſiſter of Alexander III. John Cumine Lord of Badenock derived his title from a remoter ſource, viz. from Donald Bane, who had uſurped the Crown about two hundred years before this time; but he was willing to lay by his pretenſions in favour of John Baliol; he might alſo have added, of Robert Bruce and John Haſtings; for, to ſay the truth, none but theſe three had colourable pretenſions; nay that of Haſtings was ſcarcely ſuch, when in competition with that of Bruce, ſince tho' both were the immediate ſons of Earl David's immediate lawful daughters; yet Ada, the mother of Haſtings, was the younger ſiſter, who muſt therefore yield to Iſabel, the mother of Bruce (50). When the ſentence againſt Robert Bruce had been pronounced, the other competitors, amongſt whom Eric King of Norway had of late appeared by his Procurators, and as heir to his daughter Queen Margaret, had put in his claim for the Kingdom, did not think fit to inſiſt upon thoſe feeble pretenſions, they had probably never mentioned, had not King Edward, to raiſe diviſion, ſet them upon the bold attempt (51). So that when on the 17th of November, the Commiſſioners being met, the King had called them in, and aſked, what they had to offer to ſupport their claim, they anſwered, that they did not intend to proſecute it any farther, and withdrew their petitions; whereupon the King declared, that they had no right to the Crown of Scotland (52).

(50) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 463, 464.

(51) Idem, ibid. pag. 473.

(52) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 47.

[S] Robert Bruce and John Haſtings put in another claim.] John Haſtings began firſt. He pleaded, that the Kingdom of Scotland, ſince holden of the Crown of England, was, like all other lands, tenements, &c. diviſible, and ought therefore to be divided between John Baliol, Robert Bruce, and himſelf, as heirs to the three daughters. Robert Bruce, already diſappointed of his claim to the whole, ſtruck in with Haſtings, and, being ſeemingly at leaſt, content with his third part, requeſted of King Edward, that judgment might be given according to the common law of England. This plea, tho' mean in the competitors, (for here again I muſt own, that Robert Bruce did not ſhew himſelf to be that diſintereſted Heroe, which the Scots authors have made him) was nevertheleſs as plauſible as could be, upon the ſuppoſition of Scotland's being but a fee depending on the Engliſh Crown. For whatever the Law of England might have been at that time, I am ſure, that by the then Law of Scotland, lands (I don't ſay honours) held of the Crown, were partible; as appears from the Lordſhip of Galloway, which upon the death of Alan, Great Conſtable of Scotland, was divided among his three daughters, in ſpite of the oppoſition made by the baſtard Macdualan. Nor does it appear, that the law was then otherwiſe in England, as Mr. Tyrrel (53) would make us believe; becauſe, ſays he, upon the deceaſe of John Scot Earl of Cheſter, without iſſue of his own body, the Earldom with the County devolved to the Crown; and his ſiſters had no part of it allowed them. This is true; but then it is plain, that State-policy prevailed in this caſe over the laws of the Land. The Earldom of Cheſter was a Palatinate, and the Earls of it were petty Sovereigns. The laſt in poſſeſſion was a Scots Prince, the ſon of David Earl of Huntington and Garioch; and upon his death, either his eldeſt ſiſter Margaret, the ſame in whoſe right John Baliol her grand-child now claimed the Crown of Scotland, ſhould have ſucceeded; or the lands ſhould have been divided between that Lady and her two ſiſters, Iſabel and Ada, the mothers of the two other competitors, Robert Bruce and John Haſtings. But the Kings of England found it inconvenient to have little Sovereignties erected or continued in England, and therefore could never be eaſy, till they had prevailed with the Kings of Scotland to accept an equivalent for their Principality in Cumberland, Earldom of Northumberland, &c. And for the ſame reaſon it was, that the common-law did not take place, in the caſe of the three ſiſters abovementioned. But then an equivalent was likewiſe given to them; and John Baliol, the ſon-in-law of Margaret the eldeſt ſiſter, had in her right, and in that of her daughter Dervegild an aſſignation of the Manors of Thorkeſey, Gernemuth and Luddingland, till the King ſhould make them a reaſonable exchange of other lands in ſatisfaction of her part of the Earldom of Cheſter (54). The Earldom of Cheſter was then partible by the Engliſh Law, and the Lordſhip of Galloway by the

(53) Vol. 3. pag. 70.

(54) Dugdale, Baronage of England, tom. 2. pag. 524.

Baliol accept of the abſolute and independent Crown of Scotland. We ſhall make ſome obſervations upon King Edward's conduct in this affair in the note [T]. On the 20th of November 1292 John Baliol ſwore fealty to King Edward at Norham, and acknowledged his Sovereignty over Scotland in the moſt clear and ſubmiſſive words imaginable, and had an authentic Record of this tranſaction drawn up (u). Then he went into Scotland, and there in purſuance of the Writs iſſued out by his acknowledged Lord, and directed to the ſeveral Caſtellans, or Governors of Caſtles, he was on the Feaſt of St. Andrew, Patron of the Kingdom, placed on the Royal Throne at Scoon, and crowned King. He had not leiſure to receive the congratulations and ſubmiſſions of his party; I ſay of his party *; for as all ſhould have done, ſo ſome, particularly the Bruces, father, ſon, and grandſon, together with John Earl of Caithneſs, William Douglas, &c. refuſed to acknowledge him. He was ſoon

(u) Rapin, ibid.

* Fœder. Angl. tom. 2. pag. 604.

the Scots. Conſequently the Kingdom of Scotland, if holden of the Crown of England, as it was then pretended, was alſo partible by the Laws of both Nations (55). Yet it was not judged to be ſo. King Edward propoſed the two following queſtions to be examined. 1. Whether the Kingdom of Scotland was a partible fief? 2. If not, Whether the acquiſitions made by the Kings of Scotland ought to follow the Common-Law of ordinary inheritances? The unanimous opinion of the King's Council and of the Commiſſioners was, that the Kingdom of Scotland was an indiviſible fief; and that the new acquiſitions, made by the King within the Kingdom, ceaſe to be diviſible, as ſoon as they are in the King's poſſeſſion (56). It ſeems by this laſt queſtion, as tho' Robert Bruce and John Haſtings, or perhaps ſome other of the pretenders, had claimed ſome lands, belonging to the Crown of Scotland; and which formerly had been in the poſſeſſion of ſome private perſons; otherwiſe it does not appear to what purpoſe the ſecond queſtion had been examined.

(55) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 463, 464.

(56) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 47.

[T] Some obſervations upon King Edward's conduct in this affair.] "All theſe tranſactions, ſays Mr. Tyrrel (57), ſtill remaining upon Record in the Tower "of London, may ſerve as a ſufficient juſtification of "the ſincerity of King Edward's proceedings in this "great affair, and that all things were tranſacted in "the face of the world, and by the common conſent of "the major part of the auditors, ... and confirmed by "that of the Clergy, Nobility, and Commonalty of "Scotland; and therefore Hector Boetius, and thoſe o-"ther Hiſtorians are by no means to be credited, who "relate that the King uſed violence to obtain their "votes. ..." He afterwards adds, "That he will not "juſtify all that the King did, in the beginning of "this affair, in ſo ſtrictly inſiſting upon his ſupreme "dominion over all Scotland, which the States of that "Kingdom, and the competitors for the Crown, either "could not, or durſt not contradict." I wiſh, ſays Mr. Abercromby upon this, that Mr. Tyrrel had been a little more conſiſtent with himſelf in the obſervations he makes upon thoſe tranſactions, that have been controverted by all Scots and Engliſh Writers, and by moſt of them either ignorantly or maliciouſly repreſented. He is indeed by far more candid and fair, than even thoſe, who having his Hiſtory before their eyes, while they compoſed their own, are for their unrelenting partiality inexcuſable. He does juſtice to the Scots on many occaſions, but ..., in ſome meaſure divided between prejudice and truth, he often falls into obſervations contrary to matters of fact, related by himſelf. Hence it is, that according to him the ſincerity of King Edward's proceedings is juſtifiable, becauſe he acted in the face of the world; yet not juſtifiable in the beginning, becauſe he ſo ſtrictly inſiſted upon the ſupreme dominion of an independent Kingdom. And again, thoſe authors are not to be credited, who ſay that he uſed violence, yet he owns that the Competitors and Eſtates of Scotland, as he calls them, either could not or durſt not contradict him. And the reaſon is plain; he took advantage of their implacable diviſions, cheated them out of their country, and having firſt by an armed force awed them into a ſubmiſſion to his unjuſt commands, continued to the laſt to purſue the ſame meaſures, by ſeizing all the fortreſſes of Scotland into his own hands, filling the Kingdom with Engliſh ſoldiers, cajolling and bribing ſome of the Nobles into a ſurrender of their rights, and obliging others, particularly the Chieftains of the Highlands, as Alexander of Argyle Lord of Lorn, and Alexander and Donald of the Iſles, to be anſwerable for the compliance and ſubmiſſion of their reſpective vaſſals and countries. If this was not to uſe violence, and if it was not a continued tract of violence, that laſted from the beginning of the controverſy, till at leaſt two months after its deciſion, when the Engliſh forces evacuated the Caſtles they had garriſoned in Scotland, I know not what it is. Sure I am no people were ever more ſhamefully abuſed, nor even by conqueſt more irreſiſtibly commanded (58). It appears, ſays Mr. de Rapin (59), by King Edward's whole conduct, that at firſt his intention was not to make himſelf maſter of the Kingdom of Scotland, as Buchanan charges him, but only to render that Kingdom dependent of England. This he had in common with moſt of his predeceſſors; for, not to mention the Saxon and firſt Norman Kings, no ſooner had Henry II King William in his power, but he reſolved to take advantage of that Prince's misfortune, and obliged him to pay him homage for his Kingdom; and Henry III, Edward's father, pretended to require the ſame of Alexander III, but could not ſucceed in that attempt. We cannot therefore conclude, from King Edward's firſt ſtep, that he had formed a deſign of making himſelf abſolute maſter of the Kingdom of Scotland, ſince he only claimed the direct Sovereignty of it, without ever pretending to the property of it, concerning which he contented himſelf with entering his proteſtation. If he had that deſign, he might eaſily have found plauſible pretences, to put Engliſh Garriſons, and Governors entirely devoted to him, in the places that were ſurrendered to him. He might have ſaid, that all the Scots having already declared for one or other of the Competitors, he could not commit the Caſtles of the Kingdom to their cuſtody, without expoſing it to the danger of a civil war. But inſtead of putting himſelf by that means in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, he confirmed the ancient Governors, only requiring them to take the oath to him; a precaution, which ſo wiſe a Prince as he was, could not but look upon as very precarious. Thus far Mr. de Rapin; upon which we may obſerve, firſt, that it is very probable he put Engliſh garriſons in the caſtles of Scotland (60); for how elſe is it to be conceived that the Kingdom was delivered up to him, as he expreſly required, according to Mr. de Rapin himſelf (61)? Secondly, the caſe of Gilbert de Umfraville (62), which Mr. de Rapin himſelf relates, ſeems plainly to inſinuate, that the Governors were obliged to ſurrender the place, committed to their own care, and that other Governors were put in their ſtead. However that be, Mr. de Rapin adds (63), that it muſt be owned, that King Edward was very willing to take hold of the opportunity to eſtabliſh his direct Sovereignty over Scotland, and thus to accompliſh the deſign which his anceſtors had often formed, but could never well execute. It is not eaſy to determine, whether he was himſelf perſuaded of the lawfulneſs of his right, or whether conſidering the diſtreſſed condition, in which Scotland then was, he reſolved to take advantage of it in order to eſtabliſh a new dominion. This is more likely, though it happens but too often, that men eaſily ſuffer themſelves to be prepoſſeſſed in favour of what is to their profit. And indeed, to borrow proofs from Engliſh Hiſtorians, in order to ſhew that Scotland is dependent on the Crown of England, was as much as if he had owned that he had no better arguments to ſupport his pretended right. Certainly ſuch an homage as that which he claimed from the Scots, ought to have been proved by the moſt unqueſtionable and moſt authentick records. One cannot eaſily be perſuaded that if the Kings of Scotland had conſtantly paid homage to thoſe of England, one inſtance only of it ſhould have been

(57) Vol. 3. pag. 73. apud Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 465, &c.

(58) Abercromby, ibid.

(59) Ubi ſupra, pag. 50.

(60) See remark [O] under the quotation (40).

(61) See ibid. quotation (42).

(62) Ubi ſupra, pag. 51.

(63) Ibid.

ſoon obliged to return again into England, in order to attend his Liege-Lord, who was pleaſed to keep his Chriſtmas at Newcaſtle; where on St. Stephen's day he again renewed his homage [V]. This was no ſooner done, but he perceived under what ſlavery he had put himſelf, ſeveral cauſes, which ought to have been judged in Scotland, having been brought before King Edward [W]; upon which ſome Prelates and Noblemen of Scotland repreſented to the King of England, that he had but lately promiſed, that the laws and cuſtoms of Scotland ſhould remain entire, and that pleas of things done there, ſhould not be drawn out of it. But in vain; for they were told both by King Edward himſelf, and by Robert Brabanſon, Chief Juſtice of his Bench, "That if he had made ſuch tempora-"ry promiſes, when there was no King in Scotland, he had performed them; that now "they had a King, he was to be bound by no ſuch obligations; that his proteſtations re-"mained in force; that he would admit and hear all complaints whatſoever, and all other "affairs relative to the Kingdom of Scotland and its inhabitants, when and where he pleaſ-"ed; and that he would uſe and exerciſe his ſuperiority and direct dominion, which he "had, and of right ought to have, over the kingdom of Scotland, as his progenitors in "their times had, ſo far as to call the King of Scotland himſelf to appear before him in "his Kingdom of England." This was plain language, and he could not be miſunderſtood; yet that none might be ignorant of his deſign to enſlave the Nation, two days after a paper was preſented to King John, importing, "That John King of Scotland "acquitted him, King Edward, of all promiſes, bargains, agreements, and obligations "he had made, or entered into, to the guardians and others of the Kingdom, while, by "reaſon of the ſuperiority of his dominion, he held it in his hands." This releaſe or acquittance was ſealed with the ſeal of that unhappy Prince, and confirmed with thoſe of all his ſubjects about him. King John was before this time in no great eſteem with his ſubjects at home; many of them did not acquieſce in his title, and all were ſatisfied, or ought to have been ſo, that though his title had been indiſputable, he was not their King when he owned a Superior above him. But they were, for the moſt part, willing to bear with him, in hopes that the title of King, and poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, would inſpire him with ſentiments becoming his dignity; and the rather, becauſe after all it was plain, that what he had hitherto done, was the effect of compulſion and force, and that he could not avoid ſubmitting, as he did, without forfeiting, if not his life, at leaſt his pretenſions to the Crown. But now he was on the Throne, and yet continued a ſubject, people became more variouſly affected toward him, than they had formerly been; the braveſt and beſt ſet themſelves to find out means of freeing him and themſelves from their bondage; while others, either out of a deſign to urge him to a reſentment, or, as it is uſual, to ingratiate themſelves with the ſuperior powers, appealed from the legal ſentences given by their own King and his Judges in Scotland, to the King and Parliament of England. That a great many did ſo, and that they were always encouraged in their inſolence, and careſſed for it, appears from ſeveral places of Rymer's Collections; we ſhall give ſome inſtances of it in Note [X]. Theſe were not the only injuries done to King John, and indeed to the whole Scots been found upon record. It is therefore probable, that King Edward, without being himſelf well ſatisfied of his right, reſolved to eſtabliſh it by taking advantage of the opportunity, which the ſituation of the affairs of Scotland afforded him. For he knew very well that no body was in a condition to oppoſe him, ſince the heads of the moſt conſiderable parties had ſuch ſtrong reaſons to have a great regard for him, and to take care not to offend him. But I doubt whether the conſent of the Scots was ſufficient to acquire him a new right. This I leave to the conſideration of thoſe who are better acquainted than myſelf in theſe matters. However it ſeems that this Prince cannot be well acquitted, ſince by his unbounded ambition he kindled a moſt cruel war between the two nations, who inhabit Great Britain. And if the event may ſometimes be looked upon as a determination from heaven of the juſtice or injuſtice of any cauſe, it appears from hiſtory, that though God ſuffered at firſt King Edward to ſucceed in his deſign, yet he afterwards permitted all the mighty projects of the Engliſh to vaniſh away.

[V] He renewed his homage.] The form of it was thus. "My Lord Edward King of England, and ſu-"perior Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, I John of "Scotland become your liege-man, for the whole "Kingdom of Scotland, with its appurtenances, "which Kingdom I claim and hold, and ought of "right to hold, for me and my heirs Kings of Scot-"land, hereditarily of you, and your heirs, Kings of "England; and ſhall bear faith to you and your "heirs Kings of England of life and limbs, and ter-"rene honours, againſt all men that may live and die." This form is very different from thoſe formerly uſed by the Kings of Scotland, when they did homage for their Engliſh Territories; and plainly ſhews, that till then (except the extorted homage paid by King William) they had never done homage for Scotland: elſe they had certainly done it in terms no leſs expreſs, than thoſe I have tranſcribed (63). We may add another proof of this. When John Baliol did homage to the King of England, the Lord Chamberlain either aſked too much for his fee, or did not know what he was to aſk; whereupon King Edward himſelf fixed that fee at twenty pounds, which is double the ſum an Earl uſed to pay (64).

(63) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 475.

(64) Fœder. Angl. tom. 2. pag. 600. apud Rapin's Extracts of them, tom. 1. p. m. 179.

[W] Several cauſes, which ought to have been judged in Scotland, were brought before King Edward.] Here follows an inſtance of it. One Roger Bartholomew, a Burgeſs of Berwick, which was then owned a town within the borders of Scotland, and belonging to it, had the unprecedented inſolence to offer a complaint to King Edward againſt ſome Officers or Judges appointed by King John, that is, againſt King John himſelf. He was no doubt purpoſely ſet on to begin the affair; ſo that it is no wonder if he was favourably heard, and juſtice was ordered to be done according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of England. It will be owned, that a greater affront than this could not be put upon the King and Kingdom of Scotland; nor could there be any thing more unjuſt in itſelf, than to judge Scots men by Engliſh Laws, which they had never been liable to, nor acquainted with (65).

(65) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 479.

[X] Some inſtances of appeals brought by King John's ſubjects before the King and Parliament of Scotland.] A Merchant of Gaſcogne preſented a petition to King Edward, ſetting forth, that Alexander III, the late King of Scotland, owed him a certain ſum of money, which had not yet been paid, notwithſtanding all his ſollicitations. That therefore he addreſſed himſelf to him as Sovereign of the King of Scotland, to demand that Scots Nation. The Parliament of England, in which the King was obliged to plead his own cauſe, againſt one of his ſubjects, decreed ſuch things, as diveſted the King of Scotland of almoſt all his authority [Y]. Yet all theſe affronts were not at firſt capable to rouſe the timorous ſpirit of Baliol; perhaps becauſe he was not yet in a condition to oppoſe his haughty Sovereign. For a war breaking out about the year 1294 between King Edward that juſtice might be done to him: Edward eagerly embraced this opportunity to exert his right, and ſummoned the King of Scotland to appear before him the day after Aſcenſion day, in order to anſwer in perſon, the complaints brought againſt him by the Merchant. This ſummons is dated March the 8th 1293, about two months after Edward had left Newcaſtle. A week after Baliol was again ſummoned on the following occaſion. While Edward was at Berwick, he commanded the Guardians of Scotland to put Macduff Earl of Fife in poſſeſſion of certain lands, which he claimed as belonging to him. This order had been put in execution before Baliol's coronation, and whilſt Edward was ſtill Maſter of Scotland. In the firſt Parliament which the new King held at Scone, the Earl of Fife was charged with having unjuſtly taken poſſeſſion of theſe lands, the cuſtody of which belonged to the King. This was properly accuſing him of an affected and too great precipitation, in having addreſſed himſelf to the King of England, without waiting till there was a King on the Throne of Scotland. The Parliament ſentenced the Earl to be impriſoned (66). The Earl having been ſet free ſome time after, and thinking himſelf injured in that law-ſuit, which had been intended at the inſtance of the Abernethies, the mortal enemies of his family, went to England, and complained, that King Edward having reſtored him to the lands and tenements in debate, King John had notwithſtanding diſ-ſeized him of the ſame, and cauſed an unjuſt ſentence to paſs againſt him, to his great damage, and in contempt of the King of England the ſuperior Lord of Scotland. Edward immediately directed his Writ to the King of Scotland, ſummoning him to appear at his court, wherever he ſhould be in England, on the day after the Feaſt of the Holy Trinity, to anſwer to what Macduff had to ſay againſt him (67). He was a third time ſummoned on the 15th of June following, and a few months after again, and finally he was cited for the fifth time the next year, every time for different, but very trifling ſubjects. This made him ſenſible, that he was a ſlave rather than a vaſſal to the King of England (68). But the Scots, ſtill divided among themſelves, terrified by the Engliſh power, which was never greater than at that time, and miſerably diſpirited for want of that ſoul in their King, by which every particular ſhould have been animated, had not yet concerted meaſures towards reſiſting: for which reaſons their unprincely Sovereign was obliged to anſwer his Summons. He did it, and had, at his firſt entrance into the Engliſh Parliament, the honours, which the Kings of Scotland his predeceſſors, when they as Princes of Cumberland appeared at the Engliſh Court, ever had received, to ſit by the King of England, on an equal elevation above the reſt of the Aſſembly. But when his own cauſe came to be tried, which was that of Macduff, he was neither allowed Procurators, as all the Scots Hiſtorians aſſert, nor permitted to plead in his own ſeat, but was obliged to riſe and deſcend to the uſual place of pleading. A cruel uſage, which even Baliol could not bear with; his indignation appeared by the anſwer he made. For he ſaid, that as he was King of Scotland, he durſt not anſwer to Macduff's complaint, nor to any thing concerning his Kingdom, without the advice of his ſubjects. Upon this Macduff demanded judgment againſt him; and King Edward told him plainly, that he was his liege-man and homager, even for the Kingdom of Scotland; that as ſuch he had ſummoned him thither to anſwer; and that he muſt anſwer accordingly, or ſhew cauſe to the contrary. He replied as before, and being told, that he might require another day, he ſaid, that he would require none. Had he ſtood to this reſolution, he had acted like a King, and regained both the love and eſteem of his ſubjects. But then, beſides that he knew not, what violence might have been done to his perſon, he muſt neceſſarily have involved his ſubjects in a war, for which they were not prepared. For it was inſtantly determined, that ſince he had made no defence, nor would require a day, nor ſhew cauſe why he would not, three of his principal caſtles ſhould be ſeized into the hands of King Edward, till he had given full ſatisfaction. But before the ſentence was pronounced, he ſubmitted anew, re-acknowledged the ſuperiority of the King of England, and, upon aſſurance given, that he would anſwer at King Edward's Parliament after Eaſter next, and behave towards him as he ought to do, he was permitted to return and adviſe with his own Nation. This we find in the public Inſtrument preſerved in the Tower of London; but to acknowledge the truth, I know not how far each particular, contained in thoſe Inſtruments drawn up by King Edward's Notaries, ought to be credited. That King John was adviſed to make amends for his pretended obſtinacy, and to do it according to the form ſet down in the Record, I do not at all doubt. But if what an Engliſh Monk of St. Alban's, who lived at that time (69), has left us in manuſcript be true, I am apt to think, that he adhered to what he firſt ſaid, viz. That he durſt not anſwer to any thing concerning his Kingdom, nor conſequently take any new obligations upon him, without conſulting his ſubjects. And the reaſon is, becauſe that author ſays, that juſt before he came to the Parliament at London, the Scotiſh Nobility had choſen twelve Peers to govern in his abſence. To them, it ſeems, he promiſed to account for his actions; and therefore not daring to do any thing without their advice, he withdrew privately, without taking leave of the King; which, continues that author, ſo incenſed King Edward, that he cauſed all Baliol's eſtate in England to be ſeized into his hands. If this was ſo, King Edward was a great gainer by his retreat; for beſides thoſe ample poſſeſſions King John inherited from the Baliols his anceſtors, he was alſo, as King of Scotland (70), veſted and ſeized not only in the lands of Penrith, and others in the Northern Counties, amounting to twelve hundred pound land, granted by Henry III to Alexander II, as an equivalent for his pretenſions to Northumberland, Cumberland, &c. but alſo in the honour of Huntington, and the lands of Tyndale. Whether all theſe were upon this occaſion loſt to the Kings of Scotland, I ſhall not determine. It is certain they afterwards were; nor were the Scots Kings henceforth deſirous to be repoſſeſſed of an invidious, though rich vaſſallage, which had adminiſtred ſo many occaſions to the Kings of England of pretending to the ſuperiority over Scotland itſelf (71). We may obſerve here, that according to Buchanan (72), it was by chance only, that the King of Scotland happened to be preſent at the Parliament we have mentioned. But this is not at all probable; how can it be imagined that the new King would have ſo ſoon left his Kingdom, to put himſelf into the power of a Sovereign, from whom he had no great favours to expect; and this at a time when a cauſe was to be tried, in which complaint was made againſt him by one of his ſubjects? It is much more likely, that being awed into compliance, he appeared there to obey his ſummons.

(66) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 53.

(67) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 479, 480.

(68) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 54.

(69) Tyrrel, vol. 3. pag. 76.

(70) Mr. Anderſon's Eſſays, pag. 234, 235.

(71) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 480, 481.

(72) Ubi ſupra, pag. 256.

[Y] The Parliament of England decreed ſuch things, as diveſted the King of Scotland of almoſt all his authority.] It was decreed (73), I. "In caſe the King of "Scotland, being cited to appear upon any account whatever, before his ſuperior Lord the King of England, "ſhould fail to do it at the time appointed, that he "ſhall be bound to come the next day, and to purge "himſelf of the crime of contumacy and diſobedience; "which if he do not, he ſhall loſe the cognizance of "the cauſe in debate, and be at the mercy and diſcretion of his ſuperior Lord. II. If upon his appearance it ſhall be found, that the complainer, in caſe "of an appeal from him, ſhall be found to have been "prejudged by the ſaid King, or the Judge ordinary "under him, that the ſaid complainer ſhall, by ſentence of the Engliſh Court, recover both his right "and expences, and that the ſaid King ſhall for his "injuſtice be at the mercy and diſcretion of his ſuperior Lord. III. That the ſaid complainer ſhall "henceforth (73) Prynne's Collect. tom. 3. pag. 551, 552. apud Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 481, 482.

Edward, and Philip King of France, Baliol is ſaid to have behaved, outwardly at leaſt, as a dutiful ſubject to his ſuperior Lord, and even to have been preſent at a great Council, which Edward had aſſembled at London in 1294, and to have granted the revenue of all his eſtates in England for three years, towards carrying on the war with France (w). However the next year he entered into an alliance with King Philip againſt Edward [Z]. But though this negotiation was carried on with great ſecrecy at Paris, Edward got the hint of it; and to prevent the deſigns of the King of Scotland, he demanded of him the caſtles of Berwick, Roxburgh, and Jedburgh, to be put as a caution into his hands, while the war ſhould laſt, which when over, he obliged himſelf by his letters of the eighth of October, to reſtore theſe caſtles (x). But this was refuſed; and the King of Scotland, to ſhew that he was now reſolved to be no longer ſubject to the Engliſh authority or influence, baniſhed all thoſe of that Nation, even the Eccleſiaſtics, out of his dominions, and would permit none

(w) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 478-784.

(x) Idem, ibid: pag. 489. and Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 55.

" henceforth do the ſame homage and ſervices to the " ſuperior Lord for the lands recovered, as is ſaid, " which he was wont to do and perform to the King of " Scotland, ſo that the ſaid King ſhall never after- " wards have any authority, power, or juriſdiction, " over the ſaid complainer, his perſon, lands, tene- " ments, &c. IV. That all ſuch, as ſhall bring their " complaints from the Judicatories of Scotland to thoſe " of England, ſhall if they deſire it, be allowed a Guar- " dian during the dependence of their plea, to protect " their perſons, families, lands, tenements, revenues, " &c. And if any hurt or damage ſhall in the mean " time be done to the ſaid guardian, the ſaid King of " Scotland, and his heirs, ſhall forfeit all their right " and title, to the homage, fealty, and ſervice of the " ſaid complainers, who henceforth ſhall become and " remain the immediate Vaſſals of the King of Eng- " land, and his heirs for ever; and the King of Scot- " land ſhall be, as in the caſes before mentioned, at " the mercy and diſcretion of his ſuperior Lord." This was certainly a moſt compendious, eaſy, and infallible way of doing buſineſs; and at this rate it is plain the King of Scotland was not ſo much a King in his Kingdom, as the meaneſt Baron is, and ever was in his own Court. This is Mr. Abercromby's reflection, which every reader will certainly find perfectly well grounded.

[Z] He entered into an alliance with the King of France againſt Edward.] " The French King, ſays " Mr. Prynne (70), by his private ſollicitations, letters " and promiſes, procured John Baliol, King of Scots, " with all the Prelates, Nobles and Commonalty, to " enter into a moſt perfidious, clandeſtine league, and " an offenſive and defenſive war with him, againſt their " ſovereign Lord . . contrary to their late ſolemn oaths " and homages, under their reſpective hands and ſeals." Upon which Mr. Abercromby obſerves (71): " The " truth is, none of thoſe ungrateful, perfidious, and " rebellious Kings of Scotland, nor the perfidious Scots " under their command (ſo he is pleaſed to miſ-call " them) did think themſelves, nor were they, bound " to keep oaths, or to perform obligations violently " extorted, or from a King, that was only ſuch in " name, or from ſubjects firſt deluded, then compelled " into a ſurrender of liberties and rights, which be- " ing tranſmitted to them by their independing ance- " ſtors, belonged more to their poſterity than to them- " ſelves. This they conſcientiouſly repreſented to the " acknowledg'd Judge of the like controverſies in thoſe " times, Pope Celeſtin, and he (miſinformed by their " falſe ſuggeſtions, ſays Mr. Echard (72), by a par- " ticular Bull abſolved them from their oaths and " homage; his ſucceſſor Boniface VIII did afterwards " the ſame: and how far either of theſe two Pontiffs " was by falſe ſuggeſtions miſinformed, the letter of " this laſt, which we'll mention afterwards, will let " the reader know." As the King of England had made a powerful confederacy againſt the King of France, " the latter was, no doubt, for his own in- " tereſt very deſirous to counter-balance it by another " againſt King Edward, and he had reaſons to think, " that the Scots, ſtated as they then were, with re- " ference to England, could not be ſo far wanting to " themſelves, as to decline his amity and aſſiſtance, if " offered; yet we do no where find that he made the " firſt advances (73). But if we may credit the Engliſh " Hiſtorians, the Scots were highly diſſatisfied, that " the King of England had impoſed a King upon " them; ſome of them did in ſome meaſure reclaim, " others privately murmured againſt the thing; and " finding that the King they had got was a ſimple and " eaſy man, they deſpiſed his authority, and having " entered into a combination together, they ſeized his " perſon; (This, ſays Mr. Abercromby in a paren- " theſis, I believe is falſe, nor do I any where elſe read, " that violence was uſed) carried him to the inland " country, ſhut him up in a ſtrong caſtle on all ſides, " environ'd with mountains almoſt inacceſſible, and " appointed ſoldiers to guard him. This done, a " Parliament was called to meet at Scone, where in " imitation of the Conſtitution of France, they elected " twelve Peers, four Biſhops, four Earls, and four " Barons, by whoſe advice the King was to govern. " They cauſed alſo a publick Seal to be made for " the Community of Scotland, as they were called, " and the Peers prevailed upon the King to conſent " to their intended treaſon, that is, to ſend Embaſ- " ſadors to the King of France, with a procuratory " power, and letters, to which the King's Seal and " that of the Community were appended. The Em- " baſſadors were William Biſhop of St. Andrews, " the ſame who formerly had been in favour with " King Edward (74), Matthew Biſhop of Dunkeld, " Sir John Soules, and Sir Ingeram Umfraville. " Theſe Gentlemen having procured their letters of " Credence, and plenipotentiary powers, dated at " Stirling the fifth of July 1295, were moſt honour- " ably and kindly received at the Court of France, " and they were ſo ſucceſsful in their negotiations, " that on the twenty third of October the treaty pro- " poſed by King John was finally agreed to by " King Philip; the ſubſtance of it was as follows. " I. That Edward King John's ſon ſhall marry the " daughter of Charles of Valois Earl of Anjou, the " King of France's brother. II. That King John " and his ſucceſſors ſhall with all their power by ſea " and land, be aſſiſting to King Philip and his ſuc- " ceſſors in the proſecution of the preſent war againſt " the King of England and his Allies, &c: and that " he ſhall at his own charge invade England in order " to make a powerful diverſion in favour of France, " whenever attacked by the ſaid King of England, " or his Allies. III. That King John ſhall prevail " with the Prelates, Earls, Barons, Noblemen, and " the Community of all the Cities in Scotland, ſo " far as of right they may, to teſtify their aſſent to " this agreement, by tranſmitting their Letters Pa- " tents under their Seals to France. IV. That in the " like manner, if the King of England ſhall invade " Scotland, the King of France ſhall make war upon " him in other parts, by way of diverſion, and if " required, ſhall ſend auxiliary forces at his own " charge, till they come thither. V. That they ſhall " not make peace on either ſide, without the conſent " of each other. In the authentic writs we have " concerning this league, there are three things ob- " ſervable. For as King John in his letters to King " Philip begins thus, To the moſt excellent Prince his " Lord, (to be ſure, becauſe of the lands he held of " him in Normandy) and friend if he pleaſes, Philip; " ſo King Philip in his anſwer to King John ſtiles " him, his ſpecial friend; both which laſt expreſſions " ſeem to relate to the antient league or friendſhip " between the two Nations, which by King John's " late ſubmiſſion to England had been in ſome mea- " ſure broken. But what puts the matter out of all " doubt, is the ratification of this ſame treaty made " by King John, which plainly narrates their con- " ſtant, ſincere, and inviolable attachment to one " another (75)."

(70) Ubi ſupra, pag. 601.

(71) Ubi ſupra, pag. 484, 485.

(72) Book 2. pag. 315.

(73) Yet, Mezeray, Abregé de l'Hiſt. de France, tom. 2. p. 782, ſays, that Philip induced King John, already half perſuaded by the Scots, who could not bear to be ſubject to the Engliſh, to break the treaty he had made with King Edward, and to enter into an alliance with France.

(74) See above, note [C].

(75) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 485, 486.

none of them to ſtay, but ſuch as took an oath to aſſiſt him againſt their own King and countrymen [AA]. He ſoon after ſhook off entirely the yoke of the Engliſh, and gave notice of it by a letter to King Edward [BB], who was then upon the point of ſending his forces againſt the French; but fearing leſt the Scots ſhould make a dangerous diverſion, he altered his mind, and reſolved to attack and ſubdue them, before he went beyond ſea. Baliol had at firſt ſome advantage over King Edward; and depending upon his ally the King of France, he was in hopes of being powerfully aſſiſted. In the mean time he put himſelf at the head of a numerous army, and went to meet King Edward, who had already made himſelf maſter of Berwick, and was marching towards Dumbar. King John was reſolved to determine by a deciſive battle, whether he ſhould live in ſlavery, or be free. But the event was not favourable for him; his army was routed [CC], and not only fled before Edward, but even diſbanded and left the field. So that the King of England at the head of his triumphant army, which by freſh recruits from Wales and Ireland grew every day ſtronger and more formidable, had nothing elſe to do, but to receive the ſubmiſſion of thoſe on his road. The weak and cowardly King John, and the diſpirited few, that continued to attend him, retired immediately upon the loſs of the battle of Dumbar, and left all the South and North, as far as the country of Angus, open to the prevailing power, which they had neither heads nor hearts to oppoſe; tho' they might poſſibly have found ſome means to retrieve their affairs [DD]. But King John was perſuaded, either by his own fear, or by thoſe about him, as mean ſpirited as himſelf, or, as Boethius ſays (y), "by the fair deluding promiſes of King Edward, to come on the ſeventh of "July to that Prince, then at a place called Strowkathiack, without any ſtate, only "mounted upon a little nag, with a white rod in his hand, according to the cuſtom of "ſurrenderers, and, as was previouſly agreed, to implore the mercy of his ſuperior Lord, "and to renounce the unlawful confederacies (ſo he was pleaſed to expreſs himſelf) he had "made "ſelves, and all the inhabitants of our Kingdom, as "well for the lands we held of you in your King-"dom, as for your pretended government over us "us (77)." This declaration did extremely provoke the Engliſh; King Edward cauſed it to be recorded for preſervation, and thoſe about him inſulted and abuſed the bearer moſt ſcurrilouſly; inſomuch, that according to Buchanan (78), he hardly eſcaped home with his life, and owed his ſafety more to the contempt they ſhewed to his perſon, than to the reſpect that was due to his quality of a meſſenger, or to his character of a Prieſt, for none but a church-man durſt go on ſo dangerous a meſſage.

(y) Ubi ſupra, fol. 294.

[AA] But ſuch as took an oath to aſſiſt him againſt their own King and countrymen.] "This, ſays Mr. Tyr-"rel (74), was fooliſhly contrived; for how could a "forced oath oblige others, when the Scots themſelves "had broke their oath of fealty to King Edward, on "pretence that it was impoſed upon them againſt their "conſents?" Mr. Abercromby ſays upon this (75), "I am much of the ſame opinion, and am very apt "to think, that no Government ever was, or can be "ſecured by impoſition of oaths. All ſubjects are by "the law of God and nature obliged to be loyal, and "as a man of honour and conſcience will be ſo, whe-"ther he has ſworn to it or not; ſo thoſe of no prin-"ciples, that dare to rebel, will dare to be perjured: "Wherefore ſince it is plain, that an unlawful oath "binds no body, and lawful ones no ill man, it fol-"lows that no body is bound by oaths." But with that Gentleman's leave, we may obſerve that his enumeration is not complete. I own, that oaths are not neceſſary for men of a ſtrict conſcience, nor for men of no conſcience at all. But do theſe two claſſes take up all mankind? How many men are there, who do not ſcruple to do an unlawful action, which they would not do for the world, if they were bound by an oath? And in this claſs we may rank the greateſt part of mankind; whence it follows, that oaths are binding upon the greateſt part of mankind.

(74) Vol. 3. pag. 92.

(75) Vol. 3. pag. 92.

(76) Ubi ſupra, pag. 489.

[BB] King John's Letter to King Edward.] It is as follows: "To the Magnificent Prince Edward, by the "grace of God, King of England, John by the ſame "grace, King of Scotland. Whereas you, and others "of your Kingdom, have purpoſely, knowingly, no-"toriouſly and frequently done, by your violent power, "intolerable injuries, grievous contempts, and enor-"mous damages to us, and the liberties of our King-"dom, againſt God and juſtice, citing us at your plea-"ſure, upon every ſlight ſuggeſtion, out of our King-"dom, unduly vexing us, ſeizing our caſtles, lands, "and poſſeſſions unjuſtly, and for no fault of ours, "taking the goods of our ſubjects, as well by ſea, as "by land, and carried them into your Kingdom, "killing our Merchants, deſtroying their trade, and "taking away and impriſoning our ſubjects: for the "reformation of which things, though we ſent our "meſſengers to you, yet they remain not only unre-"dreſſed, but there is every day an addition of worſe; "for now you are come with a great army upon our "borders, to diſinherit us, and the inhabitants of our "Kingdom, and proceeding forwards have inhumanly "committed many ſlaughters, burnings, and inſults by "land and ſea; we therefore, unable to bear theſe "injuries, grievances and damages, or to remain in "your fealty and homage extorted by your violent "oppreſſion, do hereby return them to you for our

(77) Abercromby. ubi ſupra, pag. 492.

(78) Ubi ſupra, pag. 257.

[CC] His army was routed.] This diſaſter was owing, ſay the Scots Authors, to the revolt of the Bruces. They not only acted above board in conjunction with the invaders, who had their private friends every where over the Kingdom, eſpecially at Court, and in the Army; who believing that the only way to ſet the Crown upon the head of Robert Bruce Earl of Carrick, (the ſon of him, who was one of John Baliol's competitors, and who was now dead) was to ſerve King Edward, and to betray King John, put this laſt and his Council upon wrong meaſures, and when they came to action, to deſerted, or lay by idle and inglorious ſpectators, of their own diſgrace, and their country's ſubjection. But treaſon is ſeldom rewarded, but, as it deſerves, with ſcorn and diſappointment. When upon the repeated overthrow of his countrymen, Robert Bruce, now ſure that King Edward would carry all before him, deſired he would be pleaſed to perform his promiſe, and make him King, he received this mortifying anſwer, by which all his hopes were defeated. What, ſaid King Edward in French, the language he beſt liked, and generally uſed, do you think, that I have nothing elſe to do, but to conquer Kingdoms for you? There is ſomething in theſe expreſſions ſo ſevere, that neither of the Bruces could ever forget them; and the time came, when the younger had the double pleaſure of ſatiated revenge and ſatisfied ambition (79), as we ſhall ſee in another place.

(79) Idem, ibid. pag. 493, 494.

[DD] They might poſſibly have found ſome means to retrieve their affairs.] The Nobility and Gentry were not all cut off, as appeared by their frequent meeting afterwards at Berwick; and there were ſtill a great many ſtrong holds in the different parts of the Kingdom, which had they been garriſoned, might have ſtopped the enemy's progreſs, and ſpun out the campaign. Beſides had the fiery Croſs been ſet about, as was ordinary in thoſe days, it is not to be ſuppoſed, but that in leſs than a fortnight the High-lands alone, being as yet in the hands of the Government, might have ſent to the field an army capable, if well commanded, to diſpute paſſes, lay ambuſcades, cut off parties, fall upon

" made with the King of France, in his own name, and in that of his ſon, and ſubjects, " againſt his due homage, and the fealty he had ſworn to the King of England." It ſeems, he believed this was all the atonement, which would be required of him, and that by ſubmitting again to the yoke, which he had ſo unſucceſsfully endeavoured to caſt off, he ſhould be continued what he was before, a vaſſal King. But he was miſtaken, for three weeks after he was commanded to attend King Edward at Brechin, where death being threaten'd, ſays Boethius (z), or a total ſurrender of his Crown and Dignity, he choſe to do the laſt; for what elſe could be expected of his ſervile mind, ſo long accuſtomed to ſubmiſſion?" On July 10, 1296 (aa), he made a ſolemn, and as he was forced to call it, a willing reſignation [EE] of himſelf, his whole Kingdom of Scotland, his Royal Dignity, with all homages, right, and appurtenances thereto belonging, as alſo of all his lands, poſſeſſions, and goods, moveable and immoveable, into the hands of Anthony, Biſhop of Durham, who received them for and in the name of King Edward. He was now no more called King, nor conſidered as ſuch, at leaſt by King Edward, who ſent him and his ſon Edward to the Tower of London, where, notwithſtanding the violent ſtruggles, and unexampled efforts, made afterwards in their favour, they lived at the diſcretion of the Conqueror, ſubmiſſive to his pleaſure, and for ought we know, unconcerned, and perhaps unacquainted with what was doing either for or againſt them [FF]. The Pope (bb) and the King of France did exert themſelves in order to have King John reſtored to his Kingdom [GG], but to no purpoſe; at laſt the Pope being infinitely deſirous to have the honour of eſtabliſhing a ſolid and laſting peace between England and France, he and King Philip thought themſelves in honour and conſcience obliged, not to abandon altogether the perſon of John Baliol, and the intereſt of Scotland. Wherefore a ſort of peace was agreed to at Monſtreuil in the month of June 1299, and in purſuance of it, the Lady Margaret, ſiſter to the King of France, was conducted to England, and married to King Edward, and King John was releaſed from his confinement, and delivered to the Biſhop of Vicenza the Pope's Nuncio, upon condition, that the

(z) Ibid.

(aa) Prynne's Collect. p. 647.

(bb) Boniface VIII.

on ſtraglers, intercept convoys, and by continually harraſſing the grand army, tho' ever ſo numerous, to have given them work for more than one ſummer. At leaſt they ſhould have made ſome attempts of this kind, and when all endeavours had failed, the King, had he deſerved to be ſuch, would have lurked in the mountains, retreated beyond ſeas, died, or done any thing rather than what he did (79).

(79) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 494.

[EE] He made a ſolemn reſignation.] The reaſons alledged in the paper, to which King John ſet his ſeal, for this ſurrender, were the following. " Be " cauſe by evil counſel and his own ſimplicity he had " greatly offended and provoked his Lord the King of " England; had allyed himſelf, contrary to his faith " and homage, to the King of France; had aſſiſted " the latter by war and otherwiſe, defied the former, " put himſelf out of his faith and homage, and ſent " an army into England to burn, ſpoil, plunder, kill " and commit other miſchiefs; fortifying the King- " dom of Scotland, King Edward's own fee or ſeig- " nority againſt him; putting garriſons into the " towns and caſtles, &c. For all which tranſgreſſi- " ons his Lord the King of England, having entered " Scotland by force, as he had a right to do, as Lord " of the Fee, had conquered and taken it, notwith- " ſtanding all he, King John, could do againſt him." To this Act the great Seal of Scotland was put; which being of no further uſe in the opinion of the Engliſh, was forthwith broken, and a new Seal was contrived for the purpoſes in hand (80).

(80) Idem, ibid. pag. 495.

[FF] What was doing either for or againſt them.] It ſeems however by ſome Bulls of the Pope, not only that he owned King John notwithſtanding his impriſonment and abdication; but alſo that that Prince, as inſenſible as he was of reputation and honour, kept ſtill ſome correſpondence abroad, and continued as far as he could to act as a King. If ſo, what is confidently aſſerted by ſome authors, may be true; viz. that Sir William Wallace was by King John's Commiſſion, as well as by the election of the Community of Scotland, made Regent or Guardian of the Kingdom under him (81). This great man at firſt commanded in chief thoſe of the Scots, who had not yet ſubmitted to King Edward. But diviſions and parties ariſing among the Nobility, and ſeveral falling off, or lying by quiet and unconcerned, they all became an eaſy prey to the King of England, who on the 22d of July 1296, routed their forces at Falkirk. The conſequence of this battle was as unlucky as the battle itſelf; for Sir William Wallace, under whoſe conduct the Scots, if united among themſelves, had been unconquerable, laid down his Command. Yet ſtill he kept up a party of brave men, who would never part with him, nor ceaſe to do all the miſchief they could (and they did a great deal) both to the Engliſh, as ſuch of the Scots as acted by Engliſh influence. Neither did the generality of the Nation ſubmit on this occaſion; on the contrary they reſolved upon death or liberty, modelled themſelves into a regular Government, and made Sir John Cumine, ſirnamed the Red, Lord of Badenoch, their Governor; a brave man, of high birth and a great eſtate, and a good Officer (82). Another proof that the Scots did not entirely forget their unfortunate Prince, is that when in the year 1300 they came to treat about a peace with King Edward, they required that he would permit John Baliol and his ſon to reign over them, and reſtore them to their own eſtates (83). This ſhews, that theſe unfortunate Princes had yet friends left, who were deſirous to have them reſtored, though they themſelves perhaps had not a ſoul great enough to be affected with it.

(81) Ibid. pag. 502.

(82) Ibid. pag. 504.

(83) Ibid. pag. 507.

[GG] The Pope did exert himſelf in order to have King John reſtored.] He directed a monitory Bull to him, in which he repreſented, that " Scotland never was nor is " a Fee of England; that both himſelf and his Fa- " ther Henry III had owned this. His father, becauſe " by his Letters-patent he ratified, that he had receiv- " ed auxiliary troops from his ſon-in-law Alexander " III, not as an aſſiſtance any way due to him, but " by as a ſpecial favour; himſelf, becauſe when he en- " treated the ſame King Alexander to be preſent at his " coronation, he declared alſo by his Letters, that he " aſk'd it as a ſpecial favour, to which King Alexander " was no ways obliged. That when the King of the " Scots did the uſual homage to him for his Engliſh poſ- " ſeſſion of Tyndale and Penrith, he publicly proteſt- " ed that as King of Scotland he was independent, " and that he held his Crown of God alone, to which " King Edward himſelf did agree. That when Alex- " ander died, leaving only a grandchild behind him, " as heireſs of the Crown, King Edward did ſollicit a " marriage between her and his own ſon Prince Ed- " ward by all methods imaginable; whereas had he been " Liege Lord of Scotland, he would have had the ward- " ſhip of the young Lady, and might have given her " in marriage to whom he pleaſed; but that on the " contrary there were Guardians of the Kingdom at " that time, tho' not appointed, yet owned by him." He then ſhews by the articles of marriage, that were agreed to by King Edward, that the Kingdom of Scotland was then by himſelf acknowledged to be independent. He proved the ſame by the manner in which he had accepted to be arbitrator between the competitors to the Kingdom. Then he adds, " That when the the * Pope might direct and order what he pleaſed concerning his perſon, and the eſtate he had in England, ſaving to King Edward and his heirs, their title to the Kingdom of Scotland, its inhabitants, appurtenances, &c. [HH]. This releaſing of John Baliol, and the freedom granted to him, did not in the leaſt alter or influence the affairs of Scotland, nor reſtore the unhappy Prince to his Throne; for though ſome of the Scots ſeemed ſtill to follow his party (cc), yet the greateſt part of the Nation deſpiſed him, as a weak man, who had neither genius nor courage, which he had ſufficiently ſhewn by ſtooping twice to kneel down before the King of England, ſo that being entirely abandoned, he retired into France, probably upon the eſtate he had there, and lived the remaining part of his days in a private manner (dd). He died in the year 1314 (ee). We ſhall give his character in the Note [II].

* Fœder. Angl. tom. 2. p. 840, 847, &c.

(cc) Abercromby, ubi ſupra, pag. 495-507.

(dd) Mezeray, Hiſt. de France, tom. 2. p. 796.

(ee) Fœder. Angl. tom. 3. p. 506. apud Abercromby, tom. 2. pag. 2.

" Legates were ſent into England by the Apoſtolick " See, to exerciſe their functions, they could not upon " that pretence proceed to do the ſame in Scotland; " nor was ever a Legate admitted, or ought to be ad- " mitted into that Kingdom, unleſs he brought ſpe- " cial Letters from the Pope to the King of Scotland, " which had been needleſs, if Scotland had been a Fee " of England, or the King of Scots ſubject to the King " of England. . . . In fine he abſolutely condemns the " deſign and intention of the King of England to ſub- " due Scotland, eſpecially at a time when it wanted a " Head, and admoniſhed him ſharply to withdraw his " arms from thence and to leave the Scots to their own " liberties and laws. Adding withal, that if he had " any equitable plea to alledge for himſelf, he ſhould " appear before him by his Embaſſadors within ſix " months, and that he would take care to do juſtice to " both parties (84)." This Bull was delivered to King Edward the 25th of Auguſt 1300, that is above four years after he had King John in his power, and tho' the Pope does not require of him directly to reſtore that King; yet he inſinuates it enough, ſince he ſharply admoniſhes him to withdraw his forces out of Scotland, and to let the Scots enjoy their liberty.

(84) Ibid. pag. 508-510.

[HH] Saving to King Edward and his heirs their title to the Kingdom of Scotland &c.] The reaſon given for this ſalvo was, becauſe he, John Baliol, for Edward would not give him the title of King, had committed many inhuman treſpaſſes and treaſons againſt his ſovereign Lord, contrary to his homage and fealty; and afterwards had abdicated and renounced all the right and title he ever had to the Kingdom. He might have added, that but three years before, he had declared by a writing under his hand and ſeal, that when he was upon the Throne, he had found ſuch malice, fraud, treaſon and deceit in the Scots, who deſigned to have made away with his perſon, that he would never have any more to do with them. " What is it, ſays here- " upon Mr. Abercromby (85), one of his daſtardly tem- " per would not, when a priſoner, and in continual " apprehenſions of death, be perſuaded to declare?"

(85) Ibid. pag. 505.

[II] We ſhall give his character in the Note.] When a ſubject, he was ſo to no leſs than three different Sovereigns; to the King of France for the great eſtate that had been delivered down to him by his Norman anceſtors; to the King of England on account of the many Baronies he ſucceeded to in that Kingdom; to the King of Scotland, by reaſon of his Lordſhip of Galloway, from whence he was moſt commonly deſigned. Happy if he had continued in that elevated tho' private ſtate; but it was his misfortune and that of Scotland that he came to be King. His head was not fitted to wear a Crown, nor had he hands capable of ſwaying a Scepter. King Edward, a penetrating and deſigning Prince, beyond any perhaps at that time in the world, eaſily diſcovered his foible, and it is probable that the greateſt merit he ſaw in him, was that he had none at all (86). And if he really ſigned the Declaration, which we have mention'd above (87), voluntarily, of his own accord, and without the privity of King Edward, he was not only the moſt weak, but the moſt ungrateful man in the world. To ſpeak properly, he never was a King, becauſe as ſuch, he owned himſelf a Vaſſal. Yet the Scots, though not all, had received him, and done what they could to make him a King in earneſt, by freeing him from ſubjection. He and they were defeated in the attempt, probably by his fault. He had given a proof of his incapacity and raſhneſs, and perhaps of his cowardice and faint heartedneſs, when he ſuffered himſelf to be drawn into a meeting with King Edward; whereas he ſhould by all means have kept out of the way, and either died or preſerved himſelf free, till a more favourable opportunity ſhould offer. He had certainly found one in the courage and loyalty of his ſubjects, who, tho' he had proceeded to make a baſe ſurrender of himſelf and them, and was actually a priſoner in the Tower of London, yet ſtood up for him, and acted in his name all thoſe things, which their poſterity muſt neceſſarily be proud of, as long as they ſhall laſt (88). In a word, he was a weak man, but not a wicked man, as appears by his whole conduct. P.

(86) Ibid. pag. 477, 478.

(87) Note [HH].

(88) Idem, ibid. pag. 506.

☞ BALL (JOHN), Author of ſeveral Treatiſes in Divinity [A], was born at Caſſington or Cherſington near Woodſtock in Oxfordſhire in the beginning of October 1585. He was educated in grammar learning at a private ſchool under the Vicar of Yarnton near Caſſington. He was entered a Student at Brazen Noſe College in Oxford in 1602, where he continued under a ſevere Diſcipline and Tutor about five years, in the condition of a Servitor; from whence he removed to St. Mary Hall, where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1608. He was invited ſoon after into Cheſhire, to be Tutor to the children of the Lady Cholmondely, where he ſtaid for ſome time, and contracted an acquaintance with ſeveral ſtrict Puritans, who gained ſo far upon his affections, that they brought him over to their party. He afterwards went up to London, where he procured

[A] Author of ſeveral treatiſes in Divinity.] I. A ſhort Treatiſe containing all the principal grounds of Chriſtian Religion, &c. There were fourteen editions of this piece publiſhed before the year 1632. It was tranſlated into the Turkiſh language by Mr. William Seaman, an Engliſh Traveller. II. A Treatiſe of Faith, in two parts. The firſt ſhewing the Nature, the ſecond the Life of Faith &c. London 1631, in 4to, and 1637 in 4to, the third edition. There is a Preface before this work in commendation of it by Mr. Rich. Sibbes. III. Friendly Trial of the Grounds tending to Separation, in a plain and modeſt diſpute touching the Unlawfulneſs of ſtinted Liturgy and ſet Form of Common-Prayer; Communion in mixt Aſſemblies, and the primitive Subject and firſt Receptacle of the Power of the Keys, &c. Cambridge 1640 in 4to. The imperfect draught of this book was firſt made for the ſatisfaction of Mr. Richard Knightley, which by the importunity of ſeveral Miniſters and others was afterwards enlarged into this Treatiſe. IV. An Anſwer to two Treatiſes of Mr. John Can, the Leader of the Engliſh Browniſts in Amſterdam. The former is called, A Neceſſity of Separation from the Church of England proved by the Nonconformiſts principles. And the other, A Stay againſt ſtraying; wherein, in oppoſition to Mr. John Robinſon, he undertakes to prove the Unlawfulneſs of hearing the Miniſters of the Church of England. Mr. Ball's book was publiſhed by Mr. Simeon Aſh at London 1642 in 4to. After our author had finiſhed this Treatiſe, he undertook a large work upon the Church, in which he propoſed cured himſelf to be ordained a Miniſter by an Iriſh Biſhop, without ſubſcription. He removed then to Staffordſhire, and was appointed Curate of Whitmore, a Chapel of eaſe near Stoke, where he lived in a very mean manner, in an obſcure village, upon an allowance of 20 l. per annum. He taught ſchool likewiſe, in order the better to ſupport himſelf. Mr. Baxter tells us (a), that he deſerved as high eſteem and honour as the beſt Biſhop in England, yet looking after no higher things, but living comfortably and proſperouſly with theſe. He was accounted a learned and pious man, who had done great ſervice to the public; and though he was a little diſaffected to the Ceremonies and Diſcipline of the Church of England, yet he wrote againſt thoſe, who imagined that this was any juſt ground for a ſeparation. He died the 20th of October 1640, and was buried in the Chapel of Whitmore (b).

(a) See his book intitled, An unſavoury Volume of Mr. John Crandon's anatomiz'd, London 1654, Sect. 1. pag. 6.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. Col. 636, 637, 638. 2d edit. London 1721.

poſed to examine into the Nature of Schiſm, and to treat of the principal controverſies concerning the Eſſence and principal Government of the viſible Church. He left fifty ſheets of this work finiſhed. He was cenſured by ſome perſons on account of his Anſwer to Mr. John Can and his Friendly Trial, for receding in ſome meaſure from his former inconformity to the Church, and for deſerting the cauſe of the Nonconformiſts. However they aſſert, that he refuſed to comply with ſome things, which were excepted to in the Church of England; ſo that tho' he argued in theſe pieces againſt aggravating and multiplying the objections of corruptions, and that theſe were not a ſufficient reaſon for affirming ſet forms to be unlawful, and ſeparating from the public worſhip of the Church; yet he acknowledged ſome things to be exceptionable in the Engliſh Liturgy. But, as Mr. Wood obſerves (1), he died fully ſatisfied in the juſtneſs of that cauſe, which he ſo well defended againſt Separation. V. Trial of the new Church-way in New-England and Old &c. London, 1644, in 4to. VI. Treatiſe of the Covenant of Grace. London, 1645 in 4to, publiſhed by Mr. Simeon Aſh. VII. Of the Power of Godlineſs, both doctrinally and practically handled &c. To this work he added ſeveral Treatiſes, as 1. Of the Affections. 2. Of the ſpiritual Combate. 3. Of the Government of the Tongue. 4. Of Prayer, with an Expoſition on the Lord's Prayer, &c. London 1657 in fol. Publiſhed by Mr. Simeon Aſh, Chaplain to the Lord Brook, and afterwards to the Earl of Mancheſter. T.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 638.

☞ BALLANDEN (a) (Sir JOHN), a learned man of the XVIth Century, was deſcended from an antient and honourable family. His father, Mr. Thomas Ballanden of Auchinoul, was Director of the Chancery in 1540, and Clerk Regiſter in 1541. Our author having finiſhed the courſe of his ſtudies entered into holy Orders, and was made Archdean of Murray, Canon of Roſs, and Doctor of Divinity; and in the minority of King James V was appointed Clerk-Regiſter, though he afterwards loſt that honourable poſt through the factions of the times. In the reign of Queen Mary, the daughter and ſucceſſor of that King, he was again made Clerk-Regiſter and one of the Lords of the Seſſion (b). He died at Rome in the year 1550, according to Dempſter (c), who tells us likewiſe (d), that by incredible ſtudy and application he attained a complete knowledge of all the ſciences. He tranſlated and wrote ſeveral Works [A]. George Con in his book De duplici ſtatu Religionis apud Scotos ſays (e), that he was honoured with the degree of Doctor by (a) Mr. Nicholſon in his Scotiſh Hiſtorical Library, pag. 10. edit. London 1702, calls him Bellenden.

(b) Dr. George Mackenzie's Lives and Characters of the moſt eminent Writers of the Scots Nation, vol. 2. pag. 595. edit. Endinburgh 1711.

(c) Lib. 1. pag. 10. apud Mackenzie, p. 596.

(d) See Mackenzie, pag. 599.

(e) Lib. 2. pag. 167. ap. Mackenzie, pag. 600.

[A] He tranſlated and wrote ſeveral works.] At the command of King James V he tranſlated into the Scots language Hector Boethius's Hiſtory, which was printed at Edinburgh 1536 in folio, under this title, The Hiſtory and Chronicles of Scotland; compilit, and newly correctit and amendit be the Reverend and Noble Clerk Mr. Hector Boeis, Chanon of Aberdene, tranſlated lately be Mr. John Ballenden, Archdene of Murray, and Chanon of Roſſe, at command of James the Fyfte, King of Scottis; imprintet in Edenburgh be Thomas Davidſon, dwelling fornens the Fryere-Wynde. It is printed in the old black letter. He likewiſe tranſlated Boethius's Deſcription of Scotland, to which he prefixed a Poem of his own compoſition, intitled, The Proem to his Coſmography; and another Poem addreſſed to King James V, which he calls The Probem to his Hiſtory (1). Dempſter likewiſe tells us (2), that he publiſh'd Albaniæ Deſcriptio, which Dr. Mackenzie (3) ſuppoſes to be the ſame with his tranſlation of Boethius's Deſcription of Scotland; Letters to King James V, none of which are now thought to be extant (4); Of Virtue and Pleaſure, a Dream; which Dr. Mackenzie ſays is certainly the Proem to the Coſmography, wherein virtue and pleaſure are introduced thus entertaining King James with a Dialogue:

Ane ſilver Fontane ſprang of Watter cleir
Into that place, quhare I approachit neir;
Qu hare I did ſone eſpy ane fellown reird
Of courtly Gallandis in their beſt Maneir,
Rejoyſing them in ſeaſon of the Zeir.
As it had bene of Mayis Day the feird.
Thair gudlie Havingis maid me nocht affeird
With thaym I ſaw an crownit King appeir
With tender Downis riſing on his Beird.
Thir courtly Gallandis ſettand their Intentis
To ſing and play on divers Inſtrumentis,
According to this Princis Appetit.
Two pleſand Ladyis come pranſand oure the Bertis,
Thair coſtlie Cleithin ſchew thair mychty Rentis.
Qukat Hart mycht wis, thay wantit nochtan Myte.
The Rhubies ſhone upon their Fingaris quhite.
And finallie I knew be thair conſentis
This ane Virtue, that other hecht Delite.
Their Goddeſſes arrayit in this wyſe,
As Reverence and Honoure liſt deviſe,
Afore this Prince fell down upon thair Kneis.
Syne dreſſit thaym in thair beſt Avyſe,
(So far as Wiſdome in thair Power lyis)
To do the thing, that mycht him beſt appleis,
Quhare rejoyſit in his Hevenly Gleis,
An him deſyrit for his hie Empryis
Ane of thaym two unto his Lady cheis
And firſt Delite unto this Prince ſaid thus, &c.

(1) Dr. Mackenzie's Lives and Characters, &c. vol. 2. p. 596.

(2) Apud Mackenzie, pag. 599.

(3) Pag. 596.

(4) Idem, ibid.

He wrote likewiſe miſcellaneous Poems, and a Life of Pythagoras the Philoſopher. Mr. Nicholſon in his Scotiſh Library (5) mentioning Ballanden's Tranſlation of Boethius's Hiſtory, tells us, that it was haſtily put into Engliſh by William Harriſon, and printed in the firſt volume of Holinſhead's Chronicle; but that neither of theſe have exactly kept to their text, the former abridging the original, and the latter new modelling even the Tranſlation. And Harriſon ſpeaks thus of his own performance at the end of the thirteenth chapter: "Hitherto have I tranſlated Hector's Deſcription of Scotland out of the Scotiſh into the Engliſh Tongue, "being not a little aided therein by the Latin; from "whence the Tranſlator ſometimes ſwerveth not a "little, as I have done alſo from him, now and then "following the Latin, and now and then gathering "ſuch ſenſe out of both as moſt did ſtand with my "purpoſed brevity. Now will I ſet down the De-"ſcription of an ancient Pict, as I have gathered it "out of Herodian and others; and then I will give "over not only to write more at this preſent, but for "ever of the Sorbonne, and that he was a ſtrenuous oppoſer of the Reformation both by his writings and diſputes; and that Dr. Laing and he concurred in that point.

(5) Pag. 10. edit. London 1702.

" ever hereafter of hiſtorical matters; ſith I ſee that " this honeſt kind of recreation is denied me, and all
" time ſpent about the ſame in theſe days utterly con" demned, as vain and ſavouring of negligence and " Heatheniſh impiety."
T.

BALMIS (ABRAHAM de) a Jewiſh Phyſician, born at Lecci [A] in the Kingdom of Naples, flouriſhed at Venice in the beginning of the XVIth Century. He wrote an Hebrew Grammar [B], which was printed in Hebrew and Latin at Venice by Daniel Bomberg, in the year 1523. He tranſlated into Latin ſeveral Commentaries of Averroes upon Ariſtotle, and ſome Writings of Aven Pace, and wrote himſelf a book De Demonſtratione, and another De Subſtantiâ Orbis. See the Bibliotheca of Geſner, and the Bibliotheca Rabbinica of Bartolocci. I muſt not omit to mention, that he taught in the Univerſity of Padua (a), and that he took much more pleaſure in confuting what others had ſaid, than in eſtabliſhing any thing as certain [C].

(a) Simon, Hiſtoire Critique du Vieux Teſtament, p. 536.

[A] He was born at Lecci.] You will find theſe words in the Bibliotheca of Geſner: Ibidem (1) hic Author natum ſe ſcribit in Litio civitate agri Salentini, quæ à Brunduſio Hydrunto & Graia Gallipoli 24 miliaribus diſtat, eodem in loco ſitâ, ubi olim Rudiæ patria Enuii, ex reliquiis Rudiarum nacta originem (2). I am ſurprized that neither Toppi, nor Leonard Nicodemo make any mention of him in the Biblioteca Napolitana.

(1) That is, in the preface to his tranſlation of the Commentaries of Averroes in Analytica, Topica, &c. Ariſtotelis, printed at Venice in 1523.

(2) Geſner in Bibliotb. fol. 1 verſo.

[B] He wrote an Hebrew Grammar.] He intitled it Mikne Abram, that is, The Poſſeſſion of Abraham. Father Bartholocci is miſtaken, when he ſays that Daniel Bomberg tranſlated it into Latin (3). If he had conſulted the Preface, he would have ſeen that Daniel Bomberg cauſed it to be tranſlated by others. In the firſt place he made uſe of the Author himſelf, and deſired him to tranſlate it word for word. This exactneſs was obſerved for ſome time: the Author afterwards gave himſelf a greater liberty for the ſake of elegance; after his death, Calonymos, who finiſh'd the tranſlation, took infinitely more freedom, which Bomberg did not at all oppoſe (4). This ſhews that de Balmis was not living in the year 1523. Mr. Simon ſays that the tranſlation of this Grammar is word for word, and very barbarous (5); that there is really but little method in this Author, but that he ſhews in other reſpects a great deal of learning, and that he detects in an infinite number of places the errors of the Grammarians, who wrote before him (6). Mr. Huet relates very faithfully what regards the Latin Tranſlation (7). He ſays that Balmis began it, and that Calos Calonymos finiſh'd it; and that the former made it barbarous and more obſcure than the original: but that the latter, by endeavouring to avoid the faults of the other, run into the contrary extreme.

(3) Julius Bartolocius, Bibliotb. magna Rabbin. tom. 1. pag. 34.

(4) See in Bibliotb. Geſner. fol. 1. a fragment of the preface, which informs us of this.

(5) Simon, Hiſt. Critique du Vieux Teſtament, pag. 536.

(6) Ibid. p. 278.

(7) Huet. de claris Interpretibus, pag. 186, 187. Mr. Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 1. num. 724. pag. 206. makes him ſay that this tranſlation was done by an Anonymous perſon.

[C] He took much more pleaſure in confuting . . . than in eſtabliſhing any thing as certain.] Munſter caſts this reproach upon him. Abraham de Balmis, ſays he (8), nihil aliud agere mihi viſus eſt quam veterum doctrinam perpetuò convellere atque impugnare, magis infectando occupatus, quàm in docendo. At in dubium tantum vocare priſcorum præceptiones, cum interim nihil certe ſtatuas, non dicere eſt, ſed ridere.

(8) Munſter in Præf. Grammat. Eliæ, apud Spizelii Felicem Literatum, pag. 958.

BALTHASAR (CHRISTOPHER) was a man of great learning and merit in the XVIIth Century. He applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and it was this application, that gave him a great diſguſt to the Romiſh Religion, and a great deſire to embrace that of the Proteſtants. He had a conſiderable poſt in the Preſidial of Auxerre (a); and as he muſt either reſolve to abandon it, or not change his Religion, he was ſome time perplexed with this alternative; but at laſt his conſcience gained the aſcendant, and obliged him to leave Auxerre, his eſtate, his poſt, his relations, and friends, and go to Charenton, where he publickly joined himſelf to the Reformed Church. He continued in it till his death, and edified his brethren both by his exemplary life, and his diſcourſes. The expence, which he was obliged to be at in Paris, being too great for his circumſtances, and his converſion rendering him too obnoxious in ſuch a city as that, he thought that it was beſt to retire into ſome province; and was extremely pleaſed to find himſelf invited to Caſtres by a rich young Counſellor of the Bipartite Court of the Edict (b), who gave him a lodging in his houſe, and a proper penſion. This Counſellor thought himſelf happy to have with him a man of learning, who by his inſtructions and converſation might teach him a thouſand uſeful points of knowledge. But as Mr. Balthaſar had an inclination to labour for the public, he wiſhed to have all his time at his own diſpoſal, and for that reaſon took his leave of the Counſellor. His deſign was favoured by the National Synod of Loudun in the year 1659; for that Aſſembly granted him a penſion of 750 livres to be paid by all the Churches of France, according to the repartition that was made of them (c). He had prepared before that Synod was held, a conſiderable number of diſſertations upon important ſubjects, againſt Cardinal Baronius (d). He put four or five into the hands of a Miniſter of Caſtres, who was one of the Deputies of the Province of Upper Languedoc, and Upper Guienne. They were preſented to Mr. Daillé, Moderator of that National Synod, and one, who of all the Miniſters was the beſt able to judge of the merit of thoſe pieces. Mr. Daillé was extremely pleaſed with them, and gave a very advantageous character of them to the whole aſſembly. He carried them to Paris, where it was hoped they would be printed; for they were judged to be worth the publiſhing. But the event ſhewed, that proper meaſures were not taken, or could not be taken, for that purpoſe. The author, who was very old, and troubled with the ſtone, died. Mr. Daillé died too; and after that the Church of Caſtres ſent repeated letters to recover thoſe diſſertations, but could not even diſcover what became of them. Mr. Balthaſar left others, which were not finiſhed, and a great many collections, which conſiſted the greateſt part of them of ſeparate pieces of paper, in which he had noted down the authorities and teſtimonies, which he deſigned to make uſe of againſt Cardinal Baronius. It is a pity, that all this ſhould remain

(a) It was that of the King's Advocate.

(b) His name was Mr. de Faur.

(c) It was at the requeſt and upon the good teſtimony of the Synod of Upper Languedoc and Upper Guienne. He enjoyed before a penſion of 300 Livres. See the Acts of the National Synod of Loudun in the Synodicon of Mr. Quick, tom. 2. pag. 572.

(d) He gave them the title of Diatribæ. His work was in Latin.

remain in a cheſt in the poſſeſſion of I know not who (e). Mr. Balthaſar wrote well in Latin: his Panegyric of Mr. Fouquet is in a fine ſtyle. I have ſeen nothing but that of his, and I cannot tell whether he publiſhed any thing elſe. If he had been leſs ſcrupulous about the language, he might have made a greater progreſs in his criticiſm upon Baronius. I am of opinion however that there is ſomething of the hyperbole in what is reported of his ſcrupuloſity about the Latin [A]. I think that is more probable, which is related concerning his credulity with regard to Witchcraft [B].

(e) Taken from a Memorial communicated by Mr. de la Deveze, formerly Miniſter of Caſtres, and at preſent of the Hague.

[A] There is ſomething of the hyperbole in what is reported of his ſcrupuloſity about the Latin.] Among ſeveral pieces which the Abbe de Marolles publiſhed in the latter part of his life, there is one that contains the names of thoſe who had given him their books, or who had honoured him extraordinarily with their civilities. It is there that we find what follows. "Chriſtopher Balthaſar, who had written ſo many collections with his own hand for divers hiſtorical manuſcript Treatiſes. He deſigned to make Animadverſions upon the Annals of Baronius; but he began too late, and had not yet formed his ſtyle, intending beſides to give it too elegant a turn, ſo that he could not write above one entire page of his book in a day, though he was then above ſixty three years of age." If the Abbe de Marolles had mentioned the time which he had in view, we ſhould have known at what age Mr. Balthaſar procured his penſion from the Synod of Loudun.

[B] What is related concerning his credulity with regard to witchcraft.] The ſame Abbot of Marolles ſupplies me with the whole commentary upon this text. The paſſage is pretty long, yet I ſhall not abridge it: what will not ſerve for one thing will ſerve for another. "Let us return now to our cabinet, where in a company of learned men, there happened one day to be Mr. Balthaſar preſent, who is ſo well verſed in the knowledge of Hiſtory, and Mr. de Sorbieres, whoſe affability and learning likewiſe deſerve much commendation; the one, who of a Catholick eſpouſed the pretended reformed Religion (1), and the other, who of a Proteſtant returned to the Catholick Church. Upon which the former being attacked, becauſe it was difficult to comprehend the motives of his change, conſidering his great knowledge and genius, he ſaid, that he was induced to it by the perſuaſion, which he had conceived, that in the other Communion there was more purity and ſimplicity than in ours; that they had reſtored the holy liberty of the Goſpel, under the mild yoke of the faith of our Lord's promiſes; and that they had removed abuſes and ſuperſtition, and placed in the room of them a worſhip conformable to the uſage of the primitive church. The ſeveral parts of his anſwer were conteſted with him; but this proving to no purpoſe, other points were diſcourſed of; and from the ſubject of miracles, the debate came to that of a great many ſtories, which are told about Sorcerers, and various apparitions, which are ſcarce believed even by children. By which it appeared that he, who had teſtified his averſion to ſuperſtition, admitted it in ſome meaſure out of a great credulity with regard to ſuch things as theſe. Beſides having explained himſelf upon the idle conjectures of Aſtrologers, he ſhewed that he paid too great a regard to them, as well as to the predictions of Noſtradamus in his Centuries, than which there is nothing imaginable ſo barbarous. This was the judgment of the whole company, in which were preſent the Abbe Talman (2), who has ſo fine a genius, Mr. Bandelot (3) Abbe de Maiſſai, and the Abbe de Verdus, who are ſo free from popular errors, with Mr. de la Herpiniere of Blois, who is ſo judicious in all his ſentiments, Monſieur de Marſay le Boſſu, Governor of Gien, who knows ſo many good things, and delivers them in ſo noble a manner, and ſome other perſons, whereof one only attempted to maintain the opinion which had been exploded (4)."

(1) The Memoires de l'Abbe de Marolles were printed off the 5th of January 1656. So that Mr. Balthaſar muſt have made his abjuration in 1655 at fartheſt.

(2) He ſhould have ſaid Tallemant.

(3) He ſhould have ſaid Bourdelot.

(4) L'Abbe de Marolles, Memoires, p. 276.

☞BALUZE (STEPHEN) was born at Tulles in the year 1631. He ſhewed when he was very young the ſigns of a very lively genius, and which at the ſame time was capable of proſecuting thoſe ſtudies, that are leaſt agreeable, with an unwearied application. After he had begun his ſtudies at Tulles, he went to Toulouſe to continue them, where he obtain'd an allowance in the College of St. Martial (a). He began then to compoſe ſome of his Works, which afterwards raiſed him a great reputation [A]. In 1656 Mr. de Marca Archbiſhop of Toulouſe invited him to Paris (b); which invitation Mr. Baluze conſidered as a mark of diſtinction, and thought that nothing could be more advantageous to himſelf than to engage in the ſervice of a Prelate of ſuch diſtinguiſhed merit and ſo great intereſt at Court as Mr. de Marca. The

(a) Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 1. pag. 194. edit. de Paris 1727.

(b) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 19. pag. 1. edit. Amſterd. 1715.

[A] Began then to compoſe ſome of his works, which afterwards raiſed him a great reputation.] We ſhall give here a Catalogue of his works. I. Antifrizonius: printed at Toulouſe 1652 in 12mo. This piece is a critique upon the errors of Peter Frizon, a Doctor of Sorbonne, in a work of his intitled, Gallia purpurata, publiſh'd in 1638 (1). II. Diſſertation ſur le temps &c. That is, "A Diſſertation concerning the time when S. Sadroc (in Latin Sacerdos), Biſhop of Limoges lived." Tulles 1655 in 12mo. III. Diſſertatio de Sanctis Claro, Laudo, Ulfardo, Baumado, quorum ſacræ reliquiæ ſervantur in Cathedrali Eccleſia Tutelenſi apud Lemovices: i. e. "A Diſſertation concerning the Relicks of St. Clair, St. Lo, St. Ulfard, and St. Baumade, which are preſerved in the Cathedral of Tulles in the Dioceſe of Limoges:" Tulles 1656 in 8vo, IV. Petri de Marca de Concordia Sacerdotii & Imperii; ſeu de Libertatibus Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ Libri VIII, à Stephano Baluzio emendati: i. e. "Peter de Marca's eight books concerning the Agreement of the Empire and Prieſthood corrected by Stephen Baluze." Paris 1663, 1669, and 1704 in fol. The laſt edition contains ſeveral curious remarks of Mr. Baluze in anſwer to thoſe Writers, who had attacked the ſentiments of Mr. la Marca (2). V. Salviani Maſſilienſis & Vincentii Lirinenſis opera cum Notis: i. e. "The Works of Salvian of Marſeilles and Vincentius Lirinenſis, with Notes:" Paris 1669 and 1684 in 8vo. The laſt edition is the beſt. VI. Servati Lupi Preſbyteri & Abbatis Ferrarienſis Opera: i. e. "The Works of Servatus Lupus Prieſt and Abbot of Ferrieres:" Paris 1664 in 8vo. The difficult paſſages in this Author are explained by the judicious Notes of Mr. Baluze. VII. S. Agobardi Archiepiſcopi Lugdunenſis Opera. Item, Epiſtolæ & Opuſcula Leidradi & Amulonis Arch. Lugd. Notis illuſtrata: i. e. "The Works of St. Agobard Archbiſhop of Lyons; and the Epiſtles and Tracts of Leidradus and Amulo Archbiſhops of Lyons; illuſtrated with Notes:" Paris 1666, two volumes in 8vo. VIII. Concilia Galliæ Narbonenſis cum Notis: i. e. "The Councils of Gallia Narbonenſis with Notes: Paris 1668 in 8vo. IX. S. Cæſarii Arelatenſis Epiſcopi Homiliæ 14, Notis illuſtratæ: i. e. "Fourteen Homilies of St. Ceſarius Biſhop of Arles, illuſtrated with Notes:" Paris 1669 in 8vo. X. Reginonis Abbatis Prumienſis libri duo de Eccleſiaſticis Diſciplinis & Religione Chriſtianâ. Acceſſit Rhabani Archiep. Moguntini Epiſtola ad Heribaldum Epiſc. Antiſſiodorenſem, cum Notis. Paris 1672 in 8vo. This piece contains the Abbot Regino's two Books concerning Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline and the Chriſtian Religion; and the Letter of Rabanus Archbiſhop of Mentz to Heribaldus, with Mr. Baluze's Notes. XI. Ant. Auguſtini Archiep. Tarraconenſis Dialogorum libri duo,

(1) Niceron, ubi ſupra, pag. 200. and Du Pin, Biblioth. tom. 19. pag. 1.

(2) Niceron, p. 200, 201.

The Archbiſhop had the greateſt eſteem for and confidence in him imaginable. But upon his death, which happen'd June 29, 1662, Mr. Baluze was oblig'd to ſeek for another patron. He was agreeably prevented by Mr. le Tellier, afterwards Chancellor of France, who having a deſign to engage him in the ſervice of his ſon the Abbé le Tellier, who was afterwards Archbiſhop of Rheims, made him ſeveral noble preſents, which he always mentioned with the utmoſt gratitude. But divers particular incidents in the mean while preventing the ſucceſs of this affair, Mr. Colbert took the opportunity of Mr. Baluze's want of an employment, and made him his Library-keeper, after he had obtained Mr. le Tellier's leave to accept of that place; in which he continued till Mr. Colbert's death; when not finding the ſame ſatisfaction under the Archbiſhop of Roan, to whom that Library fell, he left that employment. It was to his care and advice, that we owe the excellent collection of Manuſcripts and other Books, which are to be found in that Library (c). In 1670 he was appointed Profeſſor of Canon Law in the Royal College; which Profeſſorſhip was founded by the King upon his account (d). The Abbé Faget in 1668 had publiſhed ſeveral Works of the Archbiſhop de Marca, to whom he was related, and prefixed to them the life of that Prelate, in which he ſaid, that the Archbiſhop at his death had ordered Mr. Baluze to put all his papers into the hands of the Preſident de Marca his ſon. This paſſage raiſed the reſentments of Mr. Baluze, who vindicated himſelf in ſeveral ſevere letters, which he wrote againſt the Abbé Faget. The Abbé's anſwers to them were equally paſſionate, and full of perſonal reflections, that did no honour to either party. Theſe letters were printed in the edition of the Diſſertations publiſhed by the Abbé Faget, and reprinted in Holland in 1669. The public was the more ſurprized at this piece of conduct in Mr. Baluze, becauſe he was remarkable for an eaſy and humane temper, and a very agreeable and polite converſation. He reſolved to continue down to poſterity the memory of his diſpute with the Abbé, by inſerting it into his life of Mr. de Marca, prefixed to his new edition of that Prelate's book De Concordia Sacerdotii & Imperii. In the year 1693 he publiſhed The Lives of the Popes of Avignon; on account of which the King gave him a penſion, and appointed him Director of the Royal College. But he did not long enjoy theſe favours from the Court; for having attached himſelf for ſome time to the Cardinal Bouillon, who had engaged him to write

(c) Niceron, p. 195, 196.

(d) Du Pin, p. 3, 2.

du, de emendatione Gratiani, cum Notis: i. e. "Two "Books of Ant. Auguſtinus Archbiſhop of Tarragon "concerning the Correction of Gratian with Notes:" Paris 1672 in 8vo. XII. Petri Caſtellani Magni Franciæ Eleemoſynarii Vita, Auctore Petro Gallandio, &c. i. e. "The Life of Peter Caſtellanus, Grand "Almoner of France, by Peter Gallandius, now firſt "publiſhed with Notes by Stephen Baluze, who has "added two Sermons of Caſtellanus upon the Fune-"ral of King Francis I." Paris 1674 in 8vo. XIII. Marii Mercatoris Opera cum Notis: i. e. "The Works "of Marius Mercator with Notes." Paris 1684 in 8vo. This work and the preceding are accurately reviſed by the MSS. and illuſtrated with Notes, which ſhew Mr. Baluze's prodigious knowledge in Hiſtory, eſpecially that of the middle Age. XIV. Miſcellanea, hoc eſt, Collectio veterum monumentorum, quæ hactenus latuerunt, in variis codicibus ac bibliothecis: i. e. "Miſ-"cellanies, that is, a Collection of the ancient pieces, "which have hitherto lain concealed in divers Manu-"ſcripts and Libraries:" Paris, ſeven volumes in 8vo. The firſt was publiſhed in 1678, the ſecond in 1679, the third in 1680, the fourth in 1683, the fifth in 1700, the ſixth in 1713, and the ſeventh in 1715. This Collection is very much eſteemed, and contains ſeveral curious pieces. XV. Capitularia Regum Francorum. Additæ ſunt Marculfi Monachi & aliorum formulæ veteres & notæ doctiſſimorum virorum: i. e. "The Capitularies of the Kings of France; to which "are added the old Formularies of Marculfus the "Monk and others, with the Notes of ſeveral learn-"ed men:" Paris 1677, fol. in two volumes (3). This Collection contains ſeveral capitularies never publiſh'd before. Mr. Baluze has corrected them with great accuracy, and has given us an account in his Preface of the original and authority of the ſeveral collections of the Capitularies. The Kings of France held anciently every year a large aſſembly, in which all the public affairs were treated. It was compoſed of all the conſiderable perſons among the Clergy and Laity, Biſhops, Abbots, and Counts. It was in the preſence and by the advice of this Aſſembly, that the Kings made their Conſtitutions, which were read aloud; and after the Aſſembly had given their conſent, every perſon ſubſcribed. Theſe Conſtitutions being abridg'd and reduced under proper heads were called Capitula or Chapters, and a Collection of ſeveral articles was ſtiled a Capitulary. They may be diſtinguiſh'd into three kinds, according to the ſubjects of them. Thoſe, which treat of eccleſiaſtical affairs were generally taken from the Canons, and had the ſanction of the Biſhop's authority, and therefore might be conſidered of the ſame force as the Canons. Thoſe, which contained general regulations in civil affairs, had properly the real force of laws. And thoſe, which related only to certain perſons and certain occaſions, were only to be conſidered as particular regulations. The authority of theſe Capitularies was always very great. They were conſtantly obſerved in the moſt exact manner in all the Empire of the Francs, that is, in almoſt all Europe during the reigns of Charlemagne, Lewis the Debonnaire, and his ſons. The Biſhops tranſcribed them in their Councils, and even the Popes were ambitious to follow them, as appears by a Letter of Leo IV to the Emperor Lotharius, mentioned by Yvo of Chartres and Gratian. They were for a long time in force in Germany as well as in France, and the uſe of them was not interrupted till the beginning of the third race of the Kings of France. Mr. Baluze has added to theſe Capitularies the ancient Formularies of Marculfus; thoſe of an anonymous author; thoſe publiſhed by Father Sirmond and Mr. Bignon; a new Collection of Formularies extracted from divers old Manuſcripts; and thoſe of the promotion of Biſhops publiſh'd by Father Sirmond in the ſecond volume of the Councils of France (4). XVI. Lucii Cæcilii Firmiani Lactantii Liber ad Donatum Confeſſorem de Mortibus perſecutorum; nunc primum prodit opera & ſtudio Stephani Baluzii, cum Notis. i. e. "Lucius Cæcilius Firmianus "Lactantius's Treatiſe addreſſed to Donatus the Con-"feſſor concerning the Deaths of the perſecutors; "now firſt publiſhed by Stephen Baluze with Notes." Paris 1680 in 8vo. The ſecond edition with Notes Variorum, and reviſed by Paul Bauldri, was printed at Utrecht 1692 in 8vo. XVII. Epiſtolarum Innocentii III Pontificis Romani Libri XI. Accedunt Geſta ejuſdem Innocentii &c. i. e. "The Epiſtles of Pope "Innocent III in eleven Books; to which are ad-"ded the Acts of the ſame Pope &c." Paris 1682 in fol. two volumes. This edition is far from being a complete collection of that Pope's Letters; ſince they contain nineteen Books. But Mr. Baluze was refuſed at Rome the communication of thoſe Letters, which are preſerved in the Vatican Library (5). XVIII. Nova Collectio Conciliorum, cum Notis: i. e. "A new "Collection of the Councils, with Notes." Paris 1683 in fol. This Collection contains theſe pieces, which were wanting or defective in Father Labbe's Collection

(3) Idem, pag. 201-203.

(4) Du Pin, p. 2.

(5) Idem, ibid. and Niceron, pag. 203.

write the Hiſtory of his Family, he was involved in his diſgrace, and received a letter de Cachet to retire to Lyons. All that he could obtain in his favour was not to be removed to ſuch a diſtance; ſo that he was ſent firſt to Roan, then to Tours, and afterwards to Orleans. He was recalled upon the peace, but he never could recover his penſion or his Profeſſorſhip and place of Director of the Royal College. Though he lived at a diſtance from Paris, and was then above eighty years of age, yet nothing could interrupt his application to his ſtudies. He was engaged in publiſhing St. Cyprian's Works, an edition of which he had been preparing while he was in baniſhment, when he was ſeized by death the 28th of July 1718, in the 88th year of his age (e). Though we have very little of Mr. Baluze's own compoſition, yet there are few writers, who have done the public greater ſervice than he by collecting from all parts the antient manuſcripts, and publiſhing them with learned notes. Mr. Du Pin obſerves (f), that he was admirably well ſkilled in manuſcripts, titles, and printed books of all kinds; that he wrote well in Latin, and underſtood eccleſiaſtical and profane Hiſtory, and antient and modern Canon Law, and was extremely converſant in the Fathers. The editions which he publiſhed of ſeveral important Works, were corrected by him from a great number of manuſcripts, with prodigious accuracy and application (g). And Mr. de Roque tells us (h), that his notes ſhew a great knowledge in him of the authors of the middle age; and that he explains not only the moſt difficult paſſages and obſcure terms, but likewiſe the moſt conſiderable points of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory and Antiquity. Mr. Sallo likewiſe affirms (i), that he was maſter of a great deal of ſagacity and judgment in the reſtoring the text of authors, and of vaſt penetration and learning in clearing up their difficulties. He kept a correſpondence with all the men of letters in France and other Countries. His converſation was eaſy and agreeable; and old age abated nothing of his vivacity. Though he was born with a very delicate conſtitution, he preſerved an uninterrupted courſe of health by his temperance and regular manner of life. He ſhewed ſomething of caprice in his laſt Will, by making a woman, who was no relation to him, his Executrix, and leaving ſcarce any thing to his family and ſervants (k).

(e) Niceron, p. 190-198. See likewiſe the note upon Baillet's Jugem. des Savans, tom. 2. num. 575. pag. 264. edit. Amſterdam 1725, in 4to.

(f) Pag. 2.

(g) Journal des Savans, du 24 Avril 1677. apud Baillet, ubi ſupra.

(h) Apud Baillet, ibid.

(i) Journal des Savans du 12 Fevrier 1665.

(k) Niceron, p. 198, 199.

BALZAC

tion of Councils. This Collection was to have contained ſeveral volumes; but there was only the firſt publiſh'd; which Mr. Bonardi aſcribes to the bad ſale of it. But we find a more plauſible reaſon in the Notes upon Mr. Arnaud's Letters. We are informed there, that Mr. Colbert having an intention to reward Mr. Martin, who was Tutor to his ſons, procured him a penſion of two thouſand livres upon the Biſhopric of Auxerre; and that this honeſt Eccleſiaſtic refuſing this penſion, becauſe, as he told his patron, he had never done any ſervice to the Dioceſe of Auxerre, and therefore thought he had no right to enjoy ſuch a portion of the revenues of that See, much leſs to receive it as a reward for his temporal ſervices. Mr. Colbert upon this gave half of this penſion to Mr. Baluze; who having occaſion for the aſſiſtance of the See of Rome in that affair, abandoned the deſign, which he had of publiſhing the Acts of the Council of Baſil at large, which had been the particular motive of his undertaking a new Collection of Councils. And thus he left his ſcheme imperfect (5). XIX. Marca Hiſpanica, ſive Limes Hiſpanicus, hoc eſt, Geographica & Hiſtorica Deſcriptio Catalauniæ, Barcinonis, & circumjacentium populorum. Auctore. ill. V. Petro de Marca: i. e. "The "March or Limits of Spain, containing a geographi- "cal and hiſtorical Deſcription of Catalonia, Rouſ- "fillon, and the neighbouring people, by the illuſtrious "Peter de Marca." Paris 1688 in fol. De Marca's death having prevented him from finiſhing the impreſſion of this work, Mr. Baluze out of gratitude to his firſt patron undertook to perfect the edition, and added a fourth book to it, which contains ſeveral very curious things. XX. Petri de Marca Archiepiſcopi Pariſienſis opuſcula nunc primum in lucem edita. i. e. "Tracts "written by Peter de Marca Archbiſhop of Paris, now "firſt publiſhed at Paris 1681 in 8vo." Mr. Baluze had reprinted in the year 1669 ſeveral Diſſertations of that Prelate, which had been publiſhed during his life; but theſe Tracts were never printed before. XXI. Vitæ Paparum Avenionenſium: i. e. "The Lives of the Popes "of Avignon. Paris 1693 in 4to, two vol. This is one of the moſt conſiderable and valuable works, which he publiſhed. In his Preface he attacks theſe authors, who have compared the time of the Reſidence of the Popes at Avignon to the Captivity at Babylon; and he affirms, that the Popes have a right to fix their See where they think proper. He remarks likewiſe, that if the City of Rome has occaſion to complain, that the Popes continued ſo long at Avignon, becauſe that abſence reduced it to the greateſt ſolitude and poverty, the French did not receive any conſiderable advantage from the reſidence of the Popes in their country, ſince the Italians changed their frugality into luxury, and corrupted their innocence and ſimplicity of manners by vices till then unknown to them (6). This paſſage might be one reaſon for putting this book under the cenſure of the Index Expurgatorius (7). XXII. Hiſtoire Genealogique de la Maiſon d'Auvergne &c. i. e. "A Genealogical Hiſtory of the Family of Auvergne, "confirmed by ancient Charters, Titles, Hiſtories, "and other authentic Proofs:" Paris 1708 in fol. two volumes. This work is full of very curious reſearches (8). The Preface to it was publiſhed ſeparately in 4to the ſame year (9). XXIII. Lettre pour ſervir de Réponſe à divers Ecrits &c. i. e. "A Letter in an- "ſwer to divers pieces diſperſed at Paris and at Court "againſt ſome ancient titles, which prove that the "family of Bouillon is deſcended in a direct and male "line from the old Dukes of Guyenne and the Counts "of Auvergne:" Paris 1698 in fol. XXIV. Hiſtoriæ Tutelenſis Libri tres: i. e. "The Hiſtory of Tul- "les in three books:" Paris 1717 in 4to. XXV. Lettres au S. Tournemine ſur l'Edition de S. Cyprien, qu'il prepare: i. e. "A Letter to Father Tournemine "concerning the Edition of St. Cyprian, which he "was preparing." This Letter is inſerted in the Memoirs of Trevoux September 1714, and March 1715. XXVI. Epiſtola ad V. C. Euſebium Renodotum de Vita & Morte Car. du Freſne du Cange: "A Letter to Mr. "Euſebius Renaudot concerning the Life and Death "of Mr. Charles du Freſne du Cange." XXVII. S. Cæcilii Cypriani Epiſcopi Carthaginenſis & Martyris Opera ad MSS. Codices recognita & illuſtrata ſtudio & labore Steph. Baluzii. Abſolvit poſt Baluzium ac Præfationem & vitam S. Cypriani adornavit unus ex Monachis Cong. S. Mauri: i. e. "The Works of St. Cy- "prian Biſhop of Carthage and Martyr reviſed by the "MSS. and illuſtrated by Stephen Baluze; whoſe e- "dition is compleated with a Preface and Life written "by a Monk of the Congregation of St. Maur:" Paris 1726 in fol. Dom Prudent Maran was the editor. XXVIII. In the ſixth volume of the Memoirs of Father des Molets is publiſhed Carmen in Laudem Joan. B. Broſſard, Canonici & Officialis Tutelenſis: i. e. "A "Poem in praiſe of J. B. Broſſard, Canon and Official "of Tulles;" by Mr. Baluze. It is a mere piece of imagination, without any fixt object; and Mr. de la Monnoye has written an ingenious Commentary upon it (10). XXIX. John George Schelhorn has inſerted in his Amœnitates Literariæ, Tom. 8. p. 622. two Letters of Mr. Baluze, one to Frederic Benedict Carpzovius, dated January 1ſt 1680, and the other to John Schilter on the 13th of December 1684. They are very curious, and contain divers particulars relating to learning (11).

T.

(5) Niceron, tom. 10. Part 1. pag. 17. edit. de Paris 1730.

(6) Du Pin, pag. 4.

(7) Niceron, tom. 1. p. 205.

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Idem, tom. 10. Part 1. pag. 17.

(10) Idem, ibid. pag. 18.

(11) Idem, tom. 10. Part 2. pag. 290.

BALZAC, a little country-ſeat in Angoumois upon the river Charante, is famous for having given its name, and been a long time the retirement of one of the moſt eloquent Writers of the ſeventeenth Century [A], the illuſtrious Monſr. De Balzac. His name was John Lewis Guez, and he was the ſon of William Guez, a Gentleman of Languedoc [B], of great merit, who having at firſt attach'd himſelf to Roger de Bellegarde, Mareſchal of France, and Governor of the Marquiſate of Saluces, managed ſeveral affairs with great addreſs. He was not ſix and twenty years old, when he was ſent to the Court of Philibert Emanuel Duke of Savoy, upon important negotiations, in which he ſucceeded extremely well, and gained the eſteem of that Prince. Some time after he was made Governor to the Mareſchal de Bellegarde's ſon. This young Lord was killed in the battle of Coutras in the year 1587 (a). His father died in 1579 (b). So that William Guez having left his two patrons, applied himſelf to the Duke of Epernon, who deſired to have him near himſelf. He did him great ſervices upon ſeveral dangerous occaſions. Henry IV having obſerved the addreſs, probity and firmneſs, which that Gentleman ſhewed in the affairs, for which he was ſent by the Duke of Epernon to Court, would have engaged him in his ſervice (c); but he found him more inclined to a country life, than to that of a court, which his virtue would not eaſily accommodate itſelf to. This worthy Gentleman ſettled in Angoumois, and died there the 20th of September 1650, aged an hundred years [C]. He married a young Lady of the family of Neſmond, with whom he lived ſixty four years in perfect concord (d). He had among other children the famous Monſr. de Balzac, whom I am going to ſpeak of. See the Latin Elogium of William Guez written by Monſr. de Girac, and printed at the end of the Socrate Chrêtien. I have extracted from thence what I have given above, to which I add, I, That William Guez reſembled Father Narni ſo much in his perſon, that the firſt time Monſr. de Balzac ſaw that famous Preacher, he thought his father had diſguiſed himſelf like a Capuchin (e). II, That Dom Peter de St. Romuald, among many other virtues of William Guez, commends the magnificence, which he ſhewed in building the caſtle of Balzac, and his houſe at Angouleme (f). This houſe was adorn'd and enriched with ſuch exquiſite curioſities, particularly paintings and other ornaments, that the Queen Mother, Mary de Medicis, would lodge no where but there during her ſtay at Angouleme. III, That one of his other ſons was called Monſr. de Rouſſines (g): IV, That he had a daughter, whom Monſr. de Balzac mentions often [D].

(a) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Offic. pag. 194.

(b) Ibid.

(c) See the Lettres choiſies de Balzac, p. 364. edit. of Holland.

(d) She lived to the year 1653. See the 12th Letter of Balzac to Conrart, lib. 3.

(e) Balzac, Lettre 27 a Chapelain, liv. 3.

(f) St. Romuald, Threſor Chronol. ad ann. 1627.

(g) Mr. de Balzac wrote to him the 40th Letter of the 8th book.

BALZAC

[A] It is famous for having given its name . . . . . to one of the moſt eloquent Writers of the ſeventeenth Century.] I cannot tell what grounds Moreri had to ſay, that thoſe of the family of Guez bore the name of the Lordſhip of Balſac. I. Firſt, He ſhould have known that it ought to be written Balzac, when we ſpeak of this village; and Balſac, when we ſpeak of the antient family of Balſac d'Entragues (1). He has done quite the contrary. II. Secondly, there was only John Lewis Guez, who had the name of Balzac; his father always bore the name of the family (2); and if after the death of John Lewis, any one of his relations aſſumed the name of Balzac, I do not think it came to Moreri's knowledge. As for what ſome perſons have ſaid, that if Mr. de Balzac had not taken the name of his Lordſhip, his family-name being put before his works would not have had ſuch great ſucceſs in the world; and that if they had been intitled the Letters of Monſieur Guez, people would not have conceived ſo advantageous a notion of them; and that it is ſuppoſed, that the name of Balzac being taken for that of a noble and antient family ſufficiently known, gave him the greater authority (3); this, I ſay, is partly probable, and partly very falſe. It is probable that a name ſo ſimple as that of Guez would have been a prejudice to an Author in the title of a book (4); but it is very falſe that John Lewis Guez put the name of Balzac in the title of his books, in order to avoid ſuch an inconvenience, and to give occaſion to think that they came from ſome great Lord; this is preciſely what Sorel intended by his confuſed and embaraſs'd expreſſions. Once more this is falſe; for John Lewis Guez had taken the name of Balzac before he thought of printing his Letters. I cannot imagine how it came that Mr. Menage, who publiſhed the Poems and Latin Letters of that Author, where we find in the title page, and at the top of every page the name of Joannis Ludovici Guezii Balzacii, ſaid that we there find that of Joannis Ludovici Gueſæi Balzacii (5). I ſhould have ſaid, that the Printer of the Anti-Baillet put Gueſæi inſtead of Gueſii, if I had not ſeen the ſame error in a very correct edition of Mr. Menage's Poems (6).

(1) Sorel, Connoiſſ. des bons Livres, pag. 28. edition of Holland, and Menage, Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 4. have obſerved it.

(2) Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 4.

(3) Sorel, Connoiſſ. des bons Livres, pag. 28. quoted in the Jugem. des Savans, tom. 1. pag. 484.

(4) See the preface to the Nouvelles Lettres contre le Calviniſme de Maimbourg, and in the 22d Letter, pag. 764. a paſſage of the Mercure Galant upon the Lettres du Cheval. d'Her...

(5) Menage, Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 4.

(6) In the Index: this edition is that of Wetſtein at Amſterdam in 1687.

[B] Balzac . . . . . was ſon to William Guez, a Gentleman of Languedoc.] Mr. de Balzac ſometimes repreſents his extraction in a manner, that gives us an high idea of it. He ſays, that thoſe, to whom he had the honour to be related, had founded monaſteries in divers parts of the Kingdom, and that Angouleme and Thoulouſe are proud of the marks which their piety left there (7). He tells us in another place, that the great grandfather of his great great grandfather had three pariſhes in Languedoc preſented to him by the Counteſs Alix (8). Theophile gives us a quite different notion of Mr. de Balzac's family.

(7) Balzac, Oeuvres diverſes, Diſc. 14.

(8) Lettres choiſies, pag. 367.

[C] . . . . . died aged an hundred years.] I make uſe of a round number after Mr. de Girac, whom I have quoted; but I ought to rectify that point a little by means of a letter of Mr. Guez to his ſon, ſigned Guez, and dated the 20th of November 1642 (9). He was then entered into the eighty ninth year of his age; ſo that he was not an hundred years old the 20th of September 1650, which was the day of his death. This Letter is a preſſing exhortation to publiſh ſome of his manuſcripts, eſpecially his Apologies againſt Phyllarchus.

(9) It is in pag. 365 of the Lettres choiſies de Balzac, edition of Holland.

[D] . . . . . He had a daughter, whom Mr. de Balzac mentions often.] She was married to Mr. de Campagnolle, who died a Captain of the Guards at the ſiege of Montauban, and was brother of a brave man, whom Thuanus ſometimes mentions (10). This Captain of the Guards left a ſon, who was killed at the ſiege of Lions (11), and a daughter, who is Madam de CAMPAGNOLLE, mentioned ſometimes in the Letters of Mr. de Balzac (12). He teſtifies a great deal of love for this niece, and gives very good advice concerning her education. See his Lettres choiſies, pag. 157, and his 46th, 47th and 48th Letters of the 7th book in the folio edition. I have found in a Letter of Mr. Coſtar a paſſage which relates to Madam de Campagnolle. At Balzac, ſays he (13), you will ſee a niece, who is beautiful and witty, who diſtinguiſhes extremely well between true gallantry and falſe, and to whom nothing is wanting for you, but to love her a little more. This is what he wrote to Voiture. I have ſeen another book, where there is ſomething which may regard that Lady. We are told there that Langlade (14), one of thoſe whom Cardinal Mazarin employed moſt in ſecret negotiations, had been in love in his own country, before he came to Court, with a Lady of Quality,

(10) See the Latin Poems of Balzac, pag. 112. edit. in 12°.

(11) See the volume of his Letters to Conrart, lib. 5. Letter 3.

(12) See the 67th Letter of the 6th book, and the 42d of the 9th.

(13) See the 29th Letter in the Entretiens de Voiture & de Coſtar, pag. 249.

(14) Galanteries des Rois de France, tom. 2. pag. 239. Bruſſels edition, in 1694.

BALZAC (JOHN LEWIS GUEZ DE) was born at Angoulême in the year 1595 [A]. He gained an extraordinary reputation very early. He had such a prodigious fire of imagination, so much eloquence, and so many uncommon thoughts in the letters which he wrote in his younger years, that those who had seen them were charmed with them, and extolled them every where; by which means, as he was in the service of the Cardinal de la Valette (a), he was soon known to advantage at Court, and so highly esteemed, that Cardinal Richelieu, to whom he wrote several times, did him the honour of answering him in a very obliging manner. This answer was printed with the Letters of Balzac, the first edition of which is in the year 1624. He imagined himself in the ready way to a very great fortune [B]; his Letters had so quick a sale, that several editions of them were published. He was extolled beyond measure, but not with the unanimous consent of all his readers. There rose some persons of a contradictory spirit to oppose him, either out of envy, as it is very probable, or because they discovered the defects in Balzac's writings. These dissensions, after having reigned for some time in companies, became a publick war in 1627, nay one of the most furious wars that ever was seen in that kind. It was opened by a young Monk, who wrote a little book intitled, The Conformity of Mr. de Balzac's eloquence with that of the greatest men in the past and present times. Though this piece was not made publick, yet it passed from hand to hand, as much as if it had been printed; and every body knew that a Feuillant, whose name was lity, who was called Mademoiselle de Campagnol (15). "He did not dare to propose to marry her, but he "had got a promise from her not to marry, assuring "her, that he would acquaint her, when his fortune "would permit him, to make her happy. He entrusted Gourville with his promise to that Lady, "and told him with some regret, that he did not "think he had a sufficient estate to pretend to that "marriage, as he had not in all above forty thousand "crowns. Gourville told him, that this ought not "to trouble him, and that he might go with full assurance, and conclude his marriage, promising to "give him as much more. Langlade went upon "this assurance, and gave a great deal of joy to Mademoiselle de Campagnolle, by shewing her that "he had not forgot her. They were married, and "Langlade returned to Paris with his new spouse, "where they found that Gourville had prepared a "fine house for them, and richly furnished it. He "gave Langlade this valuable furniture, with a great "deal of plate and jewels for his spouse, besides the "forty thousand crowns; and Madam de Parville "(16) took care to shew this country Lady all the "people of figure. This new married couple lived a "long while very happily together."

(a) Sorel, Bibliath. Franç. pag. 121 of the 2d edit.

(15) Ibid. pag. 242.

(16) She was a Mistress of Gourville's.

[A] He was born at Angoulême in the year 1595.] I have not found this in any book, but here is the way which I infer it from two Letters of Balzac. He makes mention in one of these two Letters (1) of the thanks, which he had given to Mr. Spanheim in 1649 for the fine speech, which he had received, and which had restored to him a passion, which 53 years had taken from him. This speech was without doubt the funeral oration for Frederic Henry Prince of Orange: we may suppose, that he received it in the year 1648; for he was not quick in answering it. He was therefore 53 years old in 1648, and consequently born in 1595. In another Letter dated the 15th of October 1637 (2), he speaks of a piece which he wrote when he was seventeen years of age, and says that it was full five and twenty years since he wrote it. So that he was two and forty years old when he wrote that Letter, and consequently he was born in 1595. St. Romuald places his birth in the year 1598; for he was 28 years old, says he, in the year 1626 (3); but he forgot to prove that argument. I must not conceal, that I have found a passage, which proves that Balzac was born in 1596. I shall quote it in the remark [B].

(1) It is the 14th of the 1st book to Conrart: the thanks to Mr. Spanheim is the 19th of the 5th book.

(2) It is the 10th of the 3d book of his Letters to Chapelain.

(3) St. Romuald, Abrege Chron. ad ann. 1598.

A PIECE published by Balzac at 17 years of age.

The little piece, which he composed at the age of seventeen, is well worth a digression. He acknowledges that in making it he committed an error and a folly, and excuses himself in the best manner he can from his youth, and from his having composed it in Holland, without any design to have it published in print (4). He was very much displeased that Heinsius revived that fault of his (5). I have before observed, that this is an inconvenience, to which authors, who are a little famous, are very much exposed: it happens that they have some literary dispute, and this occasions their antagonist to search out very carefully the least errors of their youth, in order to reproach them publickly with them. I am not surprized, that some have thought that Balzac at that time would not have refused to make his fortune in Holland in the profession of an Huguenot. I imagined before I read the piece in dispute, that this was a rash judgment; but I have changed my opinion, since Mr. Minutoli was so kind as to send me a copy of it (6). He has a printed copy from the edition, which Heinsius caused to be published at Leyden in 1638. The title of it is, A Political Discourse upon the State of the United Provinces of the Low-Countries, by J. L. D. B. a Gentleman of France. It is a pamphlet of four or five pages: we find it at the end subscribed, John Lewis de Balzac. The piece is very fine, full of spirit and fine sentiments; but I am very sure that Baudius, who was in a public post at Leyden, and had a pension from Holland, could not have determined so strongly for the justice, with which the States threw off the Government of Philip II, nor have invented such refined compliments to Holland, or such keen invectives against the Spanish Government, or in short such elaborate arguments for liberty of conscience. It is excusable therefore to suspect that the French Gentleman had a mind to sound the affair by this pamphlet; and if the Commonwealth struck with admiration for so fine and well affected a pen, had offered him a good post, the author of 17 years of age would have preferred it to his own Country and the Catholic Religion.

(4) The 10th Letter to Chapelain, lib. 3.

(5) See above the end of the remark [C] of the article of BALDUS.

(6) He is furnished with a prodigious number of pieces of that kind, which he has always been collecting and preserving with great care.

Mr. de Balzac took his voyage to Holland in the year 1612, with Theophile, to whom, if we believe Father Goulu, he did a very ill turn (7), which occasioned the misunderstanding between that Poet and Balzac. The terrible letter, which Theophile published against his fellow-traveller, reproaches him with two or three adventures, which were very shocking. I do not mention, says he, your plundering of authors; Dr. Baudius's son-in-law accuses you of another kind of theft. . . . . I do not repent that I formerly took the sword to revenge you for having been beaten.

(7) Lettres de Phyllarque, Part 1. pag. 257.

[B] He thought himself in the ready way to a very great fortune.] It is a very diverting thing to hear him relate himself the grounds of his great hopes. We may read therefore the second History in his Entretiens (8); it is his own. We find there among other things the proof of what I have said relating to the commendations which were given to his Letters, before they were printed. He tells us that the Bishop of Luçon, being recall'd from his exile (9), caressed him prodigiously, and called him an illustrious person, an uncommon genius, an extraordinary man; and that having invited him one day to dine with him, he said to several Persons of Quality at table, See there is a man, (he was not then above twenty two years of age,) whom we must serve, when it is in our power, and we must begin with an Abbey of ten thousand livres a year. Is it not true that we can scarce make a more promising beginning than this? At Rome they would have lent him money, and laid wagers upon the future advancement of his fortune. And yet matters continued where they were at

(8) Entret. 8. pag. 132. edit. in 12°.

(9) This happened in the year 1618.

was Brother André, was the Author of it [C]. Mr. de Balzac wiſhed to have it publickly refuted, which was done in the Apology, which Ogier publiſhed in 1627 [D]: The General of the Feuillants, whoſe name at that time was Father Goulu, undertook the cauſe of Brother André, and under the name of Phyllarchus (b), wrote two volumes of Letters againſt Balzac in a very paſſionate ſtile, as I ſhall relate in his Article. This diſpute gave occaſion to a great number of books (c), and it was a ſtorm, which ſeemed to threaten deſtruction to Mr. de Balzac, as well from the artifices of his enemies, as becauſe he had given ſome advantage to their cenſures by ſome of his hyperboles, which were extremely inſipid, by his ſallies of vanity, and by ſome particular propoſitions, which were a little dangerous. He let this ſtorm paſs without anſwering his adverſary [E], who (b) That is to ſay the Prince of Leaves, in alluſion to his quality of General of the Feuillants.

(c) Biblioth. Franç. de Sorel, pag. 121. See the article of JAVERSAC.

at firſt. Cardinal Richelieu did not remember what the Biſhop of Luçon had ſaid. This puts me in mind of the following paſſage in the Menagiana: "Monſr. "de Balzac firſt aſpired to a Biſhoprick. He lowered "his pretenſions then to an Abbey; but he ſucceeded "in neither of thoſe deſigns. Nay he wrote in one "of his works, that he ſhould never be an Abbot, "unleſs he founded the Abbey (10)."

(10) Menagiana, pag. 190.

[C] There was publiſhed againſt him a little book . . of which a Feuillant, whoſe name was Brother André, was the Author.] He was of Mans, and afterwards was reconciled to Mr. de Balzac, and went to ſee him at Engoulême (11). Mr. de Balzac treated him very magnificently, and contracted a cordial friendſhip for him, which continued as long he lived (12). He wrote to him ſeveral letters, in which he ſtiles him the Reverend Father Dom André de St. Denys. See particularly one of the Diſſertations printed with the Socrate Chretien, the firſt Entretien, and among his Latin Letters the Poem entitled Iter Speratum, before which is a Letter, wherein Balzac gives an account with great ſatisfaction of the change of this Feuillant, and makes uſe of that fine exclamation of Virgil (13) by way of Parody,

(11) St. Romuald, Continuat. Chronici Ademari, ad ann. 1627.

(12) See his care for Father Andrew's Intereſts in the 17th and 18th Letters of the 4th book to Conrart, written in 1653.

(13) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 12. verſ. 503.

O Superi! tanton' placuit concurrere motu
Æterna poſthac mentes in pace futuras?

"Could Jove be pleas'd to ſee ſuch wars as theſe
"'Twixt Nations, that muſt join in laſting peace?

(14) Pag. 268.

Another Latin Letter, which is before that (14), informs us that Brother André, who according to Voiture's expreſſion, had been the Helena of this war, having heard that Mr. de Balzac was dead, had expreſſed a great deal of ſorrow for it, and extolled him highly. Now ſince after he found that news was falſe, he became a good friend to the Gentleman ſuppoſed to be deceaſed, he ſhewed that he was not of the ſame temper of mind that Horace expreſſes:

Virtutem incolumem odimus,
Sublatam ex oculis quærimus invidi (15).

(15) Horat. Od. 24. lib. 3.

——— "With envious eyes we view
"Merit, when preſent, but lament too late
"The bleſſing when remov'd."

We muſt not forget this circumſtance, that as ſoon as this Monk, who was then Prior of the Convent of St. Mémin near Orleans, heard of the dangerous ſickneſs of Mr. de Balzac, he called all his Monks together, that they might pray with him to God for his recovery (16). The latter being recovered gave to the altar of their church a perfuming-pan of four hundred livres value, and a yearly revenue to ſupply it continually with perfumes. If Moreri had mentioned the evident tokens, which Mr. de Balzac gave of his ſincerity, in his Reconciliation with Brother André and Father Garaſſe, we ſhould not have found the following paſſage of his Dictionary ſo void of judgment. He was conſidered at firſt as one of the moſt eloquent men in France. This reputation raiſed the envy of ſome perſons againſt him, and the diſpute is well known, which he had about the year 1627 with Father Goulu General of the Feuillants and others. Notwithſtanding this the world is ſufficiently perſuaded of the ſincerity and generoſity of Mr. de Balzac, who died in a very Chriſtian manner as he had lived. What a ſtrange tranſition is here from 1627 to 1654 in ſo few lines? And then, to what purpoſe does he mention his ſincerity and generoſity, which all the world was notwithſtanding perſuaded of? Was that the point in hand? The buſineſs was to know whether Balzac was a good, eloquent, and orthodox Writer.

(16) Preface to Oeuvres de Balzac, and Relation de ſa Mort.

[D] . . . . This piece was refuted . . . in the Apology, which Ogier publiſhed in 1627.] There are different accounts of the true Author of that work. Some have thought that he, who fathered it, was really the Author of it; others, that he only lent his name to a work, which was written by Mr. Balzac himſelf. Mr. Menage ſpeaks of it as follows: The Prior Oger (α) anſwered theſe books of Father Goulu againſt Mr. de Balzac, in a book intitled, THE APOLOGY OF MR. DE BALZAC (17), which is written with ſome learning and elegance; but Mr. Oger furniſhed only the learning of it. All the elegance is due to Mr. de Balzac. I have been told this ſeveral times by Mr. de Racan, and Mr. de Comberville, who ſaw Mr. de Balzac employed in that work; and I have read likewiſe, that Mr. de Balzac ſpeaking of that work, ſaid that he was the Father, and Oger only the God-Father; that he had furniſh'd the ſilk, and Oger only the Canvas (18). It is probable, that becauſe it was reported thus publicly, the Sieur de la Motte-Aigron was apprehenſive of the ſame fate; and endeavoured to prevent it by declaring in the Preface to his Anſwer to Phillarchus, that the account, which he had received from divers parts, that they would give his book a maſter, obliged him to acquaint all his readers, that there was no Roger there, who fought under the arms of Leo; that he had not the complaiſance of thoſe, who ſuffer others to provide them children; that he could not bear that others ſhould write his books for him; and that with reſpect to the compoſition of his work, his friends were as much ſtrangers to him, as thoſe who lived in the furtheſt parts of the world. He tells us in the ſame place, that his Preface to Balzac's Letters, had been falſly aſcribed to others beſides himſelf. We ſhall ſee this at large in his article (19).

(17) I ſhall ſhew in the remark [F] of the article of Father GOULU, that Mr. Menage is miſtaken in ſaying that the Apology publiſhed by the Prior Oger, was an anſwer to the books of Father Goulu.

(18) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 252.

(19) See the remark [D] of the article MOTTE-AIGRON.

§ (α). It ſhould be Ogier. He was brother to Charles Ogier, who ſhall be mentioned hereafter; and he wrote Actions Publiques in two volumes, The Apology of Mr. de Balzac, and a Funeral Oration for Philip IV, King of Spain. This piece is an excellent one, according to Sorel in his Bibliotheque Françoiſe. Coſtar, Vol. II. pag. 48 of his Letters, addreſſes his ſeventeenth Letter to the Abbot Oger. He ſhould have ſaid Ogier. CRIT. REM.]

[E] He let the ſtorm, which was raiſed againſt him by Father Goulu, paſs, without anſwering his adverſary.] I own that he took his pen in hand at that time to compoſe his Relation to Menander; but that work was not printed till a long while after. We find the reaſon of that conduct in the following words of the XXIIId Conference of Balzac. You may remember the cruel perſecution, which was raiſed againſt me above twenty years ago. At that time, an Angel from Heaven would not have been heard, if he had come down to plead my cauſe. The cabal was too ſtrong and too paſſionate, to wait for a right judgment from the Public. But thanks to Heaven, the ſtorm ceaſed, and a calm ſucceeded the tempeſt. Things having changed their appearance, it is to be hoped that right will alſo reſume its proper place. The Author being then ſollicited again to publiſh his Defence, he agreed to it. Menander, to whom he addreſſed his Relation, is Mainard (20). Tho' this Relation is accompanied with a Defence of ſome of the paſſages, which Father Goulu had criticized, yet it is rather a general anſwer, than a continued and compleat confutation of the two volumes of Phyllarchus. Balzac juſtifies likewiſe ſome paſſages, which a Doctor who dying in the beginning of the year 1629 reſtored to him a ſtate of tranquillity. The public began to recover from the prejudices, which they had received againſt Mr. de Balzac; who taking advantage of his diſgrace, and much more for the little ſucceſs of his Prince [F], ſettled himſelf at his country-ſeat, where he not only refined his genius and ſtyle, but even his heart, and preſerved there, by his correſpondence by letters [G], and by the writings, which he publiſhed from time to time, the reputation of a perſon of very great merit, and the fineſt writer in France. However it muſt be owned, his ſtyle is too much laboured, and the turn of his ſentiments is ſometimes too affected, and ſcarce ever natural enough; but though his letters have not that eaſy air, and happy ſprightlineſs, which ſhines through thoſe of Voiture, yet they have a great many charms, and a certain lively and ſerious Gaiety, which is almoſt inimitable [H]. We ſee likewiſe in all his writings ſeveral ſtrokes of learning well choſen and well applied. In ſhort, we cannot ſufficiently admire, conſidering the ſtate, in which he found the French tongue, how Doctor of Louvain, and a Doctor of Bezancon has criticiz'd (21). I find ſomething wrong in his calculation. It appears from his XXVIIth Conference, that he did not determine to publiſh his Apologies till above twenty years after the perſecution, which Phyllarchus raiſed againſt him. And yet it is very certain, that the volume of his Oeuvres diverſes, of which his Diſcourſe to Menander is a conſiderable part, was printed in 1645; and that his Bookſeller acquaints us there, that the Author could not refuſe the publication of them, upon the repeated inſtances of his father, who was then 91 years old. If we compare with this Advertiſement to the Reader the Letter of Mr. Guez, which I mentioned in the remark [C] of the preceding article, we ſhall find that the reſolution of printing the Apologies againſt Phyllarchus was taken in the year 1644: How can this be reconciled with the XXVIIth Conference?

(20) Menage, Remarques ſur Ayrault, p. 252.

(21) See the pieces which are after the Socrate Chretien.

[F] He took the advantage of the little ſucceſs of his Prince.] The Author's friends had promiſed that work as a maſter-piece, which would ſilence all the Critics, and eſpecially thoſe, who accuſed Mr. Balzac of being able to write nothing but Letters. The event was not anſwerable to theſe expectations: the book was of no advantage either to the reputation or fortune of Balzac, and raiſed him trouble from the Sorbonne. Tho' the Marquis of Aytona cauſed it to be burnt at Bruſſels (22), yet it was mentioned with the utmoſt contempt in an anſwer of the Abbé de St. Germain, and repreſented as a book, which had been ſuppreſſed by the cenſure of the Doctors, and the ſentence of the Judges a month after its birth. Mr. Peliſſon relates, that in 1638 Balzac read to the French Academy ſome part of his Prince, which he then called the Miniſter of State (23). This would ſeem to intimate, that at firſt he had only a deſign to write an Elogium upon the Cardinal. But it appears that Mr. Peliſſon was miſtaken. The Prince was printed in 1631. It was to have been followed by two other books, the latter of which was called the Miniſter of State. Some are of opinion that in his Prince he has been more profuſe of his compliments to the Cardinal than to the King; (ſee page 37 of the XVth volume of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle;) but this is a miſtake. We find in the VIIIth book of his Letters that, which the Sorbonne wrote to him, to acquaint him, that they were ſatisfied with his offers to alter himſelf what they had found worthy of cenſure. The Latin Letter, which he wrote to a Father of the Chriſtian Doctrine, concerning theſe proceedings of the Sorbonne, is an admirable one. It is in page 187 of his Epiſtolæ Selectæ, in the Paris edition in 1651 in 12mo. We may obſerve, that ſome perſons have affirmed this work to be one of the beſt of that Author's writings. It is thus, Sir, that you have practis'd it in your Prince, and in your relations to Menander, which are the two great miracles of your art, and the utmoſt efforts of heroic eloquence. Thus Coſtar ſpeaks in his Defence of Voiture. Mr. Richelet, in his Remarks upon Letters, ſays that the Prince and Ariſtippus are the two moſt elegant pieces of Balzac (24). If we may judge of the merit of Balzac's Prince by the number of editions, we cannot but form an advantageous judgment of it; "At firſt there were two e-"ditions in 4to, which were publiſhed at the ſame "time; there was another of the ſame form, but in "a ſmaller character, and full of errors, printed, I "think, at Niort or Poitiers. After this, there was "one in 8vo, which was pretty good, tho' pirated. "Then came out that of Bouillerot, in 8vo too, but "corrected; and at laſt the edition of Courbé in "12mo." This is taken from a Letter, which Mr. du Rondel did me the honour to write to me the 10th of May 1698. I ſhall give another extract from it. I bought a little while ago, ſays he, the firſt edition of the PRINCE, where I found with inexpreſſible pleaſure what Mr. Balzac wrote, which was afterwards alter'd and retrenched; and this was the firſt time that I conceived what Scaliger meant by his DETRAHENDO FECIT AUCTIOREM. Balzac by cutting off five or ſix places, has removed the languidneſs, and inſpirited the weakneſs, which appeared before; he has added new ſtrength to his performance, and ſeized the attention of the reader, which was going to relax. I make uſe of an edition in 4to of the year 1632: the place where it was printed is not marked, but without doubt it is that of Roan. I have ſeen one in ſmall octavo, printed at Paris, by Touſſaint du Bray in 1632. I find in the title-page, the ſecond edition corrected. Mr. Perrault, who has ſo highly extolled the Ariſtippus of Balzac (25), has ſaid nothing in commendation of the Prince. He ſays only that this work was publiſhed after his Oeuvres diverſes. He will not be diſpleaſed, I am ſure, with my obſerving that he is miſtaken. The Oeuvres diverſes did not appear till a long while after the Prince (26). I ſhall conclude with a paſſage of Gabriel Naudæus: Quibus omnibus velut coronidem acceſſiſſe ferunt Balſaci, Viri Clariſſimi, Principem, Gallicâ modo pumice diligenter expolitum. Verum enim vero, quoniam ipſe liber poſt meum è Galliâ diſceſſum typis fuit demandatus, ut propterea nondum in manus meas pervenerit; variâque, ut audio, & prorſus ancipiti judiciorum aleâ fuit exceptus; hoc ſolum de illo pronunciare poſſum, quod fuit ab antiquis in ſimili occaſione ex formulâ uſurpatum, Non liquet (27).

(22) Balzac, Lett. 43. lib. 8. Entret. 13. pag. 182.

(23) Hiſt. de l'Academ. Franç. pag. 221. and 167.

(24) Richelet. Lettres, &c. pag. 97.

(25) Perrault, Hommes Illuſtres, pag. 176.

(26) The privilege for printing the Prince is dated the 18th of September 1631, and the Approbation is dated the 3d of October following. The Oeuvres diverſes were printed in the year 1645.

(27) Naudæus, Bibliograph. Polit. pag. 47.

[G] His correſpondence by Letters.] This correſpondence of his was ſo very extenſive, that Mr. de Balzac was overburdened by it; for beſides that he wrote with prodigious pains, he knew that his Letters would be ſhewed, and ſo there was a neceſſity for their being very perfect. Here is the manner, in which he deſcribed his condition in that reſpect. He is the But of all the bad compliments in Chriſtendom, to ſay nothing of the good ones, which give him ſtill more trouble. He is perſecuted, he is tired out with the civilities, which come to him from the four quarters of the world, and he had laſt night upon the table in his chamber fifty letters, which required anſwers, nay and eloquent anſwers too, ſuch anſwers, as are fit to be ſhewn, to be copied, to be printed . . . . (28). At this time that I am ſpeaking to you, ſays he in another place, (29), there are upon my table a century of letters, which wait for anſwers; I owe ſome even to crowned Heads. As he was the firſt in France, who raiſed himſelf a great name for this kind of writing, he obtained the title of the Great Epiſtolizer, and he ſometimes aſſumed it himſelf; Sciat ſe dignum fuiſſe invidia magni Franciæ Epiſtolarii (30). The firſt Letters, which he publiſhed, are not near ſo valuable as thoſe, which he wrote after his retirement; and yet the latter had not a quarter the ſale of the others. Sorel had reaſon to make this remark (31); and the Critic upon Maimbourg was not wrong in repeating it (32). We may judge from thence of the caprice and humour of the Public.

(28) Balzac. Entret. 7.

(29) Letter 7 of the 5th book in the vol. to Conrart. See likewiſe his Lettres choiſies, pag. 15. and his Letters to Chapelain, p. 81. of the Dutch edition.

(30) Epiſt. ſelect. pag. 288.

(31) Sorel, Biblioth. Franc. pag. 135.

(32) Preface to the Nouvelles Lettres ſur le Calviniſme de Maimbourg.

[H] His Letters . . . . . have . . . a certain, lively and ſerious gaiety, which is almoſt inimitable.] Let us hear what Richelet ſays. Balzac, ſays he (33), does

(33) Richelet, Lettres, pag. 81, 82.

how he could trace out ſo noble a path to neatneſs of ſtyle. We muſt not think it ſtrange, that his writings ſavour of labour. Elevation and grandeur were his principal character; which cannot be attained without meditation. It is very probable that future ages will do him juſtice for the diſcredit in which ſome criticks have kept his works for a long time; and yet even this has not prevented a great many excellent judges from perſiſting ſtill in their firſt admiration (d). He was a good Latin Poet, and his Latin Letters ſhew that he wrote in that language with a great deal of delicacy. If he had a great many enemies, who wrote againſt him [I], he had on the other hand a very great number of friends and admirers (e); and there were but few perſons of merit, either French or foreigners, who travelled through France without doing themſelves the pleaſure of going to ſee him [K]. He was one of the forty members of the French Academy [L]. Cardinal Mazarin endeavoured to bring him back to Court (f). Queen Chriſtina was very kind to him, and deſired to have letters from him (g). The greateſt Noblemen of the Kingdom gave him in his Deſert (h) many tokens of their eſteem (i). That, which was moſt excellent in him was, that he lived in his retirement, and died there not only as a good Chriſtian.

(d) See what Mr. Menage ſays of Mr. de Balzac's Eloquence, Menagiana, pag. 112, 113, 114. See likewiſe Mr. Perrault in the Elogium of Mr. de Balzac.

(e) The great Des Cartes had a prodigious affection and eſteem for him. See his Life by Mr. Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 139, & ſeq.

(f) See the 1ſt Letter of Balzac to that Cardinal, in his volume of Letters to Conrart.

(g) See the 11th Letter to Conrart, lib. 3. and ſeveral others in that volume.

(h) Thus he was pleaſed to call the place of his reſidence.

(i) This appears from an hundred paſſages of his Letters.

does not make even a complaint, which has not in it ſomething ingenious, new and eloquent.... He had an agreeable and ingenious melancholy: it appears in his Letters, and he never ſpeaks without touching the heart with pleaſure, and infuſing joy. There is a certain melancholy in him, which is full of charms, and which is preferable to all the gaiety in the world.

[I] He had a great many enemies, who wrote againſt him.] The Chancellor Seguier, having refuſed to permit the publication of a book written againſt Balzac in 1636, received a little after a letter from this Author (34), in which we find theſe words: As long as there are none but theſe pen-gladiators, who beg the ſeal of your authority, be not ſparing of the favours of the King, and relax a little of your uſual rigour. If it were a new thing, perhaps I ſhould be contented to have the firſt libel, which branded me with reproaches, ſuppreſſed; but ſince there is now a pretty Library of them, I am well pleaſed that it ſhould be enlarged, and take delight to raiſe myſelf a monument of thoſe ſtones, which envy has thrown at me, without doing me any harm. We may reckon among thoſe, who wrote againſt him, beſides thoſe whom I have mentioned, Daniel Heinſius, who replied to Balzac's Criticiſm upon his Herodes Infanticida with ſomething of warmth and aſperity. See upon this ſubject Balzac's XXXVth Conference, and the XXVth Letter of his firſt Book to Chapelain, and the XXth of the ſecond Book. Salmaſius, an enemy of Heinſius, and a friend of Balzac, wrote upon that diſpute, and adjudged the victory to his friend; but a Miniſter of Languedoc, whoſe name was Croi (35), attacked Balzac in defence of Heinſius; and yet a little after he wrote very ſeverely againſt Heinſius; it is true it was upon different ſubjects. We may likewiſe reckon Nicholas Borbon of the French Academy. See what the Author of the Hiſtory of the Academy ſays upon that point (36). We muſt not omit Coſtar, who imagining that Balzac had out of jealouſy engaged Mr. de Girac to criticize upon Voiture, addreſſed to him his Defence of Voiture, and filled it with a great many keen railleries. The blow was felt, and the affair broke out afterwards into an open war. Coſtar threw off the maſk entirely. See the reproaches of Mr. Girard againſt him in the Preface to the Entretiens of Balzac. We find in the Menagiana ſome facts which may be introduced here very properly. Mr. de Balzac, after he had obliged Mr. de Girac to write in Latin againſt Voiture's Letters, engaged likewiſe Mr. Coſtar to undertake the Defence of Voiture, and to write againſt Mr. de Girac: this was with a deſign to draw the praiſes of both parties upon himſelf. I paſſed thro' Mans in my return to Paris at the time when the DEFENCE was finiſhed. Mr. Coſtar gave me two copies of it, one to be ſent to Mr. du Pincheſne nephew to Mr. du Voiture, and the other to Mr. Conrart. He told me, that he would readily ſubmit to all the alterations, which ſhould be made in it, either by adding, or retrenching. One of the copies was communicated to Mr. Balzac, who ſent ſome corrections; in the mean while the work was printed. And becauſe his corrections came when the impreſſion was finiſhed, he had word ſent him, that they were come too late; and the book was publiſhed without them, with which he was a little diſpleaſed (37). I omit the ſevere expreſſions, which are uſed concerning Balzac in the Hexameron ruſtique. See the Complaint of Mr. Menage, on account of his being introduced as ſpeaking againſt Mr. Balzac (38). I omit alſo what paſſed between Mr. du Moulin and him; but that was only a light ſkirmiſh of controverſy, in which both parties were complimented. There were other diſputes proceeded from it, which were more violent (39); but as far as I can remember, Balzac only received this little blow in it; Vir ingenio compto & Gallicæ eloquentiæ laude clarus Balzacus, ſed in religionis negotio pluſquam infans. That is, "Balzac, a man of a polite genius, and famous for "his eloquence in the French language; but in points "of Religion more ignorant than a child." It was Mr. du Moulin, who ſays this of him, in his preliminary epiſtle to his anſwer to Petra-ſancta. This inſult of his was pretended not to be taken notice of; ſee the XIth Letter of the IId Book to Chapelain. I ſhould be too prolix, if I were to mention one de Vaux (40), and all the other adverſaries of Balzac.

(34) It is the 43d of the 3d book of the 2d part of his Lettres choiſies.

(35) It is he, who is the Author of the anonymous Anſwer to Balzac's Letter and Diſcourſe upon Heinſius's Tragedy intitled Herodes Infanticida, which anſwer was printed at Geneva (tho' the title does not mention it) in 1642.

(36) Pag. 269. edit. of 1672. See likewiſe the 28th and 36th Letter of the 2d book to Chapelain.

(37) Menagiana, pag. 166, 167.

(38) Ibid. pag. 323.

(39) The Jeſuit Silveſter à Petra-Sancta, having written very ſeverely againſt du Moulin's anſwer to Balzac, he was treated in the ſame manner by du Moulin and Rivet.

[K] There were but few perſons.... who... did not do themſelves the pleaſure of going to ſee him.] This was a trouble to him, as appears from theſe words of his ſeventh Conference: There come hither troubleſome perſons ſometimes from above an hundred leagues diſtance, on purpoſe, if they may be believed; who give him a death's wound, by telling him for their firſt compliment, that his great reputation, and the glory which he gives to the place, where he reſides, obliged them to come and ſee a perſon ſo well known, and a village ſo renowned; and that he muſt not take it amiſs that they have indulged ſo juſt and obliging a curioſity as that. One of theſe curious Gentlemen began a few days ago his ſpeech with, the reſpect and veneration which he always had for him, and for the Gentlemen [Meſſieurs] his books. There is nothing more true than this, and you may perceive from it how far the ſtyle of compliments may be carried. They were not only Men of Letters who went to ſee him, but Noblemen likewiſe; and if I am not miſtaken, the Count de Pigneranda did him that honour, when he paſſed through that country in his return to Spain. Mr. Balzac tells us with pleaſure, that this Count reproached him for the warm zeal which he ſhewed in his writing in defence of the honour of France. He informs us of this in a Letter, in which he confutes a rumour that was ſpread about, that he had written a manifeſto for the Prince of Condé in 1651 (41).

(40) He publiſhed the Tombeau de l'Orateur François.

(41) It is printed at the end of the Socrate Chrétien.

[L] He was one of the forty members of the French Academy.] Mr. Peliſſon having ſaid agreeably to the Regiſters of the Academy, that on the 13th day of May 1634 Mr. Boiſrobert ſhewed a letter, which he wrote of his own motion to Mr. Balzac, to let him know, that if he would acquaint the Society by letter that he deſired to be admitted a Member, they would readily grant it him; Mr. Peliſſon, I ſay, having ſaid this, adds, that he did not find in the Regiſter what followed; but that without doubt Mr. Balzac upon his anſwer was admitted a little while after into the Academy (42). Mr. Balzac did not find that Mr. Peliſſon was a faithful Hiſtorian in this; he owns that Mr. Boiſrobert had adviſed him ſeveral times to pay a compliment in writing to the Academy, and even threatned him from the Cardinal, if that compliment was not ſent; but he affirms, that he never gave any anſwer, and that about five or ſix months after he was informed that he was made a Member of the Academy, and that his name was ſeen in the Sun of honeſt

(42) Hiſt. de l'Acad. pag. 221.

Chriſtian. He ſet apart even in his life-time eight thouſand crowns of his eſtate, to be diſtributed to pious uſes (k). He ordered two chambers to be built for him in the Convent of Capuchins at Angoulême (M], and very often lodg'd there (l). It was there that he wrote his Chriſtian Socrates. He ſaid a great many fine things upon his death-bed, and ordered by his laſt Will, that he ſhould be interred at Angoulême in the hoſpital of Notre Dame des Anges, at the feet of the poor, who were buried there (m). He bequeathed twelve thouſand livres to this Hoſpital, and left an eſtate of an hundred francs per annum, to be employed every two years for a prize to him, who in the judgment of the French Academy ſhould write the beſt diſcourſes upon a ſubject of religion (n). He died the 18th of February 1654 [N]. The Sieur Moriſcet, Canon of Angoulême, made his Funeral Oration; and another Moriſcet, brother to the former, and Advocate in the Preſidial of the ſame city, publiſhed a diſcourſe in praiſe of the deceaſed (o). An edition of all Mr. Balzac's works was publiſhed at Paris in 1665 in two volumes in folio, with a preface of the Abbé Caſſagnes of the French Academy. See the Hommes Illuſtres of Mr. Perrault, where you will find the elogium of John Lewis Guez.

(k) Epiſtle Preliminary of the Entretiens de Balzac.

(l) Moriſcet's Relation concerning his death.

(m) Saint Romuald, Abregé Chronol. ad ann. 1654.

(n) This was not begun to be put in execution till the year 1675. See Hiſt. de l'Academie Franc. 2d edit. p. 555.

(o) Saint Romuald, Abrege Chronol. ad ann. 1654.

honeſt Mr. la Peyre (43). From whence he concludes, that if a letter was preſented to the Academy in his name, it was a forged one. This is what he wrote to Mr. Conrart the 22d of September 1653. We cannot tell what explanation he received upon that point; but we find by a letter of the third of November the ſame year, that this explanation had undeceived him. One would almoſt ſuſpect that Mr. Conrart wrote to him, that he had ſeen the original of his compliment; from whence we may conclude that even the greateſt genius's ſometimes forget the Letters, which they wrote ſome years before. What is certain is, that Mr. Balzac conſidered himſelf as a good and true Member of the Academy; for the Regiſter of the 14th of April 1636 teſtifies that he read to the Academy ſome part of his Prince (44), and it has been proved from his printed Letters, that he ſent to Monſr. du Chatelet ſeveral of his works, deſiring him to read them to the Academy, and to accompany them with ſome of his expreſſions, which would ſerve (he ſaid) not only inſtead of the thanks, but likewiſe of the ſpeech which he owed them (45). He had juſt before ſaid, that the honour which the Academy had done him in admitting him into their Body, without obliging him to go to Paris, were two ſingular favours which he had received of them at the ſame time. I recollect two paſſages in his Letters, in which he acknowledges the Gentlemen of the Academy for his brethren. The firſt is in page 16 of his Lettres Choiſies, and the latter in page 95 of his Letters to Chapelain.

(43) La Peyre dedicated in the year 1635 his book de l'Eclairciſſement des Tems to the Academy with this title, To the Eminent. He added there the Cardinal's picture, with a crown of Rays round it, each of which was marked with the name of a Member of the Academy. Hiſt. de l'Acad. pag. 195.

(44) Hiſt. de l'Acad. p. 221.

(45) Ibid. pag. 106.

[M] He built for himſelf two chambers in the Convent of the Capuchins at Angoulême.] I have read no where but in the Menagiana, that he had a deſign to take the habit of that Order. "Mr. Bal- "zac was engaged ſo deeply in devotion, that he en- "tered into a Convent of Capuchins, where he had a "mind to take upon him the habit. However he "did not die there (46)." Perhaps he deſired like a great many other perſons to die in the habit of St. Francis.

(46) Menagiana, pag. 238.

[N] He died the 18th of February 1654.] The liſt of the Members of the Academy, printed at the end of the ſecond edition of the Hiſtory of the Academy, makes Mr. Balzac live till the year 1657, ſince that year it mentions Hardouin de Peréfixe, Archbiſhop of Paris, for his ſucceſſor. On the contrary the liſt of the Members who were deceaſed, printed at the end of The State of France in 1680, makes Mr. Balzac die a conſiderable time before the year 1654, ſince it places him before Baro and Baudouin, who died before the year 1651. If Mr. Peliſſon had had the care of the ſecond edition of the Hiſtory of the Academy, we ſhould not have found in the liſt the two errors, which I have mentioned; one of which regards the time, when Mr. Balzac died, the other the perſon, who ſucceeded him, who was not Mr. Perefixe. Beſides Mr. Perefixe was not Archbiſhop of Paris in the year 1657. But Mr. Peliſſon had no concern in all this. Mr. Baillet, who without doubt believed the contrary, is very excuſeable in imagining, that upon ſuch an authority he might place Mr. Balzac's death in the year 1657 (47). With reſpect to the day of his death, it was the 28th of February, according to Moreri, St. Romuald (48), Henningus de Witte (49), Mr. Perrault, and ſeveral others. But the perſons whom I have conſulted have anſwered me, that it was the 19th of February, according to the contract made with the French Academy concerning the eſtate, which Balzac had left, and according to a manuſcript letter of the Sieur Moriſcet. In ſhort it was the 18th of February, if we regard theſe two things; one is, that in the preface to Balzac's works we are aſſured that the relation of his death was written the day following; the other is, that this relation is dated the 19th of February 1654.

(47) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poetes, tom. 4. num. 1487.

(48) In the index of his Journal Chronol. printed in 1664; for he ſays nothing of Balzac under the 28th of February.

(49) Diar. Biograph. ad ann. 1654.

BANCK (LAURENCE) born at Norcopin in Sweden, was Profeſſor of Civil Law in the Univerſity of Franeker for fifteen years (a). While he lived there as a ſcholar he had raiſed himſelf a conſiderable character; ſo that upon his return from his travels in France, Italy, Spain, &c. he had the Profeſſorſhip of Civil Law given him with a good ſtipend (b). He died the 13th of October 1662 (c). I ſhall ſpeak below of his Works [A], and particularly of an edition, which he procured of the famous book of The Tax of the Roman Chancery [B]. This is a work remarkable enough to deſerve ſome mention of, and (a) Witte, Diarium Biograph. ad ann. 1662.

(b) Banckius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Taxæ Cancellariæ Romanæ.

(c) Witte, Diar. Biogr. ad ann. 1662.

[A] I ſhall ſpeak below of his works.] He publiſhed at Franeker in 1649 a book intitled de Tyrannide Papæ in Reges & Principes Chriſtianos. Seven years after he publiſhed Romæ triumphans, ſeu Inauguratio Innocentii X. With regard to his writings de Bancæ Ruptoribus; de Duellis; de Conſiliis & Conſiliariis Principum, &c. (1), I cannot tell the date of them.

(1) Witte, Diar. Biogr. ad ann. 1662.

[B] .... and of an edition which he procured of the Tax of the Roman Chancery.] I have mentioned in another place (2) ſeveral things relating to this Tax, and particularly of the edition which Pinet procured of it in the year 1564. I have obſerved likewiſe that D'Aubigne quotes the edition of Paris of 1520. That was not the firſt as ſome have imagined; for the edition of Bois-le-Duc in 1664 (3) informs me, that this book was printed at Rome in 1514, and at Cologne (4) in 1515: and that it was intitled Regule, Conſtitutiones, Reſervationis Cancellarie S. Domini noſtri Leonis Pape decimi, noviter edite & publicate, per Marcellum Silber alias Franck, Romæ, in Campo Flore, Anno MDXIV die xviii Novembris impreſſe, finiunt feliciter. This is what is teſtified by the two Echevins of Bois-le-Duc, who, with the Secretary of the City, had collated word for word this edition of Rome with that, which Stephen du Mont, Bookſeller of Bois-le-Duc, publiſhed in the year 1664, and which is intitled Taxæ Cancellariæ Apoſtolicæ, & Taxæ ſacræ pœnitentiariæ Apoſtolicæ. We find there (5) the paſſage quoted by D'Aubigné from the Paris edition in 1520 (6): Abſolutio pro eo, qui matrem, ſororem, aut aliam conſanguineam vel affinem ſuam, aut commatrem, carnaliter cognovit, gr. v. (7). Abſolutio pro eo, qui Virginem deſloravit, gr. vi. i. e. "Abſolution for "him, who has carnally known his mother, ſiſter, "or

(2) In the remark [B] of the article PINET.

(3) It is in the Latin and Dutch, in 8vo. See the Preface and pag. 130.

(4) Apud Goſuinum Colinium.

(5) Taxæ Cancell. Apoſt pag. 95, 96, edition of Bois-le-Duc.

(6) See remark [B] of the article PINET.

(7) That is, he muſt pay five Gros.

and to give occaſion to ſome reflections, both to rectify what I have already ſaid in another place,

" or other relation by blood or marriage, or god-
" mother, gr. v. Abſolution for him, who has de-
" flowered a Virgin, vi gr." We find this likewiſe in the edition of Franeker in 1651 (8). I am ſurprized that we do not find it in the edition of Pinet, intitled, Taxe des Parties Caſuelles de la Bontigne du Pape. It is in Latin and French with a great many notes by that Author. He did very wrong not to mention what copy he printed from; for it is different from the others both with reſpect to the ſubjects, and to the money. It ſpeaks only of Tournois, Ducats, and Carlins; the others mention only Gros, or at leaſt very ſeldom ſpeak of Ducats or Carlins. D'Aubigné aſſures us (9), that the Paris edition ſays, that for killing one's father or mother, one muſt pay a Ducat and five Carlins; but in the edition of Franeker (10), and that of Bois-le-Duc (11) there is an Abſolutio pro eo, qui interfecit patrem, matrem, ſororem, uxorem.... g. v, vel vii (12); that is, " An Abſolution for him, " who has killed his father, mother, ſiſter, wife, ... " v or vii Gros." I am ſurprized once more, that this article of inceſt is wanting in the edition of Pinet (13), in which we find the moſt enormous articles; as for inſtance the following: Abſolutio à lapſu carnis ſuper quocunque actu libidinoſo commiſſo per clericum, etiam cum monialibus, intra & extra ſepta monaſterii, aut cum conſanguineis vel affinibus, aut filiâ ſpirituali, aut quibuſdam aliis, ſive ab unoquoque de per ſe, ſive ſimul ab omnibus abſolutio petatur cum diſpenſatione ad ordines & beneficia, cum inhibitione tur. 36, duc. 3. Si verò cum illis petatur abſolutio etiam à crimine commiſſo contra naturam, vel cum brutis, cum diſpenſatione, ut ſupra, & cum inhibitione, turon. 90, duc. 12, col. 16. Si verò petatur tantum abſolutio à crimine contra naturam, vel cum brutis, cum diſpenſatione & inhibitione, turon. 36, duc. 9. Abſolutio pro Monialì, quæ ſe permiſit pluries cognoſci intra & extra ſepta monaſterii, cum rehabilitate ad dignitates illius ordinis, etiam abbatialem, turon. 36, duc. 9. Abſolutio pro concubinario, cum diſpenſatione ad ordines & beneficia, turon. 21, duc. 5, carlin. 6. (14). That is: " The abſolution and pardon of " all the acts of lewdneſs committed by a Clerk, " of whatever kind it may be, tho' it were even with " a Nun, within or without the bounds of his Mo-" naſtery, or with his relations by blood or affinity, " or with his God-daughter, or with any other women " of any quality whatſoever; likewiſe whether the " ſaid abſolution be made in the name of the Clerk " himſelf, or for him and his miſtreſſes, with a diſpen-" ſation to be capable of taking Orders, and to hold " eccleſiaſtical benefits, with an inhibitory clauſe " likewiſe coſts 36 tourn. and 3 ducats. And " if, beſides this above, there be an abſolution for " ſodomy, and the ſin againſt nature, or for beſtiali-" ty, and the above diſpenſation and inhibitory clauſe " be added, it will coſt 90 tourn. 12 duc. and 16 car-" lins. But if there is only a ſimple abſolution for " ſodomy, or the ſin againſt nature, or for beſtiality, " with the diſpenſation and inhibitory clauſe, it coſt " 36 tourn. and 9 ducates. A Nun, having com-" mitted the act of lewdneſs ſeveral times within and " without the bounds of her Convent, ſhall be ab-" ſolv'd and reſtored to the power of holding all the " dignities of her Order, even that of Abbeſs, upon " her paying 36 tourn. and 9 duc. The abſolution " for one, who ſhall keep a concubine, with a diſ-" penſation to take Orders and hold eccleſiaſtical be-" nefits, coſts 21 tourn. 5. duc. and 9 carlins (15)." I imagine that Du Pinet followed the edition, which the Proteſtant Princes cauſed to be inſerted in their cauſes of rejecting the Council of Trent, and which is intitled Taxa ſacræ Pœnitentiariæ (16). Mr. Heidegger has given ſome extracts, which are exactly like the edition of Du Pinet (17). Some perſons have obſerved, that the Epitome of the Tax of the Chancery of Rome is to be ſeen in page 603, and the following of a work intitled Luculenta Deductio cauſarum recuſati Concilii Tridentini à Proteſtantium Germaniæ Principibus publicatorum; and before Hunnius's book de Indulgentiis, and in page 216 and the following of Muſculus's Loci Communes (18). He, that publiſhed in 1612 the book intitled Simonia Curiæ Romanæ, inſerted in it this paſſage from the ſame Loci Communes (19). Compare this with the remark [A] of the article TUPPIUS.

I ſhall now ſpeak ſomething of the edition, which Laurence Banck procured. It was publiſhed at Franeker in the year 1651 in 8vo. He ſays, that he conſulted the moſt antient copies, printed or manuſcript, and by comparing them word for word, ſupplied by means of one what was wanting in others. He made uſe of the edition of Cologne in 1523, of that of Wittemberg in 1538, of that of Venice in 1584 (20), and of a Manuſcript, which had been communicated to him by John Baptiſta Sibon, a Bernardine Monk, and Reader in the College of Rome. By this means he has made his edition ſomewhat larger than all that had been publiſhed before. He has added notes, in which he explains a great many terms, which are difficult to be underſtood: it is a kind of gloſſary. He has likewiſe joined to it a ſmall Italian tract, which contains the tax, which was made uſe of under Pope Innocent X; and he has explained the value of the money as it was at that time. His notes have been very ſerviceable to the perſon, who has added remarks to the edition of Bois-le-Duc. We may remark, that in the preface of the latter it is obſerved that the Inquiſitors have ranked the Tax of the Chancery amongſt the prohibited books. Naſcentem ſuffocare conati ſunt ipſi Authores & in Indice Librorum prohibitorum, ex Patrum Concilii Tridentini authoritate, Hiſpaniarumque Regis & Ducis Alban. decreto, Leodii ANNO 1570 edito, inter primæ claſſis Authores atro calculo notârunt (21). I have not this edition of the Index Librorum prohibitorum. That, which I make uſe of, and which was printed from the edition of Madrid in 1667 in folio, has only ranged under the third claſs the Praxis & Taxa Officinæ Pœnitentiariæ Papæ ab Hæreticis depravata (22); and we may obſerve that they have condemned it only upon a ſuppoſition that the heretics had falſified it: the Index, publiſh'd at Rome by order of Alexander VII, uſes the ſame words as that of Spain (23). But tho' they ſuppoſe that heretics have corrupted it; yet thoſe editions, which can never be diſavowed, as that of Rome in 1514; that of Cologne in 1515; thoſe of Paris in 1520, 1545, and 1625 (24); and thoſe of Venice (25), one in the ſixth volume of the edition of the Oceanus Juris, publiſh'd in 1533, and the other in the fifteenth volume of the ſame Collection reprinted in 1584; theſe editions, I ſay, are more than ſufficient to juſtify the reproaches of Proteſtants, and to cover the Romiſh Church with ſhame. Our Laurence Banck knew nothing of almoſt all the editions, which I have mentioned above, and that of Francfort in 1612 in 4to (26). Rivet, Voetius, Hottinger, and ſeveral other Helluones Librorum, that is, Devourers of Books, imagined falſly that the edition of 1520 was the firſt (27); for they oppoſed that chiefly to the Roman Catholics, who would never allow that the Tax of the Chancery was ever publiſhed with a privilege. Voetius relates, that in 1633 a Counſellor of Bois-le-Duc declared, that he would abjure the Catholic Religion, if any perſon could ſhew him the horrid paſſages, which the Proteſtants cited as taken out of the Tax of Chancery at Rome. Recourſe was had to Rivet, who lent his copy of the edition of Paris in 1520 (28). Voetius gives this account, not without a pathetical exhortation to the Library-Keepers of the Proteſtant Univerſities to preſerve and collect the authentic copies of this work. Quia autem, ſays he (29), hîc Taxæ Pœnitentiariæ mentio facta, moneo exemplaria pauca hodiè haberi poſſe (quâ & quorum arte facilè prudentiores conjiciunt;) aliqua tamen in manibus noſtrorum ſupereſſe editionis Pariſienſis 1520 in 4*to, apud Tuſſain Denis. Edita etiam eſt Venetiis, cum quam plurimis aliis Tractatibus in Oceano Juris. Addo, rem & librum à Pontificiis paſſim negari, ubi ita uſu venit, ut noſtri allegando illam Taxam, mendacii & calumniæ ſuſpecti fiant, imò & arguantur. Accidit anno* 1633, ut quis J. Conſultus idemque Senator Sylvæducenſis, deſertionem & rejectionem Papatus minaretur, (more ipſis non inſolito,) ſi quidem tam abominanda, qualia ex Taxâ noſtri referunt, demonſtrari poſſent. Ut ampliſſ. & conſult. huic Viro ex aſſe ſatisfieret, quæſitum apud exemplari (30), me de etiam à me poſtulatum eſt. Quod cum mihi ab ipſis Pontificiis editum nullum eſſet, petii commodato

(8) It is that which L. Banck procured. See pag. 127.

(9) See the remark [B] of the article PINET.
(10) Pag. 132.
(11) Pag. 103.

(12) That is to ſay, he muſt pay five or ſeven Gros.

(13) It is that of Lyons in 1564, and it was reprinted at Leyden in 1607, and with a new Frenchtranſlation at Amſterdam in 1701. Theſe three editions are in 8vo.

(14) Taxe des Parties Caſuelles de la Boutique du Pape, pag. 55, & ſeq. edition of Lyons in 1564, in 8vo.

(15) This is according to the French tranſlation of Pinet.

(16) See Heidegger Myſter. Babyl. Magnæ, tom. 2. pag. 350 and 547.
(17) Ibid. pag. 350, & ſeq.
(18) Daniel Francus, Diſquiſit. Academ. de Indicib. Libr. prohib. & expurgand. pag. 115. edit. Lipſ. ad ann. 1684, in 4to.

(19) Lydii Analect. in Clemang. pag. 17.

(20) He means that which is inſerted in the 15th volume Part 1. fol. 368, of Tractatus Tractatuum ſeu Oceanus Juris univerſi.

(21) Preface to the Taxæ Cancell. & Pœnitent. Apoſtat. edition of Bois-le-Duc 1664.

(22) Indices Libr. prohibitor. & expurgandor. Hiſpanic. & Romanus, edit. Genev. ann. 1667, in folio, pag. 859. col. 2.
(23) Ibid. in Indice Romano, ejuſd. edit. pag. 106.
(24) Monſ. Drelincourt quotes theſe three editions of Paris. See his words in the remark [B] of the article PINET.
(25) Heideggeri Myſter. Babyl. Magnæ, tom. 1. pag. 547.
(26) Catalog. Biblioth. Oxonienſis, pag. 132.
(27) Franci Diſquiſ. de Indicib. Libr. prohibit. pag. 115, 116.

(28) Voetii Diſput. Theolog. tom. 2. pag. 296.

(29) Idem, ibid.

(30) There is an error in this paſſage. The Errata of the Author informs us that we ſhould read it, me de Exemplari. This does not remove the error. Daniel Francus, Diſſert. de Indicibus Libr. prohibitor. pag. 115. quoting this paſſage, ſays quæſitum apud alios de Exemplari, etiam à me poſtulatum Exemplar.

place (d), and to examine what we are told, by different authors, who have not explained themſelves with ſufficient exactneſs.

(d) In the remark [B] of the article PINET.

commodato à celeberrimo Theologo Andreâ Riveto. Ante biennium alibi concertatione inter noſtros & Pontificios quoſdam obortâ ſuper eadem hac Taxâ denuò conſultus, commonſtravi Bibliothecam D. Riveti, in quâ certò ſcirem exemplar edit. Pariſ. 1520 haberi; quippe quod ipſe ante annos aliquot manibus & oculis meis uſurpâſſem, & Fratribus Sylvæducenſibus ex ſummi illius Theologi conceſſione aliquamdiu uſurpandam miſiſſem. Velim hac occaſione obteſtatos omnes publicos Reformatarum Scholarum, Eccleſiarum, Politicarum, Bibliothecarios, exemplaria, ſi qua in ipſorum poteſtate ſint, capſis incluſa diligenter cuſtodiant, ne à Plagiariis auferantur; aut ſi non ſint, hoc agant, ut à privatis ſive bibliopolis, ſive viris literatis, prece aut precio quovis redimant.

I believe that the Romiſh controverſial Writers, who cannot diſprove the edition of Rome, or that of Paris, find themſelves in a prodigious perplexity. We may judge of this from the anſwer of the Abbé Richard to the Prejudices of Mr. Jurieu. That Miniſter had ſhewn the ſhocking abuſe of the Tax of the Chancery (31). The Abbot replies, that theſe were only particular Facts, which had never been authorized by the Laws and Canons of the Church of Rome (32). "We take it "well, continues he (33), that Mr. Jurieu gives an ac- "count * of the Taxes from an old Book of the "Chancery of Rome. But is it not extremely ridi- "culous to make a Book of Taxes paſs for the Laws "and Canons of the Church? Would it not turn the "Civil Law into a mere fable, to inſert the fees of "Executioners in the code, and place them among "the Laws. Would not this do a great honour to "the Gentlemen concerned? Let Mr. Jurieu learn "then what the Laws and Canons of the Church of "Rome are; and let him know in the mean time, "that theſe old Taxes of the Chancery of Rome, are "not only of no authority in the Church, but that "ſhe has always abhorred them. Theſe Taxes of the "Chancery did not begin till under the Pontificate "of John XXII, about the year 1320; and the Taxes "of the Penitentiary did not appear till towards the "year 1336, under Benedict XII †; and both of them "were immediately ſuppreſſed, and afterwards rank'd "amongſt the prohibited books, according to the "obſervation of the Sieur du Mont, who publiſhed "them in 1664; which ſhews ſufficiently the abhor- "rence, which the Church of Rome had for theſe "Taxes; ſo far was ſhe from propoſing or holding "them as rules, as Mr. Jurieu would make us believe. "Let him know then that the actions of the Officers "of the Court of Rome are only the actions of par- "ticular men, and not of the Church." This An- ſwer is not juſt; for in the firſt place, the Church of Rome has not ſhewn by the ſuppreſſion of theſe Taxes, that ſhe abhorred them. They were print- ed three times at Paris, twice at Cologne, twice at Venice; and there have been ſome of theſe edi- tions publiſhed, ſince Claudius Eſpencæus remonſtrat- ed publicly againſt the enormities of that book. We have ſeen that the Inquiſition of Spain, and that of Rome, have not condemned it but upon a ſuppoſition that the heretics had corrupted it. I add in the ſecond place, that the ſuppreſſion of ſuch a work is not a ſign that the rules, which it contains, are diſapproved. They may only ſignify, that they repented, that they had permitted them to be expoſed to the eyes of the Public, and ſo gave occaſion to heretics to inſult the Court of Rome, and wound the Church of Rome thro' the ſides of the Pope. We ought to judge that theſe were myſteries of State, Arcana Imperii, which ſhould not have been divulged (34). Have there not been ſome perſons, who have judged ſo with reſpect to ceremonies (35)? I omit ſeveral other conſiderations, which a controverſial Writer might alledge againſt the antagoniſt of Mr. Jurieu; but I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving that Claudius Eſpencæus declaimed very warmly againſt the abominations of theſe Taxes (36); I ſhall remark likewiſe, that the Proteſtant Controver- ſial Writers quote this in every diſpute; and that the Inquiſition of Spain has thought proper to order this paſſage of that Doctor's book to be eraſed (37). We may obſerve that the Inquiſition at Rome condemned Laurence Banck's edition of the Taxes (38).

(31) Jurieu, Prejuges legit. contre le Papiſme, tom. 1. p. 295, & ſeq.

(32) Richard, Examen des prejuges de Mr. Jurieu, pag. 218.

(33) Ibid. pag. 219.

* Part 1. pag. 295. of his Prejuges.

† Polyd. Virgil. de Invent. Rerum, lib. 8. cap. 2.

(34) Compare what Horace ſays de Arte Poetica, ver. 182.

Non tamen intus
Digna geri promes in ſcenam; multaque tolles
Ex oculis, quæ mox narret Facundia præſens.

(35) See the remark [D] of the article GRASSIS.

(36) See his words in a paſſage of Mr. Drelincourt quoted in the remark [B] of the article PINET.

(37) Index Hiſpan. Libr. prohibitor. pag. 232. col. 1.

(38) Index Rom. Libr. prohibit. pag. 124. col. 2. and pag. 261.

BANDEL (MATTHEW) born at Caſtro-Novo in Lombardy, flouriſhed in the XVIth Century (a). He was a Dominican. Moreri (b) has related of him moſt of the things that Voſſius had ſaid before; but he ſhould have added ſeveral other curious facts, and not have omitted two circumſtances, that Voſſius has given us an account of; one is, that the Tranſlation of Hegeſippus is in Italian; the other is, that the inhabitants of Fermo placed amongſt their Archives the Oration, which Matthew Bandel compoſed in praiſe of their city in the year 1513 (c). The following is as a ſupplement to their accounts. This Monk being at Mantua, contracted an intimate friendſhip with Julius Cæſar Scaliger, which continued as long as he lived, and which he cultivated very ſtudiouſly in Gui- enne [A]. He was Biſhop of Agen for ſeveral months; and it was in that city, that he wrote in Italian the Hiſtories or Gallant Novels, which rendered him ſo famous. I have quoted them in the remark [M] of the article LEO X, and in the remark [I] of the ar- ticle MAHOMET II. Each of them is dedicated to ſome perſon of his acquaintance (d). The XXI of the ſecond part is dedicated to Lucretia de Gonzaga, whoſe Preceptor he had been (e). He has dedicated another to his friend Scaliger. They have been tran- ſlated into French, and we muſt ſpeak a word of the judgment, which the Tranſlator has paſſed upon them [B]. The catalogue of the library of Thuanus (f) informs me, that the

(a) Theſe words of Voſſius, circa annum 1500 vivebat Matthæus Bandellus, in pag. 677. de Hiſtor. Latin. are nothing to the purpoſe.

(b) Moreri under the word Bandella.

(c) Voſſ. de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 677.

(d) See remark [A].

(e) See the article of that Lady.

(f) Page 408 of the ſecond part.

[A] He contracted an intimate friendſhip with Julius Cæſar Scaliger.] We have no account of this but from the following paſſage: Eodem tempore Mantuæ degebat Matthæus Bandellus Inſuber Dominicanus, vir eloquentiſſimus & optimus, qui poſtea per aliquot menſes Epiſcopus Aginnenſis fuit, & Mantuæ Marium Æquicolum ſummâ obſervantiâ coluit, atque ibi cum Julio Cæſare arctiſſimâ amicitiæ neceſſitudine conjunctus fuit, quam ab eo tempore, ad ſupremum uſque vitæ diem in Aquitaniâ perpetuavit. Is, quum unam Hiſtoriarum ſuarum, quas Aginni Etruſcâ linguâ Boccatium imitatus conſcripſit Julio dedicaret, eum non ſolum Scaligerum agnoſcit, ſed etiam illuſtriſſimum vocat in Epiſtolâ dedicationis. Et quum in quatuor tomis ingentibus, ſingulas ſingulis ſummis & nobiliſſimis, ac genereoſiſſimis viris dedicaret, neminem eorum majore honore, quam Julium affecit, quum tamen aliquot ex illis illuſtres vocare nulla fuiſſet invidia (1). Lucretia de Gonzaga wrote two Letters to Father Bandel, which intimate to us, that he was raiſed to ſome poſt. The firſt (2) ſhews that he was in France, and the ſecond (3) that he was in Guienne; in the firſt he is called Reverendo Padre; but in the other he is ſtiled Monſignor P. Bandello, and congratulated upon his new dignity. The date of the year is not mentioned. He was not a Biſhop, when Julius Cæſar Scaliger wrote him a Letter (4) upon the death of Fracaſtorius. His Anſwer (5) is dated Baſſennii, 22 Novemb. 1553.

[B] His Novels have been tranſlated into French . . . and here is the judgment of the Tranſlator upon them.] We muſt obſerve firſt, that the ſix firſt were tranſlated into French by Peter Boaiſteau, and the reſt by Belle- foreſt.

(1) Joſeph. Scaliger. in Confutat. Fabulæ Burdonianæ, pag. 269, 270.

(2) It is in pag. 61. of the Letters of Lucretia de Gonzaga, printed at Venice in the year 1552.

(3) It is in p. 63.

(4) It is the 56th of his Letters, pag. 186. of the Leyden edition in 1600.

(5) It is the 57th Letter amongſt thoſe of Julius Cæſar Scaliger.

the three firſt parts were printed at Lucca in the year 1554 in 4to, and the fourth at Lyons in 1573 in 8vo. I am ſurprized, that Mr. Menage has not placed this Monk in his Catalogue of Eccleſiaſtics, who have written Verſes of Gallantry (g) [C].

(g) It is at the end of his Anti-Baillet.

ſoreſt. The Advertiſement to the Reader before the firſt volume (6) contains theſe words: Deſiring thee moreover not to take it ill, if I have not confined myſelf to the ſtyle of Bandel; for his phraſe ſeemed to me ſo harſh, his terms ſo improper, his diſcourſe ſo ill connected, and his ſentences ſo dry, that I choſe rather to new mold it, and put it in a new form, than to follow him too ſuperſtitiouſly; and I have only taken from him the ſubject of the Hiſtory, as thou may'ſt eaſily perceive, if thou art curious enough to compare my ſtyle with his. See here a fact, that is curious enough. Belleforeſt, being engaged in the tranſlation of the XXXVIIth Novel, was ſeized with ſuch a remorſe of conſcience, that he reſolved to break off there his undertaking. I lay down here, ſays he (7), my arms, and leave henceforward theſe ſubjects, which may be turned every way, and from which ſome may receive inſtruction, and others an example to make uſe of in their youthful follies; for what I have done now was rather to gratify a friend of mine, than out of any deſire that ſuch a work ſhould be publiſh'd by me. Not that age diſpenſes me from ſpeaking that which is merry and gay; but there are different times for ſuch mirth and humour, whatever there may be that is concealed and colours over thoſe expreſſions, which are too luſcious, tho' neceſſary, when affairs of gallantry are ſpoken of. And beſides I have deſigns of more importance than Bandel's Hiſtories, or the amours of thoſe, who from their example ought to warn us from following ſo much our ſenſual appetites, as to become at laſt a tale to poſterity by the memory of our folly. This King (8) therefore ſhall conclude our courſe, and end from henceforward every profane undertaking of mine, if ſometimes a more ſolid Hiſtory does not awaken my ſpirits, and a longer diſcourſe does not make me think longer than I have done to follow ſimply the Author's ſteps, whom I have rather adorn'd and amplified than followed or imitated. To excuſe what was paſt he adds this remark. "I do not write ſtories of love as a laſcivious "perſon, but as one, that laughs at fools, and diverts "himſelf with thoſe, who are hurried away with their "irregular paſſions. I accuſe adulterers, deteſt infamous perſons, abhor murderers, and am ſorry "that there are in the world ſuch abſurd men, as to "throw away their lives for ſo tranſient a pleaſure, as "that of their body. In ſhort I commend virtue, "and accuſe vice, wiſhing that I myſelf improving "by this reading may ſee others come to an end of "their follies, and amend their lives. If any perſon "takes more pleaſure in the merry ſtories, which are in "Bandel, let him divert himſelf as he will; as for "me (as I have ſaid before) I give up my part to "him, and leave him all the pleaſure and glory, "which he may gain by it, having enriched both "this barren author, and our language with the native ſweetneſs of its eloquence (9)." We ſee here a French Layman, who ſcruples to tranſlate what an Italian Monk had written of Love: but this ſcruple did not continue long; for Belleforeſt finiſhed this tranſlation, and made ſeveral additions to it.

(6) It was printed at Paris in the year 1567, and reprinted the ſame year at Antwerp.

(7) Belleforeſt, Hiſtoires Tragiq. tom. 3. pag. 53, 54. edit. of Roan in 1604.

(8) That is, Henry VIII, King of England.

(9) Belleforeſt, Hiſt. Tragiques, tom. 3. pag. 55.

[C] Mr. Menage has not placed him in the number of the Eccleſiaſtics, who have written verſes of gallantry.] Bandel wrote ſeveral, and was congratulated upon them by his friends. See Julius Cæſar Scaliger's Epigram de Bandelli Amoribus Thuſcâ Linguâ decantatio (10), and the four verſes following:

Dum teneros loquitur dulcis Bandellus amores,
Ipſe ſui oblitus tela remiſit amor.
Seu canit Aonium fontem fontiſque ſorores
Fonti ipſi ex illo lactea vena fluit (11).

"While tuneful Bandel ſings his tender loves,
"Attentive Cupid drops his uſeleſs darts;
"Or when he ſings th' Aonian fount, and all
"Th' harmonious ſiſters of the ſacred ſpring,
"His numbers add new charms to Pindus' ſhades.

(10) I ſhall give it in the remark [B] of the article of (LUCRETIA DE) GONZAGA.

(11) Jul. Cæſ. Scaliger, in Heroibus, pag. 327. Part. 1. Poematum.

The Catalogue of Nicholas Heinſius's Library (12) informs me that the Canti xi, &c. del Bandello were printed at Agen in the year 1545, in 8vo.

(12) In pag. 200 of the 2d Part.

BANDOLE (ANTHONY DE) Advocate in the Parliament of Provence, publiſhed a French Tranſlation of Xiphilin at Paris in the year 1610 in 4to. He publiſhed likewiſe in the ſame city in 1609 in 4to A Parallel between Cæſar and Henry IV, prefixed to Cæſar's Commentaries, tranſlated into French, and commented upon by Vigenere.

BANGIUS (THOMAS) Doctor and Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Copenhagen, was born in the year 1600 (a). He finiſhed his Humanity Studies in the College of Ottenſée in the iſle of Funen, and then went over to Copenhagen about the end of the year 1621, where he continued his ſtudies with great ſucceſs. Gaſpar Brochmand, Profeſſor of Divinity, and Biſhop of Selande, made him Tutor to his ſon. Bangius was Preceptor at the ſame time to Chriſtian Friis, eldeſt ſon to the Chancellor of Denmark. After he had continued in that employment above five years, he obtained a penſion from the King, and went to Roſtoch, from whence he returned to Copenhagen, when the Emperor's troops drew near to the Baltic Sea. He finiſhed his courſe of Divinity under Profeſſor Brochmand, and afterwards went to Franeker, where he learned Rabbinical and Chaldee learning under Sixtinus Amama, by whom he was greatly eſteemed. He ſtudied afterwards at Wittemberg, and received there in the year 1630 a letter from the Rector and Academical Council of Copenhagen, with an offer of the Profeſſorſhip in Hebrew. He excuſed himſelf, alledging that he had not learning ſufficient to diſcharge that office worthily; but finding himſelf adviſed by Mr. Brochmand, who was then Rector, not to refuſe what was offered, he accepted it on condition that he ſhould be permitted to employ the revenue of that place in ſtudying for ſome years the Arabic and Syriac tongues under Gabriel Sionita (b). This condition being agreed to, he went to Copenhagen, and took poſſeſſion in September 1630 of the Profeſſorſhip of Hebrew, and a little after of his Doctor's Degree in Philoſophy. He diſcharged that Profeſſorſhip with great advantage to Students till the year 1652, when he was raiſed to the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, vacant by the death of Mr. Brochmand. He was promoted to the Doctorſhip in the ſame Faculty in the year 1653, in the preſence of the King and Queen. Three years after he had the office of Library-keeper to the Univerſity conferred upon him, and he performed the Dedication of the Church of the Trinity in a Latin Sermon (c). Falling ſick the 11th of October 1661, his principal care was that of his ſoul: he confeſſed himſelf, and communicated on the ſixth day of his ſickneſs, and died the 27th of the ſame month (d). he

(a) Flemloſiæ Finorum. I chooſe rather to give the name of his country in Latin, than to give the vulgar name wrong.

(b) He taught them at Paris.

(c) This church was deſigned for the religious exerciſes of the Students.

(d) Taken from his Funeral Programma, written by Peter Scavenius, Rector of the Univerſity of Copenhagen, quoted by Witte, Memor. Theolog. renov. pag. 1387.

he married in 1635 a Senator's daughter, by whom he had fourteen children, eight ſons, and ſix daughters. His writings teſtify his learning [A].

[A] His writings teſtify his learning.] He was an Author before he was a Doctor; for he publiſhed in the year 1627 an Expoſition of a paſſage in Jeremiah (1). His Vindiciæ locorum Geneſ. xlviii. 16; Geneſ. vi. 1; Pſalm xix. 1. were publiſhed in the year 1630. He publiſhed the year following Fontium Iſraëlis Trias, Jona, Michea, Ruth; and in the year 1634 his Exercitatio Glottologica de Ortu Linguarum. His Exercitationes octo Literariæ Antiquitatis appeared in the year 1638. The two books Obſervationum Philologicarum appeared two years after. His Hermes & Pan Hebraicus, quo vivum abſoluti Hebraici Lexicographi exemplum proponitur, was printed in 1641 (2). The Phoſphorus Inſcriptionis hieroſymbolicæ, quo Stellæburgum Regium Hafnienſe illuſtratur, appeared in the year 1648, and was followed the year after by the Tropæum protevangelicum, quo ex ſcriptis pontificiorum oſtenditur veram eſſe lectionem, Ipſum conteret tibi caput, & ſoli Chriſto convenire. The Exercitatio elenchtica de Nephilimis, Gigantibus vulgò dictis, oppoſita Jacobo Boulducco, was a product of the year 1652; and the Oliva ſacræ pacis repurgata, a product of the year 1654; and the Cælum Orientis & priſci Mundi, a product of the year 1657. I paſs by the titles of ſome other of his works, which have not been omitted in his Funeral Programma, or by Albert Bartholin (3). Some of the books, which I have given the titles of, are only ſpeeches; the Oliva ſacræ pacis repurgata is of that number. However this has given the Author a place in the Catalogue of the Reconcilers in Religion (4), and been inſerted at large by John Duræus in his Irenicorum tractatuum Prodromus.

(1) It is the 24th verſe of the 23d chapter.

(2) Father Labbe Biblioth. Bibliothec. pag. 198. ſpeaks of this book, tho' it had no relation to his deſign, and aſcribes it to Thomas Bengus.

(3) In Libro de Scriptis Danorum.

(4) See Heidegger. de Concordiæ Eccleſiaſt. Prot. pag. 208.

☞ BANISTER (JOHN), an eminent Phyſician in the XVIth Century, and Author of ſeveral Treatiſes in Chirurgery [A], was born of honeſt and wealthy parents. He ſtudied at the Univerſity of Oxford, and entering upon the Phyſic Line, applied himſelf ſolely to that Faculty and Chirurgery (a). In July 1573 he was licenſed by that Univerſity to practiſe Phyſic (b). He ſettled afterwards at Nottingham, where he lived many years, and had very great practice, on account of his admirable ſkill in Phyſic and Chirurgery. There was likewiſe one Richard Baniſter, who wrote a piece upon the Diſeaſes of the eyes [B].

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxonienſ. vol. 1. col. 243. 2d edit. 1721.

(b) Idem, ibid. and Faſti Oxon. col. 109.

[A] Author of ſeveral Treatiſes in Chirurgery.] I. A needful, new, and neceſſary Treatiſe of Chirurgery, briefly comprehending the general and particular Curation of Ulcers, London 1575, in 8vo. II. Certain Experiments of his own Invention, &c. III. Hiſtory of Man, ſucked from the ſap of the moſt approved Anatomiſts, &c. in nine books. London 1578, in a thin folio. IV. Compendious Chirurgery, gathered and tranſlated eſpecially out of Wecker, &c. London 1585, in 12mo. V. Antidotary Chirurgical, containing Variety of all ſorts of Medicines, &c. London 1589, in 8vo. Several years after his death in 1633, his works were publiſhed at London in 4to in ſix books. 1. Of Tumours; 2. Of Wounds; 3. Of Ulcers, in general and particular; 4. Of Fractures and Luxations; 5. Of the Curation of Ulcers; and 6. The Antidotary, abovementioned.

[B] Who wrote a piece upon the Diſeaſes of the Eyes.] It is intitled; A Treatiſe of one hundred and thirteen Diſeaſes of the Eyes and Eye-Lids, commonly called Baniſter's Breviary of the Eyes. Mr. Wood tells us (1), that he never ſaw this Treatiſe, but only the title of it mentioned in the book following; An appendant part of a Treatiſe of one hundred and thirteen Diſeaſes of the Eyes and Eye-Lids, called Cervifia Medicata, purging Ale, with divers Aphoriſms and Principles, &c. London 1622, in 12mo, 2d edition. The Epiſtle is dated from Stamford in Lincolnſhire. It appears from the 9th chapter of that book, that the Author was living in the year 1617, and from the 6th chapter that he was alive in 1619, and perhaps in 1622, when the ſecond edition was publiſhed. He tells us in the 4th chapter, that in his Treatiſe of the Eyes he had named the beſt Oculiſts that have been in this Land for fifty or ſixty years, who were no Graduates either in Cambridge or Oxford. T.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 244.

☞ BANKS (Sir JOHN) Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas in the reign of King Charles I, was born of honeſt parents at Keſwick in Cumberland, and entered a Commoner in Queen's-College Oxford in 1604, at fifteen years of age; but left the Univerſity before he took a Degree, and ſettled in Grays-Inn, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his uncommon application to the ſtudy of the Law, and became Barriſter and a Counſellor of great eminence. He afterwards received the honour of Knighthood, and was appointed Attorney to Prince Charles; and in the ſixth year of King Charles I was choſen Lent-Reader to the Society of Grays-Inn, and the year following Treaſurer to that Houſe (a). In 1640 he was made Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench (b), and ſoon after following his Majeſty, when he was obliged to leave Weſtminſter, he was choſen one of his Privy-Council at Oxford, and Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas. January the 31ſt 1642 he was created Doctor of the Civil Law in that Univerſity, where he died December the 28th 1644, and was interred in the Cathedral of Chriſt Church there (c), and had a monument erected to him [A]. By his laſt will he gave thirty pounds per annum, with other emoluments to be beſtowed upon pious uſes, and eſpecially to ſet up a manufacture of coarſe cottons at Keſwick, where he was born (d). His invention was ready; his apprehenſion quick; his memory capacious and retentive; his knowledge in the Law, even the moſt abſtruſe parts of it, profound; his experience in affairs of State univerſal. He was patient in hearing; ſparing, but pertinent in ſpeaking;

(a) Wood, Faſti Oxonienſ. vol. 2. col. 26. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Dugdale in Chron. Serie, ann. 1640. apud Wood, ubi ſupra.

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(d) See Fuller's Worthies in Cumberland.

[A] Had a monument erected to him.] His epitaph inſcribed upon it is as follows.

P. M. S. Hoc loco in ſpem futuri ſæculi depoſitum jacet JOHANNIS BANKES, qui Reginalis Collegii in hâc Academiâ Alumnus, Eques auratus ornatiſſimus, Attornatus Generalis, de communi Banco Cap.' Juſticiarius, a ſecretioribus Conſiliis Regi Carolo, Peritiam, Integritatem, fidem egregie præſtitit. Ex Æde Chriſti in Ædes Chriſti tranſiit menſe Decembris die 28. Anno dom. 1644. Ætatis ſuæ 55 (1). i. e. "Here lie interr'd in hopes of the Reſurrection the Remains of "Sir John Banks, Knight, educated in Queen's "College in this Univerſity, afterwards Attorney-"General, and Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common "Pleas, and Privy-Counſellor to King Charles; in "which ſtations he gave ſignal proofs of his Abili-"ties, Integrity, and Fidelity. He departed this "Life at Chriſt-Church, and was removed to the "Manſions of Chriſt in Heaven December 28th "1644, in the 55th year of his age." T.

(1) See Hiſtor. & Antiquit. Univerſit. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 289. ed. Oxon. 1674.

ing; highly pleaſed with a juſt and clear repreſentation of a cauſe, and able to penetrate through all diſguſes into the real merits of it. He was a Gentleman of a ſingular modeſty, of the antient freedom, and unſpotted integrity; grave and ſevere in his behaviour, but at the ſame time eaſy and affable; in ſhort ſo uniform and circumſpect in the ſeveral changes of his life, that though he went himſelf, and brought over as many perſons as he had any intereſt in, to the King, yet he fell under no extraordinary diſpleaſure from the contrary party (d).

(d) See Lloyd's State Worthies, pag. 961, 962. edit. London 1670 in 8vo.

BARANZAN (REDEMPTUS) a Barnabite Friar, was one of the firſt who in the XVIIth Century ventured to depart from the Ariſtotelian way of philoſophizing. La Mothe le Vayer ſays that he might juſtly rank him amongſt the firſt Wits of our age (a), and the productions of his youth are ſufficient to give him that claim [A]. He adds, that this honeſt Barnabite had ſeveral times aſſured him, but always with ſubmiſſion to the good pleaſure of God, that he would appear to him, if he ſhould depart firſt out of this world. He did not keep his promiſe, Providence having ordered it otherwiſe; and he verified the ſentence of a Latin Poet;

(a) La Mothe le Vayer, Diſcours Chretien de l'Immortalite de l'Ame, tom. 4. of his Works, in 12mo, pag. 172.

Qui nunc it per iter tenebricoſum,
Illuc unde negant redire quenquam (b).

(b) Catull. Epigr. 3.

" He paſs'd the dark and dreary way,
" From whence there's no return to the bright genial day.

I ſhall ſpeak in another place (c) of ſome perſons, who made the ſame kind of promiſes. Baranzan was of Verceil: he taught Mathematics and Philoſophy in the city of Anneci in Savoy. Naudæus in page 79 of the Inſtruction, which he publiſhed in 1623, concerning the Roſicrucians, ſpeaks of him as a perſon already deceaſed.

(c) In the article BONFADIUS.

[A] He may be rank'd amongſt the firſt Wits of our Age: the productions of his youth are ſufficient to give him that claim.] He means without doubt the book de novis Opinionibus Phyſicæ, printed at Lions in 1619. Konig mentions two books of this work; Edidit, ſays he, Uranoſcopium & Campum Philoſophicum, an. 1620 (1). I had in my hands a copy of the Campus Philoſophicus, printed at Lyons in 1619. It contains but one volume, and treats only of Logic, and that in a manner very conformable to that of the Peripatetics: but the approbation makes me imagine that this volume is only the firſt part of Baranzan's Courſe of Philoſophy; and that this Courſe had for its general title Summa Philoſophica Anneciacenſis; which confirms what I have ſaid, that this author taught in Anneci.

(1) The Catalogue of the Oxford Library ſays Uranoſcopia ſeu Univerſa Doctrina de Cœlo, 1617.

BARBARUS (FRANCIS) a noble Venetian, was a man of great fame in the XVth Century. He had not only a great fund of Learning, but likewiſe a very ſkillful addreſs in the management of affairs of importance; he was no leſs a Stateſman, than a man of Letters; and he ſhewed this in all the public employments, which he was intruſted with, and eſpecially when he was Governor of Breſcia. The vigilance, reſolution, activity, and other great virtues, with which he defended that City againſt the forces of the Duke of Milan, commanded by the famous Picinin, can never be ſufficiently admir'd. He had to engage with enemies both at home and abroad, and yet he gained the advantage over them all. There were prodigious diviſions in the City; the Avogadri, and the Martinenghi were the heads of two oppoſite factions: he induced them by his eloquence to reunite, and to join together in promoting the intereſts of the common cauſe. The length of the ſiege, or blockade, occaſioned a famine in the City; the famine occaſioned a peſtilence; and yet amidſt all theſe embaraſſments, he had the advantage of rendring uſeleſs all the efforts of the enemy for three years, and obliging them to retire. This happen'd about the year 1439 (a). There are ſome authors, who imagine that our Francis Barbarus is the ſame with him, who wrote a book De Re Uxoria, ſeveral Letters, and ſome Speeches. This is the opinion of Volaterranus (b), who adds, that he had been the Scholar of Chryſoloras, and that he forgot all his Greek in his old age. Volaterranus might perhaps be miſtaken in ſomething [A]. Francis Barbarus died in the year 1454 (c).

(a) Taken from Vianoli in his 18th book of the Hiſtory of Venice, tom. 1. See likewiſe what he ſays in the 20th book, p. 768.

(b) Volaterran. lib. 21. p. 773.

(c) Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 620.

BARBARUS

[A] Volaterranus might perhaps be miſtaken in ſomething relating to Fr. Barbarus.] This is the reaſon of my ſuſpicion. I find in Vianoli, that Francis Barbarus, who defended ſo ſucceſsfully the city of Breſcia, was father to Zachary, and that Zachary was father to Hermolaus Barbarus (1). I find in Geſner's Bibliotheca, that Francis Barbarus, author of the book de Re Uxoriâ, tranſlated from the Greek of Plutarch the Life of Ariſtides, and that of Cato, and dedicated them to Zachary his brother. I find in Volaterranus (2), that Hermolaus Barbarus was nephew (3) to that Francis Barbarus, who defended the city of Breſcia. Volaterranus had ſpoken of this Francis Barbarus in pag. 733, and ſaid of him among other things what follows; " He underſtood the Greek tongue; but he " forgot it entirely in his old age, as I have heard " Hermolaus Barbarus his kinſman ſay." Hic poſtremo feneſcens, uti ab Hermolao ejus neceſſario accepi, Literarum Græcarum quas probe tenebat, erat omnino oblitus. The other things, which Volaterranus related of this Francis Barbarus, are, that he had been the ſcholar of Chryſoloras, that he wrote a book de Re Uxoria, ſome Speeches, and Letters, and that he raiſed himſelf a great reputation by defending the city of Breſcia. Dum Brixiæ prætor eſſet, eam urbem à Philippi Ducis obſidione magnâ cum laude liberavit. This might make one ſuſpect that Volaterranus confounded what regarded the Father, and what belonged only to the ſon. The paſſage of Geſner ſhews that Francis Barbarus, author of the book de Re Uxoria, and tranſlator of the Life of Ariſtides, was brother to Zachary Barbarus. Now, according to Vianoli, Zachary Barbarus was ſon to him, who defended Breſcia, and father to Hermolaus; ſo that we muſt ſay, that he, who defended Breſcia, had a ſon named Francis Barbarus, who wrote a book de Re Uxoriâ, and tranſlated from the Greek of Plutarch

(1) Hiſt. of Venice by Vianoli, tom. 1. liv. 20. pag. 768.

(2) Lib. 21. pag. 777.

(3) Ex fratre nepos.

BARBARUS (HERMOLAUS) grandſon of the preceding, was one of the moſt learned men in the XVth Century. He was born at Venice the 21ſt of May 1454 (a). He made a great progreſs in his ſtudies, and ſo quickly, that he began to write books in the eighteenth year of his age [A]. The publick employments, which he was entruſted with very early, did not prevent him from cultivating polite Learning with great application [B]. He was ſent by the Venetians to the Emperor Frederic, and to Maximilian his ſon, King of the Romans; and that deputation was ſo far from putting a ſtop to his pen, that it ſupplied him with matter to maintain the character of an author; for he not only publiſhed the Oration [C], which he ſpoke before theſe two Princes at Bruges in the year 1486; but he likewiſe wrote A Treatiſe of the agreement of Aſtronomy with Phyſic; he wrote it, I ſay, the ſame year, as he paſſed through the city of Cologne to go to Mentz. It was at the deſire of Theodoric Flas, Phyſician of Nuis, that he compoſed it (b). As he was very well ſkilled in Greek, he undertook the moſt difficult tranſlations, and began with a famous Paraphraſt upon Ariſtotle, I mean Themiſtius. He then attempted Dioſcorides, whoſe Text he corrected in the beſt manner he could, and gave a tranſlation of him, to which he added a very learned Commentary. It is ſaid that he laboured likewiſe upon two treatiſes of Plutarch, which are the moſt difficult of all (c): I cannot tell whether this tranſlation was ever publiſhed. He had a deſign to tranſlate all The Works of Ariſtotle [D], and he ſays in one of his Epiſtles Dedicatory, that the execution of that deſign was already very much advanced. He had an extraordinary facility in making verſes, and it is ſaid that he compoſed above twelve thouſand [E]. But of all his Works, there

(a) Geſner. Bibliotb. fol. 246. ex Tritbemio.

(b) Geſner. in Bibliotb. fol. 317.

(c) De Iſide & Oſiride, & cur Oracula deſierint. Geſner. in Bibliotbec. fol. 317.

tarch the Life of Ariſtides and that of Cato, and who was uncle to Hermolaus Barbarus. According to this, Volaterranus muſt have aſcribed to the father ſome things, which agree only to the ſon. Beſides he, that defended Breſcia, muſt have had a brother named Zachary, to whom he dedicated his two Tranſlations; and ſo all the error of Volaterranus would conſiſt in not having known that Francis Barbarus was grandfather to Hermolaus. If I had the works of Francis Barbarus, I ſhould probably find ſomewhat to decide this diſpute. But as I had them not, I deſired Mr. de Larroque to clear my doubt; and this is what he anſwered me: "Mr. Joli (4) proves that the author of "the book de Re Uxoriâ was grandfather to Hermo"laus, and that he publiſhed it about the time of the "Council of Conſtance; for Poggio and Paul Verger "ſpeak of this book in their Letters dated from the "city of Conſtance. Poggio's Letter is written to "Guerin of Verona, and that of Verger to Nicholas "Leontin. They commend Fr. Barbaro for having "written ſo well concerning Marriage, tho' he was "very young and unmarried. He dedicated to his "brother Zachary the Tranſlation of the Lives of A"riſtides and Cato, and died in the year 1454. Mr. "Joli diſtinguiſhes two Daniel Barbarus's." Obſerve that I have been informed, that this Preface of Mr. Joli, which I have quoted, contains ſeveral Elogiums upon the author of the book de Re Uxoriâ, and an Explication of many things relating to learned Men.

(4) In the preface to the French tranſlation of the book de Re Uxoria, printed at Paris in 1667.

Geſner and Voſſius quote a Letter of Andrew Brentius, from which we may learn that Francis Barbarus, grandfather to Hermolaus, and father to Zachary, wrote and tranſlated a great many books. Nimirum in te omnia Franciſci Barbari patris virtutum lumina eluceſcunt; cui certè multum Latina lingua debet tot tantiſque ab eo libris compoſitis, partim converſis, à quo minimè degenerat Hermolaus filius, te tanto patre non indignus (5). It is very certain, even from the teſtimony of Hermolaus himſelf (6), that his father's name was Zachary. So that Philip of Bergamo was much miſtaken, when he repreſented him as ſon to Francis Barbarus, and grandſon to Zachary; Franciſci Barbari filius, Zachariæ Barbari nepos (7). Moreri, as well here as in an hundred other places, tranſlates Nepos Nephew. This is an exceeding blunder. Thoſe, who value themſelves upon true Latin, uſe Nepos only to ſignify a Grandſon; but thoſe, who are not exact in their Latin ſtyle, uſe indeed the word Nepos for Nephew; but they generally add ex fratre or ex ſorore in order to prevent an equivocation; if they ſay Nepos without any addition, they mean a Grandſon.

(5) Andreas Brentius Patavinus, Epiſtolâ ad Zachariam Barbarum, apud Voſſium de Hiſtor. Latin. pag. 621. In the Appendix to Dr. Cave, pag. 157. we are aſſured that Hermolaus was ſon to Francis.

(6) See the 32d Letter of the 12th book of Politian's Letters.

(7) Philip. Borg. apud Voſſium de Hiſtor. Lat. pag. 621.

[A] He began to write books in the eighteenth year of his age.] It is Geſner, who acquaints us with this: Ab octavo decimo ætatis ſuæ anno ſcribere exorſus multa elegantiſſima Opuſcula compoſuit (1). Voſſius intended to ſay the ſame thing; but his Printer having forgot two Letters, it occaſioned Mr. Teiſſier to ſay that Hermolaus Barbarus began to write at twenty two years of age (2). Thus he tranſlates theſe words of Voſſius, ab anno ætatis duo vigeſimo ſcribere orſus fuit (3); of ſuch conſequence ſometimes are the errors of Printers. It is plain that Voſſius had put duodevigeſimo; two letters of this word being ſuppreſſed have taken away four years of glory from our author. We find in page 157 of the Appendix of Dr. Cave the error of Mr. Teiſſier.

(1) Geſner. Bibliotb. folio 317.

(2) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges de Monſ. de Thou. p. 354.

(3) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 622.

[B] His public employments . . . . did not prevent him from cultivating polite Learning.] We muſt underſtand this with ſome reſtriction; for it is certain that theſe employments diverted him very much from ſtudy. Honores, ſays he (4), in republicâ geſſi multos & magnos: quâ fide, quâ opinione, quâ gratiâ, non dixerim. Placet quidem impendiſſe annos penitus duodecim, ſed octo reipub. continuos: totum id tamen tempus literis fere periit.

(4) Herm. Barbarus, Epiſt. 31. lib. 12. inter Politiani Epiſtol.

[C] He publiſhed an Oration.] It was dedicated to Carondelet, who was then firſt Secretary to the King of the Romans. The author owns that he did not publiſh it entirely as he ſpoke it; but he declares at the ſame time, that he gave it juſt as he had prepared it. If he did not ſpeak all that he had prepared, it was becauſe the Courtiers had recommended to him to be ſhort, and to come immediately to the point. They were not ignorant that the ſtudy of polite Learning flouriſhed in Italy then, and that the Embaſſadors of that Country were fond of making long ſpeeches, filled with all the ornaments of Rhetoric. It was neceſſary therefore to reduce the two ſpeeches, which Hermolaus and his collegue had prepared, into one; and as this abridgment and reduction of them was to be done in an hour and an half's time, we may judge of Hermolaus's preſence of mind, who happily ſurmounted all theſe difficulties. Obſecro ne mirere ſi qua leges in hoc libello, quæ tunc dicta non fuerunt. Nec enim addidi nunc ea, ſed detraxi tunc, admonitus ab aulicis extemplo quam limen attigi ne longus eſſem, ambitioſa reciderem, optima quæque dicerem, patientiſſimis omnino, ſed occupatiſſimis tamen Principibus parcerem. Amputavi ſubito conſilio multa. . . . . Conſiderans hoc & æſtimans quod ſeſqui horam antequam Principes adiremus ſignificatum nobis fuerit non duas orationes ſeorſum, ut cogitabamus & paraveramus, ſed unam duobus junctim habendam & recitandam eſſe (5).

(5) Herm. Barbar. Epiſt. ad Carondelet. inter Epiſt. Politian. 45. lib. 12.

[D] He had a deſign to tranſlate all the works of Ariſtotle.] In this manner he ſpeaks in the Preface to his Pomponius Mela (6). Vocant nos majora quædam ſtudia, urgemuſque noſtrum illud vetus, omnes Ariſtotelis libros in Latinum vertendi exponendique propoſitum. Quod ſi ad exitum perduxero (nam bona ejus pars jam pridem peracta eſt) non dubito futurum, quin de reliquo in literis labore gratia mihi fiat. His tranſlation of Ariſtotle's Rhetoric was publiſhed after his death. See the article following.

(6) Apud Geſner. Bibliotb. fol. 317. verſo.

[E] He had an extraordinary facility in writing verſes: he compoſed above twelve thouſand.] Amongſt other there is none, which has gained him so much reputation as that, which he made upon Pliny. He corrected in him above five thousand passages; and restored occasionally three hundred in Pomponius Mela (d). There have not been wanting censurers with respect to this noble Work [F], no more than to his other performances [G]. He was Ambassador from the Republic of Venice to Pope Innocent VIII, when the Patriarch of Aquileia died. The Pope immediately conferred the Patriarchate upon him. Hermolaus was so imprudent as to accept it, without waiting for the consent of his Superiors [H], though he could not be ignorant that the Republic of Venice had made Laws to forbid all the Ministers, which they sent to the Court of Rome, to accept any Benefice. Hermolaus's excuses, which were founded upon the Pope's forcing him to take the Prelacy, were not heard. The Council of Ten signified to him in very severe terms, that he must renounce the Patriarchate; and that if he did not do it, his father should be degraded of all his Dignitles, and soon see all his estate confiscated. They were inflexible: Zachary Barbarus employed all the means imaginable to obtain the consent of the Republic to his son's being Patriarch; other pieces of Poetry he wrote a work of 600 verses, the title of which is the same with that of his grandfather Francis Barbarus's work: I mean that this Poem is entitled de Re Uxoriâ, but it is very different from the prose work under that name. Francis Barbarus prescribes rules, as well to those who would marry, as to those, who are already married (7): he enters so particularly into the subject, that he has one chapter de Coitus Ratione. Hermolaus confines himself to this question, Whether a wise man ought to marry (8)? and concludes for the negative.

(d) Hermol. Barbar. in præfat. ad Alexandr. VI.

(7) See the titles of the chapters of his book in the Bibliotheca of Gesner, folio 246 verso.

(8) Gesner, Biblioth. fol. 317.

[F] There have not been wanting censurers with regard to his work upon Pliny.] It is pretended that he has given too great a scope to his conjectures and his memory. Pintianus censures him very severely upon that account. Those who pardon his slips of memory, will not forgive him his rashness, and say very freely of him, that he attempted to correct a great many things, which were not faults, but which surpassed his understanding. It is true that in several editions of Pliny great regard has been had to Hermolaus's corrections, because they have been inserted in the text; but it has been a long time said, that this pretended Physician of Pliny had given him more wounds, than he had cured. I shall give this in Father Hardouin's words. Ipse (Hermolaus) in iis quæ attigit, sæpe nimium conjecturæ, memoriæ etiam plus quam hominem deceat, tribuit; uti paulo acerbius eam ob rem invectus in eum Pintianus olim exprobravit. Sed concessa facile venia μνημονικῶν ἁμαρτημάτων, quod minus mirum sit memoriam excidere aliquarum rerum, quam constare omnium; at non veniâ dignus æquè, cum neglectis veterum exemplarium vestigiis, & priscarum ante se editionum securus, plurima pro arbitrio, eruditè magis quam cautè ac verè, mutavit, vel planè peffumdedit: cum plurima ex iis quæ castigavit, non errata illa sint, sed parum intellecta. Tantum nihilominus auctoritati Barbari subsecuta ætas, eruditionique tribuit, ut conjecturas illius, ceu totidem κυρίους ὀδόντας in contextum inseruerit, unde eliminandæ a nobis variis argumentis fuere. Sensit jamdudum hanc labem operi Pliniano illatam auctor Epigrammatis alias haud perelegantis, in Commentarios a Stephano Aquæo editos, de quibus agendum mox erit. Sic enim ille;

Dum facere Hermoleos medicinam Barbarus optat
Non paucis lacero vulneribus Plinio;
Perlæsum gravius conjectâ vulnerat arte:
Nec minus incautâ plurima turba manu.
In tantum ut Latio jam deploratus abiret,
Ob multa in Stygias vulnera fessus aquas, &c.

Felicior aliquanto Sigismundus Gelenius, qui uno duntaxat archetyporum præsidio, collatis inter se exemplaribus, non pauca restituit, quæ Hermolao latuerant (9). I have quoted this long passage in order to convince Mr. Varillas more effectually, that he was mistaken in a point, which is pretty well known. But I am notwithstanding sufficiently persuaded that Hermolaus's work upon Pliny's Natural History is worthy of admiration, considering the great number of authors, which he was obliged to consult, and the little time that he wanted for doing it. Twenty months were sufficient for him, he says; he broke the ice for others; he found Pliny in a very wretched condition, and like a piece of land, which has been long uncultivated, and an house infected with the plague, or haunted with spectres. Hæc erant in Pliniano codice flagitia, propter quæ non parum multi divinum opus tanquam sentetum, imo verò quasi pestilens aut lemuribus infame domicilium vitabant. Ea nos Græcis & Latinis auctoribus perlectis omnibus lucubratione viginti mensium revellere ac publicare curavimus (10). With respect to Volaterranus's sentiment, that this was an employment inconsistent with the character of Hermolaus Barbarus, opus impar ejus dignitati & vitæ instituto (11), it has been very justly condemned, as well because Hermolaus had engaged in this work before he took Orders in the Church, as because it were to be wished that several Prelates would commit the same faults. Utinam sic a multis ejus dignitatis atque instituti peccaretur (12). Vossius adds another reason; which is, that Pliny did not make the Patriarch neglect his episcopal functions, as appears from his Sermons, which are preserved in manuscript at Padua. I should choose rather to say, that since the Venetians would not suffer him to accept of that dignity, he could not neglect his patriarchal functions in favour of Pliny. We may observe, that having published this work in 1492, he added an Appendix to it, which he called Secundæ Castigationes, and which is dated from Rome the 13th of January 1493.

(9) Hardouinus in præfat. in Plinium ad usum Delphini.

(10) Herm. Barbar. in Epilogo Operis, pag. 425. edit. Basil. an. 1534.

(11) Volaterranus, lib. 21. pag. 777.

(12) Cogitare debuerat Volaterranus, jam antea quam ad Episcopatum provectus esset, parata majori ex parte laboris esse, quæ ad istud opus pertinerent. Vossius de Hist. Latin. pag. 623. Hermolaus says only, Plinianas Castigationes, quas Legatus Romæ, nec dum sacris initiatus, inchoaveram. Præfat. ad Alexandrum VI.

[G] . . . . . No more than to his other performances.] His Translation of Themistius is not exact, if we believe Vossius. Ipse ille Themistius ab Hermolao Barbaro, dum nimium studet elegantiæ, tantâ conversus est libertate, ut sæpissimè longè aliud dicat quam senserit Themistius (13); and he has shewn by his Translation of Aristotle's Rhetoric, that he did not understand Greek sufficiently, if we may depend on Francis de Escobar (14). It is said that he was so full of Pliny, that he accommodated the words of Dioscorides too often to those of Pliny, when he translated the former. This Translation has been frequently criticised upon by Marcellus Virgilius. Doctè quidem & eleganter translati, sed (ut nonnullis videtur) nimis ad imitationem Plinii, quem dum ubique sequitur, à Dioscoridis verbis aliquando recedere videtur. Marcellus Virgilius, qui post Hermolaum eosdem Libros transtulit, plerumque interpretationem ejus carpit (15).

(13) Vossius de Philos. pag. 8.

(14) Apud Andream Schottum, Biblioth. Hispan. pag. 333.

(15) Gesner. in Biblioth. fol. 317 verso.

[H] Hermolaus was so imprudent as to accept the Patriarchate of Aquileia, without waiting for the consent of his Superiors.] No person, that I know of, has succeeded better than Peter Bembus in relating this fact: for which reason it will be very convenient and agreeable to those, who have not that Historian, to see here what he says. Eo mortuo Innocentius Patriarchatum (sic enim appellant) Aquileiensem . . . . Hermolao Barbaro, legato apud se Veneto attribuit. Quod ubi civitas intellexit, tametsi Hermolaus ad Senatum scripserat, coactum se à Pontifice vestem senatoriam mutavisse; quoniam tamen sacerdotiis cooptari cives Veneti, qui legati Romæ essent, lege prohibebantur, graviter tulit, ausum illum contra leges patrias facere. Auxit ejus rei magnopere invidiam, quod antea ex Hermolai literis, quas ad Senatum de Barbi morte dederat, more institutoque majorum comitiis senatoriis præjudicium patres fecerant, cujus ipsi civis nomen ad id adipiscendum sacerdotium Innocentio commendarit. Itaque deceptos in eo sese, ac prope delusos querebantur. Erat omnino Hermolaus, propter ejus summam in literarum atque optimarum artium studiis præstantiam, magnum apud exteras nationes nomen, apud suos quidem certe maximum: nam ad doctrinæ singularem opinionem, etiam vitæ perpetuam innocentiam adjunxerat. Simul is multum patris opibus & gratia, qui Patriarch; but not being able to gain any thing, he died of grief [I]. His ſon followed him ſoon after: ſome tell us, that he died likewiſe of grief [K]; but it is more probable that he died of the plague. Pierius Valerianus has placed him at the head of his Unfortunate Learned Men. He has carried the point too far, I think, when he ſays, that it is not even known whether Hermolaus Barbarus was buried [L]. This great man died at Rome in the year 1493. He teſtifies in his Letters a great reſignation, and tranquillity of mind, with reſpect to the treatment, which he had received from his Country (c). I do not think it can be affirm'd, that he was made Cardinal [M]. It is reported that he had recourſe to the Devil, to know the ſenſe of a Greek word [N], which Ariſtotle makes uſe of.

(c) See the remark [K].

qui ſummo proximum in civitate magiſtratum gerebat; multum clientelis, neceſſitudinibus, propinquatibuſque pollebat. Quibus tamen in rebus omnibus ſatis ſibi præſidii non habuit; cum pluris à patribus una legum charitas, majeſtaſque, quam ullorum civium omnibus aucta nominibus dignitas, atque claritas fieret. Decemviri enim literas ad eum ſeverè ſcriptas dederunt; morâ omni excuſationeque ſublata ſacerdotium repudiaret; id ſi non faceret, patrem magiſtratu remoturos, & bona ejus publicaturos præ ſe tulerunt. At pater, perſpectâ civitatis voluntate, omnibus tentatis rebus, cum jam eam flecti & leniri poſſe diffideret, ægritudine animi eſt mortuus. Filius non multo poſt Romæ, editis Plinianis Caſtigationibus, immenſi prope laboris opere, privatus plebeio morbo periit. Eum vitæ finem Hermolaus habuit, omnium ex ſua civitate, qui ante illum nati eſſent, Latinorum & Græcorum literis plane doctiſſimus (16).

(16) Bembus, Hiſt. Venetæ, lib. 1. fol. 18 verſo.

[I] His father . . . died of grief.] We have ſeen that Bembus aſſures us of it. The thing is probable enough; for he was a man in years, and filled one of the chief poſts of the Commonwealth. Such a ſevere proof of the decline of one's credit in one's old age, and to the prejudice of an illuſtrious ſon, whom one loves extremely, is generally a fatal blow. Zachary Barbarus died in the year 1492, fully reſigned to the orders of Providence: he was then entered into his 70th year; he was extremely regretted; his funeral pomp was magnificent. See Hermolaus's Letter to his friend Antonius Calvus (17). Accedit quod ſeptuageſimum ingreſſus annum, quandiu in familiâ noſtrâ vixit nemo; quod functus omnibus honoribus; quod republica incolumi; quod liberis honeſto loco poſitis; incredibili deſiderio & amore civitatis exceſſit, frequentiâ funeris tanta (ut audio) quanta in cive nunquam.

(17) It is the 32d of the 12th book of Politian's Letters.

[K] . . . . . It is ſaid that he likewiſe died of grief.] Volaterranus affirms it: Romæ deceſſit ex animi dolore exacerbante, quod orator a Venetis miſſus, præter ejus auctoritatem Senatus, Patriarcha Aquileienſis ab Innocentio fuerat creatus, ac propterea contumax & exul (18). I am ſtrongly of opinion that he died under the brand of a rebel and a baniſh'd perſon; for he always gave himſelf the title of Patriarch, notwithſtanding the preciſe orders, which he had received from his Sovereign to renounce the Patriarchate; but I believe he died of the plague and not of grief. My reaſons are, I, that after he was in diſgrace till his death he engaged in a work, which required a great freedom of mind, and a firm ſtate of health (19): II, That Peter Crinitus, who lived at that time, aſſures us that Hermolaus died of the plague (20). He does not aſſure us of this in a vague uncertain manner, but adds to his account a circumſtance which is very particular; and that is, that Picus of Mirandola, being informed at Florence, that Hermolaus was ſick of the plague, ſent him as ſoon as poſſibly he could an antidote, which he thought to be of ſovereign efficacy; but the meſſenger came too late. Paulus Jovius relates the ſame ſtory. Mors ante diem irrepſit & peſtilenti quidem morbo periit, adeò ut quod a Pico Politianoque Florentiâ laboranti per diſpoſitos equos mittebatur miræ poteſtatis antidotum, veneni celeritate præverterit (21). So that I can eaſily aſſent to the teſtimony, which Hermolaus Barbarus gives of himſelf, that he ſupported his diſgrace without grief, and even congratulated himſelf upon an injury, which put him into a full liberty of purſuing his ſtudies (22). His friends were fearful leſt he ſhould ſink under it, and his enemies publiſhed it every where. The latter were without doubt thoſe, who, in order to deprive him of the glory of his conſtancy and tranquillity, imputed to his grief what was only to be imputed to a contagious diſtemper. See in the remark [P] what I quote from Alcyonius.

(18) Volater. lib. 21. p. 777.

(19) The correction of Pliny.

(20) Crinitus de honeſtâ Diſciplinâ, lib. 1. cap. 7.

(21) Jovius, Elog. cap. 36.

(22) See the 31ſt Letter of the 12th Book of Politian's Epiſtles.

[L] Pierius Valerianus . . . . . ſays that it is not known whether Hermolaus Barbarus was buried.] I obſerve once more, that I believe Pierius Valerianus has carried things too far, when he ſays that this Patriarch dying in poverty, and being abandoned, was deprived of a burial: Ob ſuſceptum inconſulto ſenatu ſuo Aquilienſe ſacerdotium exſul factus, & de poſſeſſione ejectus vitam inopem aliquandiu traxit, Alexandri Pontificis ſummi ſportulâ quodammodo ſuſtentatus; paucis vero poſt menſibus peſtilentia contactus, deſertus ab omnibus, infeliciſſimo mortis genere oppreſſus eſt; quique laudatione, & eloquentia ſua innumeros ætatis ſuæ homines illuſtraverat, & funere, & honore ſepulchri ita defraudatus eſt, ut ubi ſepultus, quove hominis cadaver conjectum fuerit, ignoretur (23). Paulus Jovius, who wrote after Pierius Valerianus, not only ſays that Hermolaus Barbarus was buried, but even mentions the place of his burial. Scilicet ut nimis ſevera patria optimi civis oſſa non haberet, quæ ſub colle hortorum ad Flumentanam portam ſepulchro condita e Campo Martio ab erudita Romana juventute ſalutantur (24). Mr. de la Rochepozai (25), and Father Oldoini (26), ſhew more clearly the place of his burial; they fix it at St. Mary del Popolo. If Valerianus had only ſaid that the fear of the plague had driven away thoſe, who ſhould have aſſiſted the Patriarch (27), he would not have fallen into an hyperbole.

(23) Pier. Valer. de Litteratorum Infelicit. pag. 9.

(24) Jov. Elog. cap. 36.
(25) Rochepozai, in Nomenclat. Cardinal
(26) Oldoini, in Athen. Roman.
(27) See below the paſſage of Alcyonius.

[M] I do not think it can be affirm'd that he was made Cardinal.] Pierius Valerianus has not poſitively affirmed this; he ſays ſome things incompatible with it; but does Paulus Jovius, who has ſo plainly contradicted him with regard to Hermolaus Barbarus's burial, ſay that this Patriarch obtained a Cardinal's Hat? By no means: he only ſays that this honour was deſigned for him. Tuliſti quippe æquo animo ſuffragiorum ſeveritatem, quum ex eo tamen pari merito tibi purpura pararetur. Sed mors ante diem irrepſit (28). The author of the Nomenclator Cardinalium relates that Trithemius, who was followed in this by Pierius Valerianus, and ſeveral others, affirms, that Hermolaus Barbarus was raiſed to a Cardinalſhip. As for his own part, he affirms nothing; he only makes uſe of theſe words Cardinalis deſignatus, ſed ut fertur nondum evulgatus; that is, "He was deſigned to be made a "Cardinal, but not then, as it is reported, publickly "acknowledg'd ſo." Voſſius has quoted John Roche a Franciſcan, who affirms (29) that Hermolaus was made a Cardinal (30). Father Hardouin aſſerts the ſame thing (31).

(28) Valer. de Litterator. Infelicitate, pag. 9.

(29) In Compendio Hiſtorico.
(30) Voſſius de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 621.
(31) Præfat. in Plinium.

[N] It is reported that he had recourſe to the Devil, to know the ſenſe of a Greek word.] This word is ſo eſſential to the Natural Philoſophy of the Ariſtotelians, that while the ſenſe of it was not known, there was no poſſibility of underſtanding what Ariſtotle meant concerning the Nature of Body. I ſpeak of the word ἐντελέχια, which ſome Latin Writers, after having ſought to no purpoſe for others more proper, have at laſt render'd by that of Perfectihabia. Peter Crinitus ſpeaks as if Hermolaus himſelf had boaſted of this magical conſultation, and had ſaid that the anſwer was given in ſo low a tone of voice, that he could underſtand nothing of it. Et reverà perexilis vocula dæmonum & exigua eſt, quod olim noſter quoque Venetus Hermolaus dicebat, vocem ſe dæmonis prætenuem & pene ſubſibilantem audiſſe, qua ille de Ariſtotelis forte entelechia interrogatus, ſibi ipſi & Georgio Placentino reſponſitavit (32). I think I have gone to the original authority for this fact, in quoting Peter Crinitus; moſt Writers (33) only quote the Dæmonomania of Bodinus, where I have not yet found this Action of Hermolaus (34). Some quote Monlorius, who ſpeaks of it in his treatiſe de Entelechiâ. Laſtly, ſome pretend that Budæus is the inventor of Perfectihabia: you will find theſe words in Du Verdier Vau-Privas. "And even "thoſe, who have had a mind to praiſe him, have ſaid, "of him, Eſt fœliciſſimus quidem, ſed audaciſſimus in no-

(32) Crinit. de honeſtâ Diſciplinâ, lib. 6. c. 11.
(33) Father Rapin, Reflex. ſur la Philoſ. p. 350. Teiſſier Eloges, &c. tom. 1. pag. 355.
(34) I have not had leiſure to look page after page; but I could not find it in thoſe places, where it was probable that I ſhould find it.

of. We must not forget that Laurence de Medicis gave him marks of a singular esteem [O]. Mr. Varillas has given a very agreeable and elaborate account of Hermolaus Barbarus; but he is mistaken in a great many things, and much oftener than Moreri [P].

I shall quote a passage from Alcyonius, in which we shall find that our Harmolaus congratulated himself upon his disgrace; and that he never prosecuted his studies with so much application, as after his Country had ill treated him [Q].

BARBARUS

"wandis vocibus; that is, "He was very happy indeed, "but very bold in coining new words, as for instance "when he rendered the Entelechia of Aristotle Perfectihabia (35)." We may observe that several authors have maintained that Cicero has translated this word of Aristotle very ill (36).

(35) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoise, pag. 472. reporting what Genebrard said of Budæus.

(36) Joannes Ferrerius Pedemontanus confutes them in his Treatise de Entelechiâ.

[O] Laurence de Medicis gave him marks of a singular esteem.] He went to meet him notwithstanding his indisposition, and gave him a magnificent entertainment at his country-house. Read this Latin: Cum Hermolaus Barbarus Reipublicæ Venetæ nomine legationes forte per Italiam obiret, & ad urbem Florentiam obiter accederet, Laurentius Medices (qui Florentinam Rempublicam non minore tum consilio, quam fortunâ gubernabat) statim tanto viro cum amicis pluribus (ut fit) obviam procedit; nihil veritus, quod ægros pedes haberet, ac summis doloribus vexaretur. Tum in Caiana villa, (quam infinitis propè sumptibus ædificabat) honorificentissimè illum accepit, simulque tanti hominis ingenio, & doctrina singulari provocatus, eam quoque liberalissimè studiorum nomine illi obtulit, cum insigni atque instructissima bibliotheca, quam ad exemplum Philadelphi mira tum industria paraverat, ut in eo quasi Musarum secessu simul cum Pico Mirandula honestioribus disciplinis, ac philosophiæ sacris pro arbitrio incumberet. In quo Hermolaus Barbarus (ut homo maxime humanus) libenter se dixit, & studiorum causa, & Laurentii merito talem animum agnoscere, villamque ipsam, si per publicas curas liceret, excipere (37).

(37) Petrus Crinitus de honestâ Disciplinâ, lib. 15. cap. 9. pag. 400.

[P] Mr. Varillas has given a very agreeable account . . . . of Herm. Barbarus; but he is mistaken in a great many things, and much oftner than Moreri.] He says (38), I, That Hermolaus Barbarus past at Venice for the Nobleman, who above all others made profession of the highest and most refined gallantry. II, That no person ever saw him at study, and that no books were to be seen in his chamber or closet. I doubt the first of these two things, and think the second to be false. III, That having undertaken the greatest work, which was then in the Republick of Letters, (it was the correction of Pliny) (39), he made use of the authority of manuscripts, and of the Greek and Roman Writers, who had treated of the same subjects; and that in the places, where these two helps failed him, he made use of his own conjectures, with so much probability and success, that not one of them has been rejected. See the Confutation of this in the remark [F]. IV, That it was by this ingenious method, that he discovered that Pliny was born at Como, and that he wrote a Dissertation, which convinced all that read it. Of all the authors, which I have consulted concerning the Catalogue of Barbarus's works, I have not found one, that ascribes such a Dissertation to him. It is true in the Preface of Pliny, he seems to prefer the reading of Catullum congerronem meum to that of Catullum conterraneum meum, by which he eludes a very strong argument, which is drawn from this passage to prove that Pliny was of Verona. It is true, that independently of the reading Congerronem, which he will neither admit or reject absolutely, he declares that Pliny was of Como, and not of Verona; but he does enlarge upon this point; three lines are sufficient for him. This is not therefore what is called a Dissertation in form. Now tho' Mr. Varillas was right in this point, yet he has been guilty of a great error; for there is scarce any able and unprejudiced Critic, who has not always adjudged Pliny to the people of Verona. Causam dudum adjudicârunt Veronensibus eruditi, inter quos præcipui Polycarpus Palermus singulari opere de Plinii patriâ, & Scaliger. in Euseb. Chron. pag. 190 (40). Paulus Jovius's words being misunderstood very probably lead Mr. Varillas into this mistake. Novo-comensibus C. Plinium secundum civem suum ab imperitis invidiosè surreptum, eruditâ præclarâque sententiâ reddidisti (41). V, The wonderful desire, says he in his Anecdotes, which Barbarus had to remedy the disorders of Physic, made him undertake the same work upon Dioscorides, which he had executed upon Pliny. This is reverse of the proper order of time. Barbarus lived so short a time after his work upon Pliny's Natural History was published, that he formed no new designs; he had books enough to finish, and I do not doubt but that he wrote upon Dioscorides before he applied himself entirely to Pliny (42). VI, Hermolaus's friends advised him to rest and enjoy the glory, which he had gained by his Pliny and Dioscorides; but he himself told them, that he must translate what Themistius had left us upon Aristotle; and he executed it as he proposed. Here is a new Anachronism: the Translation of Themistius is one of the first, which Barbarus published. Themistii Peripatetici Paraphrases in aliquot Aristotelis Libros admodum adolescens Latinas effecit (43). He dedicated it to Sixtus IV, who had been dead eight years when he publish'd his Notes upon Pliny. VII, Hermolaus did the Republic justice against his own interest, and confest that they had reason to be against him. He conjured the Pope to confer the benefice upon him, who should be presented by the Embassador of Venice, and declared formally, that he would not have it, if he must on that account incur the envy of his Citizens. This seems to be a mere romance: we have seen above (44) in the passage of Peter Bembus, that the father of Hermolaus would never quit his hold, and that he endeavoured only to soften the Republic. Besides it is certain, that the new Patriarch always kept his title, and never submitted to his temporal Superiors. VIII, I cannot tell where Mr. Varillas read, that the only remedy to cure Hermolaus was to send him right bezoar, and that there was some at Florence in a vessel of agate, which the Sultan Caitbey had made a present of to Laurence de Medicis. Peter Crinitus, who ought to know as much of this as any person, says that the antidote belonged to Picus of Mirandola, who understood the composition of it. Pharmacon contra pestem, quod ille sibi si quando incidisset, asservabat diligentissimè, curat ut Romam quam celerrimè ad Hermolaum devehatur. Dicebat autem Picus illud ipsum ex oleo scorpionum linguisque aspidum, & aliis ejusmodi venenis confectum (45).

(38) Varill. Anecdot. de Florence, pag. 187, & seq.

(39) Mr. Varillas says that Pliny's Natural History contains 36 books: he should have said 37.

(40) Hardouin. in Plin. tom. 1. pag. 2.

(41) Jovius in Elog. cap. 36.

(42) See the following remark towards the end.

(43) Gesner. Bibliothec. fol. 318. The words in the Journal of Leipsic, pag. 461. for the year 1685, are not exact: Hos libros Themistii paraphrasticos Hermolaus Barbarus Venetiis A. 1570, in fol. edidit: for that edition was long after the author's death.

(44) Quotation (16).

(45) Petrus Crinitus, de honestâ Disciplinâ, lib. 1. cap. 7.

Moreri's errors consist in his saying, I, that the Senate did not approve the choice, which Innocent VIII made of Hermolaus Barbarus for Patriarch of Aquileia: II, that Herm. Barbarus publish'd Pliny's Natural History. The Senate would no less have disapproved of the election of any other person; and it was not on Hermolaus Barbarus's account, that the Senate was displeased with what Innocent VIII had done. They were angry that the Pope should pretend to dispose of the Patriarchate without consulting of them, and that Hermolaus had recognized the Pope's pretended right, by accepting of this dignity contrary to the laws of his country. He published his Corrections upon Pliny without the text of that author (46).

(46) All this Paragraph was at the end of the remark of the article of (FRANCIS) BARBARUS in the first edition.

[Q] A passage of Alcyonius will shew that Hermolaus . . . . never prosecuted his studies with so much application, as after his country had ill treated him.] This passage is as follows: it is Cardinal John de Medicis (47), who speaks. Exsilium igitur Barbaro non solum calamitatem detraxit, sed etiam dignitatem auxit, quod quidem ita constanter moderatèque ferebat, ut facetissimè jocaretur Musas illud sibi à patriâ impetrasse, quoniam ægrè ferrent hominem suis sacris initiatum ambitione vulgarium honorum distineri, & plebeis occupationibus impediri. Itaque plura scripsit biennio exsul quam XX ante annos cum patria frueretur, & honoribus illius florentissimus esset, recognitionem erratorum Pliniani codicis, explanationem librorum de animâ Aristotelis, cum tamen ante ejusdem Philosophi libros talis argumenti in Latinum convertisset, & XVI libros de ratione disserendi, veteres Peripatetici organon eos appellant; & V Rhetoricos & unum Poeticum, octoque Dioscoridæ Medicos, quos alio etiam opere instruxerat, quod Corollarium inscribebat. Adjecerat quoque pulcherrimam expositionem ad libros analyticos posteriores Aristotelis ante in Latinum tralatos (48). This seems to confute what I have said above,

(47) He was afterwards Pope Leo X.

(48) Petrus Alcyonius in Medice Legato priore de Exsilio.

BARBARUS (DANIEL) grand-nephew of the preceding procur'd himself a great reputation by his Learning. He published A Commentary upon the five Fragments of Porphyrius in the year 1542. Two years after he published A Commentary upon the three Books of Aristotle's Rhetoric to Theodectus, which had been translated into Latin by Hermolaus Barbarus. He wrote to Gesner, that he hoped to publish soon several works of Hermolaus (a). We are obliged to him for the edition of Speron Sperone's Dialogues.

(a) Taken from the Bibliotheca of Gesner, folio 192 verso.

(49) In the remark [P] num. 5 and 6.

above (49): but upon a careful examination I have nothing to apprehend; for besides that there may be some inaccuracy in this enumeration of Alcyonius, it is certain that part of the writings, which he mentions, are rather a revisal, or fuller exposition of what Hermolaus had done, than an entire new undertaking: and it is very plain, that Dioscorides had passed thro' his hands before his exile, and before his Corrections of the text of Pliny. This is a confirmation of what I have said against Mr. Varillas. Besides, we must observe that the writings in this Catalogue were not published before the author's death: so that he could not be exhorted to rest himself, by reason that his Pliny, and afterwards his Dioscorides had gained him glory enough. We shall see that Alcyonius observes, that these works of Barbarus were kept in manuscript in a Library Et hæc quidem omnia (50) adhuc diligentissimè asservari vidi à fratribus illius cum sedecim abhinc annos (51) Venetiis Bibliothecam illius exciterem, atque incredibili sum lætitiâ elatus, cum cognovi doctissimi amicissimique hominis elucubrationes non intercidisse, quod ne evenisset magopere verebar, cum in suburbano Oliverii Caraphæ collegæ mei ex pestilentiâ obiisset, & domestici intimique familiares fugâ salutis suæ consuluissent, omniaque tanquam bona caduca in medium reliquissent. Sed ejus generis scripta ab interitu & furto vindicata fuisse narrabant Zenotelis cujusdam operâ, quum ille habebat ad manum (52). I cannot deny but that Barbarus in the Epilogue to his Corrections upon Pliny promised an edition of Dioscorides: Scire oportet, says he (53), annotamenta hæc . . . Dioscoridi quoque propediem emittendo profutura; but I still insist upon it, that Mr. Varillas has not distinguished the times. There was a work of this author published upon Dioscorides before that upon Pliny, and after he had given the paraphrase of Themistius. See what follows: Primum quidem dum Themistii nobis paraphrasin atque id juvenis adhuc tam eleganter Latinè loquentem producit, mox edito in Dioscoridem corollario tam variam ac reconditam doctrinæ rerum omnium supellectilem depromit: postremum Plinio . . . succurrit (54).

(50) He should have excepted his work upon Pliny, which was published by the Author himself.

(51) Alcyonius supposes that the Cardinal John de Medicis said this about the year 1512.

(52) Alcyon. in Medice Legato priore.

(53) Herm. Barbar. in Monit. ad Lector. ad calcem Castigat. pag. 521.

(54) Jo. Oporinus, Epist. dedicat. Castig. Herm. Barbari in Plinium.

BARBARUS (DANIEL) of the same family with the preceding, was Patriarch of Aquileia, and famous for his Learning. He had engaged himself very deeply in Mathematics and Philosophy, before he had any Dignity in the Church; but after his promotion to the Bishoprick, he applied himself entirely to the study of Divinity. He was so prejudiced in favour of Aristotle, that he would readily have taken an oath of fidelity to him, if he had not been a Christian (a). He was Ambassador from Venice to England, when Pope Paul IV named him Coadjutor to the Patriarch Grimani (b). He was one of the Fathers of the Council of Trent, where he acted with great zeal for the Pope's interest. He voted strongly against those, who insisted upon the Communion in both kinds (c). He died in 1569 at forty one years of age (d). He published divers Works [A]; and if he had lived longer, without doubt would have published a great many more (e).

(a) Taken from Thuanus, lib. 46. p. 942.

(b) Pallavic. Hist. Concil. Trident. lib. 16. cap. 4. num. 22.

(c) Idem, lib. 18. cap. 4. num. 4. ad ann. 1562.

(d) Vossius de Scient. Mathem. pag. 355. Thuan. lib. 46. p. 942.

(e) Thuan. ibid.

[A] He publish'd divers works.] A Commentary upon Vitruvius, which was printed at Venice in 1567. La prattica della Perspectiva, printed at the same place in 1559 and 1568 (1). Catena Græcorum Patrum in quinquaginta Psalmos Latinè versa. Aubert Miræus (2), Moreri, Mr. Teissier (3), Konig, Paul Freher (4), &c. ascribe to him the Commentary upon the five Predicaments of Porphyry, and the Commentary upon Aristotle's Rhetoric, which I mentioned in the preceding article: but as the first of these Commentaries was printed in 1542, and the second in 1544, it is plain that they are not the Production of our Daniel Barbarus, who was born in the year 1528 (5). (6) Freher, thro' a very strange mistake, has said that our Daniel Barbarus, who died in the year 1569 at forty years of age, had obtained of Pope Innocent VIII, to whom he was Embassador from Venice, the Patriarchate of Aquileia.

(1) Vossius de Scient. Mathem. p. 355 and 425.

(2) De Scriptor. Sæculi 16.

(3) Teissier, Addit. à Mr. de Thou, tom. 1. pag. 354.

(4) Freheri Theatrum Viror. Illustr. pag. 1465.

(5) That is according to Thuanus and Vossius.

(6) Freher. Theatr. Viror. Illustr. pag. 1465.

BARBARA, wife of the Emperor Sigismond, was the daughter of Herman Count of Cilia in Hungary. Sigismond had been taken by the Hungarians, and placed under the guard of two young Gentlemen, whose father he had put to death. While they had him in custody, he persuaded their mother to let him escape. This was not gained without a great many excuses for the death of her husband, and a great many promises. He promised among other things to marry the daughter of the Count of Cilia, a near relation of that widow, which promise he performed (a). He had the most extraordinary wife of her that ever was seen. She had no manner of shame for her abandoned life. This is not the thing in which her great singularity consisted; for there are but too many Princesses, who are above being concerned at any imputations on account of their lewdness. What was extraordinary in her was her Atheism [A], a thing, which there is scarce any instance

(a) Æneas Sylvius, in Addition. ad Anton. Panormitan. de Dictis & Factis Alphonsi, lib. 3. num. 44. p. 69.

[A] What was extraordinary in her was her Atheism, ... which we have scarce any instance of amongst the women.] I am not ignorant of what has been lately publish'd in a Satyr on the sex, which is, I think, the master-piece of Mr. Despreaux. We find in this new piece that even irreligion is represented as one of the enormities of the women.

Dans le sexe j'ai peint la piété caustique.
Et que seroit-ce donc, si, censeur plus tragique,
J'allois y faire voir l'Atheisme établi,
Et non moins que l'honneur le ciel mis en oubli?
Si j'allois y montrer plus d'une Capanée;
Pour souveraine loi mettant la destinée,
Du tonnerre dans l'air bravant les vains carreaux,
Et nous parlant de Dieu du ton de Des Barreaux?

" If the whole sex I should pretend to trace
" In whom their caustic piety's grimace.
" But should I a more tragic story tell,
" Shew a She-Atheist ridiculing Hell;
" More than one Capanea should I paint;
" What would you say, at Heaven to hear her rant;
" Laugh at the glories of a future state,
" And make the sovereign Law consist in fate;
" To brave Heav'ns thunders, and with scoffs despise
" The voice and lightnings of the vengeful skies;
" Against

inſtance of amongſt the women. She believed neither Heaven nor Hell [B], and ſhe laughed at the Nuns, who renounced the pleaſures of this life, and mortified their bodies. Sigiſmond found himſelf likewiſe ill married upon other accounts; for his wife Barbara engaged in plots with ſeveral great Lords of Bohemia, in order to drive him out of the Kingdom, and ſo to get another huſband. He diſcovered this contrivance, and condemned the Empreſs to perpetual impriſonment. When he was dead, ſhe was ſet at liberty (b); and as ſhe deſigned to marry again, ſomebody repreſented to her the example of the turtle-dove, who continues ſingle all her life, after the death of her firſt mate. If you will propoſe to me, replied ſhe, the example of beaſts, propoſe that of pigeons and ſparrows (c) [C]. She grew old at Grats, in Bohemia, without renouncing her debaucheries (d), and died there about the

(b) Ex Matthiæ Theatro Hiſtor. in Sigiſmunde, pag. 998.

(c) Æneas Sylvius, in Addition. ad Ant. Parnormit. num. 5. pag. 56.

(d) Gretii in Bohemiâ in vitâ turpi & fœdis libidinibus infami conſenuit. Mathias, Theatr. Hiſt. pag. 998.

" Againſt the great Creator to declaim,
" And with lewd tongue inſult his mighty name."

But all this may be true, tho' there are not above four or five women in France, who have given into theſe impious maxims. I would not deny that this prodigy is become a little leſs extraordinary, ſince the ſex does not value themſelves upon their ignorance ſo much as they did before. There is occaſion for a certain degree of falſe Metaphyſics to fall into this fatal abyſs of irreligion. However that be, I am very well perſuaded with the author of the Thoughts upon Comets, that it is not upon this account the women deſerve cenſure. Their fault is not Atheiſm; they make it a virtue not to enter into any deep train of reaſonings; ſo that they keep ſtrictly to their Catechiſm, being much more inclined to ſuperſtition than to impiety; they are great lovers of Indulgences and Sermons, and ſo much employed by a thouſand paſſions, which fall as it were to their lot, that they have neither time nor capacity enough to call in queſtion the articles of their faith (1). It is certain they would ſooner find out the ſecret of reconciling their paſſions and their religion, tho' it were even in Moliniſm itſelf, than an expedient to believe nothing.

(1) Penſees diverſes ſur les Comet. num. 142. pag. 421.

[B] She believed neither heaven nor hell.] Here is the picture, which Bonfinius has left of that woman. Barbaram Imperatricem eâ tempeſtate Græci diem obiiſſe ferunt, indomitæ libidinis mulierem, quæ inter adulteros publicè vitam duxit, proſtitutoque pudore viros ſæpius petiit quam peteretur. Quum ab omni religione deſtituta foret, ſuperos ac inferos eſſe negabat: religioſas ancillas, jejuniis aut oratorii rebuſque divinis intentas gravius increpabat, nullis aſſeverans moleſtiis ac inedia corpus eſſe macerandum, immò lautè paſcendum, in deliciis & voluptatibus alendum, & poſt mortem, cum nihil ſuperſit, nullam deorum animorumque curam eſſe ſubeundum (2).

(2) Bonfinius, Rerum Ungaricar. Decade 3. lib. 7. pag. 344, 345.

[C] If you will propoſe to me, ſaid ſhe, the example of beaſts, propoſe that of pigeons and ſparrows.] This is one of the fineſt common places in Morality, to ſhew men their diſorders, by comparing their irregular conduct with the regularity of beaſts. Men tear one another to pieces: man is a wolf to man (3); but beaſts of the ſame ſpecies never fight amongſt themſelves. It is by this argument that Horace endeavoured to make the Romans aſhamed for engaging in civil wars: Wolves and lions, ſaid he, do not act in that manner. He ſuppoſes that this objection is ſo ſtrong, that thoſe, to whom it is propoſed, would be reduced to a ſhameful ſilence.

(3) Homo homini lupus. Eraſm. Adagior. Chil. 1. num. 70. p. 48.

THE inconveniences of moral reflections taken from the conduct of beaſts.

Neque hic lupis mos, nec fuit leonibus
Unquam, niſi in diſpar, feris.
Furorne cæcus, an rapit vis acrior?
An culpa? reſponſum date.
Tacent, & ora pallor albus inficit,
Menteſque perculſæ ſtupent (4).

(4) Horat. Epod. 7.

" Ev'n wolves are to more gentle thoughts inclin'd,
" And prey but on another kind:
" What is it madneſs, is it ſtupid rage
" That doth the brutal arms engage?
" Or is it ſin? Speak: not one word will come;
" Tis cruel fate, that urges Rome."

Creech.

Juvenal has made uſe of the ſame moral reflection in his xvth Satyr. ver. 159.

Sed jam ſerpentum major concordia; parcit
Cognatis maculis ſimilis fera: quando leoni
Fortiter eripuit vitam leo? quo nemore unquam
Exſpiravit aper majoris dentibus apri?
Indica Tigris agit rabidâ cum tigride pacem
Perpetuam, ſævis inter ſe convenit urſis?
Aſt homini, &c.

" But ſerpents now more amity maintain!
" From ſpotted ſkins the Leopard does refrain;
" No weaker Lion's by a ſtronger ſlain.
" Nor from his larger tuſks the foreſt Boar
" Commiſſion takes his brother ſwine to gore.
" Tyger with Tyger, Bear with Bear you'll find " In leagues offenſive and defenſive join'd.
" But lawleſs man &c."

Tate.

Mr. Deſpreaux has extremely well tranſlated the Latin of theſe two Poets, and added new examples to them (5).

(5) See his 8th Satyr.

Voit-on les loups brigans, comme nous inhumains,
Pour détrouſſer les loups, courir les grands chemins?
. . . . . .
Un aigle ſur un champ prétendant droit d'aubeine
Ne fait point appeller un aigle à la huitaine:
Jamais contre un regard chicanant un poulet
Un renard de ſon ſac n'alla charger Rolet.
Jamais la biche en rut n'a pour fait d'impuiſſance
Traîné du fond des bois un cerf à l'audience:
Et jamais juge entre eux ordonnant le congrès,
De ce burleſque mot n'a ſali ſes arrêts.

" Who ever ſaw the wolves ſo bent on prey,
" To rob their fellow wolves upon the way?
. . . . . .
" No eagle does upon his peerage ſue,
" And ſtrive ſome meaner eagle to undo:
" No fox was e'er ſuborn'd by ſpite or pay
" To ſwear his brother fox's life away:
" Nor any hind for impotence at Rut
" Did e'er the ſtag into the arches put;
" Where a grave Dean the Congreſs might ordain,
" And with that burleſque word his ſentence ſtain."

How fine ſoever this common place may be, and how capable ſoever of affecting us, yet it has its weak ſide; for firſt it may be eluded by a ſtroke of pleaſantry; and ſecondly it may be ſeriouſly attacked by the common maxim,

Nil agit exemplum, litem quod lite reſolvit (6);

(6) Horat. Sat. 3. ver. 103. lib. 2.

—— —— " That example's vain,
" That ſolves all doubts by raiſing more again."

That is, it may be retorted, and by turning the tables, an advantage may be gained over the Moraliſt. I do not pretend to approve of thoſe, who oppoſe raillery to reaſon; but I ſay it is a very great diſadvantage to a point of reaſoning, that it may be turned to ridicule by perſons, who are fond of jeſting. We may prove this from an example. If any one had undertaken to make Mr. Bautru believe, that he had better chooſe an old miſtreſs than a young one, and had quoted a paſſage from Pliny, where it is ſaid, that the rams ſeek old ewes rather than young ones; would not ſuch a perſon have been confounded by this humorous anſwer (7), That is becauſe they are rams (8)? A Roman Lady made uſe of a thought of that kind to a man, who could not comprehend why the females among beaſts do not deſire the male but when they want to become mothers: This is, replied the Lady, becauſe they are beaſts. Simile dictum Populiæ Marci filiæ, quæ miranti cuidem quid eſſet quapropter aliæ beſtiæ nunquam marem deſiderarent, niſi cum prægnantes vellent fieri, reſpondit, beſtiæ

(7) See Menagiana, pag. 323. of the firſt edit. of Holland.

(8) Vervecum in patriâ craſſoque ſub aëre naſci. Juven. Sat. 10. ver. 50.

the year 1451. The Bohemians notwithſtanding gave her a magnificent funeral at Prague, and buried her in the tomb of their Kings, as we are aſſured by Bonfinius in the VII Book of the III Decade. Prateolus has not omitted her in his alphabetical catalogue of Heretics; in which he has made himſelf very ridiculous; for ſhe never forged any new opinions, or raiſed her beſtiæ enim ſunt (9). Was not this a terrible and confounding ſtroke to the enquirer? And thus much for the firſt inconveniency. The other is no leſs ſo; for in ſhort a man, whom you ſhould ſend to the ſchool of beaſts to learn his duty, would tell you that he deſires nothing better. I ſhould learn there, he would ſay, to ſubject right to force; a dog, that is ſtronger than another dog, makes no ſcruple of taking his portion away from him. What is more common than to ſee dogs fighting with each other? Do not chickens fight together in the ſight of their common mother? Do not cocks fight ſo furiouſly with one another, that ſometimes nothing but the death of one of them will put an end to the battle? Do not pigeons, the ſymbol of gentleneſs, very often come to blows? What is more furious than the battle of bulls? Is it not force, that decides their diſputes in the affair of love?

(9) Macrob. Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 5. in fine.

——— Ignotis perierunt mortibus illi,
Quos Venerem incertam rapientes MORE FERARUM
Viribus editior cædebat, ut in grege TAURUS (10).

(10) Horat. Sat. 3. lib. 1. ver. 108.

" They fought, and fell unknown, like beaſts they " ſtray'd,
" Each caught his willing female, and enjoy'd;
" Till one more ſtrong kill'd him, and was preferr'd,
" Juſt as the greater bull amongſt the herd."
CREECH.

Illi alternantes multa vi prælia miſcent
Vulneribus crebris; lavit ater corpora ſanguis,
Verſaque in obnixos urgentur cornua vaſto
Cum gemitu; reboant ſilvæque & magnus Olympus:
Nec mos bellantes una ſtabulare, ſed alter
Victus abiit, longèque ignotis exulat oris,
Multa gemens, ignominiam plagaſque ſuperbi
Victoris, tum quos amiſit inultus amores,
Et ſtabula aſpectans regnis exceſſit avitis (11).

(11) Virgil. Georgic. lib. 3. ver. 220.

" The ſtooping Warriours, aiming head to head,
" Engage their claſhing horns, with dreadful ſound;
" The foreſt rattles, and the rocks rebound.
" They fence, they puſh, and puſhing loudly roar;
" Their dew-laps, and their ſides are both in gore.
" Nor when the war is over, is it peace;
" Nor will the vanquiſh'd bull his claim releaſe;
" But feeding in his breaſt his antient fires,
" And curſing fate, from his proud foe retires,
" Draw'n from his native land to foreign grounds,
" He with a generous rage reſents his wounds,
" His ignominious flight the victors boaſt,
" And more than both, the loves, which unreveng'd
" he loſt.
" Often he turns his eyes, and with a groan
" Surveys the pleaſing Kingdoms once his own."
DRYDEN.

Shall not I learn at the ſchool, which you ſend me to, the moſt unnatural barbarity? Are not there beaſts which devour their young ones? Shall not I learn inceſt there?

——— Sed enim damnare negatur
Hanc Venerem pietas, coëuntque animalia nullo
Cætera delectu, nec habetur turpe juvencæ
Ferre patrem tergo: ſit equo ſua filia conjux,
Quouſque creavit init pecudes caper, ipſaque, cujus
Semine concepta eſt, ex illo concipit ales.
Felices quibus iſta licent; humana malignas
Cura dedit leges, & quod natura remittit
Invida jura negant (12).

(12) Myrrhe in Ovid. Metam. lib. 10. ver. 323.

——— " No piety
" Condemns ſuch Venus; Nature's common tie.
" Horſes their fillies back, ſires heifer's bear;
" Goats kids beget on thoſe, whoſe kids they were.
" Birds of that ſeed conceive, whereof but late
" Conceiv'd themſelves; nor they degenerate.
" Happy in this are thoſe! But human care
" Hath fram'd malignant laws; and we, who are
" By nature free, malicious cuſtoms bind." SANDYS.

Shall not I learn there to lay hold on every thing, that is within my power, in order to make proviſion for myſelf like the ant?

——— ——— ——— Sicut
Parvula, nam exemplo eſt, magni formica laboris,
Ore trahit quodcunque poteſt, atque addit acervo
Quem ſtruit, haud ignara ac non incauta futuri (13).

(13) Horat. Sat. 1. lib. 1. ver. 32.

" As the ſmall ant (for ſhe inſtructs the man,
" And preaches labour) gathers all ſhe can;
" And brings it to increaſe her heap at home,
" Againſt the winter, which ſhe knows will come."
CREECH.

Shall not I reſcue myſelf from the hard ſervitude, under which ſo many perſons groan, and which extorts from them ſuch mournful complaints as theſe?

Que votre bonheur eſt extrême
Cruel lions, ſauvages ours,
Vous qui n'avez dans vos amours,
D'autre regle que l'amour même!
Que j'envie un ſemblable ſort!
Et que nous ſommes malheureuſes,
Nous, de qui les loix rigoureuſes
Puniſſent l'amour par la mort (14)!

(14) Theſe verſes are from Paſtor Fido, according to the Counteſs De la Suze's tranſlation.

It is impoſſible therefore to deny, that the example, which we may find of all kinds of irregularity in the ſchool of brute beaſts, weakens a little the moral reflections, which I mentioned in the beginning of this remark; for ſince according to Divinity all beaſts are exempt from ſin, it cannot be ſaid that for the puniſhment of ſome fault ſome have fallen into diſorder, while others in reward for their good works have been continued in a regular courſe. So that all that they do is equally regular; and if any perſon ſhall aſk you, as Sigiſmond's widow did, Why would you have me imitate the turtle-dove rather than the pigeon or the ſparrow? you would have nothing of any force to reply to this, unleſs you conſult the foundations of morality, which you would be obliged to conſult, if you did not make uſe of the example of the turtle-dove. What could Mr. Deſpreaux anſwer to a Sophiſter, who ſhould maintain that his rutting Hind is a very falſe compariſon? For to make it a good one, it is neceſſary, that this beaſt ſhould be in the ſame caſe, in which thoſe women are, who ſue a man at law for impotency. How is it poſſible that an hind ſhould be in ſuch a caſe? Does ſhe engage her faith to a ſingle ſtag? If one fails her, does ſhe not find others? Mr. Deſpreaux's invective and ſevere cenſure would be well founded in a country, where the laws of marriage are unknown; but it is very certain that in ſuch a country the men would not be any more expoſed than the ſtags to a ſuit on account of impotency, and no body would be condemned to the congreſs by a Decree of Parliament.

However what I have ſaid above does not hinder me from thinking that the reflections, which we are ſpeaking of, are very proper to make an impreſſion upon the greateſt part of mankind. I do not blame therefore Francis de Sales, who has propoſed the elephant for an example of chaſtity, and I condemn the Empreſs Barbara's anſwer. There might be a thouſand things ſtarted upon this ſubject. The actions of Beaſts are perhaps one of the moſt profound abyſſes, which our reaſon can exerciſe itſelf upon; and I am ſurprized that ſo few people perceive it. But let us ſee the words of Francis de Sales. The elephant, ſays he (15), is only a great beaſt; but yet the worthieſt and moſt ſenſible of any upon earth. I ſhall ſpeak a word of his chaſtity; he never changes his female; he loves her tenderly whom he has choſen, and yet he cohabits with her but every third year, and this only for five days, and ſo ſecretly, that he is never ſeen in the act; but he appears on the ſixth day, when before all things he goes directly to the river, in which he waſhes his whole body, without ever returning to the herd, till he is purified. Does not this beaſt ſhew a noble and chaſte her self to be the head of a Sect; she only gave into such impieties as are common to all ages. In every country the profane and impious have always ridiculed those persons, who expose themselves out of a principle of Religion to the burning of the flesh, rather than follow the inclinations of nature (e).

(13) Introduct. à la Vie devote, Part 3. chap. 39. de l'Honneteté du Lit. nuptial.

(e) Barbara ... stultas appellabat Virgines, quæ pro Christinomine passæ fuissent, propterea quod voluptatis gaudia non gustassent. Pratcol. p. 85.

disposition, by which he calls upon married persons not to attach themselves too much to the sensuality and pleasure, which they have gratified according to their calling, but when those are past to wash their heart and affections, and to purify themselves as soon as possible, in order to practise afterwards with a greater freedom of mind other actions, which are more pure and elevated, &c. What is said of the elephant is taken from Aristotle (16), Pliny (17), and Ælian (18). Claudius Despensius in his Treatise of the State of Widowhood, where he speaks of Monogamy, had already observed this of the elephant, and represented him together with the turtle-dove as noble examples of modesty and chastity to Christians.

(16) Arist. Hist. Animal. lib. 5. cap. 25.
(17) Plin. lib. 8. cap. 5.
(18) Ælian. Hist. Animal. lib. 8. cap. 17.

BARBERINI (FRANCIS) one of the most excellent Poets of his age, was born in the year 1264 at Barberino in Tuscany. As his mother was of Florence, he went and settled himself in that City, where his profession of the Law, but especially the beauty of his Poetry, raised him a very considerable character. The greatest part of his works are lost. That, which was intitled, The precepts of Love [A], had better fortune. It was published at Rome, adorned with beautiful figures in the year 1640, by the care of Frederic Ubaldini, who thought this was a proper method of paying his court to the higher powers; for the family of Barberini, which was descended from this Poet, was at that time possessed of the Popedom. He prefixed to that work the Author's life, with several Elogiums upon him; and as there are in these verses a great many words which are not in use now, he added a glossary to it, in order to explain them, which illustrates or confirms the sense of them by the authority of contemporary Poets (a).

(a) Taken from the Journal of Leipsic. Sect. 8. tom. 1. of the Supplem. p. 349.

[A] His Poem entitled The Precepts of Love has been preserved.] This is equivocal: it might be imagined that this Poem is a school of coquettry, like that of Ovid de Arte Amandi; but this would be a great mistake. There is nothing in the world more moral than this Poem of Barberini. It contains nothing but rules to instruct those in their duty, who have a regard for glory, virtue, and eternity (1).

(1) Journal of Leipsic, p. 249. tom. 1. of the Supplement.

BARCLAY or BARCLEY (a) or BARKLAY (b), or DE BARKLAY (c) (ALEXANDER) a learned Writer in the 16th Century, was descended from an antient family in Scotland, where he was born, according to Dr. Mackenzie [A], tho' Pits and Mr. Wood are of opinion that he was an Englishman; and the latter thinks, that he was born at or near a town of the same name with himself in Somersetshire. Of what rank or quality our Author's parents were, or the time of his birth, we have no particular account; but when he had finished the course of his studies at home, he was transplanted to the University of Oxford, and entered into Oriel-College there, of which his great patron and favourer of his studies, Thomas Cornish, afterwards Bishop of Tyne, was then Provost (d). From Oxon he went over to Holland, and from thence to Germany, Italy, and France. During his travels into these countries he learned their Languages to great perfection (e), and improved himself in all parts of Learning, as appears from his translations and other works [B]. Upon his return to England he found his Patron, the Provost of Oriel College, preferred to the Bishoprick of Tyne, who made him his Chaplain, and afterwards one of the Priests of the College of St. Mary at Otery in Devonshire, founded by John Grandison Bishop of Exeter. But Bishop Cornish dying soon after, he entered into the Order of St. Benedict; but the rules of that Society not pleasing him, he changed his habit, and became a Franciscan Friar (f). Upon the dissolution of the Monasteries, he obtained the Vicarage of Much Badew or Baddow in Essex, being at that time Doctor of Divinity; and in 1546 he became Vicar of the Church

(a) Pitseus, Relation. Histor. de Rebus Anglic. ad ann. 1552. Numb. 989. pag. 745. edit. Paris. 1619.

(b) Dr. George Mackenzie's Lives and Characters of the most eminent Writers of the Scots Nation, vol. 11. pag. 287. edit. Edinburgh 1711.

(c) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 86. 2d edit. London 1721.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Mackenzie, ubi supra.

(f) Idem, ibid. and Wood, ubi supra.

[A] Descended from an antient family in Scotland, where he was born, according to Dr. Mackenzie.] That Writer tells us, that the Barklies, from whom this Gentleman, says he, was descended, are of a very antient standing in Scotland. For we find Walter de Berkeley in the reign of King Malcolm IV about the year 1152, and both in the Registers and Chronicles this Walterus de Berkeley throughout all King William's reign is stiled Camerarius Regis, or the King's Chamberlain. And in the time of King Alexander III in the year 1252 Fordon mentions David de Berkeley. Hence Dr. Mackenzie concludes, that our Author was not born in England; and tells us, that Pits, one of the English Biographers, acknowledges him to be a Scots Man. But he is evidently mistaken in his last assertion, since Pits expressly says (1), that though some persons imagined him to be a Scot, he was really an Englishman, and very probably of Devonshire. Quibusdam Scotus videtur, sed Anglus verè fuit, patriâ, ut probabile est, Devoniensis. Bale * leaves this point doubtful, and observes, that some assert, that he was born in Scotland, and others in England. Quem alii Scotum alii Anglum fuisse contendunt.

(1) Pag. 745.

* Script. Illustr. Major. Brytann. Cent. IX. num. 66. p. 723. edit. Basil. 1557.

[B] His translations and other works.] I. The Figure of our Mother Holy Church oppressed by the French King. Printed at London by Richard Pynson in 4to (2). II. The Miseries and miserable Lives of Courtiers (3). III. The Lives of several Saints, translated from Latin into English verse, particularly that of St. George, the Patron of England, and St. Margaret, the Patroness of Scotland, St. Catherine, St. Ethelreda, and others, amongst Mr. Selden's manuscripts (4). IV. Navis Stultifera, or the Ship of Fools. Printed at London by Richard Pynson 1509 (5), and 1509 in fol. (6), and 1570 in 4to (7). This work consists of divers verses of his own composition, and several translations from the Latin, French and Dutch into English, and dedicated to his Patron Dr. Thomas Cornish, Bishop of Tyne, and Suffragan Bishop of Wells (8). It is adorned with a great variety of pictures printed from wooden cuts. The original Author of this book was Sebastian Brantius, who was celebrated in his time for his excellent compositions (9). V. A translation of Sallust's History of the Jugurthine War into English (10). VI. The Castle of Labour, translated from the French into English (11). VII. Several Poems of John Baptista Mantuanus, Bale, Pits, and Dempster in his Histor. Eccles. Gentis Scot. lib. 2. mention several other of his translations.

(2) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 86.
(3) Idem, ibid.
(4) Idem, ibid. and Mackenzie, pag. 294, 295.
(5) Wood, Col. 87.
(6) Mackenzie, pag. 295.
(7) Idem, ibid.
(8) Wood, Col. 87. Dr. Mackenzie calls him Suffragan Bishop of Wales.
(9) Wood, ibid.
(10) Bale and Pits, ubi supra.
(11) Idem, ubi supra.

Church of St. Matthew the Apoſtle at Wokey in Somerſetſhire upon the deceaſe of Mr. Richard Eryngton, which ſeems to be all the preferment that he obtained till his death (g). He lived to a very advanced age (b), and died at Croyden in Surry in June 1552, in the reign of King Edward VI, and was buried in the Church there (i). We ſhall give his character in the note [C].

(g) Mackenzie and Wood, ubi ſupra.

(b) Wood, col. 87.

(i) Jo. Balæus, Scriptorum illuſtrium Majoris Brytanniæ, Centur. 9. cap. 66. p. 723. edit. Baſileæ 1557, and Pitſeus, ubi ſupra.

[C] We ſhall give his character in the Note.] Bale tells us, that he was an excellent Poet and Orator, and eminent for his Learning, but very variable in his profeſſion of Religion, ſometimes executing the functions of a Prieſt, and at other times appearing as a Benedictine or Franciſcan Monk, without attaching himſelf long to any particular method of life. And he informs us, that in every ſtation he was averſe to truth, (by which it is to be preſumed Bale meant the Reformation of Religion,) and guilty of the moſt ſcandalous debauchery and adultery under the covert of celibacy. However he acknowledges that his tranſlations and writings were very elegant. Poeta ac rhetor inſignis, ab eruditis artibus magnam ſibi, dum viveret, exiſtimationem peperit. Plures ſectas ille probavit; quandoque ſacrificulum, quandoque Benedictinum aut Franciſcanum induens; nulli certus; ſed in illis omnibus Veritatis oſor, & ſub cœlibatûs fuco fœdus adulter perpetuò manſit. Multa tamen in Anglicum ſermonem eliganter ille tranſtulit ac ſcripſit. Mr. Wood's reflection upon this paſſage is (11), that Bale gives an ill report of our Author, becauſe he lived and died a ſingle man; whereas that Writer's objection againſt him, if true, is on account of the looſeneſs of his morals, and not merely becauſe he lived in celibacy. Pits gives him the character of a man well ſkilled in polite Literature, and no ordinary Poet and Orator; and obſerves, that he applied all his ſtudies to Religion, and ſpent his time in reading and writing the Lives of the Saints. Vir cultioribus diſciplinis benè inſtructus, Poetâ & Rhetor non vulgaris. . . . . Omnè ſuum ſtudium in rebus piis & hiſtoriis ſanctorum legendis atque ſcribendis poſuit. Mr. Wood has copied this character of him from Pits; and Dr. Mackenzie (12) tells us from Dempſter, that he was as famous for his talents in Oratory and Poetry, as any of his contemporaries. T.

(11) Col. 86.

(12) Pag. 294.

BARCLAY (WILLIAM) a learned Civilian in the XVIth Century, was of Aberdeen in Scotland, and of a very good family [A]. Though he had been in favour with Queen Mary Stuart, yet he could not make his fortune in the leaſt at the Court of the King of Scots who was ſon to that Princeſs. This made him take a reſolution to retire to France in the year 1573 (a); and though he was then near thirty years of age, yet he went to ſtudy Law at Bourges. Some time after he took his Doctor's Degree there [B]; and as he was a man of great wit, and applied himſelf extremely to ſtudy, he ſoon made himſelf able to teach the Civil Law. Edmund Hay the Jeſuit, his uncle, procured him a Profeſſorſhip in that ſcience in the Univerſity of Pontamouſſon, by his intereſt with the Duke of Lorrain, who had lately founded that Academy. This Duke not only conferred upon Barclay the firſt Profeſſorſhip, but he made him likewiſe Counſellor in his Councils, and Maſter of the Requeſts of his Palace. Barclay married in 1582 (b) a young Lady of Lorrain (c), by whom he had a ſon, who was afterwards a very famous man, and the innocent occaſion of his father's conteſt with the Jeſuits. This youth had ſo promiſing a genius, that they endeavoured as much as poſſible to engage him in their Society. His father was diſpleaſed at this; and they reſented it ſo highly on their part, and did him ſo many ill offices with the Duke, that he was obliged to leave Lorrain. He went to London to King James, who offered him a place in his Council, with a very good penſion; but he refuſed theſe offers, on account of the condition that was annexed to them, which was, that he ſhould embrace the Religion of the Church of England. He returned to France in the beginning of the year 1604, and accepted a Profeſſorſhip in Civil Law, which was offered him by the Univerſity of Angers. He taught there with great applauſe [C] till

(a) The Life of John Barclay prefix'd to the Argenis places it in the year 1571.

(b) See the remark [A] of the following Article.

(c) Her name was Anne de Malleville.

[A] He was of a very good family.] Namely that of Barclay, which is allied to all the beſt families in Scotland, as appears from a Patent of King James, printed before the Argenis. I make uſe of the word Patent, becauſe it is not a ſimple letter written to the Duke of Lorrain, as Mr. Menage aſſures us (1); but a Letter ſealed with the great Seal of the Kingdom, and addreſſed to every perſon in the uſual form, To all to whom theſe preſents ſhall come, Greeting. Mr. Menage is very excuſable in his miſtake, but he that put this ſubſcription to King James's Atteſtation, Epiſtola Jacobi, Scotiæ Regis, Carolo Lotharingiæ Duci, is a deceiver, or an ignorant, who cannot poſſibly be excuſed. He ought to have read this writing, ſince he cauſed it to be prefixed to a book (2); now he could not find a line in it, which did not ſhew, that it was not a Letter written to the Duke of Lorrain. The Italian Tranſlator of the Argenis (3) tells us, that the relations of Mademoiſelle Malleville would not conſent to her marriage with William Barclay, till they ſaw proofs of the Nobility, which he boaſted of. He adds that this was not the cauſe of the leaſt uneaſineſs to Barclay, but only on account of the amorous impatience, that tranſported him; for he was obliged to wait for the coming of a certificate, before he could taſte the pleaſures of enjoyment. The relations of the fair Lady, continues he, had no ſooner ſeen the Royal Atteſtation, than they were the firſt to haſten the marriage. One cannot but be aſtoniſhed, when one reads theſe things in the ſame page, in which the Certificate of the King of Scotland is; for that Prince declares expreſly that Barclay had a wife already (4); and this appears likewiſe from the date of the Atteſtation (5). This date is above a month later than the birth of John Barclay, the ſon of William, and of Mademoiſelle Malleville. We ſee how the amorous William Barclay was obliged to ſuffer the ſuſpenſion of his happineſs by waiting for a Certificate. The author of the Latin Life of John Barclay was in the ſame miſtake: the Atteſtation, according to him, was required, that he might ſhew himſelf as a man of quality to his future ſpouſe. Cum Annâ de Malavillâ contracturus nuptias ex Scotia Regias Literas accerſivit, quibus ingenuæ nobilitatis titulos futuræ ſponſæ approbaret.

(1) Menage, Remarq. ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 228.

(2) It is printed before the Argenis.

(3) His name is Franceſco Pona; he has written the Life of John Barclay, which he has prefixed to his tranſlation of the Argenis.

(4) In Lotharingiâ conſidiſſe ibique affinitatem genere moribuſque ſuis non indignam contraxiſſe.

(5) The 19th of March 1582. Moreri ſays the 28th.

[B] He ſtudied Civil Law at Bourges . . . . and took his Doctor's Degree there.] Cujacius preſided at that Act (6). It is a very great error to ſay, that Barclay's marriage did not interrupt his ſtudies, and that having continued them after his entrance into that State of life, from a Scholar he became a Doctor, and from a Doctor a Profeſſor of Civil Law. Lequali (nozze) non rompendo il bel filo de gli ſtudii di lui, ſucceſſe che di ſcolare ch'egli era, paſſato al grado del Dottorato, riceve una lettura principale di Leggi (7).

(6) Menage, Remarq. ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 228.

(7) Franceſco Pona, in his Life of John Barclay, before the Italian tranſlation of the Argenis.

[C] He taught at Angers with great applauſe.] "When he went to read his Lectures, he was followed "by his ſon and two ſervants, in a magnificent gown, "and a great gold chain about his neck (8)."

(8) Menage, Remarq. ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 231.

till his death, which happened about the end of the year 1605 [D]. He was buried in the Franciſcan Church (d). He publiſhed ſeveral books [E], and among the reſt one, in which he refuted ſome authors, who, though they were of different Religions, yet agreed upon Republican Maxims in favour of Religion [F]. He had an averſion to the Calviniſts [G]; and it is very probable that the condition, in which he ſaw his Country, and which he had left for the ſake of the Catholic Religion (e), had raiſed in him that ſpirit of bitterneſs againſt them.

(d) Taken from Mr. Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de Pierre Ayrault, p. 228, & ſeq.

(e) Quas (litteras) cum idem Guillelmus videret una cum avitâ religione ſordeſcere, principem verò ſuam marceſcere in infamis carceris ſitu, dolore confectus migravit anno 1571 Lutetiam. Vita Jo. Barclaii.

[D] He died about the end of the year 1605.] Moreri, being deceived by Nicius Erythræus and others, has put the year 1609 inſtead of 1605. He thought with reaſon that our Barclay went to teach Civil Law at Angers in 1604, and he found in Nicius Erythræus that this Profeſſor lived five years after he had taken poſſeſſion of that place. Ab Andibus optimis conditionibus evocatur, ut in ipſorum gymnaſio primariam juris civilis cathedram obtineret, ubi cum jam quinquennium docuiſſet eſt mortuus (9). It was eaſy to conclude that he did not die till about the year 1609. But the Italian Author is miſtaken, ſince beſides the authority of Mr. Menage I can alledge this reaſon: that William Barclay was dead before the differences between Paul V and the Venetians were terminated. Accendebat hominem & pietate & jam ſenectâ liberiorem illæ turbæ, quas multi ominabantur, cum Pontifex in Anglum Venetoſque diſtrictus, illum quidem jam à ſacris noſtris alienum acerbare, hos autem alienari videbatur. Sed tam pium conatum intercepit felix & in Chriſto obitus. This we find in the Preface to the book de Poteſtate Papæ (10). The differences between the Pope and the Republic of Venice were ended in the year 1607. The Sieur Witte being perhaps deceived by Moreri only, has placed Barclay's death in the year 1609 (11).

(9) Nic. Erythr. Pinacoth. 3. pag. 76. Paul Freher, Theatr. p. 1515. makes his Profeſſorſhip to laſt five years; he quoted Imperialis and Thomaſin.

(10) Mr. Menage aſcribes this preface to John Barclay the ſon of William. See p. 228. of his Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayrault.

(11) Witte in Appendice Diarii Biographici.

[E] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] Among others Præmetia upon the Life of Agricola, and a Commentary upon the Title of the Pandects de Rebus creditis & de Jurejurando. He publiſh'd it at Paris in the year 1605. But the two works, which made him moſt famous are his Treatiſe of the Power of the Pope, and his Treatiſe of the Power of Kings. The firſt is entitled, De Poteſtate Papæ, an & quatenus in Reges & Principes ſeculares jus & imperium habeat: the ſecond is entitled, de Regno & regali Poteſtate, adverſus Buchananum, Brutum, Boucherium, & reliquos Monarchomachos. He publiſh'd this laſt work at Paris in the year 1600, and dedicated it to Henry IV. The other was not publiſhed till after the author's death, who durſt not own that he was about ſuch a work. Et quidem de Regno libros quibus popularem ambitum exagitabat nulla diſſimulatione conſcripſit. Sed hoc opus (DE POTESTATE PAPÆ) ſecreto aggreſſus eſt, cum tunc aliquid Pontifici negare hæreſis cenſeretur (12). He undertook theſe two works, when he ſaw the diſorders of the league, ſubjects in arms againſt their King, and the lawful poſſeſſors of the Crown declared to have no right to it by the Papal Bulls. Lorrain, where he was ſettled to great advantage, was carried away with the torrent; and approved the revolt of ſubjects, and the violent attempts of the Court of Rome upon the temporalities of Princes. However he continued firm in his principles; he had learn'd them in a good ſchool; for there is no doubt but the ſeditions of the Scots had been his chief Catechiſm in that point. Nothing is more proper to raiſe a perſon's averſion to republican maxims, than to ſee that they have been the ſource of the troubles, which have deſtroyed the Religion, which he believes to be the true one, and overturned the Throne of a Queen, by whom he was beloved. However that be, the Profeſſor of Pontamouſſon ſhewed a more than ordinary firmneſs; moſt people change their principles, as they change their country and intereſts: but he, in the midſt of Lorrain, perſevered ſtill in the maxims, which he maintained in Scotland, tho' the ſituation of affairs was very much changed. The authority of the people raiſed upon the regal power ſerved in Scotland to deſtroy Popery, and in France to ruin the Proteſtants. Notwithſtanding this Barclay never changed his opinion: he thought it unjuſt in Scotland, where it was contrary to the Catholic Religion; he thought it no leſs unjuſt in France, where it was very ſerviceable to the ſame Religion. It is rare to ſee ſuch a ſteadineſs in a Doctor; whereas we perpetually meet with perſons, whoſe principles turn about like a weather-cock. I obſerved, that Barclay durſt not own that he was writing againſt the maxims of the Ultramontains. This muſt not be extended beyond the time of the League; for when that was diſſipated, he made no ſecret of his work. He gave it to the Printer, and dedicated it to Clement VIII (13). But he took it back from the preſs, and kept it private almoſt ten years, during which time he added ſeveral things, and retrenched a great many others. He was making all poſſible haſte to finiſh it upon a proſpect of the differences which were apprehended between the Pope and the Venetians; but death prevented him from putting the laſt hand to his work (14).

(12) In præfat. Oper. de poteſt. Papæ.

THE league did not change Barclay's hypotheſis of the independence of Kings.

(13) See Præfat. Oper. de poteſt. Papæ.

(14) Ibid.

[F] He confuted thoſe authors, who, though they were of different Religions, yet agreed in republican maxims in favour of Religion.] He confuted two Proteſtants, Buchanan and Hubert Languet; he confuted likewiſe Boucher, one of the Curates of Paris, and a very zealous Leaguer. The latter ſubjected the ſovereign authority to the people, for the good of the Catholic Religion; the two former did the ſame thing, for the good of the Proteſtant Religion. So that all three of them were reunited in the general Theſis, and all three were Barclay's antagoniſts.

[G] He had an averſion to the Calviniſts.] This appears from his writings. Read theſe words of Mr. Menage: "He was a great enemy of the Calviniſts "and Lutherans. In his Commentary upon the Title "of the Digeſt de Rebus creditis, he ſays ſpeaking of "Donellus, Regent-Doctor of Civil Law in the Uni"verſity of Bourges: Hugo Donellus, unus ex præcep"toribus meis, vir civilis Diſciplinæ peritus, ſed malus, "quia hæreticus Calviniſta (15). That is, "Hugo "Donellus, one of my maſters, well ſkilled in Civil "Law, but a bad man, becauſe he was a Calviniſtical "Heretic."

(15) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 229.

BARCLAY (JOHN) the ſon of the preceding, was born at Pontamouſſon the 28th of January 1583 [A]. The Jeſuits of that city, under whom he ſtudied, were ſo highly charmed with the beauty of his genius, that they made uſe of all their efforts to engage

[A] He was born at Pontamouſſon the 28th of January 1583.] I have followed Mr. Menage implicitly; but I reſerve to myſelf the liberty of correcting him here by himſelf. He relates in page 228 that, which ſerves for the text of this remark, and afterwards in page 232 he aſſures us that John Barclay died the 12th of Auguſt 1621, aged 39 years and ſix months. So that he was born in the beginning of the year 1582. This is confirmed by another fact mentioned by Mr. Menage. John Barclay dedicated to the King of England in 1603 the firſt part of the Euphormio (1), and he declares in the Apology for the Euphormio, that he was but one and twenty years of age, when he publiſhed this firſt part (2). An author, who is but twenty years and ſome months old, does not uſe to ſay that he is but one and twenty: he never ſays ſo, but when his 22d year is not far advanced. Barclay therefore was at leaſt one and twenty years complete in 1603: and conſequently he could not be born in 1583 but in 1582; ſo that if his birth-day was the 28th of January, his father's marriage muſt be placed under the year 1581, and not, as Mr. Menage has done, under the year 1582. The ſame conſequences may be drawn from what he ſays (3), that Barclay in 1601, when he was but nineteen years old, publiſh'd a Commentary upon Statius. He remarks that he, who wrote the Life of John Barclay, printed before the Argenis, was ſtrangely miſtaken, in ſaying that John Barclay was born at Aberdeen

(1) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 229.
(2) Ibid. p. 231.

(3) Ibid. p. 228, 229.

engage him in their Society. I have already obſerved that this was the cauſe why his father went to King James, who was lately come to the Crown of England. He carried his ſon with him, his ſon I ſay, who was already an author [B], and had prepared ſeveral new works; for he had publiſhed a Commentary upon the Thebais of Statius in the year 1601 (a); and a Latin Poem upon the Coronation of King James, and the firſt part of the Euphormio in 1603. Theſe two pieces pleaſed his Britannic Majeſty very well, who had a great affection for the Sciences, and was well ſkilled in them. John Barclay dedicated to him that beginning of the Euphormio. He returned to France with his father, who would not leave him with King James, for fear that Prince, who had been ſo very deſirous to retain him, ſhould engage him to abjure the Romiſh Faith. He lived at Angers till the death of his father, and then went to Paris, where he took a wife [C], and ſoon after went to London. He was there in the year 1606; and it was then, that he became acquainted with Mr. de Peireſc. He had publiſhed a little before The Hiſtory of the Gun-powder Treaſon Plot. It is a pamphlet of ſix leaves (b), printed at Amſterdam. He publiſhed at London in 1610 (c) An Apology for the Euphormio, and his Father's treatiſe De Poteſtate Papæ [D]. He publiſhed at Paris in 1612 a book, which he intitled Pietas [E]. It is an anſwer to Cardinal Bellarmin, who had written againſt William Barclay's book concerning the power of the Pope. Two years after he publiſhed at London his Icon Animarum. He left that City in the year 1616, and went to Paris, where he was preſented to Mr. du Vair the Keeper of the Seals by his good friend Mr. de Peireſc. He went afterwards to Rome, being invited thither by Pope Paul V, and publiſhed

(a) It was printed at Pontamouſſon, and dedicated to Charles III of that name, Duke of Lorrain.

(b) Intitled Series patefacti divinitus parricidii in maximum Regem Regnumque Britanniæ cogitati & inſtructi.

(c) See the remark [D] at the end.

berdeen (4). If he miſtook the place of his birth, he was no leſs miſtaken in the time, which was according to him the 28th of January 1582. Now we find under the effigies of John Barclay before the Argenis, that he was born the 28th of January 1682; thus you ſee how the Engravers deceive us as well as the Printers.

(4) Ibid. pag. 228.

[B] He became an author very early.] We have ſeen above that at nineteen years of age he publiſhed a Commentary upon Statius; ſo that he deſerves a place in the ſecond edition of Baillet's Famous Children; and he would deſerve it much more, if his age had been ſufficiently known to Nicius Erythræus; for in that caſe he would have been an author at fifteen years of age. In ſhort Erythræus aſſures us that Barclay was but ſeventeen years of age, when he wrote a Poem upon the Coronation of King James, that is, in 1603. Annum tum agebat Joannes decimum ſeptimum, cum de Regis inauguratione elegantiſſimum Carmen edidit, maximo verborum ſententiarumque ſplendore illuminatum, quod lectum Rex adeò probavit, ut &c. (5). Upon that repreſentation he could not have been above fifteen years of age, when he publiſhed in 1601 a Commentary upon the Thebais of Statius. I ſhall give an account here of a new miſtake of this Italian Author, which has proved contagious to Moreri, and ſo very contagious, that it has produced another. Moreri has not only ſaid, that Barclay was but ſeventeen years of age when King James was crowned, but he has converted the printed Poem of that author into an Oration, which was ſpoken. Paul Freher places the Birth of John Barclay in the year 1585, and the Panegyric upon the Coronation in the ſeventeenth year of his age (6).

(5) Nicius Eryth. Pinacoth. 3. pag. 76.

(6) Freheri, Theatrum, p. 1515.

[C] He went to Paris, where he took a wife.] "He married Louiſe Debonnaire, the daughter of "Michael Debonnaire, Treaſurer of the old Troops, "and of Urſina Deniſot..... He afterwards went "over to England with his wife, where he had two "ſons and a daughter by her (7)." He did not marry at Rome: Moreri, who ſays ſo, did not underſtand Nicius Erythræus his author, who might have informed him eaſily, that Barclay fled from England with his wife and ſon, and retired to Rome, where his wife was brought to bed of another ſon. Ibi Barclaius, ex uxore, quam habebat, maſculam prolem ſuſcepit. Sed aliquanto poſt .... clam ex Angliâ unà cum uxore & filio ſe fugâ ſurripuit, ac Romam venit..... (8). Romæ novam ex uxore ſuâ maſculam prolem accepit, ac cive uno urbem noſtram auxit (9). Mapheus Barberinus, who was afterwards Pope Urban VIII, was Godfather to this young ſon of our Barclay (10). One would never imagine from reading theſe words of Erythræus, that Barclay's wife did not go to Rome till four years after her huſband; and yet Mr. Gaſſendi aſſures us that this is true. Read the paſſage, where he mentions the good offices, which Mr. de Peireſc did to the huſband in 1616, and to the wife and ſon in 1620. Prætereo fuiſſe Peireſkio non minorem circa Barclaii uxorem, filium, & Jo. Ludovicum Debonærum uxoris germanum, cum quarto poſt anno profecti Romam ad illum ſunt (11). If Mr. Menage had well conſidered theſe words of Gaſſendi, he would not have ſaid that Barclay went to Rome in 1617, and that his wife, his ſon, and his brother-in-law came to him there in 1619 (12). He adds that Barclay's ſon came to Paris with his mother in 1652, that he was no very conſiderable man; that he made Latin verſes, and publiſhed at that time at Paris a Latin Elegy. Erythræus ſpeaks of Barclay's widow as a woman of a preſumptuous and haughty temper: See below the remark [G]. In the Latin Life of John Barclay, it is falſly ſaid that he married Louiſe Debonnaire, after he had been employed in divers embaſſies by King James.

(7) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 230.

(8) Nic. Erythr. Pinac. 3. p. 77.

(9) Ibid. pag. 79.

(10) Ibid.

(11) Gaſſend. in Vitâ Peireskii, ad ann. 1616, pag. 283. See likewiſe p. 288.

(12) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 231, 232.

[D] He publiſhed his father's treatiſe de Poteſtate Papæ.] The printing of that book made him loſe, if we believe Mr. Menage (13), part of the favour, which the King of England had for him. I cannot comprehend how that could come to paſs, ſince it is a book, which ſtrongly confutes the pretenſions of the Ultramontains, and Bellarmin's reaſons expreſly, and maintains vigorouſly the Independence of Kings. Could any thing be written more agreeable to King James? I conjecture that Gaſſendi's Latin (14) impoſed upon Mr. Menage; and this ſhews us more and more how difficult it is to write very clearly in Latin. When we conſider it more exactly, we find that this author does not affirm that the book of the Power of the Pope cooled King James's regard; but this may be imagined, if one does not uſe ſome kind of attention. The Jeſuits did not believe that the printing of this book had diſpleaſed the King of Great Britain: on the contrary they reproached John Barclay for having put it to the Preſs with the conſent of that Prince, and the corrections of the Engliſh Divines. Neque verò niſi ejus (Regis) nutu patris tui librum à Britanniti Evangelii miniſtris ad libidinem deformatum, Londini typis excuſum (15). Beſides Mr. Menage has not marked the year of its impreſſion right. This work was printed in 1609. The Congregation of the Index condemned it the ſame year by their Decree of the 9th of November.

(13) Menage, Rem. ſur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 231, 232.

(14) Joannes Barclaius, qui poſt editum de Summo Pontifice Opus, nec jam ſolitâ apud Regem ſuoſque pollens gratiâ .... ſubduxit ſeſe ex Angliâ. Gaſſendi Vitâ Peireskii, pag. 282.

(15) Eudæmon Johannes, Epiſt. Monitor. ad Jo. Barclaium, num 1.

[E] He publiſhed at Paris a book, which he entitled Pietas.] To give the whole title we muſt add, Sive publicæ pro Regibus ac Principibus, & privatæ pro Gul. Barclaio parente Vindiciæ contra Bellarminum. The Letter of Eudæmon Johannes, which I have quoted, declares that Barclay took a journey to Paris in order to print that work; and this, that he might do the greater ſervice to the Proteſtants of England: "for "he believed, it is ſaid, that he ſhould be leſs ſuſpected "of having intelligence with the enemies of the "Church, if he ſhould publiſh this work out of Eng-"land." At nunc quoque non diſſimili conſilio te Lutetiam è Britannia demigraſſe, ut cum & coram apud viros principes, & ſcriptis apud cæteros, Eccleſiæ cauſam calumniis tuis traduceres, tamen quanto majore locorum intervallo ab Rege diſjungereris, hoc longius abeſſes à ſuſpicione fraudis (16). Here we ſee one of the moſt ſubtle and ordinary ſtrokes of the ODIUM THEOLOGICUM

(16) Ibid.

ed there a book of controverſy, intitled, Paræneſis ad Sectarios. He received a great many civilities from Cardinal Bellarmin, though he had written againſt him. He died at Rome the 12th of Auguſt 1621 (d), while his Argenis was printing in France (e) [F]. His body was carried to the Church of St. Onuphrius upon the Janiculus. His ſon erected a Monument of Marble to him in the Church of St. Laurence upon the way to Tivoli (f): we ſhall give an account in the remarks why the widow cauſed her huſband's Buſt to be removed [G]. Several perſons are of opinion that John Barclay made a profeſſion of the Proteſtant Religion in England [H]. He denied it publickly [I]. His books of controverſy had no very great ſucceſs: his other pieces have many admirers [K], and (d) In the cut before the Argenis, they have put the 12th of April.

(e) Taken from Mr. Menage, Ken: ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 228, & ſeq.

(f) Nicius Erythræus Pinacoth. 3. pag. 80.

GICUM. Thoſe, who cannot tell how to anſwer the objections, which are propoſed againſt the common opinions, fall upon the perſons, who propoſe theſe objections: they exclaim, that they are ſo many ſecret enemies, who carry on a correſpondence with the adverſary, and only retain the exterior profeſſion of orthodoxy, that they may be the better able to give the more dangerous blows.

[F] He died . . . . while his Argenis was printing in France.] Mr. de Peireſc his good friend, to whom he had ſent the manuſcript, took care to find him a Printer at Paris (17). The firſt edition therefore of this celebrated book is that of Paris in 1621. It has been tranſlated into divers languages, French, Engliſh, Italian, Dutch &c. Nicius Erythræus obſerves it was to gratify the curioſity of the Ladies, that it was tranſlated into Italian. The praiſes, which they heard given to this book, inſpired them with an ardent deſire to know what it contained. Eadem ingenii fœcunditate peperit egregium illud opus, Argenida nomine, quod & argumenti novitate & verborum ſplendore, ac rerum varietate, tantum commendationis habuit, ut mulierum etiam, quæ illud miris in cœlum laudibus offerri audiebant, ad cognoſcendum, quid illud afferret, ſtudia commoverit; adeo ut quidam, quo animum illis expleret, in Italicum ſermonem illud converterit (18). Mr. de Peireſc cauſed the effigies of the author to be placed before the book, with a diſtich, which he deſired Grotius to add to it (19). The diſtich is as follows:

(17) Gaſſendi Vita Peireskii, pag. 288, 290.

(18) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. 3. pag. 77, 78.

(19) Gaſſendi, Vita Peireskii, pag. 290.

Gente Caledonius, Gallus natalibus, hic eſt,
Romam Romano qui docet ore loqui.

That is,

"This is he, who tho' by nation a Scot, and by birth "a Frenchman, has taught even the Romans themſelves to ſpeak their own language to perfection."

[G] Why his widow cauſed her huſband's buſt to be removed from the Church of St. Laurence.] The monument of John Barclay was at the entrance of the Church-yard, oppoſite to another monument, which Cardinal Francis Barberini has erected to Bernard William his tutor. Theſe two monuments were exactly alike in every reſpect. The widow of John Barclay being diſpleaſed at the great likeneſs between them had a mind to demoliſh her huſband's monument, but not being able to do that, ſhe ordered however his marble buſt to be taken away, and carried to her houſe. Her haughtineſs could not bear, that her huſband, who was famous for his birth, and much more ſo for his wit and learning, ſhould be put upon an equality with a wretched pedant. Quod uxor Barclaii, mulier tumido, ut aiebant, animo atque elato, cum vidiſſet, ſtatim viri ſui imaginem ex ſepulcro illo, quod totum demoliri non poſſet, detrahi juſſit, ac domum ſuam afferri; quod acciperet indigne, eum, cui ipſa nupta fuiſſet, generis ſplendore clarum, ſed ingenii & eruditionis famâ clariorem, cum homine obſcuro, ac nullius ferè ingenii, &, ut ipſa dicebat, pædagogo, componi (20).

(20) Nic. Eryth. Pinac. 3. p. 81.

[H] Several perſons are of opinion that John Barclay made profeſſion of the Proteſtant Religion in England.] The Jeſuit Eudæmon Joannes reproaches him, that while he lived at the King of England's Court he was an Heretic, or conſidered as an Heretic. He adds, that it was ſaid, that this Prince employed him to tranſlate into Latin his preface concerning the oath of allegiance, and to carry it to ſeveral Princes. Nam te quidem aliquot annis in aulâ ejus Regis ita verſatum ferunt, ut hæreticus aut planè eſſes, aut haberere quidem certè. Cui nonnullam etiam Latinè reddenda, deferendaque ad principes præfatione ejus monitoriâ operam abs te navatam memorant (21). Erythræus, though he does not venture to ſay poſitively that Barclay was an Heretic in England, or at leaſt that he made profeſſion of hereſy, yet aſſures us, as the opinion of all the Papiſts of that country, that King James employed John Barclay's pen in writing the book intitled, Funiculus triplex, & Cuniculus triplex. He ſpeaks as follows: Utrum autem, apud Regem, incorruptam catholicam religionem ſemper conſervaverit, vel ſaltem, ſi non animo, ſpecie tenus hæreticorum ſe erroribus oblinierit, incertum eſt mihi; illud autem certum catholicorum omnium in Angliâ fuiſſe opinionem, Regem illum in eo libro, cui titulus eſt, Funiculus triplex, & Cuniculus triplex, componendo, uſum fuiſſe Barclaio adjutore atque magiſtro (22). No perſon, that I know of, has been more deciſive upon this queſtion than Imperialis. He ſays plainly, that Barclay embraced the Religion of the Church of England, and afterwards abjured it; but that they were at Rome ſo little perſuaded of the ſincerity of his converſion, that they ordered after his death the inſcription and ſtatue which his ſon had placed upon his tomb, to be taken away (23). Paul Freher aſcribes this to the Jeſuits: Statuam & inſcriptionem quam ejus demortui gloriæ filius in templo S. Laurentii extra muros erexerat, patres So. Jeſu ſublatam & deletam volucrunt (24). It is difficult to know the truth of this; perhaps ſomewhat might be found among his papers or elſewhere, which might ſhew he was a Proteſtant in his heart, and upon that account they might order ſome puniſhment againſt his tomb. Perhaps too it was only his wife's vanity which occaſioned this demolition of his tomb, and this might give occaſion to ſuſpicious perſons and idle commentators on the talk of the town, to find a myſtery in it, and ſome ſecret proceeding of the tribunal of the inquiſition.

(21) Eudæm. Joannes, Epiſt. monitoria, ad Barclaium, num. 1.

(22) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. 3. pag. 77.

(23) Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſtorico.

(24) Freherus, in Theatro, pag. 1515. He quotes Imperialis and Tomaſin.

[I] . . , . He denied it publickly.] We muſt renounce the ſureſt maxims, by which we judge of facts, or elſe agree that John Barclay did not renounce in England the profeſſion of the Catholic Religion. He declares publickly, that he was born and always had been a Catholic (25), and that though he had a poſt under King James (26), yet he never was preſent at the worſhip of the Church of England, and never abſented himſelf from the Aſſemblies of the Catholics. I was conſtant, ſays he, at the latter. He calls for witneſſes of this upon the Embaſſadors of France and Spain, and their Confeſſors, who were, ſays he, likewiſe mine. Nay, what is ſtill more ſtrong, he calls King James to witneſs, whoſe privilege he boaſted he had obtained that he might not be diſturbed on account of the Catholic Religion. King James was living when Barclay publiſhed theſe things; the Embaſſadors whom he appeals to were not all dead. How is it credible, that he ſhould relate a falſity? He juſtifies himſelf from another thing, which he was accuſed of; which was, that he was the author or favourer of a bloody Libel, which was publiſhed againſt King James, as ſoon as Barclay departed from England. Laſtly he declares, that he revokes certain doctrines which are in his book againſt Cardinal Bellarmin. He does not forget to ſay, that he departed with the King's good leave. Neque furtum mei feci; impetratâ Regis pace publicè cum familiâ a Britanniæ orâ ſolvi.

(25) In præfat. Paræneſis ad Sectarios. This book was printed in the year 1617.

(26) In Regis familiâ eſſe... inter domeſticos. Erythræus ſays that the King made him his Secretary, ab Epiſtolis & Conſiliorum omnium participem habuit. Freher, who quotes Imperialis and Tomaſin, ſays that his place was that of Gentleman of the Chamber, titulo nobilis cubiculi regii honeſtatus.

[K] Some of his books have had a great many admirers.] See in Sir Thomas Pope-Blount (27), and Mr. Baillet (28), ſeveral elogiums which have been given to Barclay. The greateſt without diſpute will be this, if it is true with regard to his character as an Author. It is ſaid that Cardinal Richelieu was perpetually reading the Argenis, and that it was from this book he learned all the counſels and political expedients, by which he raiſed France to ſo advantageous a ſituation. Ad Immortalitatem Barclaii una ſufficiet illius Argenis, quam Richelæus ævi noſtri miraculum aſſiduis, ut aiunt (29), verſabat manibus, habebatque quaſi præceptricem ac directricem illius regiminis, quo deinceps Galliam venerabilem juxta terribilemque gentibus cæteris fecit (30).

(27) Cenſuræ Author. p. 655.

(28) Jugem. ſur les Poet. tom. 4. pag. 152.

(29) Here is an Hearſay, which looks very much like a fable.

(30) In the Life of Barclay before the Argenis.

and have not wanted cenſurers [L]. With regard to the fortune, which he made at Rome, it is differently ſpoken of. Some ſay that Mapheo Barberini, who had a great affection for him, when he was elected Pope, was a conſiderable benefactor to him, and conferred upon his eldeſt ſon a rich benefice, and the office of Chamberlain to his Holineſs (g). Others ſay that he was obliged to divert himſelf with the culture of flowers, and that without this he could not have prevented the vexation of ſeeing himſelf ſo little advanced (h) [M]. What is certain, is that he died before Mapheo Barberini was elected Pope. He wrote poetry; and a great many good judges aſſerted that his Latin verſes are excellent (i).

(g) Nic. Erythr. Pinacoth. 3. pag. 79.

(h) Imperialis and Tomaſinus, apud Paulum Freherum Theatri, p. 1515.

(i) See Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poetes, tom. 4. pag. 152. and Pope-Blount, Cenſura Autorum, p. 655.

We

[L] .... And have not wanted cenſurers.] We have ſeen the Diſtich which Grotius wrote to be placed under Barclay's picture (31). It is a great commendation of this Author's Latin. Every body does not approve of his ſtyle. "The anonymous Author "of a little book, intitled Cenſura Euphormionis, "printed at Paris in 1620, ſpeaks of the ſtyle of the "Euphormio in theſe terms: & quod miretur aliquis, "Latinitas quoque ipſa Romanas aures peregrinitate "radit, & veteris ſaporis imbutum palatum offendit; "that is, And what any one would wonder at, the "Latin itſelf is grating to Roman ears from the fo-"reign turn of it, and very diſagreeable to thoſe who "have a true reliſh for antiquity. It is ſuppoſed, by "the bye, that Seton a Scotchman is the Author of "this little book. Joſeph Scaliger in a letter of his "to Charles Labbe, which is the 311th of his Let-"ters, does not ſpeak more favourably of this Satyr "of Barclay. Quanti Euphormionem Barclæi faciam "ex eo cognoſcere potes, quod vix ſex folia ejus legere "potuerim; that is, You may gueſs what opinion I "have of Barclay's Euphormio, when I tell you, that I "could ſcarce read ſix leaves of it. Thus we have it "in the original of that Letter which I have ſeen in "the hands of Charles Labbe, for in the edition of "Scaliger's Letters, inſtead of Euphormionem Barclæi, "there is an Aſterick. He ſpeaks almoſt in the ſame "manner in the Scaligerana ſecunda. There is a Pe-"dant at Angers, who has written a Satyricon, which "at firſt ſeems to be ſomething; but afterwards proves no-"thing at all (32). Peter Muſnier, Canon of Veze-"lai, anſwered the book intitled Cenſura Euphormionis, "in another book intitled Cenſura Cenſuræ Euphor-"mionis; but his Anſwer is very ill written; and "this is probably what obliged John Barclay to write "himſelf an Apology for his Euphormio (33). But "as it has been remarked, John Barclay was but 21 "years of age, when he publiſhed the firſt part of that "Satyr. His Argenis, which was written in a more "advanced age, is better written; and if we may "believe the author of John Barclay's Life, printed "before the Argenis, Cardinal Richelieu had an ex-"traordinary value for that work. I have ſtill to ob-"ſerve, that a Benedictine Monk, whoſe name was "Bugnot, who taught Rhetoric in the Abbey of "Tiron, wrote Latin Notes upon that work. Theſe "Notes were printed at Leyden in 1644 with the Ar-"genis (34)."

(31) See the end of the remark [F].

(32) See the ſecond Addition of Mr. Menage to the Life of P. Ayrault, pag. 539.

(33) Mr. Menage has ſaid in page 231. that Barclay publiſhed at London in 1610, an Apology for his Euphormio, which he dedicated to Charles Emanuel Duke of Savoy. How then could he ſay here, that the wretched Anſwer which was written to a Cenſure printed in the year 1620, obliged Barclay to write an Apology himſelf?

(34) Menage, Rem. ſur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 232, 233.

This is the collection of Mr. Menage; let us ſee whether we can find any gleanings after him, and begin with theſe words of Balzac: An Academician of Rome, a confident, and as he expreſſes himſelf, an intimate friend of the formidable Scioppius, knowing the friendſhip, which was between Mr. Barclay and me, and the eſteem, which I had for his Argenis, in order to moderate, he ſaid, the violence of my paſſion, offered to ſhew me in that new Hiſtory, which we had then in manuſcript, 1500 improprieties, upon a fair computation and I cannot tell how many original faults, and ſtrange expreſſions (35). Sorel, an enemy of Balzac, judged in the ſame manner as he did of the ſtyle of the Argenis. With regard to the Argenis, ſays he (36), if any one eſteems the Latin of it, I am entirely of the contrary opinion; for there is an infinite number of new words, which were never uſed at Rome; ſo that if Salluſt was to return to the world, he would ſcarce underſtand them. He pretends that in this point he only follows the opinion of the moſt learned men, ſo that ſome body ſaid, Barclay ſpoke French rather than Latin (37). He not only finds fault with the ſtyle, but likewiſe condemns the œconomy of the work, and gives a very ſevere cenſure of the Euphormio (38). It is an Hiſtory of a man of mean quality, ſays he (39), but it is extremely abſurd. .... "That, "which made this book read, was becauſe it is in "Latin, and it was not uſual to ſee modern romances "in that language; but it has not been conſidered, "that it happened well for the author that he did not "write in the vulgar tongue, becauſe it is not obſerv-"ed, that he does not underſtand how to make every "perſon ſpeak according to their character, which is "the peculiar excellence of a Satyr. Whereas on the "contrary he has introduced pedantical diſcourſes, "and made a ſervant ſpeak in the forms of a School-"maſter, who underſtands the Greek and Roman Hi-"ſtory; ſo that all theſe things being conſidered with "the lowneſs of the adventures, it appears that the "Satyr of the Euphormio is the work of a Scholar, "who juſt begins to exerciſe himſelf in writing (40)." When he grew old, he ſoftened his criticiſm a little; but he ſtill maintained a diſguſt for the Euphormio (41). This Satyr was, ſays he (42), written in Latin by John Barclay, and tranſlated into French by John Berault, Doctor of Phyſic of the Faculty of Paris. We find a great deal of learning in it, with a cenſure upon ſeveral vices of the age; but the invention is not the moſt ingenious and agreeable that can be found. We have ſeen already what Scaliger thought of the work of Euphormio itſelf; here is his judgment of the ſtyle. There are a great many faults, which every body will not diſcover, as in the verſes of Mr. Beza there are a great many Galliciſms (43). We muſt not forget that this book had the ſame fate with the treatiſe of the Power of the Pope: it was condemned by the Inquiſition. The Decree orders that certain things ſhould be retrenched; but Nicius Erythræus informs me, that the Bookſellers were forbidden to ſell it, and all perſons to have it in their poſſeſſion or read it; and that before this he had read ſomething of it. Partem Euphormionis deguſtavi tum, cum nondum lata lex erat, ne Bibliopolæ cuipiam liceret eum vendere, aut cuiquam domi habere aut legere (44). Theſe words ſhould be well remark'd, and compared with ſome others in page 77. We ſhall be ſurprized that the Court of Rome had ſo little regard for the Congregation of the Index: we ſhall find that John Barclay was received at Rome in a very kind manner, and had conſiderable favours conferred upon him by the Pope, on account of the reputation, which he had acquired by the Euphormio. Romam venit, ubi cum pro EO quod ex EUPHORMIONE, quem ediderat, celebratum ejus nomen eſſet, eſt ab omnibus humaniter exceptus, & à Paulo V, qui tum Romanam Eccleſiam Pontifex adminiſtrabat, bonis omnibus, quibus ſponte ſe exuerat, amiſſis, in victu, veſtitu, ac cæteris omnibus ad vitam neceſſariis, magnificè ac liberaliter habitus (45). Mr. Menage has criticized upon one thing in the Dedication of the Argenis (46). Barclay addreſſing himſelf to King Lewis XIII, tells him, that the Prince, whoſe ſon he was, deſerved in his life-time the ſurname of Great, which was not conferred upon him till after his death. Eo es parente genitus, qui vel confeſſione teſtium, ſæculi ſui ſummus Magni cognomen ferre vivus debuerat, quod vos modeſtius extincto addidiſtis (47). This is a miſtake; for even the Father of John Barclay, in the Dedication of his book de Regno to Henry IV, in the year 1609, calls him HENRICUS MAGNUS. Mr. Menage owns that he was obliged for this obſervation to Mr. Nublé.

(35) The 16th Diſcourſe among his Oeuvres diverſes, p. 405.

(36) Berger extravagant, lib. 13. pag. 83.

(37) Sorel, Rem. ſur le Berger extravagant, pag. 698. See likewiſe his Bibliotheque Françoiſe, p. 182.

(38) Sorel, lib. 13. of the Berger extravagant, and Remarques upon the 13th book, and elſewhere.

(39) Remarques ſur le Berger extravagant, pag. 763.

(40) Ibid. p. 765.

(41) Biblioth. Franç. p. 182.

(42) Ibid. p. 193. See the end of the text of this Article.

(43) Scalig. pag. 23.

(44) Nic. Eryth. Pinac. 3. p. 74.

(45) Idem, ibid. pag. 77.

(46) Menage, Rem. ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 232.

(47) Barcl. Epiſt. Ded. Argenid.

[M] The vexation of ſeeing himſelf ſo little advanced.] The author of the Italian Tranſlation of the Argenis acknowledges that the favours of Paul V and Gregory XV were by no means proportioned to the merit of John Barclay, whether, ſays he (48), fortune is pleaſed always to perſecute virtue, or whether the Pope conſidered that poverty is the true mother of knowledge (49). He inſinuates that Barclay was no good Oeconomiſt, and that a large family, and his liberal temper, reduced him to ſome little ſtreights. Ivi dunque, ſi trattoneva il Barcleio con facolta non poco anguſte riſpetto la numeroſa

(48) Franceſco Pona, in the Life of John Barclay.

(49) This propoſition is very uncertain, and often very falſe. See Haud facile emergunt quorum virtutibus obſtat Res anguſta domi & curta Supplex of Juvenal, Sat. 3. ver. 164. See likewiſe Sat. 7. ver. 56, & ſeq.

We have but a confuſed account of his works in Moreri's Dictionary [N]. He reviſed his Euphormio in order to publiſh it. He left the Hiſtory of the Conqueſt of Jeruſalem (k), and ſeveral ſheets of the Hiſtory of Europe (l). It cannot be ſaid that he was ſent on an Embaſſy by King James to the Courts of the Emperor, the King of Hungary, and the Duke of Savoy [O]. He ſays nothing of this, when he gives a deſcription of the life which he led at King James's Court (m); and all that we can preſume, I think, is, that this Prince employed him in ſending to ſeveral Princes copies of the book, which he wrote upon their common intereſts, againſt the pretenſions of the Court of Rome.

(k) Ha laſciato dopo ſe l'Hiſtoria de Bello ſacro, ch'è la medeſima ch'ha il Taſſo cantato nel ſuo Goſfredo. Franceſco: Pona in the Life of John Barclay.

(l) Ibid.

(m) Barcl. in præfat. paran. ad Sectarios.

His Euphormio and Argenis have been tranſlated into French [P].

meroſa famiglia, & gli ſuoi ſpiriti generoſi. Barclay in the Latin verſes, where he introduces his wife having her picture drawn, gives her but two ſons. In his Latin Life theſe verſes are quoted to prove that he had two ſons and a daughter; which is extremely abſurd.

[N] We have but a confuſed account of his works in the Dictionary of Moreri.] I, I have obſerved in the remarks [B] and [C] that this author has converted a piece of Poetry into an Oration: II, and that he has falſly placed the ſcene of Barclay's marriage at Rome; III, and his birth in the year 1586. IV, He was miſtaken in ſaying that the Satiricon Euphormionis of Barclay contains five books: properly ſpeaking it does not contain above two; for the third is only an apology for the two others: the fourth is not Barclay's but Moriſot's; and the fourth is not built upon the model of the preceding. It is the book, which the author intitled Icon Animarum. V, Moreri knew nothing of it, ſince he ſpeaks of this Icon Animarum, as a work, which had nothing common with the five pretended books of the Satiricon Ephormionis. VI, If I am not miſtaken all the works publiſhed by John Barclay againſt thoſe of the Proteſtant Religion are only the Paræneſis ad Sectarios, which he brought already finiſh'd into Italy, and publiſhed at Rome as ſoon as he arrived there. And yet Moreri tells us, that Barclay publiſh'd books againſt the Proteſtants, during the melancholy and ſolitary life which he led at Rome, in the midſt of the favours, which Paul V and Gregory XV his ſucceſſor conferred upon him. The Paræneſis ad Sectarios was printed in 1617. Gregory XV was not elected till 1621. VII. He adds that Barclay publiſhed likewiſe at that time the Icon Animarum. This is a miſtake. This work was printed at London in 1614, two years before the author went to Rome.

[O] It cannot be ſaid that he was ſent on an Embaſſy.] A writer of Elogiums and Lives eaſily runs into ſtrong and emphatical expreſſions. If a Prince makes uſe of any perſon to carry any packet of importance, you'll ſee immediately that the journey of a Courier ſhall be turned into an extraordinary deputation or even a real embaſſy. I am willing to believe, that if the preſents, which King James ſent to ſeveral Princes as an author, were entruſted to Barclay, it was not as to a mere meſſenger; he had very probably the juſtice done to his merit, to have his commiſſion made agreeable to him in the manner of it; but in ſhort this meſſage of his made ſo little noiſe, that it is a jeſt to ſay, Illius (Regis Magnæ Britanniæ) nomine, Legationem obivit ad Rodolphum Imperatorem, ad Matthiam Pannoniæ Regem, & ad Emanuelem Philibertum (50) Ducem Allobrogum (51): that is, "He "went Embaſſador from the King of England to the "Emperor Rodolphus, Matthias King of Hungary, "and Emanuel Philibert Duke of Savoy.

(50) The Duke of Savoy's name then was Charles Emanuel.

(51) See the Life of Barclay before the Argenis.

[P] His Euphormio and Argenis have been tranſlated into French.] I have already quoted Sorel (52), who obſerves that the Euphormio was tranſlated into French by John Berault: I add that this Tranſlation was printed at Paris in 1640 in 8vo, and that it was preceded by two others, the authors of which, for fear of keeping too ſuperſtitiouſly to the words of the original, had left the work at leaſt as difficult as it was before (53). Berault has given a Key and a Commentary at the end of his Tranſlation. The Tranſlation of the Argenis was printed at Paris by N. Buon in 1624 in 8vo, but without the name of the tranſlator.

(52) Above quotation (32).

(53) See the Advertiſement of the Bookſeller before Berault's tranſlation.

☞ BARCLAY (ROBERT), one of the moſt eminent Writers among the Quakers, was the ſon of Colonel David Barclay, deſcended of the antient and honourable family of the Barclays, and of Katherine Gordon from the houſe of the Dukes of Gordon (a). He was born at Edinburgh in the year 1648, and educated under an uncle of his at Paris, where the Papiſts uſed all their efforts to draw him over to their Religion. But though in that tender age he ſeemed a little too ready to comply with their ſolicitations, yet as he advanced in years and knowledge, he ſaw farther into the errors of the Church of Rome, and became more averſe to it (b). This is the account of the Quaker-Writers themſelves; but Gerard Croeſe, a Dutch Divine, in his Hiſtoria Quakeriana (c) tells us, that Mr. Barclay's uncle was Principal of the Scots Popiſh College at Paris; and that he was perſuaded by him to leave the Reformed Religion, and turn Papiſt; upon hearing which his father ſent for him home. During his reſidence in France he gained a perfect knowledge of the French and Latin tongues, and having accompliſhed himſelf in moſt of the branches of Learning, he returned to Scotland about the year 1664, being then ſixteen years of age. Mr. Pen, Mr. Sewell, and Mr. Croeſe inform us (d), that during his abſence his father had embraced the Doctrine of the Quakers; which appears to be a miſtake; ſince Mr. Barclay himſelf tells us in his Teſtimony concerning his father at the end of his Works, that he joined himſelf to the Quakers in the year 1666, which was two years after his ſon's return from France. Our Author became a Proſelyte to that Sect in 1667 (e); and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal and abilities in defence of their doctrines. He wrote ſeveral books for that purpoſe; the firſt of which was printed in 1670, and intitled, Truth cleared of Calumnies [A]; and the ſame year he wrote Queries to the inhabitants

(a) Will. Pen's Teſtimony to the memory of R. Barclay, prefixed to the edition of Mr. Barclay's Works, London 1692. fol.

(b) Will. Sewell's Hiſtory of the Quakers, pag. 472. ed. London 1722, in fol.

(c) Lib. 1. Part 1. pag. 151. Engliſh tranſlation, London 1696 in 8vo.

(d) Ubi ſupra.

(e) Pen and Sewell, ubi ſupra. Mr. Croeſe ſays that he became a Quaker when he was 18 years of age.

[A] Publiſhed in 1670, and intitled, Truth cleared of Calumnies,] The whole title was as follows: Truth cleared of Calumnies; wherein a book, intitled, A Dialogue between a Quaker and ſtable Chriſtian, (printed at Aberdeen and upon good ground, judged to be writ by William Mitchell, a Preacher near by it, or at leaſt, that he had the chief hand in it,) is examined, and the diſingenuity of the author in his repreſenting the Quakers is diſcovered. Here is alſo their caſe truly ſtated, cleared, demonſtrated, and the objections of their oppoſers anſwered, according to truth, ſcripture, and right reaſon. Mr. Barclay obſerves in his Preface, that the Quakers had been repreſented by their adverſaries, as diſtracted, and poſſeſſed of the Devil, and practiſing abominations under colour of being led to them by the Spirit; that they denied the true Chriſt, heaven, tants of Aberdeen [B]. His third performance was written upon the ſame controverſy, and againſt the ſame antagoniſt as his firſt piece [C]. In 1672 he publiſhed A ſeaſonable Warning and Exhortation to and Expoſtulation with the inhabitants of Aberdeen, concerning this preſent Diſpenſation and Day of God's living Viſitation towards them, with an Anſwer to ſome Queries annexed. He tells us in this piece, that he had been commanded by God to paſs through the ſtreets of that City covered with ſack-cloth and aſhes, and to call the inhabitants of it to repentance; and that he felt the greateſt agonies of mind imaginable, till he had executed that command. In 1675 he wrote a Catechiſm and Confeſſion of Faith [D]; and the year following a book, intitled, The Anarchy of the Ranters and other Libertines, the Hierarchy of the Romaniſts and other pretended Churches, equally refuſed and refuted in a twofold Apology for the Church and People of God, called in deriſion QUAKERS, &c. [E]. In 1676 he publiſhed in Latin at Amſterdam in 4to, his Apology for the Quakers; hell, the exiſtence of Angels, the reſurrection of the body, and the day of judgment; and that their principles were inconſiſtent with Magiſtracy, and of as dangerous a conſequence, as of thoſe of John of Leyden and his accomplices. This, he tells us, was the vulgar and familiar languages of the pulpits, which was for ſome time received as unqueſtionable truth, till about the year 1663, when the doctrines of the Quakers came to be examined by ſome impartial perſons, who detected the calumnies of their antagoniſts. He complains likewiſe, that great pains had been taken to ſuppreſs them by threatnings and perſecution at Aberdeen, as well as by preaching and writing; and refers his vindication of them from the miſrepreſentations caſt upon them to that innocent and pure principle the Light of Chriſt Jeſus within the mind of man.

[B] Queries to the inhabitants of Aberdeen.] This piece is intitled, Some things of weighty concernment; propoſed in meekneſs and love by way of queries to the ſerious conſideration of the inhabitants of Aberdeen; which alſo may be of uſe to ſuch, as are of the ſame mind with them elſewhere in this Nation. This was ſubjoined by way of Appendix to his former tract.

[C] Written upon the ſame controverſy, and againſt the ſame antagoniſt as his firſt piece.] The title of it is; William Mitchell unmaſk'd; or the ſtaggering inſtability of the pretended ſtable Chriſtian diſcovered, his omiſſions obſerved, and weakneſs unvailed, in his late faint and feeble animadverſions by way of reply to a book, intitled, Truth cleared of Calumnies; wherein the integrity of the Quakers doctrine is the ſecond time juſtified, and cleared from the reiterate, clamorous, but cauſeleſs calumnies of this cavilling Catechiſt. The author of the Preface to Mr. Barclay's Works, publiſh'd in 1692, tells us (1), that in this piece the diſpute riſes high, and the conteſt ſeems ſharp and cloſe. "But to every "impartial reader, continues he, the advantage evi- "dently runs upon our author's ſide; who appears "rather zealous than heated, and ſharp on his ene- "my's matter, than perſon; for he rather pities his "enemy, than triumphs over his weakneſs and en- "vy." Here, as in an exact draught, the reader has an account of the fabulous principles given under our names, and thoſe that we really profeſs; and the pleaſure even men pretending to religion take to render a poor ſelf-denying people, that, which they are not; as if they fear'd we ſhould be in the right, or hold principles nearer to what they profeſs themſelves to believe, than is convenient for their intereſt with the people to allow; leſt that together with the ſobriety, their worſt enemies confeſs to be ſo conſpicuous among them, ſhould give them too great a credit with their hearers.

(1) Pag. 11.

[D] A Cathechiſm and Confeſſion of Faith.] The title of it is; A Catechiſm and Confeſſion of Faith, approved of and agreed unto by the general aſſembly of the Patriarchs, Prophets, and Apoſtles, Chriſt himſelf chief Speaker in and among them. This, he tells us, "con- "tains a true and faithful account of the principles and "doctrines, which are moſt ſurely believed by the "Churches of Chriſt in Great Britain and Ireland, "who are reproachfully called by the name of Quak- "ers; yet are found in one faith with the primitive "Church and Saints; as is moſt clearly demonſtrated "by ſome plain Scripture-teſtimonies (without conſe- "quences or commentaries,) which are here collected "and inſerted by way of anſwer to a few weighty, "yet eaſy and familiar queſtions, fitted as well for "the wiſeſt and largeſt, as for the weakeſt and loweſt "capacities. To which is added an Expoſtulation "with, and Appeal to all other Profeſſors." He obſerves in his Preface, that the generality of all Proteſtants, tho' in many other things miſerably rent among themſelves, agree in dividing from the Church of Rome in theſe two particulars; 1. That every principle and doctrine of the Chriſtian Faith is and ought to be founded upon the Scriptures; and that whatſoever principles or doctrines are not only not contrary, but even not according thereto, ought to be denied, as Antichriſtian. 2. That the Scriptures themſelves are plain and eaſy to be underſtood; and that every private Chriſtian and Member of the Church ought to read and peruſe them, that they may know their faith and belief founded upon them, and receive them for that cauſe alone, and not becauſe any Church or Aſſembly has compounded and recommended them, the choiceſt and moſt pure of which they are obliged to look upon as fallible. He tells us then, that in contradiction to this known and acknowledg'd principle, they moſt vigorouſly proſecute and perſecute others with the like ſeverity the Papiſts did their Fathers for believing things, that are plainly ſet down in the Scriptures; and for not believing divers principles, for which themſelves are forced to recur to Tradition, and can by no means prove from Scripture. He declares, that in the anſwers to the Queſtions there is not one word, that he knows of, but the expreſs words of Scripture; and if in ſome of the queſtions there is ſomewhat ſubſumed of what in his judgment was the plain and naked import of the words, it was not to impoſe his ſenſe upon the reader; but to make way for the next queſtion, for the ſake of the dependence of the matter. I ſhall leave it, ſays he, to the reaſon of any underſtanding and judicious man, who is not biaſſed by ſelf-intereſt, (that great enemy to true equity,) and who in the leaſt meaſure is willing to give way to the light of Chriſt in his conſcience, if the Scriptures do not pertinently and aptly anſwer to the queſtions. The author of the Preface before Mr. Barclay's Works (2) tells us, that it was a Scripture-Eſſay in the heat of divers controverſies then on foot, and that it had paſſed thro' three impreſſions before it was printed in the collection of his works. That his aim was to give the clear and native ſenſe and authority of the Holy Ghoſt in Scripture upon every point of faith and practice, eſpecially thoſe that were controverted, ſuggeſting the points ſucceſſively in queſtions from head to head, and giving anſwer by proper Scriptures without any conſequences; leaving it to every reader to judge how far the queſtion and anſwer agreed, and what ſenſe the Holy Scripture expreſt as to the point ſtated in the queſtion. And indeed, continues that author, it were greatly to be deſired, that where men cannot agree in their comment, who yet agree in the text, they would ſtrive to improve piety and charity under generalities, where they do and can meet, and would ſtudy to be quiet and follow peace with all men, and holineſs, without which no man ſhall ſee the Lord. It was a great unhappineſs to men, as well as injury to religion itſelf, that it has been branched and broken into ſo many parts and points; and more, that ſome men have ſo boldly and critically ſuperfined upon them; but worſt of all, that Governments have troubled themſelves to give them authority, and make them the current creeds of their countries; and to deny and put down as baſe and adulterate all principles or doctrines of a differing ſenſe, tho' they have an intrinſic worth, and the exemplary virtue of their profeſſions to recommend them.

(2) Pag. 12.

[E] A book, intitled, The Anarchy of the Ranters and other Libertines, &c.] In this work he endeavours, as he tells us in the title, to vindicate the Quakers from thoſe, that accuſe them of diſorder and confuſion kers [F]; which is the moſt celebrated of all his Works. The Theſes Theologicæ, which are the foundation of this Work, and addreſſed to the Clergy of what ſort ſoever, were publiſhed a conſiderable time before the writing of this Apology, and printed in Latin, French, High and Low Dutch, and Engliſh. He ſent them to the Doctors, Profeſſors, and Students of Divinity, both Popiſh and Proteſtant in every Country in Europe, deſiring them to examine them, and return an anſwer to them (f). When he had written his Apology, he ſent two copies of it to every Prince's Embaſſador at Nimeguen, in order that they might conſider it, and ſend it to their Princes for their cognizance and enquiry. He publiſhed confuſion on the one hand, and from ſuch as calumniate them with tyranny and impoſition on the other; and to ſhew, that as the true and pure principles of the Goſpel are reſtored by their teſtimony, ſo alſo the antient Apoſtolic Order of the Church of Chriſt is re-eſtabliſhed among them, and ſettled upon its right baſis and foundation. He complains in the Preface, that the Quakers are ſometimes repreſented as a rude, diſorderly rabble, leaving every one to do, as they liſt, againſt all good order and government; and at other times, that they are ſo much for order, as not to admit men to exerciſe the liberty of their own judgments. He obſerves that there were two things eſpecially, both of which in their primitive uſe were appointed, and very much contributed towards the edification of the Church. The one was the power and authority, which the Apoſtles had given them of Chriſt for the gathering, building up, and governing of his Church; by virtue of which power and authority they alſo wrote the holy Scriptures. The other is that privilege given to every Chriſtian under the Goſpel to be led and guided by the Spirit of Chriſt, and to be taught by it in all things. But theſe, he tells us, are by the perverſeneſs of men frequently made to claſh with and deſtroy each other. For on the one hand the authority and power, that reſided in the Apoſtles, while it is annexed and entailed to an outward ordination and ſucceſſion of Teachers, is made uſe of to cloak and cover all manner of abuſes, even the height of idolatry and ſuperſtition. But he remarks, that on the other hand ſome are ſo great pretenders to inward motions and revelations of the Spirit, that there are no extravagancies ſo wild, which they will not cloak with it; and ſo much are they for every one's following their own mind, as can admit of no Chriſtian fellowſhip and community, nor of that good order and diſcipline, which the Church of Chriſt never was nor can be without. This gives an open door to all libertiniſm, and brings great reproach to the Chriſtian Faith. And on this hand have foully fallen the German Anabaptiſts ſo called, John of Leyden, Knipperdolling, &c. (in caſe thoſe monſtrous things committed by them be ſuch as they are related,) and ſome more moderate of that kind have been found among the people in England, called Ranters. As it is true, the people called Quakers have been branded with both of theſe extremes; it is as true, it hath been and is their work to avoid them, and to be found in that even and good path of the primitive Church, where all were no doubt led and acted by the Holy Spirit, and might have all propheſied one by one; and yet there was a ſubjection of the Prophets to the Spirits of the Prophets. The author of the Preface to his Works (3) informs us, that "this "diſcourſe touching the tender place, both of thoſe, "that exerciſe a coercive authority over conſcience on "the one hand, and of thoſe, that to avoid the extreme run into an abſolute perſonal independency in "point of order and government on the other hand. "Both ſorts were not a little diſguſted; but the latter "more eſpecially, that thought themſelves chiefly "concerned in the author's intentions and labour. And "indeed the riſe and ground of the diſcourſe was the "diſſatisfaction of ſome, that profeſſed to be of the "ſame Society, about the methods of proceeding, as "a Chriſtian Community for the honour of our holy "Profeſſion. Some miſtook him; others too deſignedly inveighed againſt him. The animoſity roſe ſo "high in ſome few leading perſons of that diſſent, as "to queſtion his ſincerity to the profeſſion he made of "Religion in general, whiſpering him to be Popiſhly affected, if not a Papiſt, and perhaps a graduated one too. And why? firſt becauſe he was bred "in France at ſchool under an uncle, that was a "Papiſt, if not a Prieſt. Secondly, becauſe he maintained Church-Authority at as high a rate, at leaſt "upon the ſame principles." The writer of the Preface proceeds then to vindicate him from theſe imputations.

(f) Croeſe's General Hiſtory of the Quakers, Book 2. p. 90.

(3) Pag. 14.

[F] In 1675 he publiſhed his Apology for the Quakers.] The title of it in the Engliſh edition is as follows: An Apology for the true Chriſtian Divinity, as the ſame is held forth and preached by the people called in ſcorn Quakers; being a full explanation and vindication of their principles and doctrines by many arguments deduced from Scripture, and right reaſon, and the teſtimonies of famous authors both ancient and modern. With a full anſwer to the ſtrongeſt objections uſually made againſt them. Preſented to the King. This work is divided into fifteen propoſitions, which are amply explained. The firſt is concerning the true foundation of knowledge. The ſecond is of immediate revelation; which though it neither does nor can ever contradict the outward teſtimony of the Scriptures, or right and ſound reaſon, yet is not to be ſubjected to the examination of either, as to a more noble or certain rule and touchſtone. Since this divine revelation and inward illumination is that, which is evident and clear of it ſelf, forcing by its own evidence and clearneſs the well-diſpoſed underſtanding to aſſent. The third propoſition is concerning the Scriptures, which becauſe they are only a declaration of the fountain, and not the fountain itſelf, are not to be eſteemed the principal ground of all truth and knowledge, nor yet the adequate, primary rule of faith and manners. However as they gave a true and faithful teſtimony of the firſt foundation, they are and may be eſteemed a ſecondary rule, ſubordinate to the ſpirit, from which they have all their excellency and certainty. The fourth is concerning the condition of man in the fall, in which ſtate he can know nothing aright, and his thoughts and conceptions concerning God and ſpiritual things are unprofitable to himſelf and others. However this evil ſeed is not imputed to infants, until by tranſgreſſion they actually join themſelves with it. The fifth is of the univerſal redemption by Chriſt, and alſo the ſaving and ſpiritual Light, wherewith every man is enlightened. Mr. Barclay endeavours to prove the reality and influences of this light from ſeveral paſſages of Scripture; and in the ſixth propoſition affirms, that according to this principle or hypotheſis all the objections againſt the univerſality of Chriſt's death are eaſily ſolved. And from hence, ſays he, it follows, that as ſome of the old Philoſophers might have been ſaved, ſo alſo may now ſome, who by Providence are caſt into thoſe remote parts of the world, where the knowledge of the Hiſtory is wanting, be made partakers of the divine Myſtery, if they receive and reſiſt not that grace, a manifeſtation whereof is given to every man to profit withal. The ſeventh is concerning Juſtification. As many as reſiſt not this light, but receive it, procure the fruits of holineſs, by which means they are ſanctified and juſtified before God; not indeed by their own works wrought in our will, nor yet by good works, conſidered as of themſelves, but by Chriſt, who is both the Gift and the Giver, and the cauſe producing the effects within us. The eighth is concerning Perfection. Thoſe, in whom this holy and pure birth is fully brought forth, are free from actual ſinning, and in that reſpect perfect. Yet this perfection admits of a growth; and there remains a poſſibility of ſinning, where the mind does not moſt diligently attend unto the Lord. The ninth is of perſeverance, and the poſſibility of falling from grace. The tenth is concerning the Miniſtry. He tells us, that as by this gift or light of God all true knowledge in things ſpiritual is received; ſo by the ſame every true Miniſter is ordained and ſupplied in the work of the Miniſtry. That ſuch perſons as have this authority may preach, though without commiſſion or literature; as on the other hand, thoſe who want the authority of this divine gift, however learned or authorized by the commiſſions of liſhed an Engliſh tranſlation of it done by himſelf in 1678; and it has been ſince tranſlated into High Dutch, Low Dutch, French and Spaniſh. There have been ſeveral editions of it in Engliſh ſince. He had a diſpute in the year 1675 with ſome Students of the Univerſity of Aberdeen, an account of which was afterwards publiſhed. In 1676 he publiſhed his Quakeriſm confirmed; a Vindication of the chief Doctrines and Principles of the Quakers, from the Arguments and Objections of the Students of Divinity (ſo called) of Aberdeen, in their book, intitled, Quakeriſm canvaſſed. The year following he wrote his Univerſal Love conſidered and eſtabliſhed upon its right Foundation [G]; and another piece, intitled, An Epiſtle of Love and friendly Advice to the Ambaſſadors of the ſeveral Princes of Europe met at Nimeguen to conſult the Peace of Chriſtendom, ſo far as they are concerned [H]. His next Treatiſe was publiſhed in 1679, and intitled, R. B.'s Apology for men and churches, are to be eſteemed but as deceivers, and not true Miniſters of the Goſpel. Thoſe likewiſe who have received this gift, ought to give it freely, without hire or bargaining; far leſs to uſe it as a trade to get money by. Yet if God hath called any from their employments or trades, it may be lawful for ſuch to receive ſuch temporals, (that is, what may be needful to them for meat and cloathing,) as are freely given them by thoſe, to whom they have communicated Spirituals. The eleventh is concerning Worſhip. All true and acceptable worſhip to God is offered in the inward and immediate moving and drawing of his own Spirit; which is neither limited to places, times, or perſons. For though we are to worſhip him always, becauſe we are to fear before him; yet as to the outward ſignification thereof in prayers, praiſes or preachings, we ought not to do it where and when we will, but where and when we are moved thereunto by the ſecret inſpirations of his Spirit in our hearts; which God heareth and accepteth, and is never wanting to move us thereunto, when need is; of which he himſelf is the alone proper judge. All other worſhip then, both praiſes, prayers, and preachings, which man ſets about in his own will and at his own appointment, which he can both begin and end at his pleaſure, do or leave undone as himſelf ſees meet, whether they be a preſcribed form, as a Liturgy, or prayers conceived extemporarily by the natural ſtrength and faculty of the mind, they are all but ſuperſtitions, will-worſhip and abominable idolatry in the ſight of God. The twelfth propoſition is concerning Baptiſm; which is a pure and ſpiritual thing, to wit, the baptiſm of the ſpirit and fire, of which the baptiſm of John was a figure; which was commanded for a time, and not to continue for ever. As to the baptiſm of infants, it is a mere human tradition; for which neither precept nor practice is to be found in all the Scripture. The thirteenth is concerning the Communion or Participation of the Body and Blood of Chriſt; which is inward and ſpiritual; and of this the breaking of bread by Chriſt with his Diſciples was a figure, which they even uſed in the Church for a time, who had received the ſubſtance on account of the weak; even as abſtaining from things ſtrangled and blood, the waſhing one another's feet, and the anointing of the ſick with oil; all which are commanded with no leſs authority and ſolemnity than the former. Yet ſeeing they are but the ſhadows of better things, they ceaſe in ſuch as have obtained the ſubſtance. The fourteenth propoſition is concerning the power of the civil Magiſtrate in matters purely religious, and pertaining to the conſcience. Since God hath aſſumed to himſelf the power and dominion of the conſcience, who alone can rightly inſtruct and govern it, therefore it is not lawful for any one whatſoever, by virtue of any authority or principality they bear in the government of this world, to force the conſcience of others. And therefore all killing, baniſhing, fining, impriſoning, and other ſuch things, which men are afflicted with only for the exerciſe of their conſcience, or difference in worſhip or opinion, proceeds from the ſpirit of Cain the murtherer, and is contrary to the truth; providing always, that no man under the pretence of conſcience prejudice his neighbour in his life or eſtate, or do any thing deſtructive to, or inconſiſtent with human ſociety; in which caſe the Law is for the tranſgreſſor, and juſtice is to be adminiſtred upon all without reſpect of perſons. The fifteenth propoſition concerning Salutations, Recreations, &c. is as follows. Seeing the chief end of all Religion is to redeem man from the ſpirit and vain converſation of this world, and to lead them into inward communion with God, before whom if we fear always, we are accounted happy; therefore all the vain cuſtoms and habits thereof both in word and deed are to be rejected and forſaken by thoſe who come to this fear; ſuch as the taking off the hat to a man, the bowings and cringings of the body, and other ſuch ſalutations of that kind, with all the fooliſh and ſuperſtitious formalities attending them; all which man has invented in his degenerate ſtate to feed his pride, in the vain pomp and glory of this world. As alſo the unprofitable plays, frivolous recreations, ſportings and gamings, which are invented to paſs away the precious time, and divert the mind from the witneſs of God in the heart, and from the living ſenſe of his fear, and from that evangelical ſpirit, wherewith Chriſtians ought to be armed; and which leads into ſobriety, gravity and godly fear, in which as we abide, the bleſſing of God is felt to attend us in theſe actions, which we are neceſſarily engaged in order to the taking care for the ſuſtenance of the outward man. The Author of the Preface to his Works quoted above tells us (4), that this Apology is the moſt comprehenſive of all his performances, and was publiſhed in Latin, Dutch and Engliſh. It firſt lays down, ſays he, our avowed principles of belief and practice, diſtinguiſhed from what our enemies are pleaſed to ſay in our names, who by making us erroneous, give themſelves the eaſier taſk to confute us, and then triumph. After he has ſtated our principles, he has put the objections, which he had collected out of our adverſaries books, or rather that he did apprehend might be made to thoſe principles; and anſwers them. And laſtly cites divers Authors, both antient and modern, eſpecially ſome of the primitive ages, for further illuſtration and confirmation of our ſaid belief and practice. The method and ſtyle of the book may be ſomewhat ſingular, and like a ſcholar; for we make that ſort of learning no part of divine ſcience. But that was not to ſhew himſelf, but out of his tenderneſs to ſcholars, and as far as the ſimplicity and purity of the truth would permit, in condeſcention to their education and way of treating of thoſe points herein handled.

(4) Pag. 21.

[G] He wrote his Univerſal Love conſider'd &c.] The title of it is as follows: Univerſal Love conſidered and eſtabliſh'd upon its right foundation; being a ſerious enquiry how far charity may and ought to be extended towards perſons of different judgments in matters of Religion, and whoſe principles among the ſeveral ſects of Chriſtians do moſt naturally lead to that due moderation required. He obſerves in his 4th ſection of this piece, that as there are two ways chiefly, whereby a people or ſociety ſignify their charity and love towards others, who differ from them; ſo by theſe two alſo is ſignified their contrary principles and practice. The firſt by a favourable and charitable judgment of the condition of men's ſouls, tho' of different and contrary principles from them, in ſuppoſing, or at leaſt not abſolutely denying, but that they may even upon their own principles, if faithful thereto, obtain peace with God, and life eternal. The ſecond is by a friendly and neighbourly deportment towards men's perſons, in not ſeeking to ruin and deſtroy them, whether in life, liberty, or eſtate; tho' their judgment concerning God and things ſpiritual in the nature and manner of the exerciſe of their worſhip be both contrary and different. Where the defect of either of theſe two is, there of neceſſity muſt be wanting univerſal love and charity. This piece is dated from Aberdeen-priſon 1677.

[H] Another piece, intitled, An Epiſtle of love and friendly Advice &c.] In this piece he endeavours to ſhew for the true Chriſtian Divinity vindicated from John Browne's Examination and pretended Confutation thereof in his book, intitled, Quakeriſm the Path-way to Paganiſm. He wrote likewiſe the ſame year A Vindication of his Anarchy of the Ranters, &c. ſerving as an explanatory Poſtſcript thereof. His laſt Tract was publiſhed in 1686, and intitled, The Poſſibility and Neceſſity of the inward and immediate Revelation of the Spirit of God towards the Foundation and Ground of true Faith, proved in a Letter writ in Latin to a Perſon of Quality in Holland, and now alſo put into Engliſh [I]. He travelled into England, Holland and Germany with Mr. William Pen, in order to propagate the Doctrines of the Quakers; and in Holland he had a Conference upon Religion with Mr. Labadie, well known for the peculiarity of his notions in Religion. Mr. Sewell, the Author of The Hiſtory of the Quakers, who was perſonally acquainted with him, tells us (g), that he was a man of eminent gifts and endowments, well ſkilled not only in the learned Languages, but likewiſe in the Writings of the antient Fathers and other Eccleſiaſtical Writers. That he had a ſound judgment, and a great underſtanding; and was of a friendly and pleaſant, though grave converſation; remarkably qualified for compoſing of differences; and "that he really lived "up to what he profeſſed, being of an unblameable deportment, truly pious, and well be-"loved of thoſe he converſed with." Mr. Pen likewiſe in his Teſtimony to the Memory of him tells us, that he was a dutiful ſon, a loving huſband, a tender and careful father, an eaſy maſter, and a good and kind neighbour and friend. Mr. George Keith, who had been formerly one of the moſt conſiderable preachers and writers among the Quakers, and very ſhew the true cauſe of the war, and to propoſe the right remedy and means for a firm and ſettled peace. A copy of it was delivered February 22d and 24th 1678 at Nimeguen to each of the Embaſſadors, and their Principals, together with his Apology in Latin.

(g) Pag. 627, 628.

[I] His laſt Tract was publiſhed in 1686, and intitled, The Poſſibility and Neceſſity of the inward and immediate Revelation &c.] Mr. Sewell in his Hiſtory of the Quakers (5) tells us, that he wrote this Letter in 1676 to the Heer Adrian Paets, with whom Mr. Barclay had ſome diſcourſe, when that Gentleman returned from Spain, where he had been Embaſſador from the States of the United Provinces. He had written a Letter ſome time before to Chriſtian Hartzoeker, concerning the Doctrine of the Quakers, which Letter is publiſh'd in the Præſtantium ac eruditorum virorum Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ, Amſterdam 1704; and having afterwards diſcourſed with Mr. Barclay concerning the immediate Revelation of the Spirit of God, the latter was induced to write him a letter in Latin upon that ſubject. This letter being ſent over from Scotland to Holland was delivered by Mr. Benjamin Furly at Rotterdam to Mr. Paets, with a requeſt, that he would return an anſwer to it, which he promis'd to do. But as he neglected it, Mr. Furly at laſt publiſhed the Letter without mentioning the perſon's name, to whom it was written, but only his character, viz. Cuidam Legato; i. e. "To a certain Embaſſador." In this Letter he firſt ſets down the objection of Mr. Paets, that ſince the being and ſubſtance of the Chriſtian Religion conſiſts in the knowledge of and faith concerning the Birth, Life, Death, Reſurrection and Aſcenſion of Chriſt Jeſus, he conſidered the ſubſtance of the Chriſtian Religion as a contingent truth; which contingent truth was matter of fact. And matter of fact could not be known by the revelation of another, or by the perception of the outward ſenſes; becauſe there are naturally in our ſouls no ideas of contingent truths, ſuch as are concerning neceſſary truths, viz. that God is, and that the whole is greater than the part. And ſince it might without abſurdity be ſaid, that God cannot make a contingent truth to become a neceſſary truth; neither can God reveal contingent truths or matters of fact, but as contingent truths are revealed; and matters of fact not being revealed but by the outward ſenſes, the concluſion drawn from thence is, that men are not obliged to believe God producing any revelation in the ſoul concerning matters of fact, whether of a thing done or to be done, unleſs there be added ſome miracles obvious to the outward ſenſes, by which the ſoul may be aſcertained that this revelation comes from God. In anſwer to theſe arguments, Mr. Barclay premiſes firſt, that it was falſly ſuppoſed, that the eſſence of the Chriſtian Religion conſiſted in the hiſtorical faith and knowledge of the Birth, Death, Life, Reſurrection, and Aſcenſion of Chriſt. That faith and hiſtorical knowledge is indeed a part of the Chriſtian Religion, but not ſuch an eſſential part, as that without it the Chriſtian Religion cannot conſiſt; but an integral part, which goes to the compleating of the Chriſtian Religion, as the hands or feet of a man are integral parts of a man, without which nevertheleſs a man may exiſt, but not an entire and compleat man. Yet he agrees, that the hiſtorical knowledge of Chriſt is commonly manifeſted to us by the holy Scripture as the means; but nevertheleſs he aſſerts, that God could without ſuch an outward means manifeſt that hiſtorical knowledge to our minds; and likewiſe, that a contingent truth may be known by a ſupernatural knowledge. He obſerves that when God makes known to men any matter of fact by divine revelation, he then ſpeaks as to the ear of the heart of the inward man. And that as when any natural idea is excited in us, we clearly know it; ſo alſo when a ſupernatural idea is raiſed, we clearly know that, of which it is the idea. He explains likewiſe what properly is the inward ſupernatural ſenſe in man; and then he diſtinguiſhes between contingent and neceſſary truths, and ſhews how a divine Revelation may be known to be ſuch, affirming that natural and ſpiritual ſenſes are diſtinguiſhable by their objects, and demonſtrating how godly men may know that they are in the favour of God, and how the wicked feel the wrath of God as fire. He obſerves after what manner the ſpiritual ſenſes diſtinguiſh the good and evil; and he confeſſes that there is in all men as well the godly as ungodly ſome ſort of idea of God, as of a moſt perfect Being. But he aſſerts, that the ſupernatural idea of God differs much from the natural; and that in all men there is a ſupernatural idea of God. He ſhews likewiſe wherein the motions of the mind differ from thoſe of the body; and that there are ideas as well of ſupernatural as of natural things. And obſerving from whence the errors of falſe likeneſſes of reaſon proceed, he ſays, that natural reaſon cannot perceive ſupernatural things. He aſſerts, that the revelations to the Prophets were by inward inſpirations in their minds; and that they were moſt certainly perſuaded, that they were divinely inſpired even without any outward miracle. And that it is by the inſpiration of the ſame divine Spirit, by which the Prophets prophefied, that we believe their words and writings to be divine, concerning contingent truths, as well paſt as to come. He enquires likewiſe, whether faith comes by outward hearing; and he ſhews how the outward ſenſes may be deceived, nay, that often they are vitiated both by outward caſualties and natural infirmities, to which the godly are no leſs ſubject than the wicked. Mr. Barclay treats of theſe points very largely in his Letter; and he tells us, that in the year 1685 he diſcourſed with Mr. Paets upon the ſame ſubject at London, where the latter was one of the Commiſſioners for the Dutch Eaſt-India Company. But I could not, ſays our author in his Advertiſement to the reader, find him propoſe any thing new, nor what I could conceive had any weight towards a reply. What his reaſons were not to proſecute this matter, I ſhall not determine. But thus far he readily yielded, "That he had been miſtaken in his notion of the "Quakers; for he found they could make a reaſonable very intimate with Mr. Barclay, but afterwards took Orders in the Church of England, in his Standard of the Quakers examined (b), places him in the claſs of ſuch erring Chriſtians that cannot be denied to be in Chriſt. Mr. Jerem. Jones (i) ſtyles him a man unqueſtionably of a good genius. The Dedication of his Apology to King Charles II is very remarkable, for the uncommon frankneſs and ſimplicity, with which it is written [K]; but that Work, which is eſteemed the ſtandard of the Doctrines of the Quakers, has been attacked by ſeveral Writers [L]. However ſeveral very eminent Writers acknowledge, that it is written with great force and extent of Learning. Mr. Norris tells us (k), that he cannot

(5) Pag. 536.

(b) Pag. 405.

(i) New and full Method of ſettling the Canonical Authority of the New Teſtament, vol. 2. Part 3. cap. 35. pag. 489. edit. London 1726, in 8vo.

(k) Two Treatiſes of Divine Light, Tract 2. pag. 32.

" plea for the foundation of their Religion." He informs us then, that upon reading it over again, he found an inclination in himſelf, and was perſuaded by ſome friends, to publiſh a Tranſlation of it in Engliſh. He obſerves with regard to the ground and foundation of faith, that it is reſolved either into Tradition or Revelation; ſince thoſe, who lay claim to the Scriptures, and would make it the foundation of their faith, reſolve it merely into Tradition, when the motives of credibility are enquired into. For my part, ſays he, I think, the Papiſts do wiſely in pleading for Infallibility; for certainly the true Church never was nor can be without it. And the Proteſtants do honeſtly in not claiming it, becauſe they are ſenſible they want it. I ſhould therefore deſire the one to prove, that they are infallible, and adviſe the other to believe they may, and ſeek after it. But I am ſure neither the one is, nor the other cannot, without immediate, divine Revelation. Therefore as to deny Revelation is a bad way to prove Infallibility; ſo to deny Infallibility is a bad way to make a Reformation; ſince they, who do reform, had need to be certain they are doing ſo. The aſſerting of Infallibility in the Church of Chriſt is not the error of the Church of Rome; but the pretending to it, when they have it not, and placing it where they ſhould not. But ſince thoſe, who oppoſe immediate Revelation, do it on the account, that they reckon it either impoſſible or unneceſſary, I hope there will be as much found in this Epiſtle, as will evince the contrary.

[K] Very remarkable for the frankneſs and ſimplicity, with which it is written.] Mr. Voltaire in his Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation (6), having obſerved, that Mr. Barclay's Apology is a work as well drawn up as the ſubject could poſſibly admit, tells us, that the Dedication to Charles II is not filled with mean flattering encomiums; but abounds with bold touches in favour of truth, and with the wiſeſt counſels. " He hath often " faithfully warned thee by his ſervants, ſays he in the " cloſe of his Epiſtle Dedicatory, ſince he reſtored thee " to the Royal Dignity, that thy heart might not wax " wanton againſt him to forget his Mercies and Pro- " vidence towards thee, whereby he might permit " thee to be ſoothed up and lulled aſleep in thy ſins " by the flattering of Court Paraſites, who by their " fawning are the ruin of many Princes." . . . . Thou haſt taſted of proſperity and adverſity; thou knoweſt what it is to be baniſhed thy native country; to be over-ruled, as well as to rule and ſit upon the Throne; and being oppreſſed thou haſt reaſon to know how hateful the oppreſſor is both to God and man. If after all theſe warnings and advertiſements thou doſt not turn unto the Lord with all thy heart, but forget him, who remembered thee in thy diſtreſs, and give up thyſelf to follow luſt and vanity; ſurely great will be thy condemnation. Againſt which ſnare, as well as the temptation of thoſe, that may or do feed thee, and prompt thee to evil, the moſt excellent and prevalent remedy will be to apply thyſelf to that light of Chriſt, which ſhineth in thy conſcience; which neither can nor will flatter thee, nor ſuffer thee to be at eaſe in thy ſins; but doth and will deal plainly and faithfully with thee, as thoſe, that are followers thereof, have alſo done. God Almighty, who hath ſo ſignally hitherto viſited thee with his love, ſo touch and reach thy heart, e'er the day of thy viſitation be expired, that thou mayſt effectually turn to him, ſo as to improve thy place and ſtation for his name. Mr. Voltaire remarks, that " a more ſurprizing circum- " ſtance is, that this Epiſtle, written by a private man " of no figure, was ſo happy in its effects as to put " a ſtop to the proſecution." That Gentleman ſeems to be miſtaken in aſſerting, that Mr. Barclay was a private man of no figure, ſince he was a perſon of a very good family and fortune, and particularly eminent for his extenſive learning. And there appears to be no manner of ground for affirming, that this Epiſtle was the reaſon, that a ſtop was put to the proſecution againſt the Quakers; ſince we find nothing to that purpoſe in any of their Hiſtories or other Writings.

(6) Letter 3. p. 22. edit. London 1733.

[L] Has been attacked by ſeveral Writers.] We ſhall give the reader a liſt of the Writers againſt the Theſes and Apology. I. Mr. John Brown, a Preſbyterian Divine in Scotland, in his Quakeriſm the Path-Way to Paganiſm; which was anſwered by Mr. Barclay himſelf in 1679, as we obſerved in the text of this Article. II. Nicholas Arnoldus, Profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker in Frieſland (7) wrote an Exercitation in anſwer to the Theſes Theologicæ; of which Mr. Barclay takes frequent notice in his Apology. III. John George Bajerus, a Lutheran Divine, and Doctor and Profeſſor of Divinity at Jena, publiſhed a piece concerning the beginning of the true and ſaving knowledge of God, in oppoſition to Mr. Barclay's Theſes and Apology; and objecting againſt ſome expreſſions of our Author, as improper, abſurd, obſcure, and unintelligible, he was anſwered by Mr. George Keith, (Mr. Barclay being then employed in ſome other affairs;) to whom Mr. Bajerus made no reply (8). IV. John Chriſtopher Holthuſius, a Divine of the Augſburgh Confeſſion, wrote a large treatiſe in High Dutch; which Croeſe tells us (9) deſerves the title of the German Anti-Barclaian, ſince the Quakers have not yet anſwered it. V. Mr. George Keith abovementioned publiſhed a book intitled The Quakers Standard examined, in anſwer to the Apology; to which no anſwer has been made. VI. In the year 1683 a Latin Treatiſe was publiſhed at Hamborough in 8vo againſt the Apology by a Lutheran Divine, whoſe name was L. Ant. Reiſer, a native of Augſburgh in Germany, from whence he was expelled on account of his Religion, and retired to Hamborough, where he was appointed Miniſter of the Church of St. James. His book is intitled Anti-Barclaius, id eſt, Examen Apologiæ, quam non ita pridem Robertus Barclajus, Scoto-Britannus, pro Theologiâ vere Chriſtiana edidit, inſtitutum in gratiam Evangelicorum a L. Ant. Reiſero Auguſtano, nunc Paſtore ad D. Jacobi Hamburgenſis. We have an account of this book in the Acta Eruditorum for the year 1683 (10), the Authors of which obſerve, that Mr. Barclay's Apology is written in a manner very different from the uſual writings of the Quakers; for though he declares in his Preface that he was no admirer and imitator of the School-men, but rather an oppoſer and deſpiſer of them, yet he has drawn up his Theſes after the ſcholaſtic form, and ſupported them with paſſages from the Scriptures and the Fathers, and replied to all the objections which had been or might be oppoſed to his ſyſtem, with great art and ſagacity. Beſides he was not ignorant of human learning, which was the general characteriſtic of the Quakers, defended even by that Author himſelf in his tenth Theſis; but he was well ſkilled in Philology, Philoſophy, and the Fathers, as appears from his whole work. Quamvis enim is Scholaſticorum non admiratorem & imitatorem, ſed contemptorem, & adverſarium in præfatione ad Lectorem ſe eſſe fateatur; Theſes tamen ſuas in Apologia, non confuſè, uti Fanatice plerique alii, ſed ſcholaſticorum more, h. e. κατασκευαστικῶς & ἀνασκευαστικῶς propugnat; quippe ecthеſes ſuas non Scripturæ tantum ac patrum dictis communiens undique, ſed ad ea quoque, quæ ſectæ ſuæ vel oppoſita jam ſunt, vel opponi ulterius poſſe prævidet, pro virili reſpondens. Neque enim humanæ literaturæ ignarus eſt Barclajus, qui Quakerorum alias character eſt, ab ipſo Barclajo Theſi X requiſitus; ſed in Philologiâ, Philoſophiâ, & lectione patrum non tralatitiè, ut totum hoc opus loquitur, verſatur (11). Mr. Barclay having paſſed frequent cenſures upon the Lutherans among other Proteſtants in his 1, 7, 9, 11, 14 and 15 Theſes, Mr. Reiſer undertook the defence of them in this book, and

(7) See his Article in Mr. Bayle.

(8) Croeſe, Book 2. pag. 91.

(9) Ibid.

(10) Pag. 544, & ſeq. See likewiſe Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 6. pag. 85. edit. Amſterdam 1725, in 4to.

(11) Ibid. pag. 545.

cannot think Quakeriſm inconſiderable, as the principles of it are laid down and managed by our Author; and "that the great and general contempt, which they lie under, did not "hinder him from thinking the Sect of the Quakers to be far the moſt conſiderable "of any, that divide from the Church, in caſe the Quakeriſm that is generally held, be "the ſame with that which Mr. Barclay has delivered to the World for ſuch:" Whom, ſays he, I take to be ſo great a man, that I profeſs freely, that I had rather engage againſt an hundred Bellarmins, Hardings, and Stapletons, than with one Barclay. Mr. Trenchard in a Diſcourſe upon Enthuſiaſm, publiſhed in Vol. IV (l) of Cato's Letters, tells us, that he is not aſhamed to own, that he had with great pleaſure read over his Apology, and really thinks it to be the moſt maſterly, charitable, and reaſonable ſyſtem, that he had ever ſeen. "It ſolves the numerous difficulties raiſed by other Sects, and by turns thrown at "one another; ſhews all parts of Scripture to be uniform and conſiſtent; and as Sir "Iſaac Newton, by allowing him gravitation, has accounted for all the phenomena of "nature, ſo if we allow to Mr. Barclay thoſe operations of the Spirit, which the Qua-"kers pretend to feel, and which he ſays every man in the world has and may feel, if he "watches its motions, and does not ſuppreſs them; then I think all the jangling vain "queſtions, numerous ſuperſtitions, and various oppreſſions, which have plagued the "world and examined the Apology of our Author, and endeavoured to ſhew not only the heterodoxy of many of his doctrines, but even to diſcover the latent errors in other parts of his wrirings, which ſeemed leſs obnoxious. "He takes notice, according to the Writers of "the Acta Eruditorum (12), of his frequent ſelf-con-"tradictions, and the impertinence of his quotations "from Scripture and the Fathers in favour of his "opinions; and confutes his anſwers to thoſe objec-"tions which had been ſuggeſted by others or him-"ſelf; and explodes his abſurd and chimerical gloſſes, "and inconſequential manner of arguing." Examinavit enim theſes atque ectheſes Barclaji omnes, neque heterodoxas tantum ex orthodoxiâ ſubvertit; ſed &, quid ὕπουλον ſub illis, quæ ſaniores videntur, latitet, detexit; quam ſæpe etiam ſibi contradixerit Apologetes, quamque frivolè inepteque Scripturæ ac Patrum dicta ad incruſtanda dogmata ſua adhibuerit, oſtendit, exploſis etiam omnibus ad objectiones vel ab aliis vel a ſeipſo factas reſponſionibus, gloſſis item cerebrinis, & conſequentiis malè cohærentibus. And ſince the principal doctrines of the Quakers are contained in the firſt propoſitions of the Apology, Mr. Reiſer is more copious in the confutation of them, than in the ſubſequent ones, in which Mr. Barclay advances almoſt the very ſame notions with the Anabaptiſts; and though a great many reproaches are fixed upon thoſe of different ſentiments in Religion, yet Mr. Reiſer confines himſelf chiefly to the defence of the Lutherans; though he does not deny, that even they have ſome defects, and that many learned and pious men in that communion wiſh for the removal of theſe grievances; but at the ſame time he affirms, that the uſe ought to be diſtinguiſhed from the abuſe in ſome points, which are cenſured in the 2d and 15th propoſitions of the Apology. Non diffitetur interim & ſuis Lutheranis eſſe nævos; atque hinc orta non tantum Gravamina, ſed pia multorum doctorum bonorumque in Eccleſiâ Lutheranâ eſſe Deſideria; uſum etiam ab abuſu in multis, in illis maximè, quæ in 2 & 15 Ectheſibus taxantur, diſcernendum eſſe contendit (13). He has ſubjoined to this Treatiſe a piece of Dr. Henry More addreſſed to the Quakers, and declares himſelf to be of the ſame opinion with that Divine, that this Sect has borrowed a great many of their doctrines from Jacob Behmen, known by the title of the Teutonic Philoſopher. VII. In the year 1705 Mr. Thomas Bennet, afterwards Vicar of St. Giles's Cripplegate, publiſhed a Treatiſe in twenty ſix chapters, in which he particularly attacks Mr. Barclay, the third edition of which was printed in 1733. It is intitled, A Confutation of Quakeriſm, or a plain proof of the Falſhood of what the principal Quaker Writers (eſpecially Mr. R. Barclay in his Apology and other Works) do teach, concerning the neceſſity of immediate Revelation, in order to a ſaving Chriſtian Faith; the Being, Nature, and Operation of the pretended Univerſal Light within; its ſtirring with men, moving them to prayer, and calling them to the Miniſtry; Regeneration, Sanctification, Juſtification, Salvation, and Union with God; the Nature of a Church; the Rule of Faith; Water Baptiſm; and the Lord's Supper. Divers Queſtions alſo concerning Perfection, Chriſt's Satisfaction, the Judge of Controverſies, &c. are briefly ſtated and reſolved.

(l) Num. 124. pag. 153-163. 3d edition London 1733.

(12) Ibid.

(13) Ibid.

He obſerves in his preface, that "he cannot but think "Quakeriſm one of the vileſt and moſt pernicious "hereſies, that our unhappy Nation has ever been "infected with." He tells us likewiſe, that this Sect, when it firſt appeared in the world, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by ſuch an incredible variety of enthuſiaſtic freaks as made their perſons utterly ridiculous. Their books alſo were then ſtuffed with ſuch prodigious quantities of ribaldry and jargon of bitterneſs, moſt unchriſtian language, and even blaſphemy itſelf, as inclined all ſober perſons to believe, that they ought to be rather burnt than confuted. At length, continues he, Mr. William Pen, Mr. George Keith, and Mr. ROBERT BARCLAY aroſe. Theſe dreſſed up their Religion to the beſt advantage. The two laſt eſpecially endeavoured to refine Quakeriſm. They joined their ſtudies and labours; they knew and improved each other's Notions; and what books they publiſhed, either ſeparately or jointly, were received with great applauſe by their own party. Mr. Bennet having afterwards obſerved that Mr. Keith, who had left the Quakers, had returned an anſwer to Mr. Barclay's Apology, tells us, that this is certainly the exacteſt piece that ever was written in defence of Quakeriſm. In his tenth chapter he endeavours to give a brief account of what the Quakers mean by the Univerſal Light within, from a variety of paſſages in Mr. Barclay's Works. He remarks that by this Light, which Mr. Barclay likewiſe calls the Seed, the Spirit, the Grace, the Word of God, Chriſt within, vehiculum Dei, or the ſpiritual Body of Chriſt which came down from Heaven, he does not mean the eſſence of God; ſince Mr. Barclay ſays (14), that by this Seed, Grace, and Word of God, &c. we underſtand not the proper Eſſence and Nature of God preciſely taken. Nor does he mean by the Light the rational ſoul of man, or any faculty of it, particularly that which we call human underſtanding, or man's natural conſcience, or his reaſon, or any part of man's nature; ſince Mr. Barclay ſays (15), we do not underſtand this divine principle to be any part of man's nature, &c. We make it a diſtinct and ſeparate thing from man's ſoul and all the faculties of it. But by the Light they mean, as Mr. Bennet tells us, a certain ſubſtance, or real, ſpiritual, heavenly, and inviſible principle, in which they ſuppoſe, that God as Father, Son, and Spirit, dwells. For Mr. Barclay ſays (16), we know it to be a ſubſtance, and by this Seed, &c. we underſtand a ſpiritual, heavenly and inviſible Principle, (as he expreſſes it juſt after) a real ſpiritual Subſtance, in which God, as Father, Son and Spirit dwells. He obſerves likewiſe (17), that this Seed and ſpiritual Body of Chriſt is as really and immediately united unto the Word, as his outward Body was; and that this Seed and ſpiritual Nature doth belong to him, as he is the ſecond Adam or Man-Chriſt. He affirms likewiſe, that "Chriſt in us, or the Seed, "is not a third ſpiritual Nature diſtinct from that "which was the Man Chriſt Jeſus, that was crucified "according to the fleſh at Jeruſalem. For the ſame "that is in us, was and is in him. And as it is in "him, it is the fulneſs or ſpring of the ſame in us "as the ſtream. Nor is there any difference, but "ſuch as is betwixt the ſpring and the ſtream, which

(14) Apol. Propoſ. 5, 6.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Ibid.

(17) See his Quakeriſm confirm'd, Sect. 4.

" world from the beginning, would ceaſe and be at an end." But this Author propoſes ſome exceptions to Mr. Barclay's firſt principle of immediate Revelation [M]; and obſerves, that this poſtulatum will not be granted, and he fears will never be proved, though ſuch a diſcovery is much to be wiſhed, and that the opinion of it alone muſt render thoſe very happy, who can perſuade themſelves, that they have attained to it. He obſerves likewiſe, that if Mr. Barclay had meant only by the teſtimony of the Spirit that natural faculty or principle, which the Deity has inſpir'd into all men, to regulate their actions, and to acknowledge his divine bounty, (which principle Mr. Trenchard calls reaſon) and could have reconciled the workings of his light to the only one he can find in himſelf, he could readily have ſubſcribed to a very great part of his ſyſtem; which he tells us, he muſt confeſs to be moſt beneficent to the world, moſt agreeable to the Scriptures; and that it makes them, or rather ſhews them, to be moſt conſiſtent with themſelves, and comprehends every thing, which has been ſaid by the beſt Writers for Liberty of Conſcience, and againſt all ſorts of religious impoſitions. And this Mr. Barclay has done with as much wit, happy turn, and maſtery of expreſſion, as is conſiſtent with the plainneſs and ſimplicity affected by thoſe of his Sect, and for the moſt part uſed in the holy Writings.

" are one in their nature and ſubſtance.... Therefore " this ſeed being in us, the Man Chriſt is in us; not " according to his whole manhood, but according un- " to that, which is proper unto it; and yet without " all diviſion. As the natural life is in all the mem- " bers, but more eſpecially in the head and heart, " without any diviſion; ſo this ſpiritual Life and " Nature is both in Chriſt our head and in us; by " which he dwelleth in us, as the ſpirit of a man " doth in the body." Mr. Bennet examines this hypotheſis, and endeavours to ſhew both from experience and Scripture, that there is no ſuch univerſal Light within. The firſt nine chapters of this book were anſwered by Mr. Benjamin Lindley in 1710 in 4to, under the title of The Neceſſity of Immediate Revelation toward the Foundation and Ground of true Faith proved &c. And the laſt ſeventeen Chapters were anſwered in a ſecond part of that book under the ſame title in 1713. VIII. Mr. Thomas Chubb publiſhed in the year 1726 a ſhort piece in anſwer to Mr. Barclay's fourth Propoſition; in which he tells us (18), that he thinks our Author's book contains a confuſed, abſurd ſcheme of Religion; in which God is conſidered as dealing with his creatures, not according to the moral fitneſs of things, but from arbitrary pleaſure. This occaſioned ſeveral anſwers in defence of Mr. Barclay by Mr. Thomas Beaven and Dr. Thomas Morgan, a Phyſician of Briſtol, and Author of ſeveral pieces relating to the Doctrine of the Trinity, &c. Mr. Chubb replied to theſe Writers in ſeveral pieces republiſhed in his Collection of Tracts, printed in 4to 1730.

(18) Pag. 7.

[M] This author propoſes ſome exceptions to Mr. Barclay's firſt principle of immediate Revelation.] He obſerves, that he cannot concur with Mr. Barclay, in believing, that all men, who cannot find this ſpirit in themſelves, do or have ſuppreſſed it; ſince he believes there are many thouſands in all reſpects equally virtuous with himſelf, who have actually tried all experiments of watching, internal prayer, outward and inward reſignation, ſeparation from worldly thoughts and actions, and acquieſcence of mind, and ſubmiſſion to the operations of the Deity; and yet have found themſelves after all juſt where they ſet out; nor could recollect any thing that happened to them in thoſe intervals, but abſence of thought. It is ſuppoſed, continues he, that the power ſo claimed is Jeſus Chriſt operating within us; and at it is allowed by all, that the leaſt drop of his natural blood was enough to atone for the ſins of the whole world; ſo one might imagine, that the leaſt portion of his Godhead working within us might be too hard for and overcome the depravity tranſmitted to us by our firſt parents, or at leaſt be able to engage our attention or acquieſcence, which is all that is ſuppoſed requiſite to the farther progreſs and effuſion of his Deity. It is very hard to conceive, that we can ſerve God by ſequeſtring for a time all the faculties he has given us, by ſending our wits out of doors to make room for Grace, and by believing that the Spirit of God will never exert itſelf but in an empty head. And therefore I ſhall preſume to believe, till I am better informed, that as the Almighty ſhews and exhibits to us the viſible world by the medium of the outward ſenſes, he had before given to us, ſo he diſpenſes all that we do know or can know of the viſible one thro' the vehicle of our reaſoning faculties. He obſerves afterwards, that as it is not to be denied but that Almighty God has ſometimes communicated himſelf to particular perſons by ſecret impreſſions upon their ſenſes and underſtandings; ſo he dares not affirm, that he may not; and does not do ſo ſtill; and that he will not dogmatically aſſert, that any one, who pretends to feel his divine Spirit, is a lyar or enthuſiaſt; but he thinks he may ſafely affirm, that no one is concerned in his viſions or revelations but himſelf, unleſs the other feels them too, or he can prove the truth of them by miracles. He concludes with remarking, that God has given to us reaſon to diſtinguiſh truth from falſhood, impoſture from revelation, deluſion from inſpiration; and when we quit that light, we muſt wander thro' endleſs mazes and dark labyrinths, and ramble wherever fancy, imagination, or fraud, leads us.

T.

BARCOCHEBAS, or BARCOCHAB (a), was the author of a thouſand diſorders in Judea by his impoſtures, and involved his nation in a dreadful calamity under the Emperor Hadrian. He was a Jew, who proclaimed himſelf the Meſſiah, and found a famous Rabbi, who applauded this impious pretenſion of his (b). This falſe Meſſiah accommodated himſelf wonderfully to the prejudices of this wretched people: he ſpoke of nothing but wars, battles, and triumphs; and the firſt leſſon of his Goſpel was that they muſt riſe againſt the Romans. He had ſo much the leſs difficulty in perſuading them of this doctrine, becauſe he took the opportunity, when the zeal of the Jews for their Religion had enraged them againſt the Emperor. This Prince had lately ſettled a Colony near Jeruſalem (c), and eſtabliſhed Idolatry. The Jews conſidered this as an inſupportable abomination, and a prodigious profanation of their holy place; upon which account they were extremely diſpoſed to riſe. Some writers pretend, that Circumciſion was forbid them [A],

(a) That is to ſay, the Son of the Star. He applied to himſelf the prophecy of the book of Numbers, chap. xxiv. ver. 17. There ſhall riſe a ſtar out of Jacob.

(b) His name was Akiba. See his Article.

(c) Which he called Ælia Capitolina, from his own name, and from that of Jupiter Capitolinus, to whom he built a Temple.

[A] Some writers pretend that Circumciſion was forbid the Jews.] Spartian aſcribes their inſurrection to this prohibition: Moverunt ea tempeſtate & Judæi bellum, quod vetabantur mutilare genitalia (1). It is not improbable that they were prohibited to circumciſe their children, ſince we read in Modeſtinus, that he obtained of Antoninus Pius the liberty of obſerving that inſtitution; ſo that they had been diſturbed upon that account, and were obliged to have recourſe to the juſtice of the Emperor. Circumcidere Judæis filios ſuos tantum, reſcripto Divi Pii permittitur; in non ejuſdem religionis, qui hoc fecerit, caſtrantis pœna irrogatur (2). The

(1) Spart. in Vitâ Adriani, cap. 14.

(2) Modeſtinus, Libro Regularum, apud Caſaubonum in Spartian Adrian. ca p. 1 which was a violation upon their conſcience. The Talmud alledges another reaſon for their taking arms [B]. It is ſaid that their Impoſtor made uſe of the ſame artifice, which Eunus had practiſed in Sicily, to inſpire the ſlaves with a reſolution to revolt; that is, he ſet fire to ſtraw in his mouth, that he might ſeem to vomit flames [C]. He fortified himſelf in divers places; but he choſe the City of Bitter for his place of arms, and the ſeat of his Empire. It is ſaid that in order to try the courage of his followers he required them to cut off one of their fingers; and that upon the remonſtrances, which were made to him, he left off that trial, and made uſe of another invention [D]. He ravaged a prodigious many places, and maſſacred an infinite number of people; his chief cruelty was againſt the Chriſtians [E]. The Emperor being informed of theſe ravages, ſent troops to Rufus Governor of Judea with orders to ſuppreſs this ſedition immediately (d). Rufus in obedience to theſe orders exerciſed a thouſand cruelties, and yet could not finiſh his attempt. The Emperor was therefore obliged to ſend for Julius Severus, the greateſt General of that time, and to intruſt him with the whole care of this war (e). This General obtained his end upon the Jews, without ever having attacked them in a direct battle. He thought proper to attack them in a different manner, as well on account of their prodigious number, as becauſe he ſaw them carrying on the war like deſperate men. He choſe rather therefore to fall upon them ſeparately to cut off their proviſions, to ſhut them up, and ſtreighten them (f); and at laſt the whole affair was reduced to the ſiege of Bitter in the eighteenth year of Hadrian (g). The vaſt number of Jews, who threw themſelves into that City, was the cauſe that they defended themſelves a long while, and that they were reduced by famine to terrible extremities (b). After the taking of this City, the war was not entirely concluded; but it did not continue much longer. Barcochebas periſhed there (i); and (d) Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. cap. 6. pag. 118.

(e) Xiphil. in Adriano.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) That is, about the 134th of Jeſus Chriſt.

(b) Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. cap. 6. p. 118.

(i) Idem, ibid.

The Decree, which they obtain'd, ſeems to intimate, that ſometimes they circumciſed children, who were not born in their Sect. This was forbid them under the penalties eſtabliſhed againſt Caſtration.

[B] . . . . The Talmud alledges another reaſon for their taking arms.] It is ſaid, that the Jews had a cuſtom of planting a cedar, when they had a ſon born, and planting a pine, when they had a daughter born; and of uſing of the wood of theſe trees to make the marriage-bed of, when their children married. It is added, that in a journey, which the Emperor's daughter took into Judea, a piece of her chariot broke, upon which her ſervants cut down one of theſe cedars, and brought it to her; that the Jews could not bear this, but roſe immediately, and killed thoſe, who had cut down this tree. The Emperor being informed that the Jews had revolted, marched againſt them with great indignation, and exterminated them. Ob crus carpenti vaſtata eſt Bethara. In more fuit ut cum naſceretur infans plantarent cedrum, cum infantula, pinum; cumque nati contraherent matrimonium, ex iis conficerent thalamum. Die quadam tranſiit filia Cæſaris, & confractum eſt ei crus carpenti: cedrum iſtiuſmodi exciderunt atque ad eum attulerunt. Inſurrexerunt in eos Judæi, atque eos ceciderunt. Relatum eſt Cæſari rebellare Judæos. Profectus ille in eos iracundus, excidit totum cornu Iſraelis (3). The Jews would have been abſolutely inexcuſable, if they had revolted upon ſuch a trifling occaſion as this. Theſe poor people are not able even to tell a lie to their advantage. It is prodigious ignorance, to give the Emperor Hadrian a daughter. Beſides, pine-trees are too ſlow of growth (4) to be ready to furniſh a bed, as ſoon as a maid is ready to ſhare it with a man; and a great many would have deſerved pity, if they had been obliged to ſtay for marriage till their pines had gained the neceſſary height.

(3) In Tractatu Talmudico Babyl. Gittin, folio 57. apud Joh. à Lent, de Judæorum Pſeudo-Meſſiis, pag. 7.

(4) It might be ſaid Arbos lenta venit ſeris factura nepotibus umbram. Virgil. Georg. lib. 2. ver. 58.

[C] It is ſaid that Barcochebas made uſe of the ſame artifice that Eunus did, ... that is, he ſeemed to vomit flames.] This is what we are informed of by St. Jerom, Tu videlicet flammeus, immò fulminans, qui in loquendo fulminas. Atque ut Barcochebas auctor ſeditionis Judaicæ ſtipulam in ore ſuccenſam anhelitu ventilabat, ut flammas evomere videretur (5). Here we have a man, whoſe words were fire and flame as well literally as figuratively. With reſpect to Eunus, Florus tells us as follows: Syrus quidam, nomine Eunus, (magnitudo cladium facit ut meminerimus) fanatico furore ſimulato dum Syriæ Deæ comas jactat, ad libertatem & arma ſervos quaſi numinum imperio concitavit; idque ut divinitus fieri probaret in ore abdita nuce, quam ſulphure & igne ſtipaverat, leniter inſpirans flammam inter verba fundebat (6). That is, "A certain "Syrian, by name Eunus, (which name of his has "been remembered on account of the prodigious "ſlaughter occaſioned by him,) pretending a fanatical "fury, while he brandiſhes the Locks of the Syrian "Goddeſs, excited the ſlaves to liberty and arms as "it were by the command of the Gods; and that he "might ſhew this to be a divine impulſe, he hid in "his mouth a nut, which he had filled with brimſtone and fire, and blowing it gently, vomited out "flames as he ſpoke." This is an example, which ſhews Sovereigns how much thoſe are to be dreaded in a State, who boaſt of inſpiration. This impoſtor, by counterfeiting the Fanatic, induced above ſixty thouſand men to take up arms, and occaſioned a great deal of trouble to the Roman people.

(5) Hieronym. Apol. 2. adverſus Ruffinum.

(6) Florus, lib. 3. cap. 19.

[D] It it ſaid that he tried his followers by obliging them to cut off one of their fingers . . . and that he made uſe of another invention.] We are told, that he drew after him two hundred thouſand men, who had cut off one of their fingers in order to prove their courage. The Wiſe Men not approving of ſuch a mutilation, ſent ſome perſons to aſk him how long he would mutilate the Jewiſh Nation? uſque quo tute Judæos mancos efficies? He anſwered, How would you then have try their ſtrength? They replied, that he ſhould enroll none but thoſe, who could tear up a Cedar of Libanus with their hands. He agreed to that advice, and found notwithſtanding two hundred thouſand men, who gave this proof of their ſtrength (7). Theſe, it will be ſaid, are Jewiſh fables. It is true; and it is upon that foot I relate them; and it is upon that account they belong the more properly to this Dictionary.

(7) In Madraſch Rabbeta Megillot, fol. 67. apud Joh. à Lent de Pſeudo-Meſſiis, pag. 10, 11.

[E] His chief cruelty was againſt the Chriſtians.] It is true he made a great ſlaughter of the Heathens; but without requiring them to renounce their Religion. He acted the part of a Converter only towards Chriſtians; I ſay of a Dragooning Converter, and perhaps ſtill worſe than that (8); for he condemned to death thoſe, who would not abjure Jeſus Chriſt, and load him with curſes. Proximo namque bello Judaico Barcochebas defectionis Judæorum Dux & Princeps, ſolos Chriſtianos ad gravia ſupplicia niſi Chriſtum abnegarent, & maledictis inceſſerent, protrahi juſſit (9). David Gans does not deny that at this time thoſe of his Nation ſhed whole torrents of blood (10). I believe that he repreſents the ſlaughter much more terrible than it really was. He pretends that in the city of Alexandria only they killed above two hundred thouſand perſons, and that in the Iſle of Cyprus and the adjacent parts, they left not a ſoul alive. Tunc Judæi Biterrenſes unxerunt eum (Barcocheban), & elegerunt ipſum in regem ſuper ſe, jugum Romanorum abjicientes. Occiderunt ex Romanis & Græcis, qui in Africâ innumerabiles inſtar arenæ maris, ſimiliter fecerunt Ægyptiis; incolæ urbis Alexandrinæ etiam ex Romanis interfecerunt ultra bis centena millia, qui in Cypria, occiderunt omnes planè gentes vicinas, ut ne ſuperſtes quidem remaneret. See what I ſhall ſay below (11) concerning the omiſſion of a form in Hadrian's Letter. O ye religious wars, how horrible are your cruelties!

(8) I make uſe of the word perhaps, becauſe ſeveral perſons pretend that the alternative of abjuration or death, would have been a leſs evil, than what was done in France by the Dragoons, in the year 1685.

(9) Juſtin. Apolog. pro Chriſtianis ad Antoninum Pium.

(10) David Gans, in Germine Davidis, ad ann. 880 millenarii quarti apud à Lent, pag. 9.

(11) In the remark [I].

and the Jews have not been wanting to invent fables about it [F]. The manner, in which Hadrian diſperſed the remains of this unhappy Nation was very dreadful [G]. But we muſt not credit all the ſtories of the Rabbi's upon this ſubject [H]. This war coſt the Romans a great deal of blood (k). If I relate in my remarks ſeveral facts, which concern this war, it is becauſe the article of Hadrian refers my reader hither, and it was neceſſary to make uſe of ſuch a reference, that the article of that Emperor might not be too prolix. The Jewiſh Authors ſuppoſe that Hadrian was in perſon in this war [I], that he beſieged and took the City of Bitter, and that he diſputed with a Rabbi concerning the Doctrine of

(k) See the remark [E].

[F] The Jews have not been wanting to invent Fables concerning the death of Barcochebas.] They ſay, that after the taking of Bitter the head of Barcochebas was carried to the Emperor Hadrian, and that he aſked, Who it was that killed him? and that he commanded a ſoldier, who anſwered It was I, to go and ſearch for the body. The ſoldier going upon that deſign found a ſerpent twin'd round the neck of Barcochebas. The Emperor having ſeen the body ſaid, If this man had not been killed by his own God, who is there that could have done him any harm (12)?

(12) Joh. à Lent, de Pſeudo-Meſſiis, pag. 14. ex Echa Rabbati.

[G] The manner in which Hadrian diſperſed the remains of the Jews, was very dreadful.] It is with good reaſon that I make uſe of the word remains; for the number of the Jews, who periſhed in this war, was innumerable. The Abbreviator of Dion relates, that they had fifty fortreſſes, and nine hundred and eighty five very conſiderable boroughs deſtroyed; that they had five hundred and eighty thouſand men killed in inroads or battles; and that the number of thoſe who periſhed by famine, ſickneſs, and fire, was infinite; ſo that almoſt all Judea was left deſolate (13). Let us ſee now what was done with thoſe who eſcaped this deſolation. There was an incredible number of every age and both ſexes * ſold at a very famous Fair called the Fair of the Turpentine Tree †, at the ſame price as horſes; upon which account the Jews have a great abhorrence for this Fair. . . . Thoſe who could not be ſold at this Fair were carried to Gaza ‡, and expoſed to ſale at another Fair, which Adrian had eſtabliſhed there, and which is ſtill called Adrian's Fair, as we find by the Chronicle of Alexandria. Thoſe who could not be ſold in Paleſtina were tranſported to Egypt ‡, where they periſhed by ſhipwrecks, and famine, or were killed by the Pagans. . . . When the war was finiſhed, Adrian forbid all the Jews by a publick Edict  ever to ſet a foot within Jeruſalem, on pain of death ††, and guards were placed on purpoſe to prevent them from going into it ‡‡. This Law prohibited them even to come near it, and to be found in any places, from whence it might be ſeen §§. Tertullian ¶, and St. Jerom †, go ſtill further, and extend this prohibition to all Judea, and the Jews ſeem to agree to this, when they ſpeak of the faſt which they appointed on account of the Decree, by which their fathers had been forbid to enter into the Land of Judea †. The Author from whom I borrow this paſſage with all its quotations (14), makes a remark concerning the Fair of the Turpentine-Tree. He obſerves that St. Jerom ‡ ſays in a particular paſſage that the Jews were ſold at Abraham's Tent, where there is held, ſays he, every year a Fair, that is extremely frequented. This is not difficult to be granted, for in the place where Abraham had lived in the valley of Mamre [near Hebron], and where he entertained the three Angels, there was ſtill in the fourth Century a Turpentine-Tree, which the people of the country ſaid had continued there from the creation of the world. See the remark [G] of the article ABRAHAM. Let us return now to the misfortune of the Jews. Hadrian ordered their ears to be cut off, and tranſported them to Spain, as ſome Authors tell us (15). There is a great deal of probability, that part of the falſe worſhip, which that Emperor eſtabliſhed in the new city of Jeruſalem, did not begin till after the ruin of Bitter, and the death of Barcochebas. This was one of the ſevereſt ſhocks which that unhappy Nation ever had to ſuffer. Hadrian, knowing the abhorrence which they had for ſwine, ordered one of marble to be placed upon the gate which leads to Bethlehem . He made the ſtones of Solomon's Temple ſerve for the building of a Theatre, and divers Temples ††. Two of his ſtatues, and ſeveral idols were ſet up in the place where that Temple ſtood ‡‡. The ſtatue of Jupiter was erected in the place of our Saviour's paſſion. This is what St Paulinus ſays §§, but according to St. Jerom * the ſtatue of Jupiter was placed where Jeſus Chriſt roſe again, and that of Venus where he died. The cave where he was born, was profaned by the temple and infamous worſhip of Adonis †. See Mr. Tillemont, from whom I have borrowed theſe particulars (16).

(13) Xiphil. in Adriano.

* Hieron. in Jeremiam, cap. 31. p. 342. b.

† Chronic. Alex. pag. 596.

‡ Idem, ibid.

‡ Hieron. in Zac. cap. 11. p. 272. d.

 Idem in Iſ. cap. 6. p. 31. d.

†† Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. cap. 6. p. 118. and Demonſtrat. Evangel. lib. 2. cap. 38. p. 71. a. Juſtin. Apol. 2. pag. 84. b, c. Dial. p. 234, a.

‡‡ Juſtin. pag. 84, b. Sulpic. Sever. lib. 2. p. 149.

§§ Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. 118. d. Hieron. in Iſ. lib. 3. p. 227.

¶ Apolog. cap. 21. pag. 20. d.

† In Judic. cap. 13. p. 224, 225. cap. 6. pag. 31, d. In Daniel cap. 9. p. 595, d.

‡ Scalig. Iſag. lib. 1. cap. 6. pag. 45.

(14) Tillem. Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 2. p. 501, 502, 503.

‡ In Zachar. cap. 8. p. 262.

(15) Apud à Lent, de Pſeudo-Meſſiis, pag. 17.

 Hieron. in Chron.

†† Euſeb. Demonſtrat. lib. 8. cap. 3. p. 406.

‡‡ Iter. Burd. p. 432. Sulpic. Sever. lib. 2. pag. 149.

[H] . . . but we muſt not credit all the ſtories of the Rabbi's upon that ſubject.] They ſay that the ſlaughter was ſo great in Bitter, when the Romans made themſelves maſters of it after a ſiege of three years and an half, that the horſes marched up to the mouth in blood (17). The blood, continue they, run down with ſuch a force, that it carried along with it ſtones of four pounds weight, and run into the Sea the ſpace of four miles. Now it was four miles from Bitter to the Sea. Hadrian had a vineyard-plot eighteen miles long, and as many wide; (it is the diſtance from Tiberias to Zipori;) he made a fence or incloſure to it of the bodies of thoſe who were killed in Bitter, for he would not ſuffer them to be buried; which was not granted them till the reign of his ſucceſſor. There were two rivers in the City of Jadaim, one of which run on one ſide, and the other on the other (18); the Rabbi's reckoned that the water made but two thirds of theſe rivers, and the blood the other third. The Heathens had no need for ſeven years to dung their vines; for they were fruitful enough from the blood of the Jews. The blood carried along with it ſtones of an immeaſurable bigneſs, and run forty miles into the Sea. Quin imò ſanguis rapiebat ſecum petras magnitudinis quadraginta modiorum, donec ad quadraginta milliaria uſque in Oceanum fluereſt (19). There were found upon one ſtone three hundred ſkulls of young children. We find in theſe Rabbinical expreſſions ſome traces of the ſtyle, which Rabelais makes uſe of to repreſent the qualifications or proweſs of his Garagantua and Pantagruel. But let us relate another ſtory relating to the ſlaughter at Bitter. There were in this city four hundred colleges, and in every college four hundred maſters, who had each of them in their claſs four hundred ſcholars. At the firſt attack the ſcholars made uſe of their bodkins (20) to kill the enemies; but after the taking of the city, they were packed up with their books and thrown into the fire. Ita pubes principio hoſtes impetum facientes graphiis ſuis confodiebat; cum vero hi prævalerent, urbem cepiſſent, involverunt puerulos illos cum libris ſuis, eoſque in igne ſic cremarunt (21). The Jews pretend that Hadrian deſtroyed twice as many more people of their Nation, than Moſes brought out of Egypt; and they conſider him as a greater deſtroyer than Nebuchodonoſor and Titus (22). One of their beſt Chronologers aſſures us, that the loſs which their Nation ſuffered in the time of Nebuſaraddan, or Titus, was not equal to that which Hadrian made them undergo; for the Talmud tells us, that there periſhed at Bitter four millions of perſons, quadringentas myriadas. However in the Ritual of the Jews there is an Hymn for the ninth day of the month Ab, in which Hadrian's Edict was publiſhed to forbid them to ſet a foot in Judea; there is, I ſay, an Hymn, in which Nebuchodonoſor and Hadrian are equally repreſented as the two great ſcourges of their Nation. This Hymn names them often; but it does not ſpeak above once of Veſpaſian and Titus; it mentions four hundred and eighty Synagogues burnt by Hadrian. Recordare Domine qualis fuerit Adrianus, crudelitatis conſilia amplexus, conſuluit Idola ſe perverteutia. Et ſuſtulit combuſſitque quadringentas & octoginta ſynagogas (23).

(17) See the book Echa Rabati ſuper Thren. 11. ver. 2. apud Noldium de Vitâ & Geſtis Heroidum, pag. 453.

(18) In Tractatu Talmudico Giffin, apud à Lent, pag. 16.

(19) Ibid.

(20) An inſtrument with which they wrote at that time.

(21) Tract. Giffin, apud à Lent, pag. 13.

(22) See Joh. à Lent, pag. 14.

(23) Apud eundem à Lent, pag. 18, 19.

[I] The Jewiſh Authors ſuppoſe that Hadrian was in perſon in this war.] Euſebius ſays expreſly that this Emperor ſent troops to the Governor of Judea, in order to puniſh the revolt of Barcochebas, and mentions nothing of that Prince's going afterwards thither himſelf. The abbreviator of Dion ſpeaks only of of the Reſurrection of the Dead [K]. The fact is curious; we ſhall give an account of it in the remarks. Euſebius ſuppoſes that Hadrian carried on this war by his Lieutenants (l). We may at leaſt conſider it as very falſe, that Hadrian commanded in Judea, the troops of Trajan his uncle, during the Rebellion of Barcochebas. The Jewiſh Hiſtorian David Gans is very much miſtaken in this (m). Some pretend that there were two Barcochebas's, one under Titus, and the other under Hadrian; and that the former, not being able to bear the trial, which he was put to, was killed as an impoſtor and a falſe Meſſiah. As ſoon as he had boaſted himſelf to be the Meſſiah, there was urged to him a paſſage of Scripture, which declares, according to the gloſs of the Jews, that the Meſſiah ſhall be able to diſcover by the ſmell whether an accuſed perſon is innocent or guilty (n) [L]; and finding that this pretended Meſſiah had not a noſe good enough to make that diſtinction, they put him to death. This opinion is not much followed (o).

(l) Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. cap. 6.

(m) Tandem Trajanus Imperator miſit Adrianum ſororis ſuæ filium (this kindred is falſe) Ducem exercitus contra ipſos. David Gans, in Germine Davidis ad ann. 3880. apud Leon, de Pſeudo-Meſſiis, pag. 9.

(n) Iſaiah xi. 3.

(24) Xiphil. in Adriano.

the Generals, who were ſent to Judea by Hadrian (24). He obſerves that while this Emperor continued in Egypt and Syria, the Jews, tho' enraged at the building of the Ælea Capitolina, durſt not riſe; but they took up arms openly, when he was gone from thence. He adds, that Hadrian ſent againſt them the beſt of his Generals, and particularly Julius Severus. It was here a proper place to ſay whether he went in perſon to chaſtiſe the rebels; and yet this writer does not ſay ſo; from whence it may juſtly be concluded that Hadrian did not go then to Judea. But to conceal nothing, we muſt own that Dion makes a remark, which inſinuates that Hadrian was preſent in this war. He ſays that the Romans loſt ſo many men in it, that this Emperor did not make uſe of the uſual preamble in writing to the Senate, Si vos liberique veſtri valetis, bene eſt, ego quidem & exercitus valemus; that is, "If you and your children are in good health, it is "well; I and the army are in good health likewiſe." A Prince, who makes uſe of this preface, muſt one would think be in the army; and if he was not there, he ought not to make uſe of this compliment, neither when affairs ſucceeded well or ill. It ſeems probable therefore that Dion would not have made that obſervation, if he had imagined that Hadrian was near Rome, or at a great diſtance from the army, when he wrote to the Senate. I anſwer that this is no great difficulty; for in the firſt place, it may be ſaid that the abſence of Hadrian was the cauſe of his not making uſe of that form; from whence it would follow that Dion was not acquainted with all the cauſes of this omiſſion in ſuppoſing it to be occaſioned by the loſs he had ſuſtained. It may be ſaid in the ſecond place, that an Emperor, at a diſtance from his army, might very properly make uſe of this form, in a letter, wherein he acquaints the Senate with the good news, which his general had written to him. Laſtly it may be urged againſt Dion, that the victory obtained over the Jews, was ſo complete, and that it cut off in ſuch a manner all the cauſes of a new inſurrection, that, tho' the Roman army had ſuffered great loſſes, yet there would be ſufficient reaſon for writing to the Senate in the ſame ſtyle, which is uſed in news of ſucceſs. It is poſſible therefore, that this writer may have made a falſe obſervation.

[K] . . . . . And that he diſputed with a Rabbi concerning the Doctrine of the Reſurrection of the Dead.] The chief difficulty with Hadrian, as this fable tells us, was to ſay that the parts of a dead body were diſperſed in a thouſand places. It was anſwered him, that there is in our body a little bone, which is incorruptible; and that God will reſtore our body out of that little bone. The Jews pretend that a celeſtial dew will ſoften this bone, and make it grow, as a little leaven raiſes all the dough. Officulum illud dicunt rore quodam cæleſti molliendum & extendendum ad inſtar fermenti, quod in totam ſe maſſam diffundit, vel quemadmodum granum aliquod tritici in criſtam ſe experrigit (25). Hadrian would believe nothing concerning the incorruptibility of this bone; but the Rabbi, with whom he diſputed, gave him a proof of it: this bone reſiſted every thing, fire, water, an hammer &c. Here is a long account of Manaſſeh Ben-Iſrael. Aiunt in ſpinâ dorſi aliquod officulum eſſe, quod nunquam pereat; ex ipſo officulo ſolo poſt interitum & annihilationem omnium aliarum partium, dicunt hominem inſtauratum, reſtitutumque iri, in reſurrectione mortuorum, juxta illud, quod in Bereſit Raba. Paraſ. 28 legitur: Adrianus (cujus oſſa comminuantur) quæſivit ex R. Joſuah filio Hanina, unde Deus benedictus germinare facit hominem in futura ſæculo? Reſpondit ille, ex . . . Luz, ſeu officulo ſpinæ. Rurſus alter, unde nôſti hoc? da mihi illud, inquit ille, officulum, & te docebo: contudit illud in molâ, ſed non tuſum eſt; conjecit in ignem, & non conflagravit; conjecit in aquum, & non attritum eſt; impoſuit incudi, malleoque cecidit, ſed ne hilum comminutum eſt. Imperator Romanus, ſive quod rideret reſurrectionem mortuorum, ſive quod audiverat aliquid incorruptibile officulum eſſe in corpore humano, cupiditate ejus ſcindi; vel quia, uti veriſimilius eſt, hæſitabat ob difficultatem ejus, quam jam recenſuimus, quæſivit ex R. Joſua filio Hanina, unde, vel quomodo reſtituentur mortui, quorum membra tam longè latèque diſperſa eſſent & diſſipata? Reſpondit illi R. Joſua, ex officulo ſpinæ dorſi, appellato Luz, quod incorruptibile eſt. Qui cum non poſſit facilè adhibere fidem, experimento ei oſtendit ita eſſe. Hæc opinio, ſi quid antiquis credimus, non improbabilis eſt. Iſtud enim officulum tale eſt, ut nequeat interire, quamvis hodie nullus ſit, qui illud noverit. Sunt qui arbitrentur Davidem hujus officuli mentionem facere, cum ait, Cuſtodiens oſſa ejus, unum ex iis non conſumptum eſt. Pſalm. xxxiv. 21 (26). Theſe Writers of Reveries ſhould have ſaid that this little bone is the true ſeat of the ſoul.

(25) Hoornbeeck contra Judæos, lib. 8. cap. 5. pag. 556.

(26) Manaſſe Ben-Iſrael, de Reſurrectione, lib. 2. cap. 16.

[L] The Meſſiah ſhall be able to diſcover by the ſmell whether an accuſed perſon is innocent or guilty.] Compare this with what I ſhall obſerve in the remark [C] of the article DEMOCRITUS.

What the Jews relate of a little bone called Luz, which they ſay is in the back of a man.

BARDE (JOHN DE LA) Counſellor of State, Marquis of Marolles upon the Seine, was Ambaſſador from France to Switzerland under the reign of Lewis XIV. He had been chief Deputy of Monſieur de Chavigni Secretary of State (a). He aſſiſted at the conferences at Munſter, as a Miniſter of the ſecond rank, and endeavours were made uſe of to procure him the title of Excellency; but they did not ſucceed [A]. He had been already named for the Embaſſy in Switzerland. He ſerved France with great integrity

(a) See Wicquefort, de l'Ambaſſadeur, tom. 1. pag. 959.

[A] Endeavours were made uſe of to procure him the title of Excellency at the Conferences at Munſter; but they did not ſucceed.] Mr. de Wicquefort relates this, and ſays that the Plenipotentiaries of France made their firſt attempt with the Nuncio, who anſwered that he would not do it (1). They would have had him given the Sieur de la Barde that title, and made him the firſt viſit. The reaſons of his refuſal were, that he would not give an example, that no body would follow, nor make Mr. de la Barde uſeleſs, who was of great ſervice in the Aſſembly. He would have made him uſeleſs, becauſe if he had done him the honours which were deſired, he would have put him under a kind of neceſſity of requiring it of all the other Embaſſadors, and of not appearing again there, if it ſhould be refuſed him, as it would infallibly have happened. The Embaſſador of Venice followed the Nuncio's example; and ſo la Barde was obliged to content himſelf with the honours, which they were willing to allow him. He deſired the Emperor's Miniſters at Oſnabrug, to diſtinguiſh him from the other Miniſters of the ſecond Order, and ſince they could not treat him as an Embaſſador, that they grity and addreſs, during the whole courſe of this Embaſſy. He wrote in Latin the Hiſtory of France from the death of Lewis XIII to the year 1652. This work was a long time expected as a Maſter-piece [B]: it was printed at laſt in the year 1671 (b), and well received by the Public. The ſtyle is excellent; affairs are related without flattery, and with great ſkill in the Intrigues of the Cabinet. The Author has Latinis'd his name by that of Labardæus. The reader would find himſelf ſtrangely puzzled by the Latin names, if he had not taken care to put the French names in the margin. He had made a French tranſlation of this Hiſtory, which in the opinion of good judges was much inferior to the original Latin (c). "As he was very learned in points of Divinity, he publiſhed a book "of Controverſy in Latin, againſt the opinion of Proteſtants concerning the Euchariſt (d) [C]. The Gazettes of Holland inform us that he died in the year 1692, being ninety years of age. The reader will ſee below what I have to add to the remark [C] of this article [D].

(1) Wicquefort, de l'Ambaſſadeur, tom. 1. p. 360.

(b) It is in 4to; it contains 780 pages.

(c) A manuſcript Memoir communicated by Mr. Lancelot, one of the Under-Library Keepers of the Mazarin Library at Paris.

(d) The Abbé de Marolles, Denombrement des Auteurs.

they would not treat him as a Reſident; and provided he was treated as a third perſon after the Italian manner, he would not pretend to the place of honour in the Viſits or Conferences. In ſhort, his Credential Letters for the Swiſs Cantons could not procure him any regard either at Munſter or Oſnabrug. Mr. de la Barde complained of an Italian Writer, who had not ſpoken of theſe things as he ought, and he pretended to convince him of it, by relating that the Plenipotentiaries of France always treated him as an Embaſſador, which they could not diſpenſe with doing, conſidering that the King's Patents, and all the Letters from the Court gave him that character. Avauxius & Servianus hunc haud ſecùs ac ſeipſos invicem habuere; neque aliter poterant, cum regio diplomate atque omnibus Regis atque Mazarini ad ſe atque ad alios literis legatus eſſet appellatus. Id eo accuratius mihi dicendum fuit, quod homo quidam Italicus eâ de re ſecus ſcripſit ex aliena lubidine atque invidiâ in Labardæum: nam id illi ipſi tribuere volim, qui in hujuſcemodi rebus etiam ſupra verum aliis favit, hos cum Reſidentes aut ad minores Principes abſque ullo titulo miſſi eſſent, Legatos nihilo ſecùs appellando (2).

(2) Labardæus, Hiſt. de Rebus Gallicis, lib. 4. pag. 89. ad ann. 1646.

[B] His Hiſtory of France was a long time expected as a maſter-piece.] "Mr. de la Barde is preparing "a Latin Hiſtory, in which we are to have a Sal-"luſt or Virgil of our own." This is what Father le Moine thought proper to inform the Public of in his Treatiſe of Hiſtory.

[C] He wrote a book of controverſy againſt the opinion of Proteſtants concerning the Euchariſt.] On occaſion of this I ſhall mention that he applied himſelf for ſeveral years with great care to examine the ſentiments of ſeveral of the Fathers upon this queſtion, and wrote a large volume of very abſtruſe enquiries; but all of a ſudden he took it into his fancy to deſtroy this prodigious work of his, ſo that one morning he threw all that he had written upon that ſubject into the fire. That is what I have heard from the Abbot of Brion, his grandſon, Canon of Notre-Dame at Paris.

[D] Here is what I have to add to the remark [C] of this article.] This relates to his book of controverſy. "He wrote to one of his friends in a manu-"ſcript Letter, dated from Soleurre the third of March "1663, the following words. Libellum ad te de re "ſeriâ, imò divinâ mitto, quo tibi otii mei, ſicuti prius "negotii, ratio conſtet: in eo. Latinitatem noſtram ne "quæſiveris, quam de divinis ſcribendi atque diſpu-"tandi genus vix patitur. That is, "I ſend you a "book upon a ſerious, nay, a divine ſubject, that I "may give you a good account of my leiſure, as I "did formerly of my buſineſs. You are not to ex-"pect from me elegance of Latin in it, ſince the "manner of writing and diſputing upon ſubjects of "Divinity will not admit of it." His friend anſwered him ſome time after in theſe terms: "Reſtat ut "de opuſculo tuo theologico gratias agam: in hoc ſolitam "elegantiam tuam deſideravi; neque verò tu argu-"menti ſeveritatem excuſa; quid enim eſt tam con-"tumax, quod niteſcere, quid tam horridum, quod po-"liri amœnitate iſtâ tuâ non poſſit? ſed nimirum inge-"niis Helvetiis ſcribebas. That is; "I have now "to thank you for your book of Divinity: in which "I perceive nothing of your uſual elegance. But "you ought not to caſt the blame of that upon the "ſeverity of the ſubject; for what is there ſo rough, "that will not be poliſhed by the agreeable turn of "your wit? but I ſee you wrote for the genius's of "Switzerland." This Anſwer is dated the 19th of the ſame month. By theſe two paſſages we may fix the Epocha of this book of Controverſy to the year 1663 (3).

(3) A manuſcript memorial of Mr. Lancelot.

BARLETTA (GABRIEL) a Dominican Monk, diſtinguiſhed himſelf about the end of the XVth Century [A] by a manner of preaching much more proper for a Buffoon than a Miniſter of the Goſpel. He was born at Barletto (a) in the Kingdom of Naples. Henry Stephens is not the only perſon, who remonſtrated againſt this manner of preaching (b), which was full of a prodigious number of mean explications, and only proper to expoſe our moſt ſolemn myſteries to ridicule: there are ſome Roman Catholicks, who have not ſpared Gabriel Barletta upon that account [B]; and this is much more edifying and (a) In Latin Baruhum.

(b) See the Apology for Herodotus, in which the reader will find a great many Extracts from Barletta.

[A] He diſtinguiſhed himſelf about the end of the fifteenth Century.] Altamura in his Bibliotheca of the Dominicans, places him under the year 1470; from whence it appears that Poſſevinus is not miſtaken above two hundred years. Gabriel Barletta, ſays he (1), Neapolitani regni, Apulus, Ordinis autem Dominicani, Theologus & Concionator utilis, cum floreret anno 1270. He adds, that his Sermons were printed ſeveral times before the edition of Venice in the year 1571.

(1) Poſſevin. Appar. Sacri, tom. 1. fol. 521. apud Altam[illegible] pag. 518. This error is not to be found in the edition of Cologne in 1607. We ſee there in p. 610. cum floreret anno 1470.

[B] There are ſome Roman-Catholics, who have not ſpared him.] Peter de Vaucluſe (2) has vigorouſly attacked Barletta, and reproached him particularly for impertinence in his anſwer to this queſtion, How the woman of Samaria knew that Jeſus Chriſt was a Jew? She knew it, ſays he, by his Circumciſion. It muſt be owned that this criticiſm is not ſo exact as it ſhould be; for he not only did not take notice of the other two marks, by which, according to Barletta, the woman diſcovered Jeſus Chriſt to be a Jew; but he likewiſe imputes to Barletta that he had advanced, that ſhe ſaw our Saviour was circumciſed: now it is certain that Barletta does not expreſs himſelf in that manner. Prima ad habitum, quem portabat....; ſecunda quia Nazaræus in cujus capite novaculum non aſcendit....; tertia ratio ad circumciſionem; nullus alius populus erat circumciſus: that is, "The firſt reaſon was on account of his ha-"bit; the ſecond becauſe he was a Nazarene, upon "whoſe head the razor had never come; the third "was his Circumciſion; no other people were cir-"cumciſed." It will ſignify nothing to the juſtification of this cenſurer, to ſay, that what he imputes to Barletta, may be inferred from his words; for what a man ſays ought never to be confounded with the conſequences, which may ariſe from it. How many things eſcape not only an Orator, but even an Author, the neareſt conſequences of which he does not ſee? It is very poſſible therefore, that in imputing to him that he had ſaid theſe conſequences, we may impute to him what he never thought. So that if we would criticize with exactneſs and ſincerity, we muſt lay down this rule: Accuſe others of having ſaid preciſely

(2) A Valle clauſa. It is the controverſial name, which Theophilus Raynaud has diſguis'd himſelf under.

A RULE, which ought to be obſerved by thoſe, who impute certain things to an Author.

and reputable to the Catholicks, than the pains, which the Dominicans have taken to justify this preacher [C]. His Sermons were printed at Venice in the year 1571, in two volumes 8vo. In the first volume are his Lent Sermons; the other volume contains his Sermons for Advent, Whitsuntide, Ascension, and the other Festivals (c). He was still living when the Turks took Otranto in the year 1480 (d). Some of his friends have attempted to vindicate him, by alledging that he is not the Author of the Sermons, which have been published under his name [D].

(c) Possevin. Appar. Sacri, tom. 1. p. 610.

(d) Altamura, Bibliotheca Ordinis Prædicatorum, pag. 195.

cisely what they have said; but be very scrupulous of taking away or adding any thing; shew them the consequences, which arise from it; but do not be positive that they saw these consequences, and have admitted them; wait for what they will say, when they are told, that these consequences result naturally and necessarily from what they have said. I cannot imagine with myself that Barletta was so imprudent and extravagant as to publish impudoratam blasphemiam, a shameful blasphemy, which his censurer imputes to him in his fine Latin. It is sufficient to accuse him of not knowing what he said with his third mark. I leave therefore his critick to the resentment of Altamura. Pessimè igitur à Valle clausâ falsavit calumniaturus Barlettæ sententiam exscribendo; respondit Samaritanam cognovisse Christum esse Judæum videndo eum esse circumcisum. Ubi fraudulento silentio præterivit duas priores illius rationes, &c. (3). There is more accuracy in the censure of another sermon. He is treating in that sermon of the reasons why the Holy Ghost deferred his coming into the world for ten days. Barletta ascribes this to the fear of being treated in the same manner, that the Son of God had been; and he determines the dispute between the Father and the Holy Ghost by this expedient. The Holy Ghost thought proper to assume the form of wind and fire, that he might not run any risque amongst men. What can be said more mean and unworthy of the Majesty of God? decus commune in Italiâ proloquium, NESCIT PRÆDICARE, QUI NESCIT BARLETTARE (5) (e). With regard to the ground of the other objection, he answers it in a very absurd manner; for he pretends that according to Barletta the women of Samaria knew by the habit and hair of Jesus Christ that he was a Jew, from whence she reasoned, and drew this consequence, He is therefore circumcis'd. Once more, the shortest way is to say, that this poor preacher did not know what he said in his third mark; he did not understand where he was, if he took this for a point of reasoning.

(3) Altamura, Biblioth. Ord. Prædic. p. 519.

(5) He had said this before in page 195. with a great many pompous Elogies upon him.

[C] The Dominicans have taken great pains to justify this preacher.] To begin with his Sermon for Whitsuntide, I observe that Altamura is so far from owning that there is any thing in it to be objected against, that on the contrary he found a wonderful art in it of representing the obduracy of mankind; and he is extremely surprized that any body should attempt to censure such a preacher for it. Tanti nominis, says he (4), Concionatorem, tantoque cum fructu verbum Dei disseminantem, ut adhuc vigeat ad perpetuum tanti viri

(4) Idem, ibid.

[D] Some of his friends have attempted to vindicate him, by alledging that he is not the Author of the Sermons, which have been published under his name.] Leander Alberti boasted that he had known in his youth the ignorant person, who forged those unworthy productions, which were published under the celebrated name of Barletta (6). It is surprizing that the new Author of the Bibliotheca of that Order has not alledged that reason to vindicate their brother; and it will be said, that they durst not make use of it, because they knew that the fact advanced by Leander Alberti was not true. But whether it be so or not, it is at least very certain, that in the writings, which are incontestably Barletta's, there are several impertinencies. We have seen above what Peter de Vaucluse has censured in them. Moreri has been very wrong to maintain, that divers Protestant Authors have made use of these pretended Sermons of Barletta, to turn the Catholics into ridicule, and that amongst them Henry Stephens was the first; for I dare positively affirm, that the Sermons, from which Henry Stephens has taken his railleries, are none of those which Alberti ascribes to an impostor. The dispute between the Father and the Holy Ghost is one of the gaieties of Henry Stephens; now Altamura acknowledges this for a genuine production of Barletta.

(6) Alberti, Descriptio Italiæ, pag. 370.

(e). France had likewise her Barletta in the beginning of the sixteenth Century, in the person of the Dominican William Pepin, a celebrated Preacher. See the 12th note upon the 7th chapter of the 2d book of Rabelais. CRIT. REM.]

BARLÆUS (MELCHIOR) born at Antwerp, a Latin Poet of the XVIth Century, and son of Lambert Barlæus, who was Keeper of the Records of Antwerp above forty years, was educated under good masters, and has shewn by several of his writings, as well in verse as in prose [A], the progress which he made. One of his brothers, whose name was JAMES, quitted his country for the sake of Religion, and took refuge in Holland, where after he had been Regent of the second class in the College of Leyden, he was called to the Brille, in order to be Rector of the College there. GASPAR BARLÆUS, the elder brother of Melchior [B], succeeded him in the office of the Keeper of the Records, which his father had; but when Antwerp was reduced under the yoak of the Spanish Government, he left his countrey, and retired to Holland. He carried with him thither his eldest son, who was then in the cradle (a), and of whom I shall speak in the following article.

(a) Taken from the Funeral Oration upon Gaspar Barleus, spoken at Amsterdam, by John Arn. Corvinus, the 18th of January 1648.

[A] He wrote divers pieces as well in verse as in prose.] The titles of them are as follow: Brabantiados Libri V, & Antverpiæ Encomium. De Diis Gentium Libri duo, in elegiac verses, printed at Antwerp in 1562 (1). De raptu Ganymedis Libri tres (2), & Bucolica, at Antwerp in 1572. An Oration de Vitæ humanæ Felicitate, cum adjuncto Carmine de Rerum humanarum vicissitudine ad Gasparum Fratrem, at Antwerp in 1566 (3). Historia de Domus Austriacæ Eminentiâ (4).

(1) Valer. And. Bibl. Belg. pag. 669.
(2) Corvin. in Orat. funebri Caspar. Barlæi.
(3) Valer. And. Bibl. Belg. pag. 669.
(4) Corvin. in Orat. funebri Barlæi.

[B] Gaspar Barleus was the elder brother of Melchior.] I do not question but Valerius Andreas took this Gaspar for him that was Professor at Amsterdam, and whose Latin verses have been so famous. If he did so, he is extremely mistaken; this Professor was nephew to Melchior, and not his brother. If, in order to excuse Valerius Andreas on that account, it be said, that he did not take things in the manner, which I suppose, he will run into an error on the other side; for when we would make an Author known by his relations, we ought not to mention relations, who are unknown, either in the Republic of Letters, or in the world; and consequently these words of Valerius Andreas, Melchior Barlæus, Antverpiensis, Gasparis frater, would be impertinent, if they were to be understood of Melchior's brother; for this brother, though he taught at Bommel, is a person unknown. Moreri has committed the same error as Valerius Andreas.

BARLÆUS (GASPAR), nephew of the preceding, was Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Amſterdam, and one of the beſt Latin Poets of the XVIIth Century. He was born at Antwerp in the year 1584 (a). His father, who was of the Proteſtant Religion, fled to Holland, as ſoon as the Duke of Parma made himſelf maſter of that City. He ſtaid three years at Leyden, after which he was called to Bommel, to be Rector of the College there. He enjoyed that place for ſeven years, and then died, having deſigned his ſon Gaſpar for a Miniſter of the Goſpel. This Gaſpar ſtudied eight years in the College of the Province of Holland at Leyden, and afterwards being received a Miniſter, ſerved a Church in a village near the Brill. Bertius being raiſed from the place of Sub-Principal to that of Principal of this College, thought that no perſon was more proper to ſucceed him than our Barlæus. His recommendation had its effect: Barlæus was made Sub-Principal; and ſome time after he had the Profeſſorſhip of Logic in the Univerſity of Leyden conferred upon him. He intereſted himſelf ſo far in the diſputes of the Arminians, that he was depoſed from all his offices, as ſoon as the oppoſite party had entirely gained the ſuperiority in the Synod of Dort. Barlæus then applied himſelf to Phyſic, and in two years he thought himſelf fit for the Doctorſhip. He took his Degrees at Caen; but he ſcarce ever practiſed in that Faculty. There were ſeveral young Gentlemen there, who deſired him to read them Lectures of Philoſophy and polite Learning; and as he had been uſed to that, he undertook it again, and recovered even at Leyden a great character in that employment. The Magiſtrates of Amſterdam having erected an illuſtrious ſchool in the year 1631, offered him the Profeſſorſhip of Philoſophy; which he accepted, and diſcharged very honourably till his death, which happened the fourteenth of January 1648 (b). He was a man of great merit. We have a volume of Orations, which he pronounced on divers occaſions, and which are valuable, not only on account of their ſtyle, but likewiſe for the turn and various ſtrokes of wit in them. Poetry was his chief excellence; his Muſes had a great deal of copiouſneſs and elevation (c). There was ſcarce any thing great, which happened in the world while he lived, but he made a pompous elogy upon it, when reaſons of ſtate were no obſtacle to it [A]. Cardinal Richelieu, and Chancellor Oxenſtiern were not forgotten; much leſs did he forget the conqueſts and noble actions of Frederic Henry Prince of Orange. Queen Mary de Medicis, and the magnificent reception, which was given her at Amſterdam (d), employed the eloquence of Barlæus. He had publiſhed ſeveral very ſharp pieces of controverſy againſt the adverſaries of Arminius [B]. This wound was never

(a) By the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his Letters, it appears that he was born the 12th of February.

(b) Taken from his Funeral Oration, pronounced by John Arnold Corvinus. The Diarium of the Sieur Witte places his death under the year 1647.

(c) See the Elogiums which are given to him by Borrichius, Diſſert. de Poetis, pag. 140.

(d) In 1637.

[A] There was ſcarce any thing great, which happened in the world, while he lived, but he made a pompous elogy upon it, when reaſons of State were no obſtacle to it.] I make uſe of this reſtriction, becauſe I have read in Barleus's Letters, that he refuſed to write a Poem upon the coronation of the Emperor Ferdinand III, as he had been deſired. He conſidered that he had to do with ſuſpicious people, who would not fail to exclaim againſt him as a penſioner to the Houſe of Auſtria; and beſides he thought, that after he had extolled ſo highly the victories of Guſtavus over the Emperor, he could not with any propriety praiſe Ferdinand for the great glory, which he had obtained in his wars againſt the Swedes. Here we have an honeſt man of a Poet. How many are there of that profeſſion, who are not ſo ſcrupulous? They have a two-handed pen; they not only prepare a panegyric for the party that ſhall prove conqueror, whoever he may be; but even after the event, they write verſes for both parties (1). I do not doubt, but there are Poets in Italy, who have already or will praiſe the Dauphin and Prince Lewis of Baden upon the campaign of 1693. Literas accepi Viennâ, theſe are the words of Barleus (2), quibus petitur uti laudatione aliquâ velim proſequi coronationem Ferdinandi tertii Imperatoris. Ego ſi ſapiam abſtinebo ab illâ laudatione religioſiſſimè. Quanquam enim ea poſſem ſcribere quæ ad laudes Imperatoris faciant, nec Reip. noſtræ adverſentur, tamen prout ſunt noſtratium ingenia, judicarent me beneficio obſtrictum Auſtriacis. Scimus Cæſarem non quidem aperto Marte nos petere, ſed per latus Hiſpani nobis gravem eſſe. Laudavi etiam non ita pridem Guſtavum Sueciæ Regem, ejuſque adverſus Cæſarem bella probavi. Jam ut laudem Ferdinandum tertium ob geſta adverſus Suecos feliciter bella, à prudentiâ meâ impetrare non poſſum. Non ſum ambidexter, ſed ab omni adulatione alieniſſimus. Cuperem obſequi petitioni illuſtriſſimi Legati, ſed hoc cavendum ne dum ſaris benè, domi malè audiam. Forte nimis ſum meticuloſus, ſed & illud certum illam Cæſaris laudationem à me profectam calumniæ ſuſpicionibuſque opportunam fore. Barleus's apprehenſion was not without foundation; and if reaſon would not ſuffer him to write a panegyric upon Ferdinand III, becauſe Holland was at war with the Houſe of Auſtria, and an Author ſhould not blow hot and cold, prudence no leſs required of him not to attempt that elogium. Thoſe who thought him a friend to the Arminians, would have defamed him as an enemy to God and to the State, and would not have been contented to ſay this both private and in public. To conclude, if all the Heroes, whom he praiſed, had paid him as well as Cardinal Richelieu (3), he would have had no reaſon to ſay, that the culture of Parnaſſus is that of an ungrateful ſoil.

(1) Compare this with what Macrobius, Saturn. l. 2. cap. 5. p. 337. relates of a man, who had taught two Ravens, one to congratulate Auguſtus, and the other Mark Anthony.

(2) Caſpar. Barlæus, Epiſt. 334. pag. 668. The Letter was written in the year 1636.

(3) This Cardinal gave him 5000 Livres for his Elogium, if we may believe Sorbiere, Sorberiana, pag. 40.

[B] He publiſhed ſeveral very ſharp pieces of controverſy againſt the adverſaries of Arminius.] He publiſhed at Leyden in 1615 a piece intitled Bogermannus ἐλεγχόμενος, ſive Examen Epiſtolæ dedicatoriæ, quam ſuis ad pietatem illuſtrium Ordinum Hollandiæ & Weſt-Friſiæ notis præfixit Joannes Bogermannus, Eccleſiaſtes Leovardienſis; in quo etiam Crimina à Matthæo Slado impacta Eraſmo Roterodamo diluuntur. The year following he publiſhed a little book under this title; Diſſertatiuncula, in quâ aliquot patriæ Theologorum & Eccleſiaſticorum malè ſana conſilia & ſtudio juſtâ orationis libertate reprehenduntur. There was too much bitterneſs in this piece, and too many reproaches againſt the Preachers; for he pretends (4) that there are in Holland, Viros prædicatorii ordinis vocales plus ſatis, qui ad ſcribendos ſalutiferos libros inepti, ad prædicandam Chriſti ſapientiam elingues, tamen ad obtrectandum cum Magiſtratibus, tum diſſentientibus circa res religionis ſymmiſtis diſerti ſint & copioſi: that is, "Preachers, "who are extremely clamorous, but incapable of "writing any uſeful books: who have no ablilities "to preach the Goſpel of Chriſt, and yet are very "eloquent and copious in their ſlanders both againſt "the Magiſtrates, and their brethren among the Di-"vines, who differ from them in points of religion." In the next page he ſays: Si templa aliquot Hollandiæ peragrare libeat, Theologos quam plurimos in ſpermologos; concionatores in convitiatores; pacis præcones in factionum principes & ſchiſmatis faciendi buccinatores transformatos mirabere, nec tam reformatæ amplius, quam peſſimis aliquorum moribus deformatæ religionis antiſtites eſſe jurabis: that is, "If you were to go over the Churches "of Holland, you would be ſurpriſed to find a great "many Divines transformed into ſlanderers, Preach-"ers into ſcurrilous abuſers of others, Teachers of "Peace into Heads of Factions, and Trumpeters "of never healed: he was considered all his life as a favourer of that Sect [C]; and a great many people murmured againſt the Magiſtrates of Amſterdam for entertaining ſuch a Profeſſor. Every part of his conduct was obſerved; and nothing was excuſed in him. There was a terrible clamour raiſed againſt him on account of certain verſes, which he had written upon a book of a Rabbi [D]. His Letters were publiſhed after his death in two volumes (e); but the Sextus Empiricus, which was expected from him, never appeared. He ſhewed his (e) Gerard Brandt his ſon-in-law publiſhed them at Amſterdam in 1667. We find ſome of the chief of them in the Collection of the Epiſtolæ præſtantium ac eruditorum Virorum, publiſhed by the Arminians in 8vo in the year 1660, and in folio in 1684.

(4) Pag. 4.

" of Schiſm; and you would ſwear that they were " not now any longer Miniſters of the Reformed Re- " ligion, but of a Religion deformed by the vices of " many of them." This is an exceſſive inſult upon thoſe, whoſe character ſhould render them venerable. This invective was immediately tranſlated into Dutch. I cannot well ſay, whether it was in this Diſſertation that he called one Vincent Drielenburch, who had ſet up for a Prophet, Nebulo; but it was either in this piece or ſome other, that he uſed that term of reproach; which provoked the other ſo highly, that he publiſhed a book, wherein, after he had called Barleus knave and raſcal, nebulonem & ſceleſtum, he engages to give an hundred livres to the Deaconry of Leyden, and to deliver himſelf up to juſtice, that his puniſhment might be for an example, in caſe it ſhould be proved by ſolid reaſon that he was a knave, nebulo. Vincentius etiam Drielenburch ſuis prophetandi partibus non defuit, nam anno ſuperiore a Caſparo Barlæo in ſcripto quodam Nebulonis nomine deſignatus, id adeò Propheticæ ſuæ dignitati putavit eſſe injurioſum, ut edito mox ſcripto eundem Barlæum Sceleſtum & Nebulonem nuncuparet, &c. (5). A little while after there appeared a book, in which what had been advanced againſt Drielenburch was pretended to be proved by ten inconteſtable reaſons. He replied to theſe ten reaſons, with prodigious ſeverity againſt Barleus. The latter compoſed a Remonſtrance to the States General, during his exile. It is dated from Francfort in Auguſt 1620, and intitled, Fides imbellis, ſive Epiſtola paræneticaad illuſtriſſimos & potentiſſimos Fœderatarum Provinciarum Ordines. It is a piece very well written, and in it we have a ſerious repreſentation of the evil conſequences of perſecution, and the rights of conſcience. It is publiſhed in the Præſtantium & Eruditorum Virorum Epiſtolæ (6).

(5) Salom. Theodot. in pacificatorio diſſecti Belgii, pag. 176, 177.

(6) Pag. 638, & ſeq. of the edition of 1684.

[C] He was conſidered all his life as a favourer of the Sect of the Arminians.] It is certain, that after he was reſtored to the Univerſity at Leyden, he did not break off his correſpondence with the Arminians. His CLVIth Letter informs Uytenbogard, that Polyander, Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, had diſcovered to his friends, that all the moderation, which appeared in the writing, which the Faculty of Divinity had publiſhed againſt the Arminians, came from him: Quicquid mollius leniuſque ſcriptum reperitur in ſpecimine, à ſe profectum eſſe, reliqua aſperiora collegarum eſſe (7); but that he wiſhed, that if the Arminians knew this, they would not mention it, ſince it would expoſe him to the reſentment of his collegues. Rogavit me obnixè per D. Voſſium interruncium, vobis uti ſcriberem, ne ſi forte hæc res ad aures veſtras pervenerit, ejus in reſponſo veſtro meminiſſe velit, ne collegarum ſuorum invidiæ ac odiis, quorum jam ſemina jacta, miſer objiciatur (8). The next Letter informs us, that one of Polyander's collegues had reproached him for having told this to Barleus, an enemy of the Church: Tu hoc dixiſti Barlæo, quem ſcis eſſe hoſtem Eccleſiæ, qui illud ipſum ad Uytenbogardum & Epiſcopium perſcripturus eſt. Theſe Letters were written in the year 1630. It appears from Barleus's Letters, that he always was in the opinion of the Remonſtrants.

(7) Barlæus, Epiſt. 156. pag. 356.

(8) Ibid.

[D] There was a terrible clamour raiſed againſt .... the verſes, which he had written upon the book of a Rabbi.] Manaſſes Ben Iſrael, one of the moſt ingenious men amongſt the Jews in the ſeventeenth Century, publiſhed a book concerning the Creation in the year 1634. Barleus wrote an epigram upon that book, and ſuffered it, according to cuſtom, to be printed before the work. He declared in it too plainly, that he preferred a good life to the truth in points of ſpeculation. A Divine of Deventer raiſed him a great deal of trouble upon that account; he publiſh'd a writing, in which he maintained, that the epigram was full of blaſphemies, and the author a Socinian. They were for bringing the affair before the States of Holland, in order to convict Barleus and all the Arminians of Socinianiſm: Conſilia agitari uti libellus iſte cenſoris Ordinibus Hollandiæ exhibeatur, ut appareat Barlæum & Remonſtrantes eſſe Socinianos (9). Barleus defended himſelf with warmth, and was extremely angry. He maintained that they had given a malicious interpretation to his words, and even falſified them; the better to colour the chicanery, which they made uſe of, in order to find out a ſenſe, which he had never thought of. Epigramma quoddam meum .... quæſitis & perverſis deterſionibus malignè interpretantur. Dicit illo Epigrammate contineri varia, quæ Eccleſiæ perniciosa, religioni Chriſtianæ probroſa, & in Deum ac Dominum noſtrum Jeſum Chriſtum impia ſunt. Socinianiſmum ad hæc autori Epigrammatis impingit. .... Cenſor peſſimâ fide voculam è carmine ſuſtulit, & ſuam ſubſtituit, maneamus pro vivamus. Senſus affingit verſibus meis, de quibus ne per ſomnium quidem cogitavi (10). He proteſted that he was not a Socinian, that he never had been one, and that he abhorred the doctrines of the Socinians. He added, that ſome perſons would be very glad to ſee him a Socinian, that their hatred to him might have the greater cauſe of triumph over him. Non ſum Socinianus, nec fui unquam, imò hoſtis ſum iſtorum dogmatum acerrimus. Vellent quidam me eſſe, qui explendi in me odii materiam ſollicitè quærunt (11). If this judgment was falſe, it was not far from being probable; for thoſe, who are engaged in diſputes about doctrines, accuſe their antagoniſt of ſo many things, that generally ſpeaking he cannot vex them more, than by appearing to be a quite different man from what they affirm him to be. However that be, Barleus had a right to repell this calumny; but he ought not to have made ſuch outragious verſes againſt the Divine of Deventer, that perhaps Archilochus himſelf could not have ſeverer. This Divine's name was Vedelius, and he intitled his book Deus Synagogæ. A Profeſſor of Utrecht (12) ſeconded him in this attack in a piece intitled Voſſius redivivus, which Vedelius had the care of publiſhing. Voſſius believed that Barleus fell ſick out of vexation for the inſult of theſe two antagoniſts. This is what he wrote to Grotius the 15th of December 1637. Collega Barlæus jam tertium menſem laborat quartanâ. Metuitur ei a μυρασμῷ. Ut convaleſcat non videtur idem fore qui quondam (13). Affixit valetudinem opere properando quod non excuditur. Eſt hoc de ingreſſu (14) reginæ matris in urbem noſtram, & honore pompæ ei exhibito. Typis prodibit auguſtis plurimis exornatum picturis. Atque hoc quod dixi non diſſimulat apud amicos. Sed multum metuo ne morbum hunc inde contraxerit, quod nimis ad animum revocaret, quæ adverſus eum ſcripta ſint à Doct. Vedelio, & Magn. Schœckio (15). That is, " My col- " legue Barleus has been ſick theſe three months of a " quartan ague. He is in ſome danger of a con- " ſumption. Tho' he ſhould recover, it is to be " feared, that he will not be the ſame man as he was " formerly. He injured his health by the pains, " which he took in haſtening a work, which is now " printing, concerning the Entrance of the Queen " Mother into our city, and the magnificent Reception " of her. It will be printed in a very noble manner, " and adorned with a great many copper-plates. What " I tell you, he does not ſcruple himſelf to own a- " mong his friends. But I am very much afraid, " that he contracted this diſtemper by reflecting too " much upon what has been written againſt him by " Doctor Vedelius and Mr. Schoockius." I believe that in general Barleus's beſt friends thought he was too much concerned on account of the cenſure of his Epigram; for they adviſed him to deſpiſe his cenſurers, and wrote concerning them in very ſevere terms. Tibi ſum auctor ut eos poſthac præteritione mulctes. Acerrima vindicta eſt contemtus: in malam rem homines ad civilia ingenia vexanda nati. Ex Epigrammate ſcilicet, quo Manaſſen Judæum non proſcindis convitiis, totus in te Theologorum ordo aſperatus omnem Hæreticorum ſentinam in caput tuum infundet. .... Si verpum,

(9) Epiſt. 388. pag. 675.

(10) Ibid. pag. 674, 675. See likewiſe p. 678.

(11) Ibid. pag. 679.

(12) Martin Schoockius. See Voetius, Diſput. Select. vol. 1. pag. 1156.

(13) The event did not confirm this conjecture. The like are made every day, which prove falſe.

(14) This is our true Galliciſm, C'eſt celui de l'Entrée.

(15) Epiſt. Præſtant. & eruditorum Viror. pag. 796. edit. in fol. of 1684.

his abilities in History by his Relation of what passed in Brasil during the Government of Count Maurice of Nassau. He published this History in the year 1647. There were strange rumours raised about his last sickness [E], and his death [F]; but the truth of it could never be certainly known. Little regard is to be paid to reports of that kind; for we find an hundred instances, that whenever an Author has been distinguished a little, common fame aggravates extremely the personal or domestic disgraces which happen to him; and on verpum, apellam, recutitum eundem dixisses, & virum, ut videtur, non malum poeticis scommatibus exagitasses, palmarium meruisses. . . . . Si quid mihi apud te est fidei crabrones istos iterum dico posthac negliges. Acrius enim post repulsam instant, & ubi excusseris venenum omne in aculeos advocant tanquam ipsi læsi (16). That is, "I "would advise you to revenge yourself upon them for "the future by taking no notice of them. Contempt "is the severest punishment. Misfortune light upon "those men, who seem born to plague those of mo- "dest and peaceable dispositions. On account of that "Epigram, in which you did not think proper to abuse "Manasses the Jew, the whole Order of the Divines "will be provoked, and cast upon you all the odious "imputations, which were ever thrown upon here- "tics. . . . . If you had called him by all the terms "of reproach, and satyrized a person, who seems to "be a man of integrity, with all the poetical turns "of raillery, you would have been applauded. . . . . "If I have any interest in you, I would again "persuade you for the future absolutely to take no "notice of these hornets; for they return with the "greater violence after they are driven away; and "when you have shaken them off, they collect all "their poison into their stings, as if they had been first "injured." Barleus's Epigram, which gave occasion to so much clamour, should have been quoted here, if it had not been inserted lately in a little book, which is in every body's hands (17). I am surprized that but a very small part of Barleus's verses against Vedelius is inserted there; but I am much more surprized that Sorbiere could think, that the passage, which he mentions, shews the author to laugh at both religions. Here is what he says: Cum Vedelius nomen suum in priori scripto analytico Epigrammatis Barlæani restituisset (18), ait,

Quid tenebroso
Calumniator prave delites antro,
Et exoleta, sæve tergiversator
Arcessis ergo monstra perditæ sectæ?
Cur versipellis Sarmatæ malas voces
Portenta fidei, exsibilata Senensis
Commenta verbis affricas ferenatis?

Quæ sane nec Calvinianis satisfacere nec aliis, sed utriusque religionis ludibrio habitæ poetam meritò suspectum reddidere (19). That is, "Because Vedelius had "concealed his name in his first analytical piece a- "gainst Barleus's Epigram, he replies;

"Why do you, slanderer, hide yourself in darkness,
"Nor dare avow your charge? Why raise from "hell
"The monstrous doctrines of an odious sect,
"And falsely brand me with Socinus' errors?

"This satisfied neither the Calvinists nor the other "party; but justly made the Poet suspected of ridi- "culing both religions." A man must be distracted or drunk, who can judge in that manner: for the verses above mentioned are the sharpest imaginable against Socinianism, and no person can give stronger testimony than Barleus has done, how much he abhorred the suspicion of that heresy. That author's prose, which Sorbiere quoted a little before, is no less severe against that Sect.

[E] There were strange rumours raised about his last sickness.] I have been told that he imagined himself to be of glass, and was afraid of being broken to pieces, when he saw any body come near him. Others have informed me, that he thought he was made of butter or straw; and in this false imagination he durst not go near the fire. This is inconsistent with the account in his Funeral Oration pronounced by the Sieur Corvin, Professor of Civil Law; for we are assured there, that he read a Lecture to his Scholars the day before his death, and that he was ready to read another, when he was seized by a fainting-fit, which he never recovered of. Id quod dolemus; eo accidisse momento quo se parabat, ut juventuti sibi commissæ docendo debitum præstaret officium (20). Antecessit quidem eum morbus, cum quo luctabatur subinde, non tamen tantus quin aliquo modo consuetis adhuc sufficeret laboribus. Audiverant eum pridie diei, quo eum mors invasit, discipuli docentem; audivissent eâdem quâ occidit, nisi ipsis eum abstulisset, ita ut accepimus, plurimis hodie exemplis ferè epidemica lipothymia. That is, "We "are sorry that it happened at that moment, when "he was preparing to read his Lectures to his pu- "pils. He was indeed before troubled with a dis- "temper, which frequently returned upon him, but "not so violently as to prevent him from being able "to execute his usual employments. His Scholars "heard him reading a Lecture the day before he died; "and they would have heard him the very day, on "which he died, if he had not been seized, as I have "been informed, with a sudden fainting, which ap- "pears from several instances to be almost epidemical "now." He had made use a little before (quod notandum) of the same circumstance. Inopinata eum extinxit, UT NOBIS RELATUM, lipothymia. Inde factum ut eum exstinctum ante audiveramus, quam morti esse propinquum morbus prænuntiaret. That is, "A "sudden fainting, as we have been informed, put "an end to his life; so that we heard, that he was "dead, before any distemper had shewn that he was "near death." We may observe that Corvinus had just before addressed his speech to the scholars of the deceased. Would he have ventured to say falsely in their presence, that they had assisted at one of his Lectures the day before his death?

[F] . . . . And about his sickness.] Morhof tells us, that Barleus was drowned in a well, and that it is not known, whether he fell by accident, or threw himself designedly into it. Misero fato periit, puteo submersus, an sponte, an casu; incertum, de morte ejus jam supra diximus. Thus he speaks in page 300 of his Polybistor. He refers us without doubt to page 155, when he says that he had already mentioned his death; but in page 155 he does not attribute it either to accident, or to a premeditated design; he only assures us, that Barleus fell distracted, and threw himself into a well, and quotes the LXIVth Letter of Sorbiere. Eo nonnullorum excrescit è fiducia nimia ambitio, ut sinistro aliorum judiciorum in extremam incidant insaniam. Quod Barlæo accidit, qui ob prælatum sibi Spanhemium in maniam incidit, seque ipsum in puteo suffocavit, quod de eo Sorberius refert Epist. 64, extatque apud Duportum Musarum subcisivarum lib. 1. de eo Epigramma (21). That is, "The self-conceit and pride "of some persons are carried to such an height, that "by being disappointed of the approbation of others, "they fall into the most extreme madness imagina- "ble. This was the case of Barleus, who lost his "senses, because Spanheim was preferred before him, "and drowned himself in a well, as Sorbiere tells us "in his LXIV Letter; and Dr. Duport has an Epi- "gram upon that subject in the first book of his "Musæ Subcisivæ." This quotation is very false; for Sorbiere writes as follows: "Barleus's death, which "you ask me some of the circumstances of, is not of "that importance (22), tho' he was a very worthy "man; for there will always be found more excel- "lent Poets than excellent Physicians. When I was "at Amsterdam, there were different reports of his "death, as if it had been hastened by melancholy. "It is true, that having written a Funeral Oration in "verse upon the Prince of Orange's Death, and Dr. "Spanheim having pronounced one in prose, he was "very uneasy that his reward should be inferior to "the other's. For, as Salmasius said very pleasantly, "there was a strange blunder in giving the trooper's "pay to a foot-soldier, and the foot-soldier's to the "trooper.

(16) Rochus Honerdius in Epist. ad Barlæum, ibid. p. 795.

(17) In the Sorberiana, pag. 37, 38. edition of Holland in 1694.

(18) This is without doubt an error of the press. The Author perhaps had said silvisset; for besides that is false that Vedelius named himself in his first piece, the verses here quoted suppose that he had suppressed his name.

(19) Sorberiana, pag. 39.

(20) Corvin. in Orat. Funebri Barlæi.

(21) Morhof. Polybist. p. 155.

(22) That is to say, of so much importance, as that of Wallæus, and Vossingius, which he had mentioned before.

on the other hand those who know the secret of the affair, are generally persons, who will not acknowledge what may occasion any disgrace.

" trooper. Barleus had but 500 livres, and the other " 500 crowns." We find nothing about Barleus's death in the Sorberiana. But we are told there, that, according to the common report, Barleus was subject to some intervals of madness: Ferebatur intervalla quædam minus lucida habere, nec aberat conjectura oculorum, qui non bene sanum cerebri particulam viridem-bant. That is, " He was said to have had some intervals of madness, and it appeared very probable " from a certain wildness about the eyes, that his brain " was not altogether sound."

BARLEUS (LAMBERT) brother of the preceding, was born at Bommel in Guelderland, in the year 1595 (a). He was Professor of Greek in the University of Leyden. Before this he had been Regent of the second Class in the College of Amsterdam [A]; and before he taught that Class, he had been Minister to Baron de Langerac Embassador of Holland in France (b). He was sent for to Leyden to fill up the place of Jeremiah Hoelzin, and there was a new privilege added to that office; for he had the title of Professor in Ordinary (c) given him, which has several advantages attending it. He pronounced his inaugural Oration De Græcarum Literarum Præstantia ac Utilitate, the 22d of October 1641. He published in 1652 the Timon of Lucian, with divers notes, which have nothing very exquisite or profound in them, but may be of great use to youth. He died the 16th of June 1655 (d). His Commentary upon the Theogony of Hesiod was printed in the year 1658.

(a) Witte, in Diario Biographico.

(b) Corvinus, in Orat. funebri Casp. Barlæi.

(c) See his Epistle Dedicatory to Lucian's Timon.

(d) Witte, Diarium Biograph.

[A] He was Regent of the second class in the college of Amsterdam.] The Dutch give those, who teach that class, the name of Corrector; which is as much as to say, Assessor to the Rector. He is called the Rector in Holland, who teaches the first class. He has the inspection over the other Regents.

BARLOW (THOMAS) Bishop of Lincoln in the reign of Charles II, was a man of eminent Learning. He was a long time Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, and a certain person has suspected that he was removed from that place, because he was too orthodox [A]. He was animated with a warm zeal against Popery, which he has shewn in his Writings [B]. He had a noble Library, and was a person of extensive reading. He died about the year 1690. Since his death some Opuscula, found amongst his papers, have been published. Some Writers confound him with WILLIAM BARLOW [C], Bishop of Lincoln, who flourished under King James I, and who died under that Prince.

☞ BARLOW

[A] A certain person has suspected, that he was removed from the University of Oxford, because he was too orthodox.] This person is a famous Minister and Professor of Divinity at Groningen; in short it is James Alting. He says in a Letter dated the 13th of March 1676, that Doctor Barlow was lately raised to the Bishoprick of Lincoln, that he might be removed from the University, where he taught the orthodox Faith (1); for, continues he, the English incline very much to Pelagianism and Socinianism: and upon that occasion he mentions a book de Unione & Communione cum Christo, the author of which is named Sherlock.

(1) Jac. Altingi, Operum, tom. 5. pag. 391.

[B] He was animated with a warm zeal against Popery, which he has shewn in his writings.] While there was so great a noise about Oates and the horrid conspiracy, which he discovered, this Bishop publish'd a book, in which he maintained against all evasions and subterfuges, that it is an article of the Romish Faith, that the Pope has power to depose Princes, and give their Dominions to others. This was a direct method to shew that he intended to prejudice the Papists; for of all things, which are capable of exciting the zeal of any Nation against them, there is nothing more effectual, than to shew, that they are always ready from a principle of conscience to rise up in arms against Protestant Princes. The book, which Dr. Barlow publish'd upon this subject, was immediately translated into French, and publish'd under this title, An Historical Treatise upon the subject of the Excommunication and deposing of Kings. Printed at Paris by Claude Barbin, 1681 (2).

(2) There is no need to observe, that the place of the impression is supposititious.

[C] Some Writers confound him with WILLIAM BARLOW.] The two Authors, who have given Supplements to John Deckher's Treatise de Scriptis Adespoti, have fallen into this error. Deckher had related that the Jesuit who wrote in English against King James upon the apology for the oath of Allegiance, was confuted by Mr. Baclo Bishop of Lincoln. One of his friends (3) wrote to him, that this Bishop's name was not Baclo, but THOMAS BARLOW. Is si placet est THOMAS BARLOVIUS magni apud Anglos nominis, & de nostratibus optime meritus. Optandum foret videre aliquando scriptores ipsius, quorum magnam in instructissimâ suâ Bibliothecâ copiam habet, & nuperrime uno & altero opusculo præsertim contra Curiam Romanam magnum litteratis desiderium excitavit. Historia ejus de conspiratione contra JACOBUM ANGLIÆ REGEM, vulgo The Gunpouder Treason, non ita pridem publicum vidit. i. e. " His name is Thomas " Barlow, and he is a man of great reputation in " England, and one, who has deserved very well of " our countrymen. It were to be wished, that the " world might be favoured with the publication of " his manuscript pieces, of which he has a great " number in his well-furnished Library, and he has " raised a prodigious curiosity in the men of Learning to see them, by one or two little tracts, which " he has lately published against the Court of Rome. " His History of the Gun-powder Treason Plot against " King James, was printed not long ago." The Letter, from which I have taken these words, was written from Strasbourg in 1681. It is plain therefore that Mr. Deckher's friend imagined that the Bishop of Lincoln, who wrote in defence of King James against a Jesuit, was yet living. Now this is a prodigious mistake. It was in the year 1609, that King James employed Dr. Barlow, the Bishop of Lincoln's Pen to write against Robert Parsons an English Jesuit. If this Doctor had been still living in 1681, his age would have been a thing very extraordinary; and one could not possibly excuse those who mention his Learning, and the books written by him, if they had forgot to mention his prodigious age. It will signify nothing to say that there are learned Men, who have lived an hundred years: this will not reach the case before us; since it is well known that the Bishop of Lincoln's name, who wrote in defence of King James, was William, and not Thomas, as his was, who was living in 1681. I cannot tell whether an hundred years would be sufficient for Thomas Barlow to be living at the time I speak of, and to have been a Bishop in 1609; for it is very rare in England for a man to be a Bishop before he is thirty five or forty years old. The Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, who has taken a short review of the errors of Mr. Deckher and Mr. Vindingius, has not only not perceived this, but even adopted it, which is worse (4).

(3) Paulus Vindingius. See the book de Scriptis Adespotis, p. 355. edit. ann. 1686.

(4) See the book de Scriptis Adespotis, pag. 372.

BARLOW (THOMAS). We ſhall endeavour to ſupply the defects of Mr. Bayle's Article of this great and learned Writer. He was the ſon of Mr. Richard Barlow, and was born at Langhill in the pariſh of Orton in Weſtmorland in the year 1607. He was educated at the free-ſchool at Appleby in that County under Mr. William Pickering, and ſent from thence in 1624 to Queen's College in Oxford, where he was plac'd under the care of Mr. Thomas Lough, and took the Degree of Maſter of Arts; and was appointed Fellow in 1633. Two years after he was choſen Reader in Metaphyſics to the Univerſity, and his Lectures being highly approved of, were publiſhed in 1637 [A]. When the garriſon of Oxford was ſurrendered for the uſe of the Parliament in 1646, he ſubmitted to the men then in power, and by the intereſt of Colonel Thomas Kelſey, Deputy Governor of that garriſon, he kept his Fellowſhip during the Parliamentary Viſitation in 1648 [B]. In 1651 he had a controverſy with Mr. John Goodwin concerning Univerſal Redemption [C]. In 1652 he was elected Keeper of the Bodleian Library, upon the deceaſe of Mr. John Rouſe, and about that time was made Lecturer of Church-Hill

[A] His Lectures being highly approved of, were publiſhed in 1637.] They are intitled, Exercitationes aliquot Metaphyſicæ de Deo, i. e. "Several Metaphyſical Exercitations concerning God." This edition was publiſhed at Oxford in 4to; and another likewiſe appeared in 1658 in 4to (1). Sir Peter Pett in the Genuine Remains of our Author publiſhed at London in 8vo 1695 tells us (2), that the Biſhop, when he was but a young Maſter of Arts, printed his Exercitations in Latin at the end of Scheibler's Metaphyſics, by which he gained a great reputation both in our own and in all the Proteſtant Univerſities of Chriſtendom. That Gentleman therefore was induced to publiſh an Engliſh tranſlation of one of thoſe Exercitations, which he ſtiles incomparable, and which, he tells us, the Biſhop owned to his friends, had coſt him more pains than any of the reſt. This piece turns upon the famous queſtion, Whether it be more eligible to be annihilated, or not to be at all, than to be miſerable? and examines Durandus's reaſons, who aſſerts, that it is better to be miſerable, than to be reduced to a ſimple non-entity. Our Author determines upon the contrary concluſion. We have likewiſe in the Genuine Remains an Abſtract in Engliſh of his fourth Exercitation, concerning the Exiſtence of God, wherein he endeavours to demonſtrate, that there is ſome knowledge of God attainable here by the light of Nature; and to point out the means and aſſiſtances proper for our advancement in that knowledge; with an anſwer to that queſtion, How far this natural knowledge of God can poſſibly reach, or how much of him is cognoſcible by the Light of Nature? He concludes, that it is abundantly demonſtrable by natural light, that there is a God, and that he is the firſt Cauſe of all things; from whence theſe inferences are plainly deducible; 1. That God is eternal; ſince the firſt Cauſe is not capable of receiving its production either from itſelf, or from another: 2. That he is a moſt ſimple Being; ſince the firſt cauſe, as it excludes all external, ſo likewiſe all internal conſtitutive cauſes: 3. That he is independent; for what is firſt can admit of nothing prior to it, whereupon to depend. So that not only the Exiſtence of God, but many of his Attributes deducible from thence by undoubted and natural conſequence, may be evidently demonſtrated from the Light of Nature.

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 877.
(2) Pag. 469.

[B] He kept his fellowſhip during the parliamentary viſitation.] Mr. Wood tells us (3), that he ſided with the men then in power, and that he with others preſented to the wife of Col. Kelſey, the Deputy-Governor of the Garriſon, certain gifts. But we find, that he wrote a Pamphlet againſt the Parliamentary Viſitation, mentioned by that Hiſtorian (4), under the following title: Pegaſus, or the Flying Horſe from Oxford; bringing the Proceedings of the Viſitors and other Bedlamites there, by the command of the Earl of Montgomery; Printed at Montgomery, heretofore called Oxford; in one ſheet in 4to. It is written by way of Letter, dated at Oxford April the 18th 1648 (5). With this is printed another Letter in one ſheet and an half, dated at Oxon April the 17th 1648, and ſubſcribed by Baſilius Philomuſus.

(3) Ubi ſupra, col. 876.
(4) Ibid. col. 877.
(5) Idem, ibid. and col. 859.

[C] In 1651 he had a controverſy with Mr. John Goodwin concerning Univerſal Redemption.] Mr. Goodwin, who was at that time Miniſter of St. Stephen's Coleman-ſtreet, and famous for aſſerting the Arminian Doctrines, and particularly that of Univerſal Redemption, had made uſe of this argument in favour of that point in his book intitled Redemption redeemed (6). If Chriſt died not for all men, then all men are not bound to believe on him. But all men are bound to believe on him. Therefore he died for all. Mr. Barlow in a Letter to him dated September 1651, and publiſhed in his Genuine Remains (7), tells him, that he always finds in the proſecution of his arguments that perſpicuity and acuteneſs, which he often ſeeks and ſeldom finds in the writings of others. He then obſerves to Mr. Goodwin, that the latter aſſerts the Univerſal Redemption for all mankind, without exception, by Jeſus Chriſt. Poſſibly, continues he, there wants not clear rays of truth in your diſcourſes, but I want eyes to ſee them. Therefore I lay the blame on my ſelf, well knowing, that you are not bound to find me arguments, and find me underſtanding too. He proceeds next to conſider Mr. Goodwin's argument abovementioned, and remarks, that many of our Divines miſtake in untying the Gordian knot; and though ſeveral of them deny the major, yet he ſhall deny the minor, and affirm that all men are not bound to believe on Jeſus Chriſt; for which aſſertion he offers his own reaſons, and then endeavours to anſwer thoſe of his Antagoniſt. His own reaſons are, firſt, becauſe it will eaſily be granted, that no human obligation can bind men to this; ſince the internal acts of belief and dependence on Chriſt for ſalvation, as they are not within the compaſs of human cognizance, ſo no man was ever inveſted with ſuch a power and Dominium (which is the foundation of all Laws) over all mankind, as to be able to lay an obligation on all men univerſally, which in this caſe is required. Secondly, neither is there any Divine Law, which binds all men to believe in Jeſus Chriſt, as natural or poſitive. Thirdly, becauſe infants are not bound to believe in Chriſt; and they are a conſiderable part of the world. He then examines Mr. Goodwin's objections, who urges a paſſage from Acts, Now God commanding all men to repent. Mr. Barlow obſerves, that it does not follow, becauſe to repent, therefore to believe; ſince the Light of Nature commands all men, who have ſinned, to repent of their ſin, and would have done ſo, if Jeſus Chriſt had never been revealed to the world. In anſwer to the other objection, that he that believes not ſhall be damned, he remarks that infidelity is two-fold: firſt privative, when we do not believe the things which we are bound to believe; which is a vice and moral obliquity oppoſed to the virtue of faith. Secondly, Infidelity is negative; and this is taken to be Carentia fidei in iis qui non tenentur credere; that is, "The want of faith in thoſe who are not bound to believe." Thoſe reprobates, to whom Chriſt was never revealed, ſhall be tried by the Law of Nature, and not by the Law of the Goſpel, nor the poſitive Law given to the Jews, nor any part of it, moral, ceremonial, and judicial, as far as it was poſitive. Mr. Goodwin publiſhed by way of anſwer to this a book intitled, The Pagan's Debt and Dowry, &c. London 1651, in which he acknowledges (8), that Mr. Barlow hath pleaded the cauſe of what he aſſerted with as much ingenuity and ſtrength as any man whatſoever could have done; and obſerves (9), that he ſhall anſwer ſome of the more material parts of his diſcourſe, though not in the ſame order, to which he might be directed by his papers, but only as they came to his remembrance, he not having leiſure for a ſecond review.

(6) Ch. 18. § 6; and pag. 464.
(7) Pag. 122, & ſeq.
(8) Pag. 4. See Genuine Remains, &c. pag. 131.
(9) Pag. 6.

Hill near Burford in Oxfordshire (a). July the 23d 1657 he took his Degree of Bachelor of Divinity (b); and the same year he was admitted to the reading of the Sentences, and in the latter end of that year elected Provost of Queen's College upon the death of Dr. Langbaine. After the restoration of King Charles II he procured himself to be one of the Commissioners appointed at first by the Marquis of Hertford, Chancellor of the University, and afterwards by his Majesty, for the restoring of those Members, who had been unjustly ejected in 1648 (c). August the 2d 1660 he was not only actually created Doctor of Divinity among the Royalists (d), but likewise designed Margaret Professor of Divinity upon the ejection of Mr. Henry Wilkinson Sen. and was elected to that Professorship in September 1662 (e). In 1660 he wrote the Case of a Toleration in Matters of Religion to Mr. Robert Boyle [D]. Upon the decease of Dr. Barton Holyday, who

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 876. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Idem, Fasti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 116.

(c) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi supra.

(d) Idem, ibid. and Fasti Oxon. col. 136.

(e) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi supra.

view. Upon which Sir Peter Pett remarks in his Abstract of Mr. Goodwin's book (10), that it is to be regretted, that he had not endeavoured for the satisfaction of the world to have answered paragraph by paragraph, as is usually done by the answerers of discourses written with such accurateness of method as Dr. Barlow's is. And he tells us (11), that both "Dr. Barlow's Letter, "and Mr. Goodwin's Answer may be to such, who "write of controversial Divinity, an useful specimen "of two antagonists writing of the same subject with "candour, and like Gentlemen as well as Scholars and "Christians; which was suitable to the natural tem-"pers both of Dr. Barlow and Mr. Goodwin." The same Gentleman likewise observes, that Dr. Barlow's assertion is not in the least heterodox or inconsistent with the doctrines of the Church of England, since our Great Bishop Sanderson (with as much honour now quoted in the Divinity-Schools as Aristotle is in those of Philosophy) tells us in his fourth Lecture, and of the adequate Rule of Conscience, §. 21, "that the Gentiles to whom "the Gospel hath not been preached, are not bound to "believe the Gospel, or to believe on Christ; for "nemo tenetur ad impossibile." And he asserts the same thing in §. 32.

(10) Genuine Remains, ubi supra.

(11) Ibid. pag. 239.

[D] In 1660 he wrote the Case of a Toleration in matters of Religion to Mr. Robert Boyle.] We are informed that it was addressed to that Gentleman in 1660 soon after the Restoration, in the Preface to Dr. Barlow's Several miscellaneous and weighty cases of conscience, publish'd at London 1692 in 8vo. He observes first (12), that the toleration spoken of is a toleration of several Religions, or several opinions concerning it; and that therefore Atheists (if there be any such) came not under it. For he who acknowledges no God, cannot possibly be of any Religion, which essentially includes both an acknowledgment and worship of a Deity. He tells us likewise (13), that as those, to whom a toleration is granted, may justly expect impunity, and exemption from all penal sufferings, tho' they conform not to the way of worship publicly established; so on the other side, they cannot reasonably expect the rewards and encouragements, which a Prince distributes to those, who chearfully obey, and give conformity to the Religion established. He then proceeds to the grand question, "Whether and how far the su-"preme Power may and ought to grant such a tole-"ration to religions and ways of worship differing "from that established (14)?" He observes (15), that no State should or will grant a toleration to any Religion, which contains any thing in it, which may be destructive to the civil peace and safety of itself. Upon which account he tells us it will be hard to tolerate, 1. Such Anabaptists, as deny all Magistracy; for why should any Prince own and protect them as subjects, who will not obey, or own him as their Prince (16)? 2. Such as make it a part of their Religion to believe all oaths unlawful, and so will take none; for on this account they will refuse all oaths of allegiance (17). 3. Such (especially if their number be considerable) as by the principles of their Religion think all war unlawful, and by consequence must deny their Prince any personal assistance in his wars, tho' he and his Kingdom be in the utmost hazard and necessity (18). 4. Such, who, (although they allow and will take an oath of allegiance, yet by the principles of their Religion acknowledge a Power, which can absolve them from that oath, and arm them against their Prince, depose him, and dispose of his Kingdom, nay of all the Kingdoms of the world; which is the doctrine of the Papists, as he shews very fully from their greatest writers (19). He remarks afterwards (20), that no King can tolerate such ways of worship, as are destructive of the Ecclesiastical State or peace of the Church, at least as far as they are so, and without such restrictions and qualifications, as may rationally secure the established way of worship. And that no prudent Prince will tolerate such religions and ways of worship, (if there are any such) as approve and practise any thing against the law of nature, as blasphemy, theft, perjury, adultery, &c. such as all sober men acknowledge to be crimes, and are destructive to the well-being of human society. Having premis'd these things, he comes now to the main question concerning matters of faith and false opinions; "Whether men of a false faith and heretical opinions "may be tolerated, and have a grant of impunity; "or whether the Magistrate is to punish such erring "persons, Papists, Sectaries, Socinians, &c. and then "how far, how long, with what punishments, and "what measure and degrees of them he is to do it "(21)?" In answer to this, says he (22), tho' I shall not say, that it is absolutely unlawful for the Civil Magistrate in this case to use temporal and compulsory punishments, yet thus much (giving my reasons for it) I think I may safely and truly say, that it will be very difficult and dangerous for him to do it. I. Because we find no warrant for it in the Gospel; there is neither any precept or practice of our Saviour or his Apostles to compel any to be Christians (23). II. There are several express places in the Gospel, which strongly persuade the contrary; that no violence nor coaction is or ought to be used (24). III. Such compelling punishments and coaction is not, cannot be a fit and congruous means to work faith and true religion in erring persons (25). IV. In all punishments, as the best Lawyers truly tell us, there must be two things; Cognitio culpæ, & Æstimatio pœnæ. The crime to be punished, together with the magnitude and measure of it, the degrees of the malice of it in itself, and the mischief which it does to others, must of necessity be certainly known, else it cannot justly be punish'd; for the justice of punishments consisting in a proportion between the crime and the punishment, he that would justly proportion this to that, must first know the crime and the measure of the malice contained in it, the mischief done by it; else it is impossible he should proportion a just punishment for it. But Dr. Barlow conceived it very difficult, if not impossible, for any man certainly to know how far erroneous opinions in religion or heresies (as they call them) are sinful. For, 1. no heresy or erroneous opinion can be sinful, unless it be voluntary (26). 2. It is a known maxim among all Lawyers and Divines, that no positive Law of God or man does or can bind us, without a sufficient promulgation, such a promulgation being necessary to the obligation of all positive laws. But now, when the positive truths of the Gospel are sufficiently revealed and promulgated to Titius and Sempronius (to this and that particular person,) it is difficult, if not impossible for any man to know, unless he could know the divers abilities and capacities of those persons, to whom those truths are revealed. For as those Pagans, to whom the Gospel was never revealed (as to many Nations it never was) are no ways under the obligation of it, nor any way liable to sin, or punishment for not believing it (whence that saying of Augustine, speaking of the Gentiles, Veniam habebunt propter infidelitatem, damnabuntur propter peccata contra naturam; i. e. "They will be pardoned on account of their infidelity, "but be condemned for their sins against nature;") so among those, to whom it has been revealed, there is a great difference in respect of the sufficiency or insufficiency

(12) Pag. 4, 5.

(13) Pag. 8.

(14) Pag. 11.

(15) Pag. 21.

(16) Pag. 22, 23.

(17) Pag. 23.

(18) Pag. 23, 24.

(19) Pag. 25, & seq.

(20) Pag. 30.

(21) Pag. 36, 37.

(22) Pag. 38, 39.

(23) Pag. 39.

(24) Pag. 49.

(25) Pag. 52, 53.

(26) Pag. 56, 57.

who died October 2d 1661 (f), he was made Archdeacon of Oxford, and the controverſy about that Dignity between him and Dr. Thomas Lamplugh was determined in favour of the former by the itinerant Juſtices in their Aſſizes at Oxford March 1, 1663; ſo that he was inſtalled in it June the 13th 1664 (g). His attachment to the principles of Calvin engaged him in a public oppoſition to the Harmonia Apoſtolica publiſhed in 1669 by Mr. George Bull, afterwards Biſhop of St. David's [E], and urged him to contend with great warmth againſt every thing, which ſeemed to ſavour of Arminianiſm. We find likewiſe, that he had a great averſion to the new Philoſophy [F]. In 1671 he wrote a learned diſcuſſion of its promulgation to one, which (their capacities conſidered) is not to another; and ſo the error of one be a crime, when the other, tho' holding the ſame opinion, is innocent (27). V. Upon this ground the Doctor is abſolutely againſt puniſhing heretics with death, it being uncertain who are really ſuch. For 1. it is not yet agreed amongſt Divines, who are formally heretics. 2. Some would have the formality of hereſy to conſiſt in pertinacy or contumacy. Now ſince pertinacy is an internal thing, and ſuch a conſtitution of the ſoul, as none but God does or can know; it were but juſt to ſtay the execution of heretics, till it be certain what is hereſy. 3. The Greek Scholiaſt of Theophylact and Oecumenius on Tit. 3. 10. make it requiſite to an heretic to be αὐτοκατάκριτος, ἀνίατος, ἀδιόρθωτος, ſelf-condemned, incurable, incorrigible; but none of theſe are within the compaſs of human cognizance. 4. They ſay an hereſy muſt be againſt the Articles of Faith. Now it is not agreed which and how many are ſuch, and what makes them ſo; thoſe being articles of faith to ſome, which are not ſo to others (28). He concludes with two queries: 1. Whether the Prince, who would give a toleration to ſeveral Religions, ſhould not in prudence and conſcience firſt know what theſe Religions are, and what points they hold different from that eſtabliſhed, that ſo he may knowingly judge how far he may, or may not grant impunity? 2. Whether he that does (and juſtly may) tolerate a Religion different from that legally eſtabliſhed, and ſo compells none to be of his Religion, may not yet compel his ſubjects to thoſe means and the uſe of them, by which they may be informed of the reaſons and truth of his Religion (29)?

(f) Idem, Ath. Oxon. col. 260

(g) Idem, ibid. col. 876.

(27)] Pag. 58, 59, 60.

(28) Pag. 62, 63, 64.

(29) Pag. 90, 91.

[E] His attachment to the principles of Calvin engaged him in a public oppoſition to the Harmonia Apoſtolica, publiſh'd in 1669 by Mr. George Bull, afterwards Biſhop of St. David's.] The deſign of this treatiſe of Mr. Bull was to explain and defend the doctrine of St. James with relation to good Works, and to ſhew the agreement and harmony of St. Paul with him. But more particularly the author's chief aim in his firſt Diſſertation is to ſhew, that "good works, which "proceed from faith, and are conjoined with faith, "are a neceſſary condition required from us by God, "to the end that by the new and evangelical Co-"venant obtained by and ſealed in the Blood of Chriſt "the Mediator of it, we may be juſtified according "to his free and unmerited Grace (30)." Mr. Nelſon obſerves (31), that this book met with oppoſition from three conſiderable men in the Church, Dr. Morley Biſhop of Wincheſter, Dr. Barlow, and Dr. Tully; the two laſt of whom were among the moſt zealous to oppoſe the pacific method for reconciling the different ſyſtems about attaining ſalvation, by their rigid adherence to certain tenets by them formerly imbibed, and to ſome ſcholaſtic terms unſupported either by Scripture or Antiquity. But tho' the firſt of theſe (Dr. Barlow) read public Lectures againſt the Harmonia Apoſtolica from the Divinity-chair; and tho' the other made it his buſineſs to anſwer it at large from the preſs; yet it failed not to make its way through all oppoſition and contradiction, and to gain continually more and more ground, as it came hereby to be more read and conſidered. Mr. Nelſon afterwards informs us (32), that Dr. Barlow in his Lectures is ſaid to have treated Mr. Bull very roughly, even ſo far as to give him opprobrious names; an account of which was ſent to the latter by his friend Mr. Thomas, at that time Chaplain of Chriſt-Church, who was preſent, and took notes of all that related to his friend in theſe Lectures. This treatment brought Mr. Bull to Oxford, who with Mr. Thomas waited upon the Profeſſor, told him with what inhumanity he had been treated by him, and offered to clear himſelf from thoſe imputations by a public diſputation; but this would not be accepted of. Mr. Bull and his friend thought this refuſal was by no means equitable in the Profeſſor. A diſputation, ſays Mr. Nelſon, was all that Mr. Bull deſired for himſelf; but was prudently enough declined by this Doctor of the Chair, not knowing what might have been the conſequences thereof. He excuſed himſelf therefore to Mr. Bull as well as he could, and endeavoured to avoid owning the fact, till Mr. Thomas poſitively affirmed it to his face, offering to produce the notes which he had taken, to which the Profeſſor had no more to ſay; and they parted with no other ſatisfaction to Mr. Bull, than that the perſon, who had been ſo forward to defame him in his abſence, durſt not make good the charge to his face.

(30) See the Life of Dr. George Bull, late Lord Biſhop of St. David's, by Robert Nelſon, Eſq; pag. 95. 2d edit. London 1714.

(31) Ibid. pag. 102.

(32) Ibid. pag. 211.

[F] He had a great averſion to the New Philoſophy.] He tells his friend Sir J. B. in a ſecond Letter (33), which he wrote to him upon receiving from him a Lecture, read before the Royal Society Novemb. 26th 1674, "that he was and had been for a long time "not a little troubled to ſee Proteſtants, nay Clergy-"men and Biſhops, approve and propagate that, which "they miſcall New Philoſophy; ſo that our Univerſi-"ties begin to be infected with it, little conſidering "the cauſe or conſequences of it, or how it tends e-"vidently to the advantage of Rome, and the ruin of "our Religion. It is certain this New Philoſophy (as "they call it,) was ſet on foot, and has been carried "on by the arts of Rome, and thoſe (a), whoſe oath "and intereſt it is to maintain all her ſuperſtitions." He obſerves afterwards, that when he was Library-keeper, and ſaw the Jeſuits and Popiſh party extoll their New Philoſophy, he ſent by his friends to Paris, Venice, Florence, Rome, Alcala de Henares, &c. to enquire whether the Jeſuits in their colleges trained up their young men in the New Philoſophy; or whether in all their diſputations they kept them to ſtrict form and Ariſtotle's manner of ratiocination; and that the anſwer he had was, that none were more ſtrict than they in keeping all their pupils to the old principles and forms of diſputations. For they well know, continues he, that all their ſchool-men, caſuiſts and controverſy-writers have ſo mixed Ariſtotle's Philoſophy with their Divinity, that he, who has not a comprehenſion of Ariſtotle's principles and the uſe of them in all ſcholaſtic diſputes and controverſies of Religion, will never be able rationally to defend or confute any controverted poſition in the Roman or Reformed Religion. Now while they keep cloſe to the old way of diſputing on the old received principles, if they can perſuade us to ſpend our time about novel whimſies and not well underſtood experiments, and neglect the ſeverer ſtudies of the old Philoſophy and ſcholaſtical Divinity, they will in all Divinity diſputations be every way too hard for us. Juſt ſo, as in this caſe; if I ſhould challenge a man to fight a duel with me in the field, and when we met there, if I could perſuade him to caſt away his ſword, or keep him from having any ſkill in it, I ſhould certainly be too hard for him. Dr. Barlow concludes with the following paſſage. "A comprehenſion of the principles of the old Phi-"loſophy and School-Divinity is a weapon ſo neceſ-"ſary for a rational defence of any queſtion againſt "Rome, that he who wants it, diſables himſelf to "defend, and ſo betrays the truth; and this is un-"happily manifeſt in many of our late Scriblers." His great opinion of the School-Logic appears from a Letter of his to one of his friends, who had written to him for his judgment, Wherein Mr. Chillingworth's peculiar excellency above other writers conſiſted; in anſwer to which he tells him (34), that it conſiſted in his acquired Logic. He induſtriouſly ſtudied it, finding the exceeding great uſe of it, eſpecially in controverſies of Religion. But let us hear that great man's judgment of School-Divinity, which is very contrary to that of our author. The Jeſuit Knott had obſerved (35), that the learning of Proteſtant Divines conſiſting only in ſome ſuperficial talent of preaching, languages, or elocution, and

(33) See Genuine Remains, p. 157, & ſeq.

(a) Vid. Juramentum Profeſſionis fidei (which all her Eccleſiaſtics take) in Concilio Trident. Seſſ. 24. De Reformatione, in Calce cap. 12.

(34) Genuine Remains, pag. 348.

(35) A Direction to be obſerved by N. N. if hee mean to proceede in anſwering the Booke intitled, Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholicks, pag. 19, 20. in 8vo, 1636.

discussion of the case of Mr. Cottington concerning the validity or nullity of his marriage with a Lady, whose former husband was living [G]. Upon the death of Dr. William Fuller Bishop of Lincoln April 22d 1675, Dr. Barlow, through the interest of both the Secretaries of State, Henry Coventry Esq; and Sir Joseph Williamson, who were formerly of his College, and of several of the Nobility, was introduced to the King, and had the grant of that See; to which he was consecrated at Ely House the 27th of June following (b). Mr. Wood informs us, that Archbishop Sheldon opposed his preferment (i). He never resided at Lincoln, or visited his Diocese in person; for which he alledged some reasons, which we shall mention in the note [H]. After the Popish Plot was (b) Idem, ibid. col. 876 and 1161.

(i) Idem, col. 876.

and not in any deep knowledge of Philosophie, especially of Metaphisicks, and much lesse of that most solide, profitable, subtile, and succinct method, which we call School-Divinity; when they come to be pressed by Socinians, are unable to satisfy their doubts, but either are caught themselves, as I know it happeth not seldome, or give occasion for the Socinians to be more settled in their errours, and for others to be drawn into the same infidelitie. And the Divel aymed at no lesse than this total ruin of all Faith and Religion, when he first moved hereticks to deride School-Divinity, and to nickname the professours thereof Dunses. Mr. Chillingworth's answer to this is as follows (36): "Their learning (you say) "consists only in some superficial talent of preaching, languages, and elocution, and not in any deep knowledge of Philosophy, especially of Metaphysics, and much lesse of that most solid, profitable, subtile, and (o rem ridiculam, Cato, & jocosam!) succinct method of School-Divinity. Wherein you have discovered in yourself the true genius and spirit of detraction. For taking advantage from that, wherein envy itself cannot deny but they are very eminent, and which requires sufficiency of great substantial learning, you disparage them as insufficient in all things else. As if forsooth, because they dispute not eternally, Utrum chimæra bombinans in vacuo, possit comedere secundas intentiones? i. e. "Whether a million of "Angels may not sit upon a needle's point?" Because they fill not their brains with notions, that signifie nothing, to the utter extermination of all reason and common sense, and spend not an age in weaving and unweaving subtile cobwebs, fitter to catch flies than souls; therefore they have no deeper knowledge in the Acroamaticall part of learning? But I have too much honoured the poorness of this detraction to take notice of it."

(36) See his Preface to his Religion of Protestants &c. § 19.

[G] A learned discussion of the case of Mr. Cottington concerning the Validity and Nullity of his Marriage with a Lady, whose former husband was living.] The case was as follows (37): Gallina marries Patrimoniale in the year 1664, lives and cohabits with him as his wife a year and a half, and has a daughter by him; and all this while voluntarily gives him reverence and due benevolence, without any protestation or complaint of any nullity or illegality of the matrimonial contract by reason of any antecedent force or fear to make her consent and plighted troth involuntary; never endeavours to recede and make an escape from him, when she was in loco tuto, and had an opportunity to make such protestation or recess with safety. After this in the year 1666 the Archbishop of Turin by sentence given pronounces the said marriage void and null by reason of force and fear, into which her father put her; which rendered Gallina's consent involuntary (as was supposed) and contrary to the nature of a conjugal consent, which, jure naturæ, ought to be free and spontaneous; otherwise it will not be obligatory. After this in 1671 she marries Mr. Cottington, (her former husband then living, and who is yet alive) and claims him for her husband at Law and in the Court of Arches. The Court (sententiâ latâ) determines and declares, that Mr. Cottington and Gallina are lawfully husband and wife, without taking notice of the Archbishop of Turin's sentence, (whether it was valid or void,) and enjoined them to cohabit. The query upon this case was, Whether Mr. Cottington may acknowledge, take, and use Gallina as a lawful wife without sin? The Bishop examined this point with great accuracy and extent of learning, having premised these considerations; 1. That it is certain and confessed that the obligation of the patrimonial contract, is not grounded on any positive constitution of man, but on the divine law of God and of Nature. 2. That from hence it is, that this matrimonial contract, while the parties live, is immutable and indispensable. 3. That from hence it follows evidently, that if the conjugal contract between Patrimoniale and Gallina was a legal and valid marriage originally, then it continues so, and was and is still valid and obligatory. 4. And therefore if this be true and granted, then her marriage with Mr. Cottington is absolutely null and void. He proceeds then to the next query concerning the Invalidity and Nullity of Gallina's Marriage with Patrimoniale; which pretence seems to be founded only upon the authority and judicial sentence of the Archbishop of Turin, declaring it to be a Nullity; and upon the reason alledged, drawn from the force and fear, which made Gallina's consent involuntary. These mediums he conceives to be insufficient; and therefore concludes that the latter marriage is null and void. We are informed in the Preface to the Miscellaneous and weighty Cases of Conscience written by our author, that Mr. Cottington applied himself, and Mr. Brent came from the Earl of Danby to request his opinion; and that the resolution in this case may be of great use, it never being so fully stated before. Davila tells us in his fifth book of the History of the Civil Wars of France, that King Henry IV having been married to Queen Margaret at Notredame by the Cardinal of Bourbon, in the presence of the whole Court, when the Lady was given in marriage by King Charles IX her brother; yet after a long cohabitation the Cardinal de Joyeuse, the Pope's Nuncio, and the Archbishop of Arles, being delegated by the Pope, nulled the marriage, propter vim & metum, Queen Margaret alledging that she was forced to it by her brother. And the sentence gave liberty to the King and Queen to marry whom they pleased; and accordingly the King afterwards married Mary de Medicis, and Cardinal D'Ossat justified the legality of this sentence, tho' there had been no cause shewn. Sir Peter Pett in his Preface to the Genuine Remains is of opinion, that a Discussion of any one case of conscience with such variety of learning as is contained in Bishop Barlow's Treatise of Mr. Cottington's Marriage-Case, is not to be found in the works of any foreign casuists. We have in those Remains (38), a Letter of that Bishop concerning the Allowance and Respect, which the sentences of Protestant Bishops may expect from Popish ones, written by way of answer to a friend of Mr. Cottington's, who acquainted him, that the Court of Arches here was of opinion, that the sentence of the Archbishop of Turin could not be questioned here, by reason of the practice of Popish and Protestant Bishops allowing each other's sentences.

(37) See Several miscellaneous and weighty Cases of Conscience, &c. in Mr. Cottington's Case, p. 1, & seq. edit. London 1692, in 8vo.

(38) Pag. 216.

[H] He alledged some reasons, which we shall mention in the note.] He tells his friend Sir Peter Pett in a letter to him dated from Bugden Jan. 26, 1684. and publish'd in his Genuine Remains (39), that as for going to Lincoln, according to the advice of the Marquis of Halifax, he would not fail to do it, as soon as possible; but that at present his age and infirmities were such as to disable him for such a journey, since he had not been out of his house for thirteen or fourteen months. He observes, that he had written to the Lord Privy-Seal the reasons of his not going to Lincoln; which were, 1. that he had no house there: 2. That Bugden is in the center of his Diocese, and stands more conveniently for all business: 3. That Bishop Sanderson lived and died at Bugden, and Bishop Laney lived there likewise, till he was translated to Ely; nor were they ever accused or complained of for it: 4. That Lincoln might not think him unkind or negligent of them, he sent them one hundred pounds, of which fifty were given to the Church, and the other fifty

(39) Pag. 255, & seq.

was discovered in September 1678, he published several tracts against the Roman Catholic Religion [I], in which he shews an uncommon extent of learning and skill in polemical Divinity. He distinguished himself by his zeal against Popery in the House of Lords; for as Bishop Burnet in the History of his own Times (k) informs us, while the examinations relating to the Plot were going on, and preparation was making for the trial of the prisoners, a Bill was brought into the House of Commons, requiring all Members of either House, and all such as might come into the King's court or presence, to take a Test against Popery, in which not only Transubstantiation was renounced, but the Worship of the Virgin Mary and the Saints, as it was practised in the Church of Rome, was declared to be idolatrous. This passed in the House of Commons without any difficulty; but in the House of Lords Dr. Peter Gunning, Bishop of Ely, maintained, that the Church of Rome was not idolatrous. He was answered by Bishop Barlow. And the Lords, without paying any great regard to Bishop Gunning's arguments, passed the Bill. Mr. Wood (l) charges him upon this occasion with great inconsistency in his conduct, and tells us, that though he had before been a seeming friend to the Papists, he became then a bitter enemy to them and to the Duke of York. But that when the Duke was proclaimed King, he took all opportunities of expressing his affection towards him, and in particular was said to have written reasons for reading his Majesty's Declaration for Liberty of Conscience [K]. However that be, after the Revolution, he readily voted, that the King had abdicated his Kingdoms, and was very vigorous in excluding those of the Clergy, who refused the oaths, from their Benefices (m). Mr. Rapin likewise has passed a severe (k) Vol. 1. pag. 435, 436. edit. London 1724. fol.

(l) Col. 877.

(m) Idem, ibid.

fifty to the City. And since that he had given to the City twenty pounds towards their expence in renewing their Charter; which, says he, none of my predecessors have done; and yet I only must be accused and uncharitably condemned by my enemies, causâ indictâ & inauditâ. Ah! my dear friend, it is not my absence from Lincoln, or any of those little things they (I mean the Popish party) object against me, which troubles them; but that which indeed sets them on to calumniate me, is, they know I am an enemy to Rome, and their miscalled Catholic Religion, and (God willing) while I live, shall be so, & hinc illæ lacrymæ. I have been loyal to my good King, and dutiful to my holy Mother the Church of England; and (pardon my confidence) I have done them more faithful and better service than any of my enemies have or can; and notwithstanding any discouragements, I shall (God inabling me) continue to do. I am not afraid to anger my Popish enemies, or of any mischief they can do me. I serve a most gracious and omnipotent God, who can and (I hope) will deliver me from their cruelties; and if not, they shall know, that I will never worship the abominable idols they have set up. I have something, which in convenient time I shall publish, which will anger them more than any thing I have yet done.

[I] Published several Tracts against the Roman Catholic Religion.] I. Popery, or the Principles and Positions approved by the Church of Rome (when really believed and practised) are very dangerous to all, and to Protestant Kings and supreme Powers, more especially pernicious, and inconsistent with that loyalty, which by the Law of Nature and Scripture is indispensably due to supreme Powers. In a Letter to a person of honour. Mr. Wood tells us (40), that this book was published at London in December 1678 in 4to, and there again in April in 8vo. It was animadverted upon in another book, intitled, The Compendium, or a short view of the late Tryals in relation to the present Plot against his Majesty and Government, &c. London 1679 in 4to, pag. 76, 77. written by Roger Palmer Earl of Castlemain. But these Reflections were replied to in the Preface to A Memento for English Protestants. The Bishop's book was likewise answered in a book intitled, Four Letters on several subjects to persons of Quality. The fourth being an answer to the Lord Bishop of Lincoln's book intitled, Popery, &c. published in 1686 in 8vo, and written by Peter Walsh, an Irish Friar of the Order of St. Francis. There was also a Latin translation of the Bishop's book by Rob. Grove, Bachelor of Divinity, and afterwards Bishop of Chichester, published under this title, Papismus regiæ potestatis eversor, &c. London 1681, in 8vo. II. A Letter concerning Invocation of Saints and Adoration of the Cross, writ ten years since to John Evelyn of Deptford Esq; London 1679 in 4to. It was published at the latter end of December 1678; upon which Mr. Wood observes (41) in his usual manner, that the Roman Catholicks at that time being much troubled upon account of the Popish Plot, this Letter was then printed to make their trouble the greater. III. The Gun-powder Treason, with a Discourse of the manner of its Discovery, and a perfect relation of the Proceedings against those horrid Conspirators; wherein is contained their Examinations, Tryals, and Condemnations; likewise King James's Speech to both Houses of Parliament on that occasion. Now reprinted. A Preface touching that horrid Conspiracy by the right Reverend Father in God Thomas Lord Bishop of Lincoln. And by way of Appendix several Papers or Letters of Sir Everard Digby, chiefly relating to the Gun-powder Plot, never before printed. London 1679 in 8vo. The substance of this Preface of the Bishop was afterwards published in his Genuine Remains (42). IV. Brutum Fulmen; or the Bull of Pope Pius Sextus concerning the Damnation, Excommunication and Deposition of Queen Elizabeth; as also the Absolution of her Subjects from the Oath of Allegiance, with a peremptory injunction, upon pain of an Anathema never to obey any of her Laws and Commands; with some Observations and Animadversions upon it. London 1681 in 4to. To this book, of which there are two editions, is annexed the Bull of Pope Paul III, containing the damnation, excommunication, &c. of King Henry VIII. V. A Discourse concerning the Laws Ecclesiastical and Civil made against Heretics by Popes, Emperors and Kings, Provincial and General Councils, approved by the Church of Rome, shewing 1. What Protestant Subjects may expect to suffer under a Popish Prince acting according to those Laws: 2. That no oath or promise of such a Prince can give them any just security that he will not execute the Laws upon them. London 1682 in 4to. There is a large Preface to it against persecuting and destroying Heretics, and some things said in favour of the Dissenters. There is no name set to this Discourse and Preface, but, as Mr. Wood informs us (43), when they were published in November 1681, the public and constant report was, that they were written by Bishop Barlow.

(40) Col. 877.

(41) Col. 878.

(42) Pag. 383, & seq.

(43) Col. 877.

[K] He took all opportunities of expressing his affection towards him, and in particular was said to have written reasons for reading his Majesty's Declaration for Liberty of Conscience.] We find among his Genuine Remains (44) a Letter giving an account of the Bishop and his Clergy's address to King James, wherein he tells his friend, that many of his Clergy had been sollicited by Letters from London not to subscribe the address; and that himself had two or three Letters sent him from unknown hands, without any name to them, warmly declaiming against that address and all subscriptions to it; but without mentioning any thing like a reason to prove that such subscriptions are either unlawful, or (circumstances considered) imprudent, or inconvenient. He observes likewise, that he had been lately informed by a person of quality from London, that the Bishop of Lincoln had indeed subscribed the address, but his Clergy refused it. But the truth is, says he, that beside my self and three Arch-Deacons, above

(44) Pag. 340, 341.

severe censure upon him for his compliance with regard to that King's Declaration; for he tells us (m), that if there were Nonconformists, who thought themselves obliged to express their gratitude for the King's Declaration by flattering addresses, there were likewise Bishops, who with much less foundation prevailed with their Clergy to send Addresses of Thanks to the King, as for a signal favour to the Church of England; of which number were Crew Bishop of Durham, Barlow of Lincoln, Cartwright of Chester, Wood of Litchfield, and Watson of St. David's. As for Parker Bishop of Oxford, he was not so successful, since he could find but one Clergyman in his whole Diocese, who would sign such an address. "It may easily be imagined, concludes Mr. Rapin, that had the King's "project succeeded, these Bishops would not have been the last to embrace the Popish "Religion." But the impartial Reader will expect some better grounds for such a reflection as this with respect to Bishop Barlow, when he considers the uncommon zeal and vigour, with which he appeared against Popery through his whole life. In 1682 he wrote a Letter in answer to some queries concerning Abbey-Lands, and concerning the opinions of Calvin and Luther relating to the punishment of Heretics [L]; and about the same time likewise he wrote another Letter upon the question, Whether the Turk or Pope be the greater Antichrist [M]? In 168¾ he wrote a Breviate of the Case concerning setting up of images in the Parish-Church of Moulton in the Diocese and County of Lincoln [N]. The above six hundred of my Clergy have actually subscribed it, and their subscriptions are now in my hand. Sure I am, that his sacred Majesty's gracious promise to protect the Church of England, as by Law established, is such (especially from a Roman Catholic Prince) as deserves the utmost of our thanks and gratitude, and most worthy to be acknowledged in a most humble and hearty address; and I fear that the obstinate denying to give him thanks in an address may give his Majesty some reason to say, he had little reason to protect them, who would not thank him for it. Sure I am, that it is a rule (and a rational one too) in your Canon-Law, that (a) propter ingratudinem quod actum est revocatur.

(m) Book 24. ad ann. 1687.

(a) Concilium Lateranum sub Alexandro 3. Anno 1180, de Pactionibus licitis & illicitis, Can. 2.

[L] About the opinions of Calvin and Luther relating to the punishment of Heretics.] This Letter is published in his Genuine Remains (45). He observes there, that Calvin and the Senate of Geneva put Servetus an Arian to death; and that Beza (46) justifies the fact in his Tract, De Hereticis a Magistratu puniendis, where he cites Melancthon, Bullinger, Capito, and many more Protestants, who, according to him, were of the same opinion. But the Bishop observes, that the Church of England never put any Papists to death, though Heretics and Idolaters; and that this is publickly affirmed and justified in a book intitled, Justitia Legum Anglicarum. And for my part, says he, I should not be willing, that any Heretick should be punished with death, unless he join with his heresy, blasphemy of God, or disloyalty against the King, or some sins against the Law of Nature evidently punishable by the Civil Magistrate, for the preservation of the public peace and safety of the Commonwealth.

(45) Pag. 240, 241, 242.

(46) Inter Opera Bezæ, tom. 1. pag. 85. edit. Genevæ 1582.

[M] He wrote another Letter upon the question, whether the Turk or Pope be the greater Antichrist.] This Letter is dated from Bugden September the 9th 1682, and he observes in it, 1. That it is granted, that both the Pope and the Turk are Antichrists; for even in St. John's time there were (47), and ever since have been many Antichrists, that is, impious Heretics, and deserters of the truth of the Gospel (48); but amongst these many Antichrists there was ὁ Ἀντίχριστος, one great Antichrist, who was to come, as St. John there says. And of all the rest the Turk and Pope have the fairest pleas to be that Antichrist. But the Pope is certainly to be preferred, because he has some proprieties and characteristical marks of that Beast, which the Turk neither has nor can pretend to. As 1. the seat of Antichrist was to be the great City, which reigned over the Kings of the earth (49); which is unquestionably Rome, where the Pope has and does sit. 2. Another mark of the great Antichrist is, that he exalts himself above all that is called God, &c. (50), above all Kings and Emperors, who in Scripture are called Gods. This the Pope does, who takes upon him, (and his own Canonists and Council insist upon his right to do it) to depose Kings, and give away Kingdoms. But the Turk has never claimed such universal Monarchy. 3. It is a mark of Antichrist, or the Whore of Babylon, as St. John calls her (51), that she was drunk with the blood of the Saints. This does not agree to the Turk, who suffers Christians to live, if they do not rebel, and pay their taxes, and does not take away their lives, because they are not of his Religion. But the Pope, continues our author, wherever he has power, suffers none to live, who will not submit to him, and embrace his Romish and idolatrous way of worship. The many thousands, (nay many hundred thousands,) who barely on this account have in these last six hundred years been murthered by the Pope and his party, either by open war, inquisitions, or other ways, are signal evidences of this truth; and among others, the French Massacre anno 1572, and our late Irish Massacre are sad and signal instances.

(47) 1 John ii. 18.

(48) Ibid. ver. 19.

(49) Revelat. xvii. 18.

(50) 2 Thessal. ii. 3, 4.

(51) Revelat. xvii. 6.

[N] In 1683 he wrote a Breviate of the case concerning setting up of images &c.] We are told in the Preface to Several miscellaneous and mighty Cases of Conscience &c. that this was written upon occasion of his being cited before the Dean of the Arches for suffering such images to be defaced; and that upon reading the case, the whole persecution against him, which had been carried on with great violence, was immediately stopped. The case was as follows: Some of the parishioners of Moulton upon pretence of adorning and beautifying the church, washed out all the sentences of Scripture formerly written upon the walls in the church; and without the approbation or advice or general consent of the Parish set up the images of five or six of the Apostles; which giving offence, (for thirty seven of the parishioners protested against it under their hands,) they procured an order from the Deputy-Chancellor of Lincoln, to approve and confirm what they had done, and authorize them to set up more effigies, as they called them. By this order and authority they set up the images of thirteen Apostles, St. Paul being one. The image of Peter they placed above the Ten Commandments; and that of Paul above the King's Arms; and the Holy Ghost in the form of a Dove over them; and in contempt of the Translation of the Bible, approved and received in the Church of England, and in compliance with the erroneous and ridiculous Vulgar Latin (52), they painted Moses with horns. When they had done all this, they petitioned the Bishop for his approbation, who denied their petition, and for reasons given them told them, that he never would nor de jure could approve what they had done without and against law. At last the Chancellor nulls the order of his Deputy with regard to the setting up of those images; and those, who had done that work without the consent of the Parish, appealed to the Arches. The Bishop asserts (53), that in the Reformation of our Church our supreme Powers, who regularly begun, and piously and happily finish'd it, expressly condemned not only the worshipping of images, but the having them in our churches; which, he says, evidently appears in our authentic Records, publish'd by supreme authority for that purpose, to say nothing of our learned particular writers. He observes likewise (54) that the Church of England absolutely condemns all images of the Trinity or any person of it (55) as absolutely unlawful, and expressly condemned in Scripture (56); and that no images of our blessed Saviour (57), or of any Saints and Martyrs are in the judgment of our Church to be tolerated in our temples, or any place of God's public worship. This, says he, I conceive,

(52) Ex. xxxiv. 30, 35. In the Vulgate it is, Facies Mosis erat cornuta; whereas the most learned Translators among the Roman Catholicks, Arias Montanus and Pagninus are ashamed of it; and agreeably to our English Version, render it, Resplendebat aut promicabat Facies Mosis.

(53) Pag. 12, 13.

(54) Pag. 18, 19.

(55) See the 3d part of the Homily against the peril of Idolatry in the second book of Homilies, pag. 40.

(56) Deut. iv. 12, 15, 16, 23. Isa. xl. 18. Rom. i. 23, 25.

(57) See the last named Homily, as the most

The ſame year alſo he wrote the caſe of pardoning Murther [O]; and a Letter for the putting in execution the Laws againſt Diſſenters, written in concurrence to that, which was drawn up by the Juſtices of the Peace of the County of Bedford, dated the 14th of January 1684 [P]. Dr. Edmund Calamy in his Memoirs of the Life of Mr. John Howe (n) ſtyles this a warm and angry Letter, and tells us that Mr. Howe ſent his Lordſhip by the poſt a free letter in anſwer to it, a copy of which has been preſerved and printed in thoſe Memoirs. He was a zealous Calviniſt, and profoundly learned both in Divinity and the Civil and Canon Law. Arthur Earl of Angleſey in his Memoirs (o) gives him the following character. "I never think of this Biſhop and of his incomparable knowledge both in Theology and Church Hiſtory, and in the Eccleſiaſtical Law, without applying to him in my thoughts the character, that Cicero gives Craſſus; Non unus è multis, ſed unus inter omnes propè ſingularis." We ſhall mention the reſt of his Works in the note [Q]. He died at Bugden in Huntingdonſhire in the 85th year of his age, October the 8th 1691, and (n) Pag. 104. edit. London 1724, in 8vo.

(o) Pag. 20. edit. London 1693, in 8vo.

is the approved and received doctrine of the Church of England. And he concludes with remarking (58); that they, who maintain and encourage this doctrine of ſetting up images in our churches, if they perſiſt in it, are by our known laws now in force, to be excommunicated ipſo facto, and if they be benificed Clergymen, to be deprived.

(58) Pag. 24.

[O] He wrote the Caſe of pardoning murder.] It is upon this query, Whether it be lawful for his ſacred Majeſty to reprieve or pardon a perſon convict and legally condemned for murder; and dated from Bugden, January 20th, 1684. It is publiſh'd among his Miſcellaneous and weighty Caſes of Conſcience; in the Preface to which we are informed, that it was written upon occaſion of Mr. St. John's (now Lord Batterſea) being convicted for the unhappy death of Sir William Eaſtcourt Bart. He premiſes firſt ſome conſiderations to ſhew that the power of our Kings is monarchical, ſupreme, and abſolute, and then endeavours to demonſtrate that there is no divine law, which prohibits, and ſo makes it unlawful for ſupreme Princes to reprieve or pardon a perſon legally condemned for murder. We have likewiſe another little piece of his upon the ſame ſubject (59) intitled, The Caſe of Murder, in anſwer to an objection made from Geneſ. ix. 6. that Kings have not power to pardon murder.

(59) See Several miſcellaneous and weighty Caſes of Conſcience, &c. and Genuine Remains, pag. 374, &c. ſeq.

[P] A Letter for the putting in execution the laws againſt Diſſenters, &c.] We have the ſubſtance of this Letter publiſhed in his Genuine Remains (60); and Sir Peter Pett obſerves, that all the compliance our moderate-ſpirited Prelate could be brought to in reference to that ſharp order of the Juſtices, was only in this Letter to repreſent to his Clergy, that it is an evident truth, that all ſubjects both by the indiſpenſable Law of Nature and Scripture are obliged to obey the Power eſtabliſhed over them by God, and that moſt particularly in things more immediately relating to the great and important concerns of God's Glory and the Salvation of their own Souls. That the Liturgy had been for many years received by our Church with little or no oppoſition, and had been approv'd and commended by the moſt learned and pious Divines in foreign Proteſtant Churches, and ſo highly eſteemed by the renowned Proteſtant Martyrs in Queen Mary's reign, that one of their greateſt complaints was that they were deprived of the benefit of it. That the rejecting of it therefore, and the diſobeying the Laws, which enjoin it, makes our Diſſenters evidently ſchiſmatical, and renders it neceſſary that our good Laws ſhould be executed both for the preſervation of the public peace and unity, and the benefit even of the Diſſenters themſelves, ſince afflictio dat intellectum, and it was probable their ſufferings by the execution of our juſt Laws and the bleſſing of God upon them, might bring them to a ſenſe of their duty, and a deſire to perform it. For the attaining therefore of theſe good ends he requires all his Clergy within that County to publiſh the abovementioned Order the next Sunday after it ſhould be tendered to them, and diligently to advance the deſign of it, according to the ſeveral particular directions preſcribed in the Order; and both by preaching and catechiſing to inſtruct their people in their duty to God and their King.

(60) Pag. 641.

[Q] We ſhall mention the reſt of his works in the note.] I. Pietas in Patrem; or a few Tears upon the lamentable death of his moſt dear and loving father Richard Barlow late of Langhill in Weſtmorland; who died Dec. 29, 1636. Oxon. 1637. in two ſheets and an half in 4to. In this little piece are copies of verſes upon the ſame occaſion written by Matthew Wilkinſon, Tho. Tully, Lancelot Davies, and Tho. Smith, nephew to the deceaſed, and afterwards Biſhop of Carliſle. All theſe Gentlemen were then Members of Queen's College (61). II. A Letter to Mr. John Tombes in defence of Anabaptiſm; which Mr. Wood tells us (62) is inſerted in one of Mr. Tombe's books; but that he had not ſeen it, only quoted in a Treatiſe of Baptiſm, printed at London 1674 in 8vo, 2d edit. c. 7. p. 63. written by Henry Danvers. III. A Treatiſe to prove that true Grace doth not lie ſo much in the degree as in the nature of it. This is the ſixteenth and laſt chapter of a book intitled, Sincerity and Hypocriſy, &c. Oxford 1658 in 8vo, written by William Sheppard Eſq; Mr. Wood tells us (63), that this chapter is the beſt part of the whole book, having very good quotations in it, whereas the other chapters have few or none; and that it was anſwered by Mr. Richard Baxter in a book intitled, Of Saving Faith; that it is not only gradually, but ſpecifically diſtinct from all common faith The Agreement of Richard Baxter with that very learned conſenting adverſary (Thomas Barlow), that hath maintained my aſſertion by a pretended confutation in the end of Serjeant Sheppard's Book of Sincerity and Hypocriſy. London 1658 in 4to, and publiſh'd in the beginning of April that year. IV. The Rights of the Biſhops to judge in capital caſes in Parliament cleared &c. London 1680 in 8vo. This book, which ſhews the author to have had an extenſive knowledge of the common Law, was an anſwer to two books juſt then publiſhed; the firſt of which was intitled, A Letter from a Gentleman to his Friend, ſhewing that the Biſhops are not to be Judges in Parliament in caſes capital; printed in 8vo 1679, and written by Denzill Lord Holles; and the other intitled, A Diſcourſe of the Peerage and Juriſdiction of the Lords ſpiritual in Parliament, &c. There is no name prefixed to The Rights of the Biſhops &c. but it was generally aſcribed to Biſhop Barlow, tho' ſome were of opinion, that it was written by Mr. Tho. Turner of Grey's-Inn (64). V. A few plain reaſons why a Proteſtant of the Church of England ſhould not turn Roman Catholic. London 1688 in ſix ſheets and an half in 4to. Dr. John Battely the Licenſer would not ſuffer ſeveral ſheets to paſs, and therefore they were omitted (65). VI. Several miſcellaneous and weighty Caſes of Conſcience, learnedly and judiciouſly reſolved by the Right Reverend Father in God, Dr. Thomas Barlow, late Lord Biſhop of Lincoln; viz. 1. Of Toleration of Proteſtant Diſſenters. 2. The King's Power to pardon murder. 3. Objections from Gen. ix. 6. anſwered. 4. Mr. Cottington's Caſe of Divorce; with the judgments of Dr. Alleſtry, Dr. Hall, Sir Richard Lloyd, Sir Richard Raines, Dr. Oldys, and the Doctors of Sorbonne, upon the ſame. 5. For Toleration of the Jews. 6. About ſetting up Images in Churches. 7. An Dominium fundatur in Gratiâ? With two pages omitted in the Engliſh Machiavel, and his Lordſhip's Cenſure thereupon. London 1692 in 8vo. Mr. Wood tells us (66), that this book was publiſh'd by Sir Peter Pett without the knowledge of the Biſhop's domeſtic Chaplains, Mr. Will. Offley and Mr. Henry Brougham, who had all his original manuſcripts. But we are informed in the Bookſeller's Preface to the Reader, that all theſe Tracts were printed from MSS. written with the Biſhop's own hand, and that "tho' he gave them to his friends, "when firſt written, with his leave to print them, yet "they, fearing ſome of them might prejudice his further

(61) Wood, col. 877.

(62) Col. 879.

(63) Ibid.

(64) Wood, col. 878.

(65) Ibid.

(66) Ibid.

and was buried on the eleventh of the ſame month in the Chancel of the Church there, near the body of Dr. Sanderſon, formerly Biſhop of Lincoln, and according to his own deſire in the grave of Dr. William Barlow, who had likewiſe been Biſhop of that See; to whoſe memory as well as his own is erected a Monument with an Inſcription [R], which he wrote himſelf a few days before his death. He gave all ſuch books in his own Collection to the Bodleian Library, as were not there at the time of his death; and the remainder he beſtowed upon Queen's College, where the Society erected at a great expence a noble building to receive them in 1694. He left the Manuſcripts of his own compoſition to his two domeſtic Chaplains, Mr. William Offley, and Mr. Henry Brougham, Prebendaries of Lincoln, with a particular deſire, that they would not publiſh any of his Writings after his deceaſe (p).

(p) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 879.

"further promotion in the Church in thoſe days, "forbore the publication of them. Tho' we muſt do "his Lordſhip this right to own, that he had no re- "gard to that; ſo careleſs was he of the event of "any action he thought himſelf obliged to do Religio- "nis cauſa, that he has been often heard to ſay oc- "caſionally, as a kind of principle, viz. He, who "thinks to ſave any thing by his Religion but his ſoul, "will be a loſer in the end." We may obſerve, that the Caſe of the Lawfulneſs of Toleration of the Jews was written at the requeſt of a Perſon of Quality, when the Jews made application to Cromwell for their re-admiſſion into England. He obſerves (67), that from what he had advanced, he believes it may appear in part, that the Toleration of the Jews in this or any Chriſtian Common-weal is not in itſelf unlawful either in ratione inhoneſti incommodi or ſcandali; but that as de facto they have been ever tolerated in Chriſtian States, ſo de jure they may ſtill. But he remarks (68), that with regard to the conditions of their admiſſion, and the reſtrictions and limitations to be put upon them, a great deal of caution and Chriſtian prudence is to be uſed, leſt while we prevent their good, we do miſchief to our ſelves. For as to deny them all liberty and commerce with us may be an act of unchriſtian and indeed inhumane cruelty; ſo to give them too much, is an act of imprudence and folly. His Letter upon Machiavel is dated from Oxford May 11th 1676, wherein he obſerves, that at the end of the Engliſh Tranſlation of Machiavel's Works, publiſh'd in 1675, there is a Letter of that author in Vindication of his Writings; in which Letter he endeavours, 1. To magnify Democracy as the beſt form of government, and to decry Monarchy: 2. To reflect upon the Clergy in general, and not thoſe of Rome only, as a ſort of people, ſo far from holy, that they have nothing left of integrity or humanity. "He tells us, continues the "Biſhop, of an execrable ill quality inſeparable from "prieſt-craft, and the conjuration or ſpell of their new "invented ordination; and would have them rooted "out ſo, as not one Sibra were left, &c. When it "was printed (by whoſe authority or advice I know "not) a conſiderable piece (one whole leaf in folio) "was left out, which I have in manuſcript, and do "here enclоſed ſend you a copy of it. The buſineſs "of that piece, which is left out, is to tell us, what "is not rebellion (ſo he pretends;) and if his princi- "ples be true, we have had no rebellion in England "theſe forty years." VII. The genuine Remains of that learned Prelate Dr. Tho. Barlow late Biſhop of Lincoln, containing divers Diſcourſes theological, philoſophical, hiſtorical, &c. in Letters to ſeveral Perſons of Honour and Quality. To which is added the Reſolution of many abſtruſe points. As alſo Directions to a young Divine of his ſtudy for Divinity, and Choice of Books, &c. With great variety of other ſubjects. Publiſh'd from his Lordſhip's original papers. London 1693 in 8vo. This book was publiſh'd by Sir Peter Pett; to which he has prefixed an Epiſtle to the Reader, wherein he gives an account of the Directions to a young Divine &c. and tells us, that with regard to the following works of the Biſhop in that volume, which are written by way of letter to ſeveral perſons, he had ſeen them written under his own hand, and that many of them were written to himſelf; which containing, ſays he, various matters relating to Eccleſiaſtical Law and Hiſtory, and points of Divinity ſo inſtructful both to Divines, Lawyers, and Hiſtorians, (and wherein he had ſhown ſuch a compleat maſtery of all that know- ledge in himſelf, that he had recommended the purſuit of to young Divines,) I thought the publication thereof could not be omitted without injury to the world, and bereaving the memory of ſo learned a Prelate of ſuch laſting monuments of praiſe, as theſe his works have erected for it. But the publication of this Collection was very ſeverely reflected upon by Mr. William Offley, M. A. one of the Biſhop's domeſtic Chaplains, who publiſh'd at Oxford 1699 in 4to that Prelate's Αυτοσχεδιασματα, De Studio Theologiæ, or Directions for the choice in the ſtudy of Divinity; in the Dedication of which to James Lord Biſhop of Lincoln the editor obſerves, that Biſhop Barlow's memory had "ſuffered extremely from "thoſe two (a) relick-mongers, who printed a (b) ſpu- "rious book under his Lordſhip's commanding name "and character. And whereas neither religion or "gratitude were of any force to reſtrain their endea- "vours from blaſting their great benefactor's reputa- "tion after his death by publiſhing of many ſmall "Tracts, it was thought neceſſary for Biſhop Barlow's "Legatees (to whoſe care his Lordſhip had commit- "ted all his own original Manuſcripts) to undeceive "the world, and put a ſtop to mercenary proceed- "ings by expoſing the defect of thoſe papers, which "were ſurreptitiouſly printed. And, I hope, thoſe "Reflections, which were drawn up and publiſh'd in "the year 1694 by my brother Chaplain (the late in- "genious Mr. Henry Brougham) and myſelf, have "been ſo far ſerviceable, as to do juſtice to our pious "Patron's memory, and to vindicate ourſelves from "all ſuſpicion of being any way concerned in ſo baſe "an action, as that of ſelling to be printed many pri- "vate papers with the ſpecious title of the Genuine "Remains of that learned Prelate Dr. Thomas Barlow." Mr. Offley likewiſe in his Preface tells us, that if the method for the ſtudy of Divinity had not been firſt print- ed, and prefix'd to many other papers, which ſwelled the book to ſuch a * price, that few cared to buy, it might the ſooner have paſſed without cenſure, conſidering the uſefulneſs of ſuch a Treatiſe, whereſoever it ſhould be kindly received. But being ſenſible withal that ſeveral copies of this method were diſperſed abroad, and that many things already falſly printed did prejudice the Church of England, and leſſen the great Author's reputation; I thought it my duty to publiſh theſe Directions from the original manuſcript, (which the late mercenary Editors never ſaw,) without the long train of letters, which are of no uſe, but to expoſe the ſecrets of a private and haſty correſpondence.

(a) Sir P. P. S. W.

(b) Genuine Remains, &c.

* Six ſhillings and ſix pence.

[R] With an inſcription.] It is as follows: Exuviæ Thomæ Barlow S. T. P. Collegii Reginenſis Oxon. Præpoſiti, Protobibliothecarii Bodleiani, Archidiaconi Oxonienſis, pro Dom. Margaretâ Comitiſſâ Richmondiæ S. Theol. Profeſſoris, Epiſcopi (licet indigni) Lincolnienſis, in ſpem lætæ Reſurrectionis. Epitaphium hoc moriens compoſuit, tumulum rev. Prædeceſſoris Gulielmi Barlow rabie fanaticâ ruiturum ſumptibus propriis extruxit. Obiit 8 die Octob. 1691 an. ætatis ſuæ 85. i. e. "Here lie "the Remains of THOMAS BARLOW, Doctor of Di- "vinity, Provoſt of Queen's College Oxon, Chief- "Keeper of the Bodleian Library, Archdeacon of "Oxford, Lady Margaret's Profeſſor of Divinity, "and (tho' unworthy) Biſhop of Lincoln, in hope of "a joyful Reſurrection. He wrote this Epitaph as "he was dying, and at his own charge rebuilt the "monument of his right reverend Predeceſſor WIL- "LIAM BARLOW, which was almoſt demoliſhed by "fanatical rage. He died the 8th of October 1691, "in the 85th year of his age." T.

☞ BARNARD or BERNARD (JOHN) the ſon of a Gentleman of both the ſame names, was born at Caſtor in Lincolnſhire, and educated in the Grammar School there; from from whence he was removed to Queen's College at Cambridge. He went from thence to Oxford in order to obtain preferment from the Visitors there, who were appointed by the Parliament, at the latter end of the year 1647 (a). He was created Bachelor of Arts April the 15th 1648 (b); and on the 29th of September following he was by the order of the Visitors made Fellow of Lincoln College (c). February the 20th 1650 he took his Degree of Master of Arts, and about that time became a Preacher in and near Oxford. He afterwards married the daughter of Dr. Peter Heylin, who then lived at Abingdon, and became Rector of Waddington near Lincoln, the perpetual Advowson of which he purchased, and held for some time, with the Sine Cure of Gedney in the same County. After the Restoration he conformed to the Church of England, and not only kept his Rectory, but was likewise made Prebendary of Asgarby in the Church of Lincoln (d). July the fifth 1669 he took the Degree of Bachelor and Dr. of Divinity (e). He wrote several books [A]. He died at Newark in his journey to the Spa on the 17th of August 1683, and was buried in the Chancel of his Church of Waddington (f).

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 736, 737. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Idem, ibid. and Fasti Oxon. col. 63.

(c) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi supra.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Idem; Fasti Oxon. col. 175, 176.

(f) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi supra.

[A] He wrote several books.] I. Censura Cleri, or against scandalous Ministers, not fit to be restored to the Churches livings, in point of prudence, piety, and fame. London 1660, in three sheets in 4to. This was published in the latter end of the year 1659, or beginning of 1660, to prevent those persons from being restored to their Livings, who had been ejected by the opposite party in 1654, 1655, &c. His name is not prefixed to this pamphlet; and he did not care afterwards, when he saw the event of affairs, to be known to be the Author of it. II. Theologo-Historicus; or the true Life of the most reverend Divine and excellent Historian Peter Heylin, D. D. Sub-Dean of Westminster. London 1683 in 8vo. He published this, as he tells us, to correct the errors, supply the defects, and confute the calumnies of George Vernon M. A. Rector of Bourton on the Water in Glocestershire, who had before published a Life of the Doctor. III. Answer to Mr. Baxter's false accusations of Dr. Heylin. Printed with the Theologo-Historicus, &c. IV. Catechism for the use of his Parish. Mr. Wood tells us (1), that he was informed by his son, Mr. John Barnard, who was Fellow of Brazen-Nose College in Oxford, that our Author left a manuscript chiefly against Socinianism. T.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 737.

BARNES (ROBERT (a) Professor of Divinity, and Chaplain to Henry VIII [A], King of England, was sent to Germany by his Master in the year 1535 [B]. He had a conference immediately with the Protestant Divines upon the affair of the Divorce; after that he had several audiences of the Elector of Saxony, and joined with the English Embassadors, who proposed to this Elector an alliance against the Pope, and desired that Henry VIII might be associated in the League of Smalcalde. He gave them hopes of a Reformation in England; but at the bottom, they had no other design than to obtain their Doctors approbation of the Divorce of their Master, and a political Alliance, in order to find the Emperor more employment, who threatned to revenge the injury upon King Henry for divorcing his aunt. They carried away with them the opinion of the Divines of Wittemberg; which was not entirely favourable to them [C]; but they suppressed

(a) See the remark [A].

[A] He was Professor of Divinity and Chaplain to Henry VIII.] He has these titles in the credential letters, which the King his master gave him to negotiate in Saxony; and these letters are dated from Windsor the 8th of July 1535 (1). His Christian name does not appear in those letters before that of Barnes. He gave himself in Germany the name of Anthony Amarius, though his true name was Robert Barnes. In the Dedication of his Lives of the Popes to the King of England in 1535, he signed Robert Barnes, Doctor (2). We find in a Preface of Luther's (3), that Barnes concealed his name and quality of Doctor at Wittemberg on account of the persecutors. Melancthon calls him D. Antonius Doctor, or D. Antonius, in a letter which he wrote to the King of England the 13th of March 1535 (4).

(1) See Seckendorf, Hist. Lutheran. lib. 3. p. 110. in the Addition.

(2) Idem, in Supplementis ad Indicem 1. num. 10.

(3) In that which he prefixed to the Relation of the martyrdom of Barnes, inserted in the 7th volume of his Works. See Seckendorf, lib. 3. p. 262.

(4) It is 26th of the 1st book.

[B] He was sent into Germany by his master in the year 1533.] The Preface, which I have quoted, informs me that Barnes lived at Wittemberg about the year 1530, and that he lodged likewise at Luther's house. Quis ante annos hoc decus in Barnesio quæsivisset? & quod Christus ipse in eo nobiscum versatus esset? domesticum enim & commensalem habuimus (5). Barnes might have lived in Germany till the year 1535, and there received credential Letters from Henry VIII to negotiate with the Elector of Saxony. According to that account it might justly be said in the History of the Reformation of England, that Fox Bishop of Hereford being at Smalcalde (in the year 1536) sent him over to England, where he was received and kindly entertained by Cromwel, and well used by the King (6). According to that account, I say, this representation would be exact; for all the reason that Mr. Seckendorf alledges to criticize upon it, is that Barnes came from England into Germany in the year 1535 with a commission from Henry VIII (7). So that he was returned to England before the Bishop of Hereford sent him thither: and consequently we must not consider the message which that Bishop charged him with, at his return to his own country. But can it be proved, that the credential Letters were not sent to Barnes into Germany, and that he was sent himself into that country? It is certain it can be proved; Seckendorf has proved it from the Records, which have furnished him with a prodigious number of good pieces. Venerat Wittenbergam (Reg. X. fol. 99. n. 42.) verno hujus anni 1535 tempore, Doctor EX BRITANNIA ab Henrico Rege MISSUS (8). Melancthon confirms the same thing in Greek; for he makes use of that Language to acquaint his good friend Camerarius, that there was an Envoy from England there, who spoke of nothing but the King's second marriage, and said that Henry VIII concerned himself but very little about the affairs of Religion. Ἦλθε δὲ πρὸς ἡμᾶς ξένος τις πρεσβεὺς ἐκ τῆς Βρεττανίας, μόνον διαλεγόμενος περὶ τοῦ δυτέρου γάμου τοῦ Βασιλέως, τῶν δὲ τῆς ἐκκλησίας πραγμάτων ἐ μέλει, ὡς φησι, τῷ Βασιλεῖ (9). But though I cannot place this upon the same foot that I have mentioned, yet it may be said that the relation in question is not faulty. The History says only, that the Bishop of Hereford sent Barnes to England; he does not deny that Barnes was returned thither before.

(5) Luther. apud Seckendorf, lib. 3. pag. 262.

(6) Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, lib. 3. p. 295. edit. London 1679.

(7) Seckendorf, lib. 3. p. 262.

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Melancthon, Lett. 170. lib. 4. dated the 11th of March 1535.

[C] He and his Collegues . . . . carried away with them the opinion of the Divines of Wittemberg, which was not favourable to them.] Dr. Burnet has given an exact account of the particulars of it. They also thought, says he, the Laws in Leviticus were not moral . . . . yet after much disputing they were induced to change their minds, but could not be brought to think that a marriage once made might be annulled, and therefore demurred upon that (10). He relates this under the year 1530. He does not do that, because he was ignorant that this opinion was given in the year 1536; but only without doubt in order to shew his readers all at once the different sentiments of the Divines upon preſſed the concluſion, when they ſhewed it to the King. It was in this concluſion that there was ſomething, which could not but diſpleaſe that Prince (b). Barnes's conduct pleaſed the King extremely; which induced him to employ him in carrying on a correſpondence with the Princes of Germany. He was ſent ſeveral times to thoſe Courts; and among other Negotiations, he was the firſt, who was employed in the project of the Marriage with Anne of Cleves [D]. He was an hearty Lutheran, which de did not conceal in his Sermons; for in Lent in the year 1540 he confuted the Sermon, which Biſhop Gardiner had preached againſt Luther's doctrine. He took the ſame text as Gardiner had done, and taught a doctrine abſolutely contrary to that, which this Prelate had laid down concerning Juſtification; nay he even attacked the Biſhop perſonally in an indecent manner, and jeſted upon the name of Gardiner. Gardiner's friends complained to the King of this, who ordered Barnes to give him ſatisfaction, to ſign certain articles, and to make a formal recantation in the pulpit. All this was done, but in ſuch a manner, that there was a complaint, that in one part of his Sermon he very ſubtilly maintained what he had retracted in the other. Upon theſe complaints he was ſent to the Tower by the King's command, which he never came out of but to ſuffer death in the midſt of the flames [E]; for he was condemned as an Heretic by the Parliament, without being permitted to make his defence. He declared his belief a little before his death, he rejected Juſtification by Works, Invocation of Saints, &c. and deſired that the King would undertake a thorough Reformation (d). His freedom of ſpeech had for a long time before expoſed him to trouble.

(10) Burnet, Hist. of the Reformation, book 2. pag. 94. ad ann. 1530.

(b) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. 3. pag. 110, & ſeq.

(d) Taken from the Hiſtory of the Reformation of England, written by Dr. Burnet (now Biſhop of Salisbury) B. 3.

While Henry VIII's divorce. Mr. Seckendorf believed ſo; for when he has remarked that the opinion of the Divines of Wittemberg is to be found in the Hiſtory of the Reformation of England in the volumes of records and original pieces, amongſt thoſe, which relate to the year 1530, he adds this parentheſis (forte per occaſionem); that is, perhaps occaſionally. Annus & Dies reſponſo hinc non eſt aſcriptus, & Burnetus illud inter Acta anni 1530 (forte per occaſionem) retulit (11) lib. 2. fol. 94. i. e. "The date of the day and "year is not fixed to this anſwer; and Burnet, B. 2. "fol. 94. places it (perhaps occaſionally) among the "Tranſactions of the year 1530." The Biſhop of Meaux did not know that the decree of Wittemberg is of the year 1536. He mentions only with regard to that year the opinion of Melancthon, and does not criticize upon Dr. Burnet for placing the anſwer of the Divines of Wittemberg under the year 1530 (12). Mr. Seckendorf obſerves that the copy of this anſwer, which he had read among the Records of Weimar, is longer than that which is inſerted among Dr. Burnet's original pieces. Here is what Henry VIII's Embaſſadors retrench'd in it: Etſi conſentiamus cum Dominis Legatis ſervandam eſſe legem de uxore fratris non ducendâ, manſit tamen inter nos controverſum, quod legati ſtatuunt diſpenſationi locum non eſſe, nos verò putamus eſſe illi locum. Neque enim ſtrictius obligare nos lex poteſt quam Judæos: ſi autem lex diſpenſationem admiſit, vinculum matrimonii utique fortius eſt quam lex illa altera de uxore fratris. That is, "Though we agree "with the Embaſſadors that the Law of not marrying a brother's wife is to be obſerved; yet ſtill it "continued diſputed among us, becauſe the Embaſſadors "are of opinion that there is no room for a diſpenſation; but we think there is. For the Law cannot "bind us more ſtrictly than the Jews; but if the "Law admitted a diſpenſation, the bond of marriage "is much ſtronger than the other Law of not marrying a brother's wife." Mr. Seckendorf conjectures that the Embaſſadors ſuppreſſed this paſſage, that they might deprive their maſter of all hopes, that the Divines of Wittemberg would at laſt approve his ſecond marriage.

(11) Seckendorf, lib. 3. pag. 112.

(12) See his Hiſtoire des Variations, lib. 7. num. 58.

This thought is very reaſonable; and in general theſe Doctors might ſuppoſe very juſtly that there are ſome things which ought not to be done, and yet ought to be maintained when once they are done; but I own I cannot well comprehend how the beginning and end of their opinion can be reconciled together. They acknowledge on one hand, that the ordinances of the Levitical Law are divine, natural, and moral; that no Law can be eſtabliſhed contrary to theſe; and that the whole Church has always determined that a marriage with a brother's widow is inceſtuous. Hoc manifeſtum eſt, & negare nemo poteſt, quod lex tradita Levit. xviii. 20. prohibet ducere fratris uxorem, &c. ſed divina, naturalis, & moralis lex eſt intelligenda tam de vivi quam de mortui fratris uxore, & quod contra hanc legem nulla contraria lex fieri aut conſtitui poſſit (13); and they maintain on the other hand, that this Levitical Law is capable of a diſpenſation. Legati ſtatuunt diſpenſationi locum non eſſe, nos verò putamus eſſe illi locum. If it may admit of a diſpenſation, Henry VIII ought to have conſidered himſelf as lawfully married to Catherine of Arragon. If it may not admit of one, if it be a divine, natural, and moral Law, and ſuch in ſhort as cannot allow of any contrary conſtitution, and laſtly, if the Church has always determined that a marriage not conformable to this Law is inceſtuous, Henry VIII ought not to have conſidered his commerce with Catherine of Arragon any otherwiſe than as inceſtuous, and therefore he ought to have renounced it immediately; the Divines of Wittemberg ſhould not have heſitated the leaſt, whether they ſhould approve or diſapprove of his divorce. The maxim, that there are things, which ought not to be done; but yet when they are once done, ought not to be undone, could not poſſibly be admitted here, ſince the debate was concerning the continuation of an inceſtuous commerce. Perſons, who are fond of ſlander, and engage in recrimination, will not readily acquieſce in what Dr. Burnet obſerves, that if in the conduct of the Saxon Divines there does not appear the cunning, the policy, and the diſſimulation of the Court of Rome, yet there appears in it at leaſt the candour, the ſincerity, and good conſcience of the Apoſtolic times (14). For my own part, I ſhould chooſe rather to ſay, that they did not argue conſequentially, than pretend that they would have the pleaſure of reflecting upon the Pope's diſpenſation, and at the ſame time were prudent enough to have a regard for Charles V, and the intereſts of the Princeſs Mary his couſin; but enemies, who love to give a bad turn to every thing, might eaſily, by way of repriſal, paſs ſuch a malicious judgment upon their conduct (15).

(14) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, lib. 2.

(15) See Monſ. de Meaux, Hiſt. des Variat. lib. 7. num. 57.

WHETHER the Divines of Wittemberg have reaſoned conſequentially.

(13) Apud Seckendorf, p. 112. and Burnet in Documentis, Part 1 lib 2. num. 35.

[D] He was employed in the project of the marriage with Anne of Cleves.] This was a misfortune to Barnes; for the King's marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleves giving him ſo little ſatisfaction, all who were the main promoters of it fell in diſgrace upon it. The Biſhop of Saliſbury aſſures us of this (16). Luther has touched upon another circumſtance; he ſays that the true cauſe of Henry VIII's hatred to Robert Barnes was the freedom with which that Doctor adviſed him againſt repudiating Anne of Cleves (17). Mr. Seckendorf pretends that Dr. Burnet obſerves the ſame thing (18); I doubt that very much; for I cannot meet with that fact in his Hiſtory of the Reformation of England.

(16) Hiſt. of the Reformat. B. 3. pag. 295. ad ann. 1540.

(17) In præfat. Relation. Martyrii Barneſii, apud Seckendorf, lib. 3. p. 262. num. 25.

(18) Seckendorf, ibid.

[E] He was ſent to the Tower . . . . which he never came out of but to ſuffer death in the midſt of the flames.] The relation of his martyrdom was ſent from England into Germany: Mr. Seckendorf found it in the Archives of Weimar, tranſlated into High-Dutch (19). Luther publiſhed it (20), and added a preface to it, in which he commends among other things the modeſty of Barnes. He was not ignorant, ſays he, of the defects of Henry VIII, and he did not diſſemble them, when he was with his friends; but upon all other occaſions he never ſpoke of that Prince but in terms of reſpect and honour (21).

(19) Idem, ibid.

(20) It is inſerted in the 3d tome of his Works, edit. of Altorf. fol. 422. Seckendorf lib. 3. p. 262. num. 25.

(21) Ibid. num. 25.

While Wolſey was in favour, he preached ſo vehemently at Cambridge againſt the luxury of Prelates, that every body ſaw immediately, that he deſigned it againſt the Cardinal. Upon that account he was carried to London, where by the ſollicitations of Gardiner and Fox . . . . he was reſcued from that proſecution, having agreed to abjure ſome Articles which were propoſed to him. " Afterwards he was again committed to priſon upon ſome new " accuſations; and then it was generally believed that he would be burnt, but he eſcaped, " and went over into Germany, where he applied himſelf entirely" to the ſtudy of the Bible and Divinity: in which he made ſo great a progreſs, that he was very much eſteemed by the Doctors and Princes. When the King of Denmark ſent Embaſſadors to England, he deſired Barnes to accompany them (e), or even to be one of them (f). The Biſhop of Saliſbury, whom I quote in the margin, may be eaſily vindicated in a point, which has been criticiſed upon in him (g). We have at leaſt two books written by Barnes [F].

(e) Ibid.
(f) Fox relates this laſt opinion, which ſeems doubtful to Dr. Burnet, ibid.
(g) See the remark [B].

[F] We have at leaſt two books written by Barnes.] One contains the Articles of his Faith, the other is the Hiſtory of the Popes. The former was printed in Latin with a Preface by Pomeranus, at whoſe houſe Barnes lodged at that time. It was printed in High-Dutch at Nuremberg in the year 1531. It contains nineteen Theſes according to Luther's principles, and ſeveral proofs from Scripture and the Fathers. The other book was printed at Wittemberg in the year 1536 with a Preface by Luther: it contains the Lives of the Popes, from St. Peter to Alexander III. It is dedicated to the King of England: the author wrote the Epiſtle Dedicatory the 10th of September 1535. He treats the Popes with great ſeverity; he promiſed to continue the Hiſtory of them down to his own time (22). Mr. Seckendorf thinks this book would deſerve a ſecond edition (23), and he has inſerted the Preface in his Indexes, becauſe he ſays it is very difficult to be found, and may be conſidered as a loſt piece. Quia liber ipſe rariſſimè invenitur, & pro deperdito haberi poteſt (24). But it is very certain that there was a new edition of it publiſh'd at Leyden in the year 1615, which contains likewiſe the Lives of the Popes by John Bale, and which is not yet very ſcarce.

(22) Ex Scholiis ſive Supplementis Seckendorfii ad Indicem 1.
(23) Recudi meretur. ibid.
(24) Idem in Indice 3. ad ann. 1536.

BARNES (JOHN) in Latin Barneſius, an Engliſh Benedictin Monk, was one of thoſe Roman Catholics, who, after the example of Eraſmus, Caſſander, Wicelius, Modrevius, Father Paul, and a great many others, have made a profeſſion all their life of the Catholic Religion, though they obſerved in it an infinite number of abuſes, which they paſſionately wiſhed might be reformed. He wrote a book againſt Mental Reſervations, which did not at all pleaſe the Jeſuits [A], though he dedicated it to Pope Urban VIII. His Catholico-Romanus pacificus is full of ſuch things, as cannot but be diſreliſhed by thoſe, who are called good Papiſts [B]. He was deſirous without doubt to bring the two Communions as near each other as poſſibly he could. The Court of Rome was extremely diſpleaſed with him upon that account. This unhappy man, whoſe morals were unexceptionable (a), was at Paris, when he was ſeized [C], and ſtript of the Habit of his Order, and carried away into Flanders bound on horſeback. After this he was ſent to Rome, where he continued in the priſon of the Inquiſition till he was removed into that of the Lunatics.

(a) See the remark [B].

[A] He wrote a book againſt Mental Reſervations, which did not at all pleaſe the Jeſuits.] It was printed at Paris in the year 1625 under the title of Diſſertatio contra Æquivocationes: it was publiſhed in French the ſame year and at the ſame place under the title of Traité & Diſpute contre les Equivoques. The approbation of the Faculty of Divinity acquaints us, that John Barnes was Doctor of Arts in ſacred Theology, and Profeſſor of the Engliſh Miſſion, and firſt Aſſiſtant for the Congregation of Spain; and it is dated the 13th of July 1624. The author's Dedication is dated from Paris the 13th of January 1625. Father Theophilus Raynaud is therefore miſtaken, when he tells us that Barnes was carried to Rome, and put into priſon under the Pontificate of Paul V. I ſhall quote his own words, becauſe they inform us of ſomething relating to this poor Benedictin. Joannes Barneſius, Jeſuitis admodum infenſus, ob nonnullas ſuſpiciones de compertâ illis vitâ ſuâ, eo loco fuit apud Paulum V, ut eum tanquam novæ fidei fabrum per Albertum Auſtriacum è Galliâ abductum, & è Belgio Romam avectum judicaverit carcere dignum, donec emoto cerebro inter fatuos pone S. Pauli minoris ædem ſacram fatuari deſiit cum aliorum periculo (1). i. e. " John Barnes, a great enemy to " the Jeſuits on account of ſome ſuſpicions, which he " had of their being acquainted with his manner of " life, was conveyed from France into the Low- " Countries by order of Archduke Albert of Auſtria, " as an heretic, and carried thence to Rome, where " he was condemned by Pope Paul V to impriſon- " ment, till having loſt his ſenſes, he was removed to " the hoſpital of Lunatics behind the Church of St. " Paul the Leſs, where he was prevented from doing " any more miſchief in his madneſs." This paſſage has been quoted by Edward Brown in page 826 of his Appendix to the Faſciculus rerum expetendarum, printed at London in 1690. See the following remark. We are informed by the French Mercury (2), that this honeſt Benedictin believed, that the Jeſuits had a mortal hatred towards him after the printing of his book againſt Equivocations, which Dr. Gamaches, (who was eſteemed one of the greateſt Divines of his age,) would not approve, though he was required to do it; and that he wrote this book while he was Confeſſor to the Convent of Chelles (3).

(1) Theophil. Rayn. in Theologiâ antiquâ de veri Martyrii adequatè ſumpti notione. This book was printed at Lyons in 1656 under the name of Leodegarius Quintinus. The paſſage which I quote is in page 174 of his Apopompæus.

(2) Tom. 12. pag. 752.

(3) Mercure François, tom. 12. pag. 751.

[B] His Catholico-Romanus Pacificus is full of ſuch things, as cannot but be diſreliſhed by . . . . good Papiſts.] It was printed at London in 1690, in the Appendix to the Faſciculus rerum expetendarum. The author of the Appendix informs us, that he had three manuſcript copies of this work of Barnes; and he quotes theſe words of John Baſier, Profeſſor of Divinity. Bonus ille Irenæus (4), tametſi vitæ inculpatæ & famæ integræ fuit, mediâ Lutetiâ correptus, ſuo habitu exutus, & quadrupedis inſtar barbarum in modum alligatus ad equum, & ita vehementiſſimè avectus primò in Flandriam, deinde Romam, ibi in Inquiſitionis barathrum, deinde in maniacorum ergaſtulum erat detruſus (5). i. e. " This honeſt Pacificator in Religion, tho' a man of " irreproachable morals, was ſeized in the midſt of " Paris, ſtript of his habit, and bound like a beaſt in " a barbarous manner upon an horſe, and conveyed " in that violent manner firſt into Flanders, and after- " wards to Rome, where he was caſt into the Inquiſiti- " on, and at laſt removed into the Hoſpital of Lunatics."

(4) That is to ſay Barnes the Benedictin.

(5) Brown in Appendic. Faſciculi rerum expetendar. He quotes John Baſier in Diatribâ de antiquæ Eccleſiæ Britannicæ Libertate, printed at Bruges in the year 1656.

[C] He was at Paris when he was ſeized.] He would have been forced away the day he was taken, if the Captain of the Watch had been as impatient as the Father Procurator of the Benedictines at Doway. But this impatience of his was obliged to wait till the next day. Then Father Barnes was carried in a coach to Vilette, where two Benedictines waited to go along with him, and with the Guards, who had orders to convey him to Cambray. He was tied upon the horſe, and delivered to the Governor of Cambray, who had him convey'd to the Caſtle of Waerden (6). Father Theophilus Raynaud was miſtaken in mentioning the orders of Albert of Auſtria; this Arch-Duke was dead long before Barnes was ſeized. I have quoted that Jeſuit's words in the firſt remark.

(6) Mercure François, tom. 12. pag. 753.

Lunatics (b). In this laſt place he ended his days, worthy without doubt of a better fate. He was a profeſſed Monk of the Convent of Benedictins at Doway, and had been Superior of it (c); but not being able to agree with the Monks of his Order, he had retired to France, and did not obey the ſummons of the Benedictins to return to Doway, or to retire into ſome other of their Convents. At Paris he lodged near the College of Navarre, then in the College of Burgundy, and at laſt in the Prince of Portugal's Houſe, where the Captain of the Guard ſeized him the fifth of December 1626. He was writing an Anſwer to a book intitled Apoſtolatus Benedictinorum in Angliâ, in which he would have inſerted his own private ſentiments concerning the diſcipline of the Church (d). Father Theophilus Raynaud, diſguiſed under a fictitious name, wrote againſt his Treatiſe of Equivocations [D].

(b) See the Mercure François, tom. 14. pag. 336.

(c) Ibid. tom. 12. pag. 752.

(d) Ibid.

The reader perhaps will be pleaſed to ſee here the reaſon why Barnes was an enemy to the Jeſuits [E]; I mean the reaſon which they have reported.

[D] Father Theophilus Raynaud, diſguiſed under a fictitious name, wrote againſt his Treatiſe of Equivocation.] I mean a book intitled, Splendor veritatis moralis; ſeu de licito uſu Æquivocationis, pro Leonardo Leſſio, adverſus Joannem Barneſium, Anglum Monachum. It was printed at Lyons in 1627 in 8vo. The author aſſumed the name of Stephanus Emonerius. I have a ſtronger proof of this, than that which Mr. Placcius has formed by joining two paſſages of Father Alegambe (7), in one of which it is ſaid that Theophilus Raynaud wrote ſub nomine alieno the Treatiſe, which I have given the title above (8); and in the other, that he diſguiſed himſelf under the name of S. Emonerius (9). The proof I inſiſt upon is this. Father Abram tells us in his Treatiſe of Lying (10), that Theophilus Raynaud owned for one of his works the book of Emonerius, intitled Splendor Veritatis moralis, and that it was eaſy to diſcover him in that piece. Miror te hunc pro Theophili partu agnoſcere; i. e. "I wonder "you ſhould take this of one of Father Theophilus's "productions:" thus ſpeaks one of Father Abram's Interlocuters: the other replies, Quid ne verò agnoſcam, cum illum in ſuis moralibus ſuum eſſe fateatur (11)? Quem ſi abdicaret, nullo tamen negotio patrem vel ex ipſâ filii facie cæteriſque corporis lineamentis agnoſcere poſſemus,

Sic oculus, ſic ille manus, ſic ora ferebat.

That is,

"Why ſhould I not take it for his performance, ſince "he owns it to be ſo in his Moral Works? And tho' "he had diſowned it, yet we may eaſily diſcover the "true father by the reſemblance, which every part "of it bears to him:

"The eyes, the hands, and ev'ry feature like."

Here is a paſſage of Theophilus Raynaud, which informs us, that he acknowledged for his work the Confutation of Barnes, and that this Benedictin was living in the year 1650. Dixi ego ſanè in præfatione operis de Æquivocatione, adverſus Cæitani germanum, bipedum omnium effrontiſſimum, Joannem Barneſium Anglium, qui vicenario carcere, in quem curante ſummo Pontifice recluſus eſt, necdum deterſit multiplicis adverſus Deum & Religionem Catholicam, ac S. Benedicti familiam malignitatis rubiginem . . . . Societatem Jeſu, &c. (12). i. e. "In the Preface to my book concern- "ing Equivocation, againſt Caetan's true brother, the "moſt impudent of mankind, John Barnes, an En- "gliſhman, who tho' he has been confined twenty "years in priſon, into which he was caſt by the Pope, "has not yet diveſted himſelf of his inveterate ma- "lice againſt God himſelf, the Catholic Religion, "and the Benedictine Order. . . . I have ſaid, that "the Jeſuits, &c."

(7) Placcius de Pſeudon. pag. 189.

(8) Alegambe, Bibliotb. Soc. Jeſu, pag. 432.

(9) Idem, pag. 452.

(10) Printed with his Pharus Veteris Teſtamenti, at Paris, in 1648 in folio.

(11) He owns the ſame thing in his Syntagma de Libris propriis. See the following remark.

(12) Theoph. Raynaud. Hoplotb. Sect. 2. Serm. 2. cap. 12. pag. 256. edit. Lugd. an. 1650.

[E] The reaſon, why he was an enemy to the Jeſuits.] Upon his return from Spain to the Low-Countries, he was preſent at one of their public diſputes, in which the Reſpondent propoſed this quodlibetal Theſis, An Joannes in Hiſpaniâ infamis, poſſit hic in Belgio abſque peccato infamari? i. e. "Whether John, "being infamous in Spain, might be innocently de- "famed in the Netherlands?" Such caſes of conſcience have been examined by Soto, Molina, and ſeveral other writers; but after a general manner, though with the addition of ſeveral circumſtances. But they did not keep to ſuch general terms in the diſpute, at which John Barnes was preſent; for the queſtion was reduced to ſuch preciſe terms, by pointing out in a very particular manner the time and place, that he thought that himſelf was perſonally intended, and he would never be convinced of the contrary, though they proteſted to him in a very humble manner that they had no deſign to point him out. It is Theophilus Raynaud who relates this, when he mentions the Anſwer, which he wrote againſt Barnes's work. Ad ſingularia locorum ac temporum adjuncta, illis in oris perfamiliaria, difficultas reſtricta eſt. . . . . Clara locorum deſignatione petitum ſe ratus Barneſius, bellum indixit inconciliabile Societatis Jeſu Doctoribus; nec ſe ullis unquam vel conteſtationibus, vel mollibus ac propè ſupplicibus verbis flecti paſſus eſt, ut nihil minus quam de eo notando cogitatum eſſe, in eo Theſium programmate ac proloquio perſuaderetur (13). i. e. "The difficulty "was reſtrained to the particular circumſtances of time "and place, which are very common in theſe parts. "..... Barnes thinking himſelf pointed at by this "plain deſignation of the place, proclaimed an irrecon- "cileable hatred againſt the Jeſuit Doctors, and would "never be the leaſt prevailed upon by any aſſurances "given in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms, to believe that "he was not at all intended in that Programma to the "Theſes." He does not forget to mention that Barnes was condemned to perpetual impriſonment; and that having loſt his ſenſes he was removed to the Hoſpital of Lunatics. Barneſium ob periculoſas novitates . . . . . carceri eſſe mancipatum, poſtea autem emotâ mente in fatuorum ergaſtulo Tranſtiberino (vulgo gli Pazzarelli) concluſus eſt; ubi anno 1643 erat ſuperſtes (14). i. e. "Barnes on account of his dangerous "innovations . . . . . was caſt into priſon; and after- "wards falling mad was ſhut up in the Hoſpital of "Lunatics beyond the Tyber (commonly called gli "Pazzarelli), where he was ſtill living in the year "1643."

(13) Theoph. Raynaudus, in Syntagm. de Libris propriis, pag. 22. col. 2. Apopompæi.

(14) Idem, ibid. pag. 23. col. 1.

☞BARNES (JOSHUA) Profeſſor of the Greek Language at Cambridge in the beginning of the eighteenth Century, was born at London January the 10th 1654 of a Tradeſman of that City. He was educated at Chriſt's Hoſpital there, from whence he was ſent to the Univerſity of Cambridge, and admitted a Servitor in Emanuel College Dec. the 11th 1671, and elected a Fellow of that College June the 7th 1678 (a). He was choſen the Queen's Greek Profeſſor in 1695. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf very early by his knowledge of the Greek, which he wrote and ſpoke with the utmoſt facility; and he wrote, even before he went to the Univerſity, ſeveral Poems in Latin and Engliſh [A], which

(a) Regiſter of Emanuel College in Cambridge.

[A] Several Poems in Latin and Engliſh.] We ſhall extract our account of them from the catalogue of his works ſubjoined to the Prolegomena of his edition of Anacreon. I. Sacred Poems in five books, viz. 1. Κοσμοποιία or the Creation of the World. 2. The Fall of Adam and the Redemption by Chriſt. 3. An Hymn to the Holy Trinity, &c. 4. A paſtoral Eclogue upon the Reſtoration of King Charles II. An Eſſay upon the Royal Exchange.

which he mentions in the catalogue of Works, which he had either publiſhed or deſigned to publiſh, ſubjoined to the firſt edition of his Anacreon at Cambridge 1705; which catalogue is omitted in the 2d edition of that Poet printed after his death in 1721, tho' it is mentioned in the Contents of the volume and in the Prolegomena (b). In the year 1675 he publiſhed at London a little piece intitled Gerania, or a new Diſcovery of a little ſort of people called Pygmies; and in 1679 at London in 8vo a poetical paraphraſe in Greek upon the Hiſtory of Eſther [B]. He afterwards applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Engliſh Hiſtory, (b) Pag. 104.

Exchange. 5. Panegyris, or the Muſes, Epigrams, &c. All theſe pieces are in Engliſh, tho' the Dedication is in Latin, Anno 1669. II. The Life of Oliver Cromwell the Tyrant; an Engliſh Poem, 1670. III. Several dramatical pieces, the titles of which are Xerxes, Pythias and Damon, Holofernes, &c. part in Engliſh, and part in Latin, the latter of which he wrote in conjunction with others, and the former by himſelf; beſides ſeveral Tragedies of Seneca tranſlated into Engliſh. IV. Upon the Fire of London and the Plague, a Latin Poem in Heroic Verſe. V. A Latin Elegy upon the Beheading of St. John the Baptiſt.

[B] A poetical Paraphraſe in Greek upon the Hiſtory of Eſther.] It is intitled, Ἀνδρωνίτης, ſeu Eſtheræ Hiſtoria, poeticâ paraphraſi, idque Græco Carmine, cui Verſio Latina opponitur, exornata: una cum Scholiis ſeu Annotationibus Græcis; in quibus (ad ſacri Textus dilucidationem) præter alia non pauca, Gentium Orientalium Antiquitates, Moreſque recondituriores proferuntur. Additur Parodia Homerica de eadem hac Hiſtoria. Acceſſit Index Rerum & Verborum copioſiſſimus, i. e. "A Mirrour for Courtiers, or a poetical Paraphraſe in "Greek upon the Hiſtory of Eſther, with a Latin "Verſion oppoſite to it, and Greek Scholia or An"notations, in which (in order to give light to the "ſacred Text,) beſides a great number of other par"ticulars, the Antiquities and more remote Cuſtoms "of the Eaſtern Nations are explained. To which is "ſubjoined an Homerical Parody upon the ſame Hi"ſtory, with a copious Index of the Things and "Words contained in this volume." It was printed at his own charge, as appears by the title-page; and the Imprimatur is dated July 3d, 1676. The Dedication, which is dated Octob. 20th 1678, is addreſſed to Dr. John Dolben, then Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Dean of Weſtminſter, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, who, as Mr. Barnes obſerves, contributed a conſiderable part of the expence of the edition. Præſertim cum & ipſe partem ſumptûs bene magnam in ejus editionem contuliſti. Our author remarks likewiſe in this Dedication, that his ſubject was new and unattempted before, or at leaſt attempted without any great ſucceſs, and that the ſtyle, if not abſolutely Homeric, yet approached as near the majeſty of that great Poet, as he could poſſibly raiſe it. That the work itſelf was adorned with the embelliſhments of Poetry as far as was conſiſtent with a ſtrict regard to the truth of the Hiſtory; and that to all this he had added that diſtinguiſhing excellence of Callimachus, brevity. Materia eſt prorſus nova, hoc eſt, à nemine hactenus, quod ſciam, aut ſaltem non ſupra æmulationem, libata. Stylus, ſi non omnino Homericus, ut ad Homerici tamen Carminis majeſtatem quam proximè accederet, diligenter curavi. Opus ita poeticis blandimentis refertum, ut divinæ veritati maximum & ſupremum locum relinquat. Quibus & Callimacheiam illam virtutem adjicere audebo, Brevitatem. In his Preface he tells us (1), that he had finiſh'd this book about five years before; but had ſuſpended the publication of it, by the advice of his friends, in order to poliſh it at his leiſure. He obſerves likewiſe, that he had then by him ſix other books in Greek verſe, tho' not all of them in the ſame kind of meaſure; and that four of them were rendered into Latin verſe of the ſame kind. Among other Poems upon ſubjects of leſs importance, tho' moſt of them drawn from ſacred Hiſtory, he had deſigned an heroic Poem in twelve books concerning the Patriarch Joſeph, tho' he had finiſh'd but one of thoſe books; to which he had added by way of ſpecimen an heroic Poem intitled Ἀγλοβιλγομαχία, upon the ſea-fight between the Engliſh and Dutch, in which the Earl of Sandwich was killed; but he had no intentions to reduce that into the form of a complete Poem, but only to try his abilities for ſome work of more importance. He mentions likewiſe, that he deſigned an heroic Poem upon the Hiſtory of England and the Doctrines of the Chriſtian Religion. However he had reſolved abſolutely to ſuppreſs thoſe ſix books; as he had very near done that of Eſther, if it had not been for the dignity of the ſubject. He takes notice of an objection, which might be ſuggeſted againſt him, becauſe he has placed that Hiſtory after the time of Nehemiah, contrary to the opinion of a great many conſiderable writers. This objection he endeavours to anſwer particularly from the authority of Joſephus. He conſiders afterwards, who Ahaſuerus, mentioned in the Hiſtory of Eſther, is; and determines that he was the celebrated Xerxes. He ſhews the moral uſes, that may be made of his Poem; and replies to the objection, that might be urged againſt his conduct in it, for introducing the names of Pagan Deities and profane alluſions into a ſacred ſubject. He obſerves, that he choſe to write in Greek, becauſe it is more agreeable to men of learning than Latin, more laſting than our own tongue, and much more noble than any other language whatſoever; and in ſhort has all the graces and beauty imaginable.

Graiis ingenium, Graiis dedit ore rotundo
Muſa loqui.

Beſides he found it much eaſier to him to write in that language than in Latin or even Engliſh; ſince the ornaments of Poetry are almoſt peculiar to the Greeks; and ſince he had for many years been extremely converſant in Homer, the great Father and Source of the Greek Poetry. However that his verſes were not mere Cento's from that Poet, like Dr. Duport's; but formed, as far as he was able, upon his manner of ſtyle and verſification; ſince he had no inclination to be conſidered as a Rhapſodiſt of a Rhapſody, but was ambitious of the title of a Poet. Omnia verò carminis ornamenta ſunt Græcis ferè propria; in Homero autem illo poetarum Coryphæo, Antеſignano, Jove, emicant, ardent, fulminant. Hunc indies à ferulâ mirari, ſuſpicere, colere non deſiiti; hunc legi, relegi, nec dum ſatis perlegi; aſſequi tamen (quod nemo unquam fecit facietve, aut ſiquis unquam, Duportus is eſt) me non poſſe quid mirum eſt? Nec verò hoc opuſculum ex Ὀρυμοκίνησις (quam ſcribendi palmam prædictus Magdalenenſis Magiſter omnibus præripuit,) ſed ex propriâ, ut potuimus, delâ, Homerici ope radii depictâ, ſegmentatum licetat gloriari. Non enim elegans verſuum conſarcinator, & (ut ita dicam) Ῥαψῳδίας Ῥαψῳδὸς, ſed Poeta fieri contendo.

[C] He publiſh'd the Life of King Edward III.] It was printed at Cambridge in fol. 1688, under the following title; The Hiſtory of that moſt victorious Monarch Edward III, King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, and firſt Founder of the moſt noble Order of the Garter; being a full and exact account of the Life and Death of the ſaid King; together with that of his moſt renowned ſon Edward Prince of Wales and Aquitain, ſirnamed the Black Prince: faithfully and careſully collected from the beſt and moſt ancient authors domeſtic and foreign, printed books, manuſcripts, and records. By Joſhua Barnes Batchelor of Divinity, and one of the Senior Fellows of Emanuel College Cambridge. It is dedicated to King James II. In the Preface he tells us that he had undertaken a work of ſo much difficulty, that nothing but a ſenſe of the honour and real advantage thereof could have animated him to it. For the obſcurity of our Hiſtories being ſo great, and the miſtakes and oppoſition of them one with another being ſo frequent, it muſt neceſſarily ſeem a labour not ſmall to endeavour to give a juſt account of the whole ſeries of all public actions for the continuance of fifty years and upwards at ſuch a long diſtance of time, as more than three Centuries. However he obſerves that his reſolution had been to ſhew ſo much diligence in the collecting, and ſo much integrity in the compoſing, that if he could not obtain the knowledge

(1) Pag. 1, 2.

Hiſtory, and in the year 1688 he publiſhed the Life of King Edward III [C]; in which he introduces his Heroes making long and elaborate ſpeeches, which ſeem to be the reſult of his own imagination, and an affectation of imitating Thucydides and others of the antient Hiſtorians. His edition of Euripides [D] appeared in 1694 in folio, and was dedicated to Charles Duke of Somerſet. In the year 1700 Mrs. Maſon of Hemmingford near St. Ives in Huntingtonſhire, a widow Lady of between 40 and 50 with a jointure of 200 l. per annum, who had for ſome time been a great admirer of him, came to Cambridge, and deſired leave to ſettle an hundred pounds a year upon him after her own death; which in a manner ledge of all the moſt momentous truths, yet he ſhould purpoſely decline all fabulous narrations, all groundleſs opinions, all popular errors, partiality, and prejudice, and ſeriouſly conform himſelf to thoſe rules and decencies, which belong to a faithful Hiſtorian. That the ſubject matter of his diſcourſe is the honour of his Country, the life and actions of one of the greateſt Kings, whom perhaps the world ever ſaw, the rights of the Engliſh Crown, and how well our anceſtors were able to vindicate them. He informs us alſo, that he does not confine himſelf wholly to the relation of King Edward's exploits, or to thoſe of his invincible ſon the Black Prince, and the reſt of his noble and victorious children; but that whatever name he found memorable of his ſubjects in either of his Kingdoms, whether they were famed for arts of war or peace, he had endeavoured to pay them that juſt duty, which it ſeemed to him they deſerved; becauſe he thought it altogether fit, that thoſe, who then ſtood with their Sovereign in his grand offices of war or government, ſhould by no means now be deprived of a participation with him in his glorious Memoirs. Eſpecially, ſays he, ſince not a few are ſtill remaining, derived from thoſe famous anceſtors, whoſe minds may be more ſtrongly affected with due incentives of honour, when they ſhall underſtand by what methods their forefathers attained ſuch eſtates and titles, which they now as worthily enjoy.

(2) Pag. 39. ed. London 1697. in 8vo.

Mr. Nicholſon in the Preface (2) to the ſecond part of his Engliſh Hiſtorical Library tells us, that our author has "diligently collected whatever was to be had, far "or near, upon the ſeveral paſſages of this great King "Edward's reign. His quotations are many; and "generally his authors are as well choſen as ſuch a "multitude can be ſuppoſed to have been. His in"ferences are not always like a Stateſman; and ſome"times his digreſſions are tedious. His deriving of

(c) Pag. 294, 295.

"the famous Inſtitution of the Garter from the (c) "Phœnicians is extremely obliging to good maſter "Sammes; but came too late, it ſeems, to Mr. Aſh"mole's knowledge, or otherwiſe would have bid fair "for a choice poſt of honour in his elaborate book. "In ſhort this induſtrious author ſeems to have haſt"ened his work too much to the preſs, before he had "provided an Index and ſome other accoutrements, "which might have made it more ſerviceable to his "readers." There is an odd character of this work in Dr. Richard Rawlinſon's Engliſh Tranſlation of Mr.

‡ Vol. 2. p. 469. edit. London 1728, in 8vo.

Langlet du Freſnoy's New Method of ſtudying Hiſtory ‡, wherein we are told, that Mr. Barnes's book is not ill eſteemed for the figures therein and its bulk.

[D] His edition of Euripides. It was printed at Cambridge in fol. 1694 under the title of Euripidis quæ extant omnia, Tragœdiæ nempe xx, præter ultimam omnes completæ: Item Fragmenta aliarum pluſquam LX Tragœdiarum; & Epiſtolæ V nunc primum & ipſæ adjectæ, &c. i. e. "All the works of Euripi"des, which are extant: namely twenty Tragedies, "all complete except one; and the Fragments of "above ſixty other Tragedies; and five Epiſtles "now firſt publiſhed and added &c." The Authors of the Acta Eruditorum for Auguſt 1695 (3) in their account of this edition obſerve, that the Aldus's were the firſt who publiſhed theſe Tragedies from the manuſcripts in the year 1503; and that they were printed at Baſil in Greek, and afterwards in Latin likewiſe with the notes of Caſpar Stiblin and Jo. Brodæus in 1558 and 1562. William Canter publiſhed an edition at Antwerp in 1571, Æmilius Portus at Heidelberg in 1597, and Stephens at Geneva in 1602, with the Greek Scholia collected by Arſenius; beſides which they were printed in the Corpus Poetarum Græcorum at Geneva 1614. Theſe editions becoming very ſcarce Mr. Barnes, whom the Authors above quoted ſtile a man of very great ſkill in the Greek Language, Græcè doctiſſimus Vir, undertook a beautiful edition of theſe Tragedies, which ſhould not only contain the advantages of all the former, with the Greek Scholia upon the ſeven firſt Tragedies collected by Arſenius Archbiſhop of Monembaſia, and printed ſeparately at Venice in 1534 and at Baſil in 1544, and afterwards added by Paul Stephens to his edition; but likewiſe the ſelect obſervations of learned men, with the Editor's own conjectures, and continued Annotations upon all the Tragedies. With regard to the Text of Euripides, he has endeavoured to give us every where the genuine reading, which had been before corrupted, and particularly to reſtore the metre; upon which he has diſcourſed very fully in his preliminary Tract de Tragœdia veterum Græcorum, in which he has made very curious enquiries into the Laws of the Tragic Verſe. He has retained the Latin Tranſlation of William Canter, and has thought proper to infert the Tragedy of Danae, which was never publiſhed before but by Commeline, though it is very imperfect. He has likewiſe given us the Fragments of thoſe Tragedies, which are now loſt, particularly the Ægeus, Æolus, Aloides, Alexander or Alexandra, Alcmæon, &c.; and thoſe Fragments, which are quoted by Authors under the name of Euripides, but which are mentioned as Extracts from his Tragedies. Theſe Fragments are collected from Stobæus, Athenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Juſtin Martyr, Plutarch, Macrobius, Strabo, Longinus, Euſtathius, and the Scholiaſts, and pointed out by Grotius in his Excerpta, and Meurſius in many of his Writings. He obſerves very juſtly (4), that there are a great many names of Tragedies falſely aſcribed to Euripides, to be found among Authors, which are repreſented as the titles of entire dramatic pieces, whereas that is by no means the caſe. For when the Tragic Writers introduced any perſon ſpeaking, as for inſtance Hermione, Polydorus, Atreus, Capaneus &c. theſe have been miſtaken for the names of Tragedies, and by that means ſo many titles have been invented of Tragedies, which never were in being. Mr. Barnes has added likewiſe an Epigram, and an Epicedium of Euripides, and ſome Verſes from the Hymns written by him, with his five Epiſtles to King Archelaus, to Sophocles the Poet, and Cteſiphon his Friend; and he endeavours to prove that Euripides was the Author of theſe Epiſtles in oppoſition to thoſe, who are of a contrary opinion, though Aldus has publiſhed them as his in the Collection of Greek Letters printed in 1499. Mr. Barnes has retained the Verſion publiſhed by Canter and Æmilius Portus, but has corrected it in many places, eſteeming it preferable to the old Verſion, which paſſes under the name of Dorotheus Camillus, or that which was made by Melancthon, and printed by Oporinus at Baſil in 1558 and 1562. He has omitted the Tranſlations in Verſe, which Eraſmus has given us of the Hecuba, and the Iphigenia in Aulis, Buchanan of the Medea and Alceſtis, Grotius of the Phœniſſæ, with the Tranſlation of others of Euripides's Tragedies by other Authors. He has prefixed two curious Diſſertations, one concerning the Life and Writings of Euripides; and the other concerning the antient Greek Tragedy, the Scenes and Apparatus of it, the Theatrical Muſic, and the Laws of Tragic Verſe. The Life of Euripides is drawn up almoſt in the manner of Mr. Dodwell's Annals of St. Cyprian and Velleius Paterculus; for Mr. Barnes begins with the year when Euripides was born, which happened in the firſt year of the 75th Olympiad, about the middle of the Summer, on the 20th day of the month Boedromion (5), and gives us from the antient Greek Writers a regular account of the affairs of Greece for ſeventy ſix years to the death of Socrates, who ſurvived him ſix years. He has given us three Index's; the firſt upon the Poet himſelf; the ſecond upon the Scholia; and the third of the Authors quoted in the Scholia and the Notes.

(3) Pag. 355.

(4) Pag. 442 and 458.

(5) Mr. Baſil Kennet tells us, that his birth is placed by the Arundelian Marble in the fourth year of the 73d Olympiad; tho', ſays he, the learned Mr. Barnes following the common opinion .. brings him down ſix years later. Lives and Characters of the antient Greek Poets, Part 1. pag. 107. edit. London 1697.

a manner peculiar to himself he refused to accept, unless she would likewise condescend to make him happy with her person, which was none of the most advantageous. The Lady was too obliging to refuse any thing to Joshua; for whom, she said, the Sun stood still; and soon after married him. His edition of Anacreon [E] was printed at Cambridge in 1705, and dedicated to the Duke of Marlborough. The Writers of the Acta Eruditorum (c) tell us, that this edition is a very beautiful one, and much more correct and perfect than any, which had been published before. But Mr. Baxter in the preface to the second edition of his Anacreon treats Mr. Barnes's with some contempt. In the year 1710 he published his edition of Homer [F], and dedicated the Iliad to the Earl of Pembroke, and the Odyssey to the Earl of Nottingham. When this edition was ready for the press, he wrote a long copy of English Verses, which are now extant in the Library of Emanuel College; the design of which is to prove that Solomon was the Author of that divine work. It is imagined, that he wrote these verses not so much from the persuasion of his own mind, as to amuse his wife, and by that means engage her to supply him with

(c) Octob. 1706. pag. 457.

[E] His edition of Anacreon.] It was published under the following title: Anacreon Teius, Poeta Lyricus, summâ curâ & diligentiâ ad fidem etiam Vet. MS. Vatican. emendatus ac pristino nitori numerisque suis restitutus, dimidiâ ferè parte auctus, aliquot nempe justis poematiis & fragmentis plurimis ab undiquaque conquisitis. i. e. "Anacreon the Teian, a Lyric Poet, "corrected with the utmost care and diligence by an "ancient manuscript in the Vatican Library, and restored to his former elegance, beauty and metre, and enlarged almost half by several entire Poems and a great "number of Fragments collected from a variety of "authors." Cambridge 1705 and 1721 in 12mo. This edition is dedicated to John Duke of Marlborough, and the Dedication is dated from Hemmingford near St. Ives in Huntingtonshire March 26th 1705. To this he has subjoined a Greek Anacreontic Ode upon the Duke's Victory at Blenheim with a Latin Translation in the same measure. Then follows his Life of Anacreon, wherein he endeavours to vindicate that Poet from the imputation of unnatural love; and to shew that his Poems contain nothing Indecent or shocking, nothing contrary to good manners, or unbecoming of a man of strict chastity and sobriety, or the least improper to be read by the youth. Verum hic Catones hoc ex me audiant, nihil omnino, quod supra § xxi. dixerim, in toto hoc Anacreonte possunt illi nobis objicere, quod auribus honestis ingratum aut injucundum, probis moribus inimicum, casto sobrioque homine indignum, aut juventi φιλολόγῳ damnosum *. But he observes that there are several pieces of a very exceptionable character in the Vatican manuscript, which he will not allow to be of Anacreon's composition. In his Prolegomena he discourses concerning the Antiquity and Invention of Lyric Poetry; with an account of the progress of it among the Greeks, and a character of Anacreon, and the qualifications necessary to form a right judgment of him. He treats likewise of the metre of that Poet; and takes occasion to reply to an objection urged against him, that as he was a man in holy Orders, and a Batchelor of Divinity of nineteen years standing; in short that as he was a Christian and a Divine, he should notwithstanding employ himself upon a work of that light nature. In answer to this, he tells us, that if he had any cure of souls, which would justly require his whole attention, the objection would be of some force. And that if those persons, who sit at the helm, would have called him forth to some nobler employment, and favoured him with their patronage in it, the case would have been different; whereas in the present circumstance of affairs debauchees, parasites, spies, and men of the worst of characters, monopolize their favour, to the exclusion of persons of the best learning and accomplishments, who have no other rewards but the satisfaction, which results from their studies. Respondeo, si huic theologo ulla animarum cura contigisset, cui toto animo incumbendum fateor, tunc aliquid valeret hujusmodi objectio. Si quis illorum, qui ad gubernaculum sedent, in aliquo nobiliori studio paratum promoveret, ad majus opus alacrem vocaret, & amicâ indulgentiâ sublevaret, &c. Verum omnem illarum munificentiæ proventum filioli, nepotes, parasiti, calumniatores, mundinatores muneralî ambitu intercipiunt, sibique plane demetunt; sanctioriqué literaturæ cultores musarum suarum deliciis saturandos relinquunt †. Since therefore notwithstanding his being a Clergyman he had no benefice, if he employed his studies in promoting of learning, propagating of the Greek literature, and searching out the truth, it was suitable to his character as Professor of the Greek Tongue, and not unworthy of that of a Christian, much less of a Divine, who has no living to require his care, and who, according to Dr. Stillingfleet in his Origines Sacræ L. 2. c. 9. §. 18. ought not to be an absolute stranger to the learning of the Heathens; as those generally are, who make such objections. Interea si sacerdotis carens sacerdos doctrinæ illustrandæ, Græcis literis propagandis, veritati indagandæ operam det assiduam & diligentem; congruum hoc quidem Græcæ Linguæ professori, nec indignum Christiano, nedum theologo, non alias cum beneficio suo occupato; qui nec, (vid. Stillingfleet's Origin. sact. L. 2. c. 9. §. 18.) Ethnicâ Doctrinâ plane hospes esse debeat; quales ut plurimum sunt illi, qui hujusmodi objectiones proferunt ‡. He afterwards vindicates himself on account of his introducing some passages from the Scriptures into his Notes; and of his making several alterations in the text of Anacreon from mere conjecture. He has subjoined to his edition the Epigrams of the ancients and moderns upon that Poet, and some Odes of his own composition under the title of Anacreon Christianus, with a Latin version of them in the same metre, and an Index to all the Odes and Fragments, &c.

‡ Ibid.

[F] Publish'd his edition of Homer.] It was printed in two volumes in 4to at Cambridge under the following title: Homeri Ilias & Odyssea, & in easdem Scholia sive Interpretatio Veterum; &c. i. e. "Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, with the Scholia of the ancients upon those two Poems. To which are added "continued Notes upon the Text and the Scholia, "many various Readings, &c. and a very correct "Latin Translation: besides the Batrachomyomachia, "the Hymns and Epigrams, the Fragments and two "Indexes. The whole collated with several ancient manuscripts and the best editions, &c. By "Joshua Barnes, Batchelor of Divinity, and Regius "Professor of the Greek Tongue in the University of "Cambridge." Tho' several ancient writers give us an account of Homer's Genealogy, of his Life, and of the time when he flourished; yet they differ so much in what they say of that admirable Poet, that our editor thought it necessary to make new enquiries about it. He informs us, that he had written a book upon that subject, which contains several considerable discoveries; and that this book is a Treasure of Erudition, wherein the riches of Homer are fully displayed; and that the great wisdom and learning of that Poet, with the design of his divine Iliad, appear in it in a much better light; and that whatever relates to the History of his Life is more clearly explained in that treatise than in any other account. He tells us, that he would have inserted those observations in this edition, had it not been for a particular reason; but that he designed to publish it at some other time. Mr. de la Roche assures us in his Account of this edition †, that there were great improvements in it, and that it is much more valuable than any of those, which had been published before; and he observes that Mr. Barnes, famous, says he, for his great skill in the Greek Tongue, tells us that Homer was his favourite author. He had a particular affection for that Poet from his younger years; and it was not in hopes of any gain, that he undertook an edition of him, but out of love for his author, and regard to the public good. He has corrected with money to defray the expences of the edition. There is an account of it in the Acta Eruditorum for January 1711 (d); in which we are told that Mr. Barnes has given us a much more correct and perfect edition of Homer than any which had appeared before; and that he has shewn in it a great deal of industry and knowledge in the Greek Poetry. However we have there some exceptions proposed against it [G], which are ascribed to one of the greatest Critics * of our own, or perhaps any other age or nation. He died August the third 1712 in the fifty eighth year of his age, and was interred at Hemmingford, and had a monument raised to him by his widow [H]. Besides the books abovementioned we shall give a catalogue of those, which he either published or designed to publish, in (d) Pag. 1, 54, 308.

† Memoirs of Literature, vol. 2. Art. 20. p. 67. ad edit. London 1722.

* Anacreontis Vita. Sect. 23.

† Prolegomena, Sect. 11.

* Dr. Bentley.

rected the text in a great many places, and added several verses to it; and rendered the Latin Version more accurate than it was before. The Scholia are enlarged, corrected, and disposed in a better order; and nothing added to, omitted, or mended in the Text and the Scholia, without giving notice of it. The various Readings are taken not only from Henry Stephens, but also from Eustathius, Plato, Aristotle, Strabo, and other ancient authors, and from several manuscripts and editions. Mr. Barnes carefully mentions all the manuscripts, which he consulted; and tells us, that the Scholia upon Homer are falsly ascribed to Didymus; and that they were not written by one man, nor in the same age, but by several hands, and at several times. He has prefixed several pieces to the Iliad in the first volume. 1. The Life of Homer commonly ascribed to Herodotus. 2. Three small pieces taken from a book of Leo Allatius de Patriâ Homeri. 3. A passage from Suidas, and another from Pausanias relating to Homer. 4. What Plutarch says concerning the Life of that Poet. 5. Certamen Homeri & Hesiodi. 6. A Dissertation concerning Homer's Poetry, which Mr. Barnes ascribes to Dionysius Halicarnassus. 7. Porphyry's Quæstiones Homericæ. 8. De Nympharum Antro, by the same author. 9. Dion Chrysostom's Oration concerning Homer. Dr. John Davis, afterwards Master of Queen's College in Cambridge, and well known for his learned and judicious observations upon several ancient authors, added some notes upon that Oration. All these pieces are printed in Greek, without a translation. The Iliad with a Latin version appears in the next place. Mr. Barnes has inserted under the text, 1. The Greek Scholia. 2. His Notes upon the Text. 3. His Notes upon the Scholia. 4. The various Readings. The second volume contains the Odyssey, and several other pieces ascribed to Homer. The Scholia, the Notes of the Editor, and the various Readings, are placed under the text of the Odyssey in the same order as in the Iliad. Mr. Barnes gives us his sentiments concerning the Odyssey: The subject of the Iliad, says he, is as vast as the whole universe; whereas the Odyssey is confined within narrower bounds.

Illius immensos miratur Græcia campos;
Est huic non magnus, sed benè cultus ager.

The persons mentioned in that Poem are not so considerable as those in the Iliad; but perhaps it affords more examples of virtue, and a great number of moral precepts for the conduct of life. The chief design of the Poet was to teach chastity, temperance, and conjugal affection. Penelope is proposed as an excellent model of those virtues. Homer describes likewise the wonderful prudence and constancy of Ulysses under all his misfortunes; and God's Providence, who never forsakes good and pious men, when they are exposed to the greatest dangers. The following pieces are inserted at the end of the Odyssey: 1. The Batrachomyomachia, or the Battle between the Frogs and Mice; which Mr. Barnes ascribes to Homer, and is of opinion that it was written by him in his younger years, and confutes Henry Stephens and some other authors, who judge it to be unworthy that Poet. 2. The Hymns of Homer. 3. His Epigrams. 4. His Fragments. All those pieces are illustrated with notes and various readings, and printed more correctly than they were before.

[G] However we have there some exceptions proposed against it.] We are told there, that tho' this edition is preferable to all the preceding, yet it is not complete enough to satisfy men of true learning; and several points in the Prolegomena are objected to; and Mr. Barnes is censured for retaining many of Schrevelius's absurd interpolations in the ancient Greek Scholia. We have likewise a censure upon some passages in the first book of the Iliad, in hopes, as the authors of the Acta Eruditorum observe, that some other person would undertake a more strict and severe criticism upon it, since they were informed that the editor had several formidable antagonists. Est autem nobis constitutum, quædam tantum delibare ex prioribus aliquot Iliados libris; non enim defore speramus aliquem, qui seriam & severiorem in hanc editionem exerceat criticam, cum tam acres & validos adversarios habere intelligamus Cl. Editorem. They observe, that such has been the fate of the writings of Homer, that the order of critics took their rise upon the occasion of them, and published their Observations and Emendations upon that Poet, the first and chiefest of whom was Aristotle, from whom Dion Chrysostom tells us the art of Criticism and Grammar was derived; and afterwards succeeded Zenodotus, Aristarchus, and others. Et sunt sanè ea fata scriptorum Homericorum, ut olim quidem istorum occasione exorta sit Natio Criticorum, qui ἰνδόκους & διορθώτας Homeri fecerunt, quorum princeps Aristoteles (ἀφ' οὗ καὶ φασὶ τὴν Κριτικὴν τε καὶ Γραμματικὴν λαβεῖν inquit Dio Chrysost.) deinde Zenodotus, Aristarchus, alii. All the modern editions of Homer, notwithstanding they have deserved a severe examination, have escaped with impunity, except that of Schrevelius, upon which Dr. Meric Casaubon, Prebendary of Canterbury, wrote a Dissertation. The authors of the Acta Eruditorum observe, that it will appear from the few observations, which they have made, how ample a field will be opened to the Critics in Mr. Barnes's edition, tho' more has been done it, and more study and labour seems to have been spent upon it, than upon any other before printed. Ex illis autem paucis, quæ attingemus, apparebit, quanta messis parata sit criticis hac etiam editione; licet in eâ plus sit præstitum, plusque studii & laboris, ut videtur, adhibitum, quam in quavis aliâ typis impressâ. They remark, that the chief assistances, which he had in it, was from the manuscripts, which he appears to have examined with great accuracy; and by this means has restored the text of Homer, having frequently abandoned the authority of Henry Stephens, which was esteemed so considerable from the edition, which he published, that most of the subsequent editors thought themselves sufficiently secure in following him.

[H] Had a monument raised to him by his widow.] The inscription upon it is as follows. H. S. E. Joshua Barnes S. T. B. Collegii Emmanuelis Socius, Linguæ Græcæ in Academia Cantabrigiensi Professor Regius peritissimus. Plura Eruditionis & Industriæ Monument. reliquit. Ob. Aug. 3. A. D. 1712. Ætat. 58. Maria Barnes Conjugi dilectissimo M. P.

Βαρνήσιος δ' ἀπαλὰς
Νύμφαι πολύτεχνος,
Λογογράφων φίλτατος,
Ἄνθος τι τῶν ἀοιδῶν.
Τῶν ἱερῶν μάγιστος,
Καὶ ῥητόρων ἄριστος,
Καὶ Μαρτίων Βαΐτης,
Βρεταννικῆς ἀρωγός.

The Greek Anacreontiques on the Monument English'd.

" Kind Barnes, adorn'd by every Muse,
" Each Greek in his own Art out-does.
" No Orator was ever greater;
" No Poet ever chanted sweeter.
" H' excell'd in Grammar mystery;
" And the Black Prince of History;
" And a Divine the most profound,
" That ever trod on English ground.

Mr.

in the Note [I]. He had a great deal of Enthuſiaſm in him, which diſcovered itſelf in many circumſtances of his life. He conſtantly maintained, that ſpiritual ſins, ſuch as pride, defamation, &c. were far more offenſive to the Deity, than thoſe which ariſe from the too great indulgence of the ſenſes. He believed, that charity ſeldom or never paſſes without its reward in this life. This opinion prevailed ſo far with him, that he has given his only coat to a vagrant begging at his door; and he uſed to relate ſome extraordinary retributions conferred upon him by unknown perſons for his charities of this kind. He was rather diſtinguiſhed for the extraordinary quickneſs of his wit, than the ſolidity of his judgment. And it was very remarkable that he could ſcarce ever correct what his firſt thoughts, which were very ſudden and rapid, ſuggeſted to him. He had an uncommon ſtrength of memory, and a prodigious readineſs in writing and ſpeaking of the Greek tongue; though perhaps there were many other learned men, who had not that faculty, and yet were better judges of the propriety and delicacies of that Language. The excellent Critic abovementioned uſed to ſay of him, that he underſtood as much Greek as a Greek Cobler.

Mr. Joſhua Barnes read a ſmall Engliſh Bible, that he uſually carried about him, one hundred and twenty one times over at leiſure hours. He was born January 10, 1654. All this is upon his monument.

[I] A Catalogue of thoſe books which he either publiſh'd or deſigned to publiſh.] We ſhall extract this chiefly from the Catalogue ſubjoined to the Prolegomena of his edition of Anacreon. The warlike Lover, or the generous Rival, an Engliſh dramatic piece upon the War between the Engliſh and Dutch, and the Death of the Earl of Sandwich. Anno 1672. Ἰωσηφιὰς or Joſeph the Patriarch; a Greek Heroic Poem in one book, mentioned above in note [B]. Ὁμιλογία, or our Saviour's Sermon upon the Mount, the Decalogue, the Apoſtles Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Magnificat, with other Hymns from the old and new Teſtament, in Greek verſe. Thuribulum, or the Hymns and Feſtivals in Greek and Latin verſe. Miſcellanies and Epigrams in Latin and Greek verſe. Ἀγγλο-Βελγομαχία, or the Death of Edward Mountague, Earl of Sandwich, in Greek, Latin, and Engliſh verſe. Ἀλεκτρυομαχία, or a Poem upon Cock-fighting. Anno 1673. The Song of Songs, containing an hundred Hexaſticks in Engliſh Heroic verſe: Anno 1674. Ψυλλιάδες, a ludicrous Poem in Greek Macaronic verſe, upon a Battle between a Spider and a Toad: Anno 1673. Φλιὰδες, or a Supplement to the old ludicrous Poem of that title at Trinity-Houſe in Cambridge, upon a Battle between the Fleas and a Welſhman. A poetical Lexicon Greek and Latin; to which is added a Lexicon of proper names. Fol. 1675. A Treatiſe upon the Greek Accents in anſwer to Henry Chriſtian Heninius and others, with a Diſcourſe upon the points now in uſe. Cant. Creditt. a Comedy in Engliſh: 1674. Humorous Poems upon the ninth book of the Iliad and the ninth of the Odyſſey, in Engliſh; publiſhed in 1681. Franciados, an Heroic Poem in Latin, upon the Black Prince, eight books of which were done, and the whole was to contain twelve books. The Art of War, in four books in Engliſh proſe: 1676. Hengiſt, or the Engliſh Valour, an Heroic Poem in Engliſh in ſeven books. Landgarth, or the Amazon Queen of Norway and Denmark, an Engliſh dramatic Poem in Heroic verſe, deſigned in honour of the marriage between Prince George of Denmark and Princeſs Anne. An Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory from the beginning of the world to the Aſcenſion of our Saviour, in Latin fol. Miſcellaneous Poems in Engliſh. Philoſophical and divine Poems, publiſh'd at Cambridge at different times in Latin. Poems and ſacred daily Meditations continued for ſeveral years in Engliſh. A Diſſertation upon Pillars, Obeliſks, Pyramids &c. in Latin 1692. A Diſcourſe upon the Sybills, in three books in Latin. The Life of Pindar in four Lectures; and 32 Lectures upon his firſt Olympic Ode. The Life of Theocritus, and Lectures upon that Poet. The Life of David; of Scanderbeg; and of Tamerlane. Theſe three Lives, as he tells us, he never actually begun, but only made conſiderable collections for them. The Life of Edward the Black Prince. The Univerſity-Calendar, or a Direction for young Students of all degrees with relation to their Studies, and general Rules of Ethics, and a Form of Prayer: anno 1685. Thirty two Lectures upon the firſt book of the Odyſſey. Above fifty Lectures upon Sophocles. Lectures upon Bereſhith, with an Oration to recommend the ſtudy of the Hebrew Language. Three Diſcourſes in Engliſh; the firſt of which was intitled The fortunate Iſland, or the Inauguration of Queen Gloriana: 2. The Advantage of England, or a ſure Way to Victory: 3. The Cauſe of the Church of England defended and explain'd; publiſhed in 1703. A Sermon ad Clerum for his Degree of Bachelor of Divinity at St. Mary's in Cambridge 1686. A Sermon preached before King Charles II, at Newmarket Octob. 19th 1684. A Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor of London upon the Feaſt of St. Matthew; with an Apology for the Orphans of Chriſt's Hoſpital, 1703. A Sermon before the Lord Mayor at St. Paul's, upon the Feaſt of All-Saints, 1703. A Sermon printed at Huntington March 8th, on the Queen's Birth-day 1705. An Oration recommending the ſtudy of the Greek Language, ſpoken in the public Schools at Cambridge before the Vice-Chancellor &c. March 28th, 1705. A Greek Oration addreſſed to the moſt reverend Father Neophytus Archbiſhop of Philippopolis, ſpoken in the houſe of the Regents at Cambridge Sept. 13th 1701. A Prevaricator's Speech ſpoken at the Commencement at Cambridge 1680. A congratulatory Oration in Latin ſpoken at St. Mary's Sept. 9th 1683, upon the Eſcape of King Charles II and the Duke of York from the conſpiracy. Sermons, Orations, Declamations, Problems, Tranſlations, Letters, and other Exerciſes almoſt innumerable, in Engliſh, Latin, and Greek. A Satyr in Engliſh verſe upon the Poets and Critics. An Imitation of Plautus's Trinummi in Engliſh. Interpretations, Illuſtrations, Emendations, or Corrections of many paſſages, which have been falſely tranſlated, with Explications upon various paſſages of Scripture, from Geneſis to Revelations. Common places in Divinity, Philology, Poetry, and Criticiſm, and Emendations of various Greek and Latin Authors, with Fragments of many of the Poets.

T.

BARON (PETER) Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Cambridge in the ſixteenth Century, was a Frenchman born (a). He occaſioned ſome troubles in that Univerſity by certain opinions, which he publiſhed there in the year 1590. It was pretended that his doctrine approached very near to that of the Pelagians. Whitaker, Tindal, Chadderton, Perkins, &c. attacked it in their Sermons, Lectures, and Books; but at firſt they ſpared their adverſary's name, out of regard to his great age. Afterwards perceiving that he continued to dogmatize, and that in his Summa trium de prædeſtinatione Sententiarum he maintained an heterodox hypotheſis, Whitaker declared himſelf his antagoniſt expreſly, and confuted his Summa. The affair was carried before Queen Elizabeth, and before the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. An aſſembly of Biſhops and Doctors of Divinity was called at Lambeth. Whitaker was ſent thither, and maintained the common opinion there with ſo much force, that he made it triumph in a very glorious manner. That of Baron was condemned, and there were drawn up on the 20th of November 1597 nine Articles (b), which were received in the Univerſity by the public authority. Baron was diſmiſſed, and returned to France; by which means the peace of the Univerſity was reſtored (c). Some are of opinion that he was treated too ſeverely [A]. We ſhall ſee the titles of ſome of the Works of this Profeſſor [B].

(a) He gave himſelf the name of Stempanus. I believe that is as much as to ſay of Etampes.

(b) A loco Lambethani dicti ſunt; i. e. "they "were called the "Lambeth Ar- "ticles from the "place where "they were "drawn up." Alting, Theolog. Hiſtor. pag. 305, 306.

(c) Taken from the Theologia Hiſtorica of Henry Alting, p. 305, 306.

[A] Some are of opinion that he was treated too ſeverely.] The Extracts which Mr. Des Maizeaux was ſo kind as to ſend me from a book of Dr. Thomas Fuller, ſhall be all my Commentary upon this head. This book is the Hiſtory of the Univerſity of Cambridge, and is ſubjoined to The Church Hiſtory of Britain from the birth of Chriſt till the year 1648. "A conteſt "happened between Mr. Chadderton (afterwards "Maſter of Emanuel College), and Dr. Baro, Mar- "garet Profeſſor (1), about ſome heterodox opinions, "vented by the ſame Baro, both in his readings and "print, (viz. in his commentary on Jonah, and book "de Fide). Whereupon the Doctor procured Mr. "Chadderton to be called into the Conſiſtory, in the "preſence of the Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Hanford, Dr. "Harvey, and Dr. Legge, where he utterly denied "that he had ever preached againſt the Doctor; but "he propounded theſe queſtions as erroneous and "falſe;

(1) The Lady Margaret, Counteſs of Richmond, mother to King Henry VII, built ſeveral Colleges at Cambridge, and founded two Profeſſorſhips in Divinity, one at Oxford, and another at Cambridge. Thoſe, who enjoy theſe Profeſſorſhips, and the ſalary annexed to them, are called Margaret Profeſſors. John Tiſtor, Biſhop of Rocheſter, was the firſt who enjoyed that at Cambridge, Eraſmus was the ſecond, and Baro the fourteenth. This marginal note is Mr. Des Maizeaux's.

"1. Primus Dei amor non eſt in naturâ fidei juſtifi- "cantis.

"2. Fides juſtificans non præcipitur in Decalogo.

"Many papers in Latin paſſed between them, and "at laſt they were conceived to come nearer together. "The end of Peter Baro's triennial Lectures began to "draw near. Now although cuſtom had made ſuch "courteſy almoſt a due to continue the ſame Profeſ- "ſor, where no urgent reaſons to the contrary were "alledged, yet the Univerſity intended not to re-elect "him for the place, meaning fairly to cut him off "juſt at the time, (which would be the leſs pain and "ſhame unto him) when his years ſhould be expired "(2). He himſelf was ſenſible of it; and beſides, "he ſaw the Articles of Lambeth lately ſent to the "Univerſity, and foreſaw, that ſubſcription thereto "would be expected from, yea impoſed on him, to "which he could not condeſcend, therefore reſolved "to quit his place. So that this his departure was "not his free act, out of voluntary election, but that "whereunto his will was neceſſarily determined; wit- "neſs his own reply to a friend, requiring of him "the cauſe of his withdrawing: Fugio, ſaith he, ne "fugarer. Some conceive this to be hard meaſure, "which was uſed to one of Dr. Baro's qualifications. "For, I. He was a foreigner, a Frenchman; & ne- "mini civitas quam non admittitur hoſpes. II. A great "ſcholar; for he that denieth learning in Baro, (ſo "witneſſed in his works,) plainly affirmeth no ſcho- "larſhip in himſelf. III. An inoffenſive man for "life and converſation; ſeeing nothing of viciouſneſs "could be charged upon him, which otherwiſe in his "conteſt with Mr. Chadderton had been urged againſt "him. Laſtly an aged man, coming hither many "years ſince, (when the Profeſſor's place as much "needed him, as he it,) and who had painfully ſpent "his ſtrength in the employment. Others alledged, "that in ſuch caſes of conſcience there is no plea "for courteſy, and that Baro, as he was a ſtranger, "had brought in doctrines to the infecting the Uni- "verſity, the Fountain of Learning and Religion; "and therefore Archbiſhop Whitgift deſigned the re- "moving him from his place (3)."

(2) Fuller's Hiſtory of the Univerſity of Cambridge, ad ann. 1596.

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 145, & ſeq. edit. London 1655.

You have here, Sir, (theſe are Mr. Des Maizeaux's words) what Dr. Fuller ſays; I have choſen rather to tranſlate him literally, though with leſs elegance, than to run the riſque of departing from his ſenſe. He remarks, that all the Engliſh conſtantly write Baro or Baroe; and that in original writings the Doctor ſigned Baro. From whence it might be concluded that I ſhould have called him Baro, and not Baron: unleſs it be ſaid that he Latiniz'd his name, when he ſigned Baro, and that the Engliſh called him after the Latin termination. It is certain however that in France the name Baron is incomparably more frequent than that of Baro, though that is not abſolutely unknown, as the Continuator of Aſtrea witneſſes (4).

(4) See Hiſt. de l'Academ. Françoiſe, pag. 321.

[B] Here are the titles of ſome of Baron's Works.] Prælectiones xxxix in Jonam; printed at London in 1579. Summa trium Sententiarum de Prædeſtinatione. De Præſtantiâ & Dignitate divinæ Legis.

BARON or BARO (PETER). Mr. Bayle's account of this great Man being very imperfect, and even erroneous, we ſhall here ſupply his defects, and correct his errors. Peter Baro was born in France, and admitted a Licentiate of the Law in the Univerſity of Bourges (a); but being of the Proteſtant Religion, he was obliged to leave his native country to avoid perſecution. He retired into England, and being a learned man, he was kindly received by the Lord Treaſurer Burghley, and entertained with humanity in that Nobleman's family. About the year 1575 he was at the recommendation of the ſame Lord then Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge, choſen Lady Margaret's Profeſſor of Divinity there, and entertained at Peter-Houſe. Dr. Perne Maſter of Peter-Houſe, who was his friend, petitioned the Lord Treaſurer to make ſome addition to Dr. Baro's ſalary, ſince he was a married man, and had a family, and, as it ſeems, depended chiefly upon his ſalary for his maintenance. The Lord Burghley was ſo kind as to promiſe to Dr. Perne, that he would take care of Dr. Baro; who thereupon wrote in November 1580, a modeſt and handſome letter to the Treaſurer [A], in which he put him in mind of his promiſe, and deſired him to perform it when occaſion ſhould offer.

(a) Strype's Annals, vol. 4. pag. 231.

We

[A] A modeſt and handſome letter to the Treaſurer.] He repreſents to his Lordſhip, that "It was now full "ſix years ſince he had been admitted into his poſt "by the votes and ſuffrages of the chief men in the "Univerſity, who had been pleaſed to ſhew him "their friendſhip in this: that all this time he had "endeavoured and ſtill did his utmoſt to be ſervice- "able to the Univerſity; that confiding in the Lord "Treaſurer's kindneſs to him, he made bold to write "to him, hoping his Letter would not diſpleaſe. "That his Lordſhip had been acquainted with his "circumſtances by Dr. Perne, and promiſed to take "his caſe into conſideration, and even to aſſiſt him. "Confiding in this, he thought his Lordſhip would "not be offended at him, for refreſhing his memory, "and deſiring him, if any occaſion to ſerve him "ſhould offer, not to let it ſlip." This is the ſubſtance of his letter, which ſhews that he was not in very good circumſtances; but the letter not being very long, the reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to find it here. Cum Spartam, quam mihi bis authoritate ac ſuffragiis primariorum hujus Academiæ virorum, mihique amiciſſimorum, natus ſum, nullis parcens laboribus, exornare, jam totos ſex hoſce annos, conor ac contendam; hoc eſt, quum tua hujus Academiæ utilitati ac dignitati inſerviens pro viribus quotidie enitar, Præſtantiſſime Domine; eumque me ante tanta cum humanitate menſa etiam tua excipere dignatus ſis: hac fretus benitati, hac

We do not find whether or in what manner his petition was granted; but in 1584 he wrote a letter of thanks to the ſame Lord, who had prevailed with Dr. Perne to elect Baro's ſon, and to admit him, with another, into the year of Probation (b). He enjoyed his Profeſſorſhip for ſeveral years with tranquillity, notwithſtanding his diſputes in writing with Dr. Whitaker, the other Profeſſor of Divinity, who differed from him in the point of Predeſtination, and maintained the rigid ſyſtem of Calvin concerning abſolute Election and Reprobation, whereas Baro defended a more moderate ſyſtem. They explained their opinions in their Lectures (c), and the controverſy was carried on with ſome mildneſs till the latter end of the year 1595, when Whitaker preached a Sermon before the Univerſity, wherein he laboured to defend the doctrine of the Church, as he called it, that is, abſolute Predeſtination. Dr. Baro aſſerted the contrary opinion alſo in a Sermon to the Clergy of the Univerſity, and as the former was heard with applauſe, ſo the latter was brought into trouble, however humbly and modeſtly he had propoſed his opinion (d). The Queen (Elizabeth) hearing of this Sermon of Dr. Baro was highly diſpleaſed with it, and diſcovered her anger in a converſation which ſhe had concerning theſe matters with Archbiſhop Whitgift, telling him, that Dr. Baro being an alien, ought to have carried himſelf quietly and peaceably in a country, where he had been ſo humanely harboured and infranchized, both himſelf and his family. The Archbiſhop excuſed him as much as lay in his power, and gave the Queen a very good character of him. He alſo acquainted him in a friendly manner with this converſation. Whereupon Baro wrote him a letter of thanks, in which he gave him an account of his principles [B], and diſcovered at the ſame time his loyalty to the Queen (e). The famous Lambeth Articles agreed upon November the 20th 1595, having been carried to Cambridge by Dr. Whitaker, who died ſoon after (f), the Heads of the Colleges had their eyes upon Dr. Baro, who was the chief oppoſer of abſolute Predeſtination, and therefore theſe Articles were ſoon offered him for his conſent and approbation. The occaſion or rather pretence of it, and the cauſe of all the vexations he ſuffered afterwards was a Sermon which he preached before the Univerſity January the 12th $159\frac{5}{6}$, in which he declared his thoughts upon the controverted points [C], though being a foreigner, he behaved himſelf modeſtly, and ſtudied

(b) Strype's Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift, B. 2. ch. 2. pag. 92, 93.

(c) Idem, ibid. B. 4. ch. 14. pag. 434.

(d) Idem, ibid. ch. 17. p. 460.

(e) Ibid. pag. 464, 465.

(f) Ibid. ch. 19. pag. 479.

ad te breviſſimas literas ſcribere auſus ſum, eas ſperans tuæ dignitati non fore ingratas. Quibus te imprimis quam officioſiſſime ſalutans, tuam etiam de meo hic ſtatu memoriam refricarem. Audiſti enim prius à Doctore Perne, qualis hic, & quam tenuis ſit mea conditio; imo te hujus rationem habiturum, ac mihi proſpecturum dixiſti. Cui verbo quia confido, tibi in memoriam hoc revocare, ingratum non fore exiſtimavi. Ac ſi qua forte ſeſe mihi juvandi occaſio offerat, eam tua erga me benevolentia effluere non ſinat. Quid autem ſit mihi commodum, id tua ipſius prudentia videre, & à Doctore Perne reſcire facilius poteſt, quam à me ipſo. Totum igitur hoc, meque adeo ipſum tuæ fidei illiuſque prudentiæ committens, Deum Opt. Max. oro atque obſecro, Illuſtriſſime Domine, ut te huic Regno, Eccleſiæ, ac Academiæ diu incolumem conſervet, ſuiſque bonis perpetuo cumulet. Cantabrigiæ, xi Cal. Decembr. 1580. Tibi Obſervantiſſimus, P. Baro (1).

(1) Strype's Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift, Appendix, pag. 38.

[B] Dr. Baro wrote a letter of thanks to the Archbiſhop, in which he acquaints him with his principles.] He ſaid, "That by what Dr. Nevill told him in the "Archbiſhop's name, he much feared that this kind- "neſs towards him had brought ſome cauſe of trouble "to his Grace; which would certainly be very griev- "ous to him, ſince he ever very much loved, he did "not ſay his Lordſhip, but his very perſon, for thoſe "eminent qualities of mind, with which he was en- "dowed; theſe he admired, and for that reaſon he "would depend upon him alone, ſince he had in this "his calamity, by a new and ſingular benefit, put him "for ever under the ſtrongeſt obligation, having ſpoken "for him to the Queen's Majeſty, which he ſhould "keep in his memory as long as he lived. But as to "the matters in controverſy, you are not ignorant, "moſt illuſtrious Lord, ſaid he, what my opinion is, "namely, that God is not the author of ſin, nor will "have it committed, ſince he openly forbids it, and re- "proves men for nothing but for ſin, which he hates; "and that the faithful or the elect ought not to be ſe- "cure of their ſalvation. Theſe were the chief things "which he and others defended, becauſe there were "certain articles (2), which were laid to be defined a- "gainſt him and others, tho' they ſcarcely touched the "ſtate of controverſy, and were almoſt ſuch, that "they might eaſily be proved, if they were dexter- "ouſly underſtood. Nor did he require a new ſenſe, "but the ſame which might be drawn from that letter of "Mr. Hooper, which he had mentioned in his Ser- "mon, and which he thought orthodox. But how- "ſoever theſe articles were underſtood, and wreſted "againſt him undeſervedly; yet it was certain that "he ſhould obey his Lordſhip, and that he would "keep peace as long as he ſhould be there. But he "wiſhed the Queen might be thoroughly acquainted "with his piety and reverence towards her; adding, "that for her, and for the defence of the ſtate of this "Church, which ſhe ſupported, he would ſhed his "blood, if it were neceſſary, with as willing and rea- "dy a mind, as her own faithful ſubjects ought to "do, and as ſhe would have him do, ſince ſhe had "been willing to make him free of her Kingdom, as "well as his wife and children, and to confirm it with "her ſeal. He ſaid, in the concluſion of his letter, "that theſe were the reaſons, why he did not aſpire to "the Queen's Profeſſorſhip of Divinity (now vacant "by the death of Dr. Whitaker); but that he hoped "his humanity would have regard to his labours, "ſince he ſpent his age at the Univerſity during "twenty years, for a very ſmall ſtipend, and had "been variouſly vexed by thoſe, who were not well "pleaſed with the ſtate of the Church of England "(3)." This letter is dated from Cambridge, 13th of December, 1595.

(2) He means the famous Lambeth Articles.

(3) Strype, ubi ſupra, B. 4. ch. 17. pag. 465.

[C] A Sermon, in which he declared his thoughts upon the controverted points.] He did not properly deny the Lambeth Articles, but rather moderate them, and ſtate, as he apprehended, the true ſenſe of them. He aſſerted theſe three propoſitions. I. That God created all men according to his own likeneſs in Adam; and conſequently to eternal life, from which no body was excluded, but for his ſins: as Damaſus taught, lib. II. De Fide Orthodoxa. II. That Chriſt died ſufficiently for all; againſt John Piſcator, a foreigner, who denied it; and whoſe opinion he ſhewed was contrary to the Confeſſion of the Church of England, and the Articles approved by the Parliament of this Kingdom, and confirmed by the Queen's authority; for the proof of which he repeated the 31ſt Article. III. That God's promiſes made to us, as they are generally ſet down, ought to be generally underſtood; for which he appealed to the ſeventeenth Article. Some of his auditors were not pleaſed with theſe propoſitions; namely thoſe, who then maintained, that God on purpoſe created the greateſt part of men to deſtruction, that by their perdition he might get glory to himſelf; and that Chriſt did not die for all, not becauſe they refuſed to accept his benefits, but ſtudied as much as he could not to exaſperate any perſon; nor did he in his Sermon ſay the leaſt thing concerning the Lambeth Articles. Yet ſome of the Heads of the Colleges countenancing the doctrine of Calvin, and being reſolved to eſtabliſh it, if poſſible, in the minds of the Students, Baro was cited before Dr. Goad the Vice-Chancellor, in the Conſiſtory [D] (g). He had ſome hint of it before hand; therefore he came to London in order to acquaint the Archbiſhop with the truth of the matter (b). What paſſed between them will appear from a Letter which his Grace wrote to the Vice-Chancellor, the abſtract of which we ſhall give in the note [E]. Baro returned immediately to Cambridge, and appeared before the Vice-Chancellor and the Heads of the Colleges January the (g) Ibid. ch. 17. pag. 465, 466.

(b) Ibid. p. 468.

but becauſe he would not, that his death ſhould profit them, and becauſe they were not created to ſalvation, as other, but to damnation. And for the ſame reaſon, they would not have the promiſes to be general, but extended or rather reſtrained them to thoſe few perſons only, who alone, they ſaid, were created by God to be ſaved. Dr. Baro's intention was to ſtop the ſpreading of thoſe dangerous poſitions, and to prevent the young ſcholars from being infected with Piſcator's book, which contained them, and which he ſaw was in the hands of many (4). He vindicated his ſentiments, and endeavoured to ſhew that they agreed with the doctrine of the Church of England in her avowed Articles: and with regard to the nine new propoſitions (5), he maintained that they were not to be underſtood in ſuch a ſenſe, as to vary from or to interfere with the old doctrine of the Church of England. This he repreſented to the Archbiſhop, in a letter dated January the 14th, 159⅓. He tells his Grace, "that he ſaw ſome "perſons at Cambridge, who took the Lambeth Ar- "ticles in ſuch a ſenſe, and ſo ſtretched them, as to "confirm from them all Piſcator's Paradoxes; and that "now it was come to that paſs, that he and others "might ſcarcely ſay, that God created the firſt man, "and in him the reſt, according to his image, and "ſo to eternal life; nor that he hated any, or re- "jected any as a man, (for otherwiſe he had rejected "and hated his own image) but only as a ſinner, ac- "cording to that ſaying of St. Auguſtin, God hated "not Eſau as a man, but as a ſinner. And that "they were hardly permitted to ſay, that the Offer- "ing of Chriſt was a perfect redemption, propitiation "and ſatisfaction for all the ſins of the whole world, as "well original as actual: which notwithſtanding were "the very words of the thirty firſt Engliſh Article. Or, "that the promiſes made to us in Chriſt were to be "generally taken and underſtood, tho' theſe were "alſo the words of the ſeventeenth Article (6)." For a further vindication of his orthodoxy, he ſent his Grace at the ſame time his own expoſition of the Lambeth Articles, which he explains in ſuch a manner, as to make them agree with the Articles of the Church of England. That expoſition is too long to be here inſerted; the reader will find it in Mr. Strype's Appendix to his Life of Dr. Whitgift (7).

(4) Idem, ibid. pag. 466.

(5) The Lambeth Articles.

(6) Ibid. pag. 467.

(7) Book 4. numb. 26.

[D] Baro was cited before Dr. Goad the Vice-Chancellor in the Conſiſtory.] Let us ſee the Vice-Chancellor's reaſons, as he wrote them himſelf to the Archbiſhop, the day after our Profeſſor had delivered his Sermon. He told the Archbiſhop, "that accord- "ing to his Grace's advice, when the nine Ar- "ticles came to the Univerſity, he uſed means, "by the Heads and Preſidents, that every College "ſhould take knowledge and warning thereof. He "alſo gave particular information of them to ſeveral "perſons of whom he doubted, eſpecially Dr. Baro "the Frenchman, cauſing him to ſee and read over "the ſame propoſitions, as alſo that clauſe in parti- "cular of the Archbiſhop's letter, That nothing ſhould "be publickly taught to the contrary. He thanked God, "that ſince that time all things were ſo peaceable "and quiet, that he thought there had been nothing "doing againſt the Articles, even in private. But he "was ſure, that in publick, in Divinity exerciſes, "either in the ſchools, or in St. Mary's, where he "had been continually preſent, he had not heard the "leaſt contradiction; . . . ſo that it was very proba- "ble, that the former troubleſome controverſies would "within a ſhort time have worn out of men's minds, "and been forgotten; but that the unhappy, as he "called it, and unexpected reviving of them by Dr. "Baro in his Sermon, would be, he feared, a great "and dangerous occaſion of overturning that quiet "ſtate they enjoyed. For notwithſtanding the Vice- "Chancellor's orders, which had been notified to "him, and the private advertiſements that had been "given him, yet the whole courſe of his Sermon was "concerning the ſame controverſies; and eſpecially "the three laſt propoſitions concerning Univerſal "Grace, were by him oppoſed, and even with more "earneſtneſs and vehemency, than was remembred "that he ever ſhewed before; to the great offence and "grief of all, who were ſoundly affected to the truth, and "to the encouragement of his diſciples and adherents. "This was the more ſtrange and unexpected, ſince the "text he choſe gave no manner of occaſion to treat "of thoſe ſubjects; it being James i. 27. (Pure Re- "ligion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, "to viſit &c.)" This is the account, which the Vice-Chancellor gave of Baro's Sermon, in order to lay the charge of diſobedience and faction as home upon him as he could. The ſame day he confered privately and ſeverally, firſt with Dr. Clayton, and then with Mr. Chaderton, two of the Heads, who were preſent at the Sermon, in order to know what they thought of it. He found them of the ſame opinion with him; they wondered, they grieved, that Baro durſt revive theſe matters; they feared it would be an occaſion of diſturbing again the peace of the Univerſity, which began to be ſettled; unleſs ſome effectual remedy were in time provided. This the Vice-Chancellor acquainted the Archbiſhop with in the ſame letter, adding, "that the care of this affair lay in him "as Vice-Chancellor, but that he was perplexed, not "knowing what courſe to take, nor by what ſtatute "to deal with Baro. Therefore he deſired his Grace's "advice, the more ſince he was reſolved ſhortly to "call Baro before him, and before the Heads of the "Colleges. Unleſs it ſhould pleaſe his Grace, in con- "ſideration that he taught againſt the Lambeth Arti- "cles, to call him before the High-Commiſſion (8)."

(8) Life of Whitgift, ubi ſupra, pag. 467, 468.

[E] A letter which his Grace wrote to the Vice-Chancellor.] That letter is dated January the 16th. The Archbiſhop ſays, "that he was very ſorry Baro "ſhould ſtill continue his troubleſome courſe of con- "tending, notwithſtanding all the advice that had "been given to him, and the ſolemn promiſe he had "made. That he had lately informed him, how "angry her Majeſty had been againſt him for theſe "cauſes, and how improper it was for him, who "was a ſtranger, and had been ſo kindly received "here, to be thus buſy in another Commonwealth, "and make himſelf the author of new diſputes and "diviſions. That when Baro was laſt at London, he "(the Archbiſhop) ſhewed him the propoſitions, and "aſked his opinion of every one of them ſeverally, "and that at two different times. And tho' the laſt "time he ſeemed to make ſome frivolous and childiſh "objections againſt one or two of them only; yet he "did confeſs that they were all true, and that they "were not repugnant to any of his aſſertions. Therefore "the Archbiſhop ſaid, he could not but wonder what "his meaning could be thus to act contrary to the "charge given him, and to which he promiſed to "ſubmit. This the Archbiſhop deſired the Vice- "Chancellor to repreſent to Baro, when he ſhould ap- "pear before him. He added, that he ſuſpected Baro "had received ſome kind of encouragement from "thoſe, who eſteemed his judgment in theſe matters, "and took a delight in commending him both pub- "lickly and in private. That poſſibly alſo Baro "might have heard, that the Lambeth Articles were diſ- "liked by ſome perſons in authority (9); but that if "he depended upon this, he might probably find "himſelf after all diſappointed in his expectations. "The Archbiſhop's advice to the Vice-Chancellor "was, Baro's friend.

(9) The Archbiſhop meant perhaps the Lord Treaſurer Burghley, who was the 19th, 21ſt, and 29th. He was charged with having preached ſuch doctrines in his late Sermon, whereby he had revived the controverſies that were pacified, againſt the peace of the Univerſity, and the command of the Vice-Chancellor, ſignified to all the Colleges, as alſo againſt the propoſitions approved of by the moſt Reverend Fathers [F]. The reader will find hereunder the particular Articles, with which Dr. Baro was charged, and his anſwer to them [G]. At his laſt appearance January the 29th, the concluſion was, "That whereas Baro had promiſed to the Vice-Chancellor upon his de-"mand a copy of his Sermon, but his Lawyers had adviſed him not to deliver the ſame, "the "was, that he ſhould call Baro before him, and re-"quire a copy of his Sermon, or at leaſt, command "him to ſet down in writing the principal points "thereof; and alſo demand of him, what could move "him to continue that courſe, notwithſtanding the "orders given to prevent new diſputes, and the many "advertiſements he had received. Laſtly, as the "Lambeth Articles made ſome noiſe (10), his Grace "adviſed the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of the Col-"leges not to proceed to any determination againſt "Baro, till they had acquainted him (the Archbiſhop) "with his anſwer, and with the particular points of "his Sermon, and received his Grace's directions con-"cerning what was beſt to be done in this affair (11)." We may obſerve here, that tho' Baro acknowledged the truth of the Lambeth Articles, as the Archbiſhop here ſays, it was only by explaining them in ſuch a ſenſe, as was not very conſiſtent with the intention of thoſe, who drew them up, that is, with abſolute predeſtination, as appears by his expoſition of them, mentioned above (12). We ſhall give but one inſtance of it; it is, his expoſition of the fourth Article; the Article is as follows: Thoſe who are not predeſtinated to ſalvation, ſhall be neceſſarily damned for their ſins. This Baro explains in the following manner: "They, who on "account of their obſtinacy in their ſins and final in-"credulity, are not partakers of Divine Predeſtinati-"on, ſhall neceſſarily be damned for theſe their ſins "and incredulity. For it is neceſſary, that they "who do not believe ſhould periſh. But this neceſſity "is not abſolute, but only hypothetical, or condi-"tional; becauſe being addicted to their ſins, they "do not receive the Goſpel, or having received it, "rejected it again." His own words are, Qui propter contumaciam in peccatis, & finalem incredulitatem divinæ prædeſtinationis non ſunt participes, neceſſario propter illa ſua peccata & incredulitatem damnabuntur. Neceſſe enim eſt, ut pereant, qui non credunt. Sed hæc neceſſitas non eſt ſimplex & abſoluta, verum ex iſta tantum hypotheſi, quod ſcilicet peccatis addicti, Evangelium non recipiant, vel receptum rejiciant.

[F] Againſt the propoſitions approved of by the moſt Reverend Fathers.] Theſe words, the moſt Reverend Fathers, have ſomething awful in them; but if we enquire into the authority, by which the Lambeth Articles were ſet forth, we ſhall find, that they could by no means be binding. Let us hear Dr. Heylin upon this ſubject. "The authority by which they were "made, ſays he (13), was ſo far from being legal and "ſufficient, that it was plainly none at all. For "what authority could there be in ſo thin a meeting "conſiſting only of the Archbiſhop himſelf, two o-"ther Biſhops, of which but one had actually receiv-"ed conſecration, one Dean, and half a dozen Doc-"tors and other Miniſters, neither empowered to any "ſuch thing by the reſt of the Clergy, nor authorized "to it by the Queen? And therefore their determina-"tions were of no more authority, as to the binding "of the Church, or preſcribing to the judgment of "particular perſons, than as if one Earl, the eldeſt "ſon of two or three others, meeting with half a do-"zen Gentlemen in Weſtminſter-Hall, can be affirm-"ed to be in a capacity of making Orders, which "muſt be looked upon by the ſubjects as Acts of Par-"liament. A Declaration they might make of their "own opinions, or of that, which they thought fitteſt "to be holden in the preſent caſe, but neither Articles "nor Canons to direct the Church; for being but "opinions ſtill, and the opinions of private and par-"ticular perſons, they were not to be looked upon as "publick doctrines. And ſo much was confeſſed by "the Archbiſhop himſelf, when he was called in que-"ſtion for it before the Queen. For her Majeſty, "being acquainted with all that paſſed by the Lord "Burghley, who neither liked the tenets, nor the "manner of proceeding in them, was moſt paſſion-"ately offended, that any ſuch innovation ſhould be "made in the publick doctrine of this Church, and "once reſolved to have them all attainted of a Præ-"munire. But afterwards, upon the interpoſition of "ſome friends, and the high eſteem ſhe had for the "excellent Prelate, the Archbiſhop, whom ſhe com-"monly called her black Husband, ſhe was willing "to admit him to his defence; and he accordingly "declared in all humble manner, that he and his aſ-"ſociates had not made any Articles, Canons, or "Decrees, with an intent, that they ſhould ſerve here-"after for a ſtanding rule to direct the Church, but "only had reſolved on ſome propoſitions to be ſent to "Cambridge, for the appeaſing of ſome unhappy dif-"ferences in the Univerſity. Her Majeſty being "ſomewhat appeaſed with this anſwer, commanded "nevertheleſs, that he ſhould ſpeedily recall and ſup-"preſs thoſe Articles; which was performed with ſuch "care and diligence, that a copy of them was not to "found for a long time after. And though we may "admit this relation upon the Hiſtory of the Lambeth "Articles printed in Latin in 1651, or on the credit "of Biſhop Mountague, who affirms the ſame in his "Appeal (14), Anno 1625; yet ſince the authority of "both has been called in queſtion, we will take "our warrant for this narrative from ſome other "hands; and firſt we have it in a book called Ne-"ceſſaria Reſponſio (15), publiſhed by the Remonſtrants "in 1618, who poſſibly might have had the whole "ſtory of it from the mouth of Baroe (16), or ſome "other, who lived at that time at Cambridge, and "might be well acquainted with the former paſſages. "And ſecondly, we find the ſame aſſerted by the Bi-"ſhops of Rocheſter, Oxon, and St. David's in a "Letter (17) to the Duke of Buckingham, Auguſt "the 2d 1625, in which they ſignify to him, that "the ſaid Articles being agreed upon, and ready to "be publiſhed, it pleaſed Queen Elizabeth upon no-"tice given how little they agreed with the practice "of piety, and obedience to all government, to cauſe "them to be ſuppreſſed, and that they had continued "ſo ever ſince, till then of late ſome of them had re-"ceived countenance from the Synod of Dort." We may judge from this account, with how much juſtice Dr. Baro was proſecuted and brought into trouble, either for not admitting theſe Articles, or for preaching againſt them, ſince they were eſtabliſhed by no competent Authority.

[G] The particular Articles with which Dr. Baro was charged, and his anſwer to them.] The Articles with which he was charged, as we find them in Mr. Strype's Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift (18), were as follow. I. That God by an abſolute will created all men and every individual for eternal life; for he created them all according to his own image, and therefore for happineſs; ſo that he deprives no body of ſalvation, but for his ſins. II. That there is a twofold will in God, an antecedent and a conſequent will: that by his antecedent will God rejects no body, otherwiſe he would condemn his own work. To explain this, Dr. Baro alledged the inſtance of a King, a Father, and an Huſbandman; a King makes Laws for the good of his ſubjects; a Father does not beget a ſon to have him hanged, or to diſinherit him; an Huſbandman does not plant a tree, to root it out again. III. That Chriſt died for all men; and that they all might know they can find a remedy in him; according to what is ſaid, that Chriſt came to ſave that which was loſt (19). But all were loſt in Adam; therefore he came to ſave all; for the remedy muſt be as extenſive as the evil is; and God is no reſpecter of perſons (20). IV. That God's promiſes are univerſal, and relate to Cain,

(10) At London it ſeems, and at Court.

(11) Life of Whitgift, ubi ſupra, pag. 468, 469.

(12) Quot. (7).

(13) Quinquarticular Hiſt. pag. 3. ch. 20. §3. in the Collection of his Hiſtorical and Miſcellaneous Tracts, printed in 1681, fol. pag. 622, 623.

(14) Pag. 71.

(15) Reſp. Nec. pag. 146.

(16) Thus Dr. Heylin writes the name of our Baro.

(17) Cabala pag. 117.

(18) Ubi ſupra, ch. 18. p. 470.

(19) Matth. xviii. 11.

(20) Act. x. 34.

" the Vice-Chancellor did now, by virtue of his authority peremptorily command him " to deliver him the whole and entire Sermon, as to the ſubſtance of it, in writing, which " Baro accordingly promiſed he would do the next day. And laſtly he did peremptorily " and by virtue of his authority command him, that he ſhould wholly abſtain from thoſe " controverſies, propoſitions and articles, and leave them altogether untouched as well in " his Lectures, Sermons, and Determinations, as in his Diſputations, and other Exerciſes." They did not think it proper to proceed further againſt him, without advice from their Superiors; therefore the Vice-Chancellor wrote an account of this whole affair to the Chancellor [H] that very day; and it is ſtrange he had not done it before, the matter having been ſo long in debate (i). The Vice-Chancellor's account being calculated to render Dr. Baro criminal in the eyes of the Lord Burghley, he did not neglect in his own defence to repreſent his caſe to him [I]; upon which the Chancellor wrote to the Heads of the (i) Ibid. ch. 18. pag. 470, 471.

Cain, as well as to Abel; to Eſau as well as to Jacob; to Judas as well as to Peter. That Cain was not more rejected of God, than Abel, before he excluded himſelf; that men exclude themſelves from heaven, but God does not exclude them, according to this paſſage, O Iſrael, thou haſt deſtroyed thyſelf (18). He acknowledged that he had aſſerted theſe propoſitions, but maintained that they were not repugnant to the nine Articles (19). And with regard to the Grace of God ſufficient to eternal ſalvation, which Grace he had ſaid was offered to all, he interpreted his words thus, Quoad homines univerſos, non quoad menſuram gratiæ datæ. That is, " With reſpect to all men in general, but not " to the meaſure in which Grace was given them." For to ſome, ſaid he, was given the greater Grace, to others leſs, to ſome more talents, to others fewer. To which the Vice-Chancellor anſwered, that his opinion of univerſal Grace ſufficient for ſalvation was not only repugnant to the propoſitions of Lambeth, but alſo againſt experience; becauſe out of the Church, the Turks, and other Barbarous Nations, altho' they had external gifts, common to this life, granted them by God, yet were altogether deſtitute of Grace ſufficient to ſalvation (20). We are not told what Baro anſwered to this objection, which is indeed very preſſing againſt thoſe, who maintaining the Arminian ſyſtem, do yet deny, that thoſe to whom the Goſpel has not been made known, will be ſaved, if they make a good uſe of their reaſon, and obſerve the precepts of Natural Religion (21).

(18) Hoſea xiii. 9.

(19) See the remark [M].

(20) Life of Whitgift, ubi ſupra, p. 471.

(21) See An Anſwer to the Poſtſcript of the ſecond part of Scripture Vindicated, printed for Knapton, in 1731.

[H] The Vice-Chancellor wrote an account of this whole affair to the Chancellor.] " So is it, Right Honourable, (ſays he) that certain new controverſies being " here raiſed about ſubſtantial points of Religion, to " the great trouble of the Univerſity, before my coming in office, it pleaſed God ſhortly after my entrance, " by the good travail of my Lord his Grace of Canterbury, my Lord of London, and other Divines there, " to bleſs us with a good ſucceſs and a happy peace " and quietneſs in the Univerſity Untill Dr. Baro, " the Lady Margaret's Reader in Divinity, contrary to " the good advice given by my Lord of Canterbury in " his letter, to the commandment given by me to every " College, and particularly ſignified to him Dr. Baro " (22), and againſt the peace of the Univerſity, did " again offenſively revive in publick the ſaid controverſies by his Sermon." He added, " That for remedy thereof, this evil being ſo dangerous to the " peace of the Univerſity and the Church, he had, " with the advice and aſſiſtance of ſuch of the Heads " as were at home, proceeded in ſuch a manner, as " would appear by the copies he ſent to his Lordſhip " (23). That this being a matter of ſuch importance " and eccleſiaſtical concernment, he had thought fit " alſo to acquaint his Grace of Canterbury therewith, " in order to ſtop the inconveniencies already in part " ſuffered amongſt them, and to prevent in time thoſe " evils which were like to break out in the Univerſity, and conſequently in the Church, upon this " publick occaſion. Therefore it was his requeſt, " that it might pleaſe his Lordſhip to direct him, " and the reſt of the Heads preſent, with his wiſe " and honourable advice, the rather becauſe there " wanted a ſufficient number of Heads at home. And " he ſaid, that he would reſt without any further proceedings againſt the party, till he received his Lordſhip's advice. Yet meaning, with his conſent, to " retain the final determination there, in regard to " the Univerſity's juriſdiction and privileges, which " he was obliged to maintain." Dated from King's College, Cambridge, January the 29th, 1595. We may obſerve upon this letter, that tho' it be not poſitively ſaid, that Baro preached againſt the Lambeth Articles, yet it is ſufficiently inſinuated, and no notice is taken of what he ſaid in his own defence. For the Articles, which were ſent together with this letter, were drawn up by Baro's adverſaries, and therefore not to be depended upon without being compared with his anſwers (24).

(22) His name is always written Barow in this Letter.

(23) The one contained the four Articles mentioned in the foregoing notes; the other may be ſeen in the Appendix to the 4th book of the Life of Whitgift, numb. 26.

(24) Life of Whitgift, ubi ſupra, ch. 18. p. 471, 472.

[I] He repreſented his caſe to the Lord Burghley.] Here follows a tranſlation of his Letter to that Lord (25). " It is with the utmoſt grief, moſt noble Lord, " ſays he, that I hear, Dr. Goad Vice-Chancellor of " this Univerſity has accuſed me before your Lordſhip, nor do I well know what it is he charges me " with. For which reaſon I make bold to write to " you, in order to ſay plainly and with ingenuity " before your Lordſhip what has given him a pretence to attack me, and if I have failed in any " thing, I willingly ſubmit to your Lordſhip's judgment and cenſure." He then gives an account of his Sermon, the ſame as we have given above (26). Then he adds, " This did not pleaſe ſome, who " endeavour to perſuade us, that God has purpoſely " created, and ſtill creates every day, the greateſt " part of mankind for deſtruction, in order to be glorified by their damnation: and that Chriſt did not " die for all men, not becauſe many reject the benefit of his death, but becauſe he himſelf is not willing that his death ſhould prove beneficial to them, " they not being like others predeſtinated to ſalvation, but created for deſtruction. For that reaſon alſo " they deny God's promiſes to be univerſal &c. (27). " Theſe then are the ſubjects for which I ſtand accuſed, and for theſe I am traduced before your Lordſhip. Indeed I own, with that frankneſs and ingenuity, which becomes a man, who ſpeaks before " ſo learned and religious a Judge as you are, that I " have ſaid thoſe things, and ſtill believe them to be " true, and the very foundation of our, that is, the " Chriſtian Religion. The Vice-Chancellor has acted with me in ſuch a manner, as not to charge me " with having delivered falſe doctrine, but rather with " having ſpoken againſt the nine Articles, which were " lately tranſmitted hither. This I denied, and ſaid " I had not the leaſt thought of it, intending only to " maintain the truth of the Goſpel-Doctrine againſt " John Piſcator. This is a true account of the whole " matter. If I have done any thing amiſs, I am in " your Lordſhip's power, nor, as I have ſaid, do I " decline your judgment. This only I beg of you, " for God's ſake, whoſe Religion is here concerned, " that according to your celebrated wiſdom and clemency, before you pronounce any thing concerning me, or entertain any ill opinion of me, you " will be pleaſed to enquire into the truth of the three " Articles I have mentioned, according to your known " piety and learning. And if you find that I ſpoke " nothing but the truth, you will be ſo kind as to " prevent the Vice-Chancellor from making any ſevere " decree againſt me. It is indeed very hard upon " me, that having taught Divinity twenty four years " in your Univerſity, and that for the ſmall ſalary of " twenty pounds a year, now that I am worn out with " age, and expected ſome reward for my long labours, " from your Lordſhip, our Chancellor, a Man of Letters, " and the Patron of the learned, I ſhould be thus defamed to you. However your ſound and ſolid " judgment in the moſt difficult and abſtruſe matters " is a comfort to me; and gives me hopes, that your " Lordſhip

(25) Ibid. App. to B. 4. num. 28.

(26) Rem. [C].

(27) See ibid.

the Colleges in ſuch a manner, as diſcountenanced their proceedings againſt the Profeſſor [K]; which appears by his continuing in his poſt till his reſignation (k). He had ſtill ſome friends left even in the Univerſity [L], but he had much trouble and oppoſition to ſuffer from the Vice-Chancellor, and from Mr. Chaderton, who had ſeveral years before conceived a prejudice againſt him, and took this opportunity to deprive him, if poſſible, of his Profeſſorſhip, on the plauſible pretence that he had in his Sermon contradicted the Lambeth Articles: this they laboured to perſuade the Archbiſhop, which obliged Baro to write another Letter to his Grace in his own vindication [M]. This letter is dated February the fourth. The Archbiſhop knowing his great learning and merit, would not prejudice him either in his place or reputation, but only charged him to forbear thoſe arguments and ſubjects, which would provoke contentious diſputations. Baro returned him thanks in a letter [N] dated March the 22d 159⅝ (l), and the time of his Profeſſorſhip

(k) This expreſſion of Mr. Strype's is not exact, for he did not properly reſign his place; ſee the note [O].

(l) Ibid. p. 473, 467.

" Lordſhip will keep an ear open to me: Here I reſt " as in a ſafe harbour, praying to God, &c." Dated at Cambridge, February the 9th, 1595.

[K] Diſcountenanced their proceedings againſt the Profeſſor.] We have not the entire letter of the Lord Burleigh, but only ſome ſhort ſentences of it, relating to the Vice-Chancellor's and the Heads of the Colleges vigorous proceedings againſt Baro, and their putting interrogatories to him, as tho' he had been ſome great offender. Yet theſe ſhort ſentences ſufficiently ſhew the Chancellor's mind; therefore we ſhall tranſcribe them here, as we find them in the Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift (27). " I am ſorry to hear &c. The matters I can- " not conceive, as others take them, &c. Broached " and publiſh'd by, &c. Whereby came to the Queen, " &c. (Theſe were ſome of their accuſations of Baro in their letter to the Chancellor, which he ſaid he could not conceive as they took them.) " As good and " as ancient are of another judgment, &c. Omnia " licent, at omnia non expediunt &c. That is, All " things are lawful, but all things are not expedient " (28). Ye may puniſh him if ye will, but ye ſhall " do it for well doing, &c. in holding the truth in " my opinion. Ye ſift him with interrogatories, as " if he were a thief, &c. This ſeems done of ſto- " mach amongſt you, &c. The witneſſes do not a- " gree (which he obſerved by the depoſitions, that were ſent him of a great many Bachelors of Divinity, and ſome Maſters of Art, that heard Baro's " Sermon.) If he has done contrary to order and " commandment, in renewing therein, (that is, the controverſies and contentions about thoſe diſputed points, that were pretty well quieted) " he has not " well done; I will write to him myſelf, and charge " him as Chancellor, &c." (that is, to forbear any further mentioning thoſe doctrines either in his readings or diſputations. It appears from hence, that tho' the Chancellor was deſirous to preſerve the peace of the Univerſity, yet he was far from condemning Baro's opinions, nor did he approve the proceedings againſt him. What conſequence may be inferred from the Chancellor's conduct will appear below (29).

(27) Ubi ſupra, pag. 473.

(28) 1 Cor. vi. 12.

(29) Note [O].

[L] He had ſtill ſome friends left, even in the Univerſity.] Mr. Overal, Dr. Clayton, Mr. Harſnet, and Dr. Andrews favoured his cauſe. The latter was at this time with the Archbiſhop, ſo that Baro thought proper to write to him, to recommend his caſe to that Prelate, who ſeemed not to be averſe to the doctrine of univerſal Grace, and of God's good Will to all mankind; for there was a good underſtanding between him and Dr. Andrews. It appears by Baro's letter to the latter, that Mr. Overal (who was now Regius Profeſſor in the room of Whitaker), freely and openly declared himſelf of Baro's opinion, when he appeared before the Vice-Chancellor, and that Dr. Clayton on the ſame occaſion had not obſcurely favoured him. Their agreeing with him had no doubt a great influence upon the Vice-Chancellor's conduct, who when that meeting broke up, declared, that there might be another concerning the ſame matter, becauſe all things could not be tranſacted at once (30). It is probable that the Vice-Chancellor, ſeeing that Baro was ſupported by ſeveral eminent men, who were of his opinion, durſt not carry his proceedings ſo far as he would have otherwiſe done. There are in this letter of Dr. Baro to Dr. Andrews ſome other particulars, which deſerve to be mentioned. Baro acquaints his friend, that a book was publiſhed, in which were the following propoſitions: Chriſt died for all neither ſufficiently nor efficaciouſly; and in the margin it was written, We muſt not pray for all men. Alſo in another place, God willeth ſin, and worketh it. This book was printed at London 1594. Baro alſo tells his friend, that Mr. Perkins had confuted the reaſons, which Mr. Overal had alledged to prove that Chriſt died for all; he added that Mr. Overal had obtained from the Biſhops of Canterbury and London, that thoſe, who contradicted him on account of his preaching pro Chriſto (in vindication of Chriſt's merits) ſhould be repreſſed. He added, that if ſuch letters might be obtained, peace would be better provided for (31). It appears by this, that Dr. Baro, tho' a learned and pious man, was not free from faults; and that contrary to the cuſtom of thoſe, who when they ſuffer perſecution preach up a general Toleration, he tho' under great troubles on account of his ſentiments, would reſtrain others from publiſhing theirs.

(30) Life of Whitgift, ubi ſupra, pag. 473.

(31) Ibid. pag. 474.

[M] Another letter to his Grace, in his own vindication.] He tells the Archbiſhop, " that when he heard " that thoſe two perſons (Dr. Goad, and Mr. Chaderton who chiefly attempted theſe things againſt him;) " went ſtill forwards, moving every ſtone, to prove, " that . . . he had made a Sermon againſt ſix of the " nine Articles, he could not but fly to him, who was " his friendly ſafeguard, that he might not be oppreſſed by their arts, which he wiſhed were known to " him. Therefore he humbly and earneſtly beſought " him, that he would read ſomething, which he " here ſhould propoſe to him. . . . Firſt, that they, as " his Grace very well knew, had for many years paſt " been evil affected towards him, and that for no other " cauſe, than that he approved of the rights and ſtate " of this Church and acquieſced in it. Tho' one of " them, viz. Mr. Chaderton, might have beſides a ſpecial cauſe of hatred againſt him, namely that he defended and ſhewed againſt him, that Faith was " commanded by the Law (32). And that hence certainly it was, that taking hold of this occaſion " from his Sermon, they moved every thing againſt " him. And that although they would ſeem to deal " with him by law, yet they regarded not to retain " the form of law; for this one thing ſeemed enough " to Mr. Vice-Chancellor, to have accuſers and witneſſes, that he might prove, that he ſpoke ſuch " and ſuch things, which he did not deny; but that " he ſpoke againſt the Articles, which was the matter of law, belonged to Judges and not to witneſſes." He then gives again an account of the three propoſitions of his Sermon, and ſhews that he did not intend to ſpeak againſt the Articles, which he had not ſo much as mentioned. Laſtly, he told the Archbiſhop, that he was forbid by the Vice-Chancellor, to treat either in Lectures or Diſputations, of the matters controverted; which he promiſed to obſerve, but at the ſame time, he aſked the Vice-Chancellor to explain, of what matters controverted he underſtood it, which nevertheleſs was not defined by him, tho' he thought it was meant of the Lambeth Articles. But fearing ſome advantage might notwithſtanding be taken againſt whatſoever he might read or ſay, he obſerv'd that if they were to proceed by conſequences, an occaſion would eaſily be taken from one word. But he promiſed the Archbiſhop, that he would take as much pains and care as poſſibly he could, that even that might not happen. Wherefore he earneſtly beſeeched his Grace, who he ſaid was his patron, that he would ſoon determine concerning theſe things (33).

(32) See Strype's Annals, vol. 3. pag. 48.

(33) Life of Whitgift, ubi ſupra, pag. 475, 476.

[N] Returned him thanks in a letter.] He told the Archbiſhop, that he was now reſcued at length by his ſhip ending three days after, he did not think fit to ſtand again for it at the new election [O], but retired to London, where he died three or four years after (m), and was decently buried in the Pariſh-Church of St. Olave-Hartſtreet, his pall being ſupported by ſix Doctors of Divinity, and his corps attended by the Miniſters of the City, according to an order of Dr. Bancroft, then Biſhop of London. Baro left ſeveral children behind him; his eldeſt ſon Samuel Baro was a Phyſician, and lived and died at Lyn-Regis in Norfolk (n).

(m) Dr. P. Heylin's Quinquarticular Hiſtory, B. 3. ch. 21. § 9. In a Collection of his Hiſtorical and Miſcellaneous Tracts, printed in 1681. fol. pag. 626.

(n) Strype's Ann. vol. 4. pag. 231.

his favour from thoſe perſecutions, with which he was ſo oppreſſed before: For he obſerved that ſince the return of the Vice-Chancellor (who it ſeems had been with the Archbiſhop, and received his inſtructions) neither he, nor any one elſe had ſpoken to him of paſt matters; which he doubted not but was done out of a reverence to his Grace; otherwiſe, thoſe who laboured thus againſt him, would have very hardly deſiſted; for they were thoſe very perſons, who, if he miſtook not, did ten or eleven years before decree certain things againſt him unheard, in a clandeſtine Synod held at London, (probably by Cartwright and his followers), the Acts of which were with his Grace; and having been informed of it by one Fontanus, he preſently took a journey to London, and complained to Dr. Goad, who had been preſent at that Synod in King's-College houſe near the Thames; praying him, that he would at leaſt ſhew him, what they had decreed concerning him, or againſt him; which he ſaid he could not obtain of him, nor knew it, before Dr. Bancroft, by the Archbiſhop's commands, ſhewed it him in a certain book three or four years ago. It was from that time, he ſaid, that they hated him, and always privily obſerved him, till at laſt they took occaſion from his Sermon, to endeavour to caſt him out of the Univerſity with ſhame, which, as they had prepared all things againſt him, they had eaſily performed, if they had not been prevented by his Grace's authority, and as with a bridle reſtrained (33). The reſt of the letter contains his thanks for this favour; and his petition for his Grace's pardon, if, tho' what he had ſaid in his Sermon be true, yet he had failed in ſpeaking the truth in an improper place, which occaſioned all the trouble he underwent, promiſing to be more cautious and prudent for the future (34).

(33) Ibid. pag. 476.

(34) Ibid. pag. 477.

[O] The time of his Profeſſorſhip ending three days after, he did not think fit to ſtand again for it at the new election.] Let us hear Dr. Heylin's account of this matter, which will correct the errors of Dr. Fuller, in that paſſage, which Mr. Des Maizeaux communicated to Mr. Bayle. "The Lambeth Articles, ſays Dr. Heylin (35), were ſo far from appeaſing the preſent controverſies, and ſuppreſſing Baro and his party, that his diſciples and adherents became more united, and the breach wider than before. And tho' Dr. Baro not long after deſerted his place in the Univerſity, yet neither was he deprived of his Profeſſorſhip, as ſome ſay, nor forced to leave it for fear of being deprived, as is ſaid by others. For that Profeſſorſhip being choſen from two years to two years, according to the Statutes of Lady Margaret, he kept the place till the expiring of his term, and then gave off, without ſo much as ſhewing himſelf a ſuitor for it; which had he done, it may be probable enough that he had carried it from any other candidate or competitor, of what rank ſoever; the Anti-Calvinian party being grown ſo ſtrong, as not to be eaſily overborn in a publick buſineſs by the oppoſite faction. This appears plainly by what followed on the death of Dr. Whitaker; who died within a few days after his return to Lambeth with the nine Articles ſo much talk'd of. Two Candidates appeared for the Profeſſorſhip after his deceaſe: Wotton of King's College, a profeſſed Calvinian and one of thoſe who wrote againſt Mountague's Appeal in 1626, competitor with Overal of Trinity-College, almoſt as far from the Calvinian doctrine in the main platform of Predeſtination, as Baro, Hurſnet, or Barret are conceived to be. But when it came to the vote of the Univerſity, the place was carried for Overal by the major part: which as it plainly ſhews, that tho' the doctrines of Calvin were ſo hotly ſtickled for here by moſt of the Heads, yet the greater part of the learned body entertained them not; ſo does it alſo render it very improbable, that Baro ſhould be put out of his place, by thoſe who had taken in Overal, or not confirmed therein, if he had deſired. And therefore we may rather think, as before is ſaid, that he relinquiſhed the place of his own accord, in which he found his doctrine croſſed by the Lambeth Articles, and afterwards his peace diſtracted by ſeveral informations brought againſt him, by the adverſe faction." This account is the more probable, ſince, as we have ſeen, he was ſupported and favoured by the Chancellor of the Univerſity, and by the Archbiſhop. It is to be wondered that the Gentleman, who ſent Mr. Bayle the abſtract from Fuller, ſhould take no notice of Dr. Heylyn's confutation of it, or ſhould not have known that there was ſuch a confutation. As for Baro having introduced a new doctrine, this is fully confuted by Dr. Heylin, who ſhews from Latimer, Hooper, and others, as alſo from the very Articles of the Church of England, and particularly from the ſeventeenth, that abſolute Predeſtination in the ſenſe of Calvin, is not the doctrine of the Church of England (36). How then can Baro be ſaid to have introduced a new Doctrine to poiſon the Univerſity? This Mr. Des Maizeaux ought to have obſerved. But perhaps Heylin's works were not then known to him. P.

(35) Ubi ſupra, § 4. pag. 623.

(36) Ibid. pag. 2. ch. 9, 10. & alibi paſſim.

BARON (VINCENT) in Latin Baronius, a Monk of the Order of St. Dominic, was eſteemed in the ſeventeenth Century for ſeveral books which he publiſhed. He had for an antagoniſt the famous Theophilus Raynaud; and I cannot tell whether his deſire of engaging with ſo renowned a champion did not occaſion him to take for that Jeſuit's Work what was not ſo. He acknowledged ſometimes that he was miſtaken in his conjectures upon that point. The works of Father Baron, which are come to my knowledge, are a book concerning Juſtification againſt the Doctrine of the Calviniſts; a moral Theology divided into three parts [A], and an Apology for his

[A] He wrote a Moral Theology, divided into three parts.] The firſt is deſigned againſt the Doctrine of Probability, adverſus laxiores probabiliſtas (1). In that part he confutes Caramuel, who had written four Letters againſt the Diſſertation, which Mr. Fagnano, Dean of the Prelates of Rome, had inſerted in his Commentaries upon the Canon Law. Mr. Fagnano maintains very ſtrongly, that an opinion, which is thought to be leſs probable, ought never to be preferred to one which is believed more probable. Caramuel confutes this, and was himſelf confuted by our Vincent Baron. Father Theophilus Raynaud was confuted in the ſame Work, with regard to an opinion of Suarez condemned by Clement VIII. Suarez had aſſerted that a perſon might confeſs by Letters: Father Theophilus contrived ſome Expedients to defend his brother againſt the Pope's cenſure; and it was againſt theſe Expedients that Father Baron took up his pen. He attacked at the ſame time the Janſeniſts, ſince he maintained to Wendrokius, that there are ſome caſes, though very rare, in which there may be an invincible ignorance with reſpect both to the Law of Nature, and the Poſitive Law (2). In the ſecond part he attacks Amadæus Guimenius, and not only aſſerts that the looſe opinions imputed to the Dominicans are not their true ſentiments; but ſhews likewiſe what judgment is to be formed of thoſe opinions. He acknowledges in his preface the error which he had fallen into

(1) See the Journal des Savans for the 8th of March 1666, pag. 194.

(2) Ibid. pag. 198.

his Order [B]. In his moral Theology he has chosen the principal points, which are in dispute between the Dominicans and Jesuits. He was a celebrated Preacher.

Here is a memorial which I have recovered since the first edition of this Work (a). " Father Vincent Baron was born at Martres in the Diocese of Rieux in Gascony. He entered into the Order of the Preaching Friars at Toulouse in the year 1622. He taught Divinity several years with applause in the Convent of the same City, and was made Prior there; as he was likewise at Avignon, and in the General Novitiate of the Suburb of St. Germain at Paris. He was Definitor for his Province in the General Chapter held in the year 1656, in which he presided at the Theses dedicated to Pope Alexander VII, which gained him the esteem of all the City and his whole Order. He was present at the Assembly, in which the Pope ordered the Definitors, and Fathers of the Chapter to be told, from him, that he was extremely grieved to see the Christian Morality sunk into such a deplorable relaxation, as some of the new Casuists had reduced it to, and that he exhorted them to compose another system of it, which should be conformable to the doctrine of St. Thomas. This was what engaged Father Baron to undertake the Works which he wrote upon that subject. He was again chosen Provincial; and afterwards sent by the Father General as Commissary to Portugal, upon important affairs, which he managed with such success, that the Queen, the Court, and all the Monks gave testimony of his merit by a public Act. He returned to Paris to the General Novitiate, and died there the 21st of January 1674, aged seventy years. Besides several Latin Poems, which he left as instances of his capacity in polite Literature, he published the Works which shall be mentioned below [C]." You will find a passage very much to his honour in the Historical Apology for the Censures of Louvain and Doway (b). The Congregation of the Index was not favourable to him [D].

(a) By means of Mr. Pinsson des Riollet.

(b) Published in 1688, by Mr. Gery, Bachelor of Divinity. This passage is in page 243.

BARONI

into in writing his book; he had imagined that Amadæus Guimenius was only a fictitious name, which Father Theophilus had assumed (3). In the third part he treats of Human Liberty, and the Media Scientia, and asserts that the Prescience of God has no other foundation than his decrees, and that this Prescience is so far from destroying the liberty of the creature, that it establishes it (4). This ought not to be considered as a paradox; for whoever should speak in a different manner, would not follow the definition of Liberty, which must be laid down in the system of Physical Predetermination. By means of the different ideas of Liberty, the contest may still be continued, and the reader may be so far imposed upon, that he shall not perceive when his cause does not succeed.

(3) Journal des Savans of the 12th of April 1666, pag. 36.

(4) Journal des Savans of the 21st of June 1666, pag. 257.

[B] . . . . And an Apology for his Order.] This work is in Latin, as well as the former. It serves for answer to the cruel Invective of Father Theophilus Raynaud intitled de Immunitate Cyriacorum à Censuris, and to that, which pretended to shew that of all the works ascribed to Thomas Aquinas, it is well if the tenth part be really his. Father Baron enters likewise into the lists with Mr. de Launoi, who maintained that several passages of the Fathers quoted in a treatise of Thomas Aquinas against the Greeks, are supposititious. This Dominican wrote not only an Apology for his Order, but even a Panegyric upon it (5).

(5) Journal des Savans, of the 7th March 1667, pag. 92.

[C] He publish'd several works, which shall be mentioned below.] What I am going to transcribe is word for word contained in the Memorial, from whence I have taken the addition to this article. " Theologia " Moralis, at Paris in 1665, in two volumes in 8vo. " Primus Tomus ejusdem correctus, Editio secunda in " 1667 in 8vo. Libri Apologetici contra Theophilum " Rainaudum, at Paris, in 1666, in two volumes in " 8vo. Mens sancti Augustini & Thomæ de Gratiâ " & Libertate, in 1666, in 8vo. Ethica Christiana, " at Paris, in 1666, in two volumes in 8vo. Re- " sponsio ad Librum Cardanæ, ibid. in 8vo. L'Here- " sie Convaincue, at Paris, in 1668, in 12mo. Pa- " negyriques des Saints, ibid. in 1660, in 4to. The " book intitled, Ethices Christianæ septemdecim loci, " written against one Matthew Moya, who had as- " sumed the name of Amadæus, was censured at Rome " by the intrigues of Cardinal Nitard, who was of- " fended at it, and Capisucchi Master of the sacred " Palace, who had approved of it, was deposed, and " Father Hyacinthe Libelli, afterwards Archbishop of " Avignon, put in his place. Capisucchi was after- " wards restored, and since made a Cardinal."

I do not find in this list of Father Baron's works the Exercitatio, which Mr. de Launoi has confuted with an incredible warmth and acrimony in one of his Letters (the XIVth of the fifth part.) See the remark [P] of the article of JOHN DE LAUNOI at the beginning.

Two or three months after I had received this Memorial, there was sent me what follows: " Apologia " pro sacrâ Congregatione Indicis, ejusque Secretario " & Dominicanis, contra Petri à Valle clausâ Libel- " lum famosum inscriptum de Immunitate Authorum " Cyriacorum à Censurâ. Romæ typis . . . . . " M.DC.LXII, in 4to. Advertat lector præter in- " numera errata ex prælo passim sensum & stylum " auctorum mutantia, addita nonnulla necessaria ser- " mone simplici, & multa adjecta convitia: has au- " tem labes tollet secunda editio. i. e. " An Apology " for the sacred Congregation of the INDEX, and their " Secretary, and for the Dominicans, against the libel " of Peter à Valle clausa, intitled, The Exemption of " the Writers among the Dominicans from Censure. " Printed at Rome by . . . . . 1662 in 4to. The " Reader may observe, that besides innumerable errors " of the press, which every where alter the sense and " style of the authors, there are some important things " in plain language, and many reproachful terms insert- " ed. The second edition will correct these faults. This " second edition was printed at Paris by Simon Piget " in 1666, in two volumes, divided into five books. " The first, printed at Rome, at the desire of Cardi- " nal Capisucchi, then Master of the Sacred Palace, " who gave his approbation of it, was the occasion " of the same Capisucchi's being deposed from his " office by Alexander VII, a great friend of the Je- " suits. It was likewise put into the Index the 28th " of February 1664."

[D] The Congregation of the Index was not favourable to him.] Here is an Extract from their Decree of the 27th of September 1672. Duo primi Tomi operum Fr. Vincentii Baronii inscripti Theologiæ Moralis Summa bipartita, prohibentur; tertius verò præfati auctoris suspenditur, donec corrigatur. Ultimi autem duo tomi ejusdem auctoris, scilicet quartus & quintus, quinque libros apologeticos continentes, pariter prohibentur (6). i. e. " The two first volumes of F. Vincent Baron's " works, intitled, Theologiæ Moralis Summæ bipartita, " are prohibited: the third volume of the same au- " thor is suspended, till it be corrected, and the last " two volumes of the same author, namely the fourth " and fifth, containing five apologetical pieces, are " likewise prohibited." See the End of the preceding remark.

(6) See Father Papebroch. Responsi. ad Exhibit. Errorum, p. 287.

BARONI (LEONORA) an Italian Lady, who had one of the fineſt voices in the world, flouriſhed in the ſeventeenth Century. She was daughter to the beautiful ADRIANA of Mantua, and was ſo greatly admired, that a prodigious number of the Wits wrote verſes in her praiſe. There is a volume of excellent pieces in Latin, Greek, French, Italian, and Spaniſh, printed at Rome under the title of Applauſi Poetici alle glorie della Signora Leonora Baroni [A]. Thoſe who would know particularly the perfections of her manner of ſinging, may read what a good judge, who heard her ſing, ſays of her [B]. It is from him that I have borrowed what I have ſaid above.

[A] There is a volume of pieces in her praiſe under the title of Applauſi Poetici alle glorie della Signora Leonora Baroni.] Nicius Erythræus ſpeaks of this work, when he ſays: Legi ego in Theatro Eleonoræ Baronæ, cantricis eximiæ, in quo omnes hic Romæ, quotquot ingenio & poeticæ facultatis laude præſtant, carminibus, tum Etruſcè tum Latinè ſcriptis, ſingulari ac prope divino mulieris illius canendi artificio tanquam fauſtos quoſdam clamores & plauſus edunt: legi, inquam, unum Lælii (Guidiccioni) Epigramma, ita purum, ita elegans &c. (1). i. e. "I have read in the Theatre of "Eleonora Baroni, an excellent Singer, in the praiſe "of whoſe extraordinary and almoſt divine manner "of ſinging, all the Wits at Rome, who have any "talent of Poetry, have publiſh'd their Congratulati-"ons both in Latin and Italian Verſe: I have read, "I ſay, in that Collection an Epigram of Lælius, "(Guidiccioni) ſo pure, and elegant, &c.

(1) Nic. Eryth. Pinac. 2. pag. 129.

[B] What a good judge, who heard her ſing, ſays of her.] "She has a fine genius, and an excellent judg-"ment in diſtinguiſhing good from bad Muſic; ſhe "underſtands it perfectly well, and even compoſes "herſelf: which qualifies her to be miſtreſs of what "ſhe ſings, and to pronounce and expreſs the ſenſe of the "words perfectly well. She does not pique herſelf "upon being a beauty; but ſhe is not diſagreeable, "and no coquet. She ſings with a bold and generous "modeſty, and with a ſweet gravity. Her voice is "ſtrong and has a great compaſs, it is juſt, ſonorous, "harmonious; ſhe ſoftens and raiſes it without any "difficulty, and without making any grimaces. Her "raptures and ſighs are not wanton; her looks have "nothing laſcivious in them, and her geſtures ſhew "a modeſty, that would become the chaſteſt virgin. "In paſſing from one tune to another, ſhe makes us "ſenſible ſometimes of the diviſions of the Enhar-"monic and Chromatic kind, with ſo much addreſs "and elegance, that every body is raviſhed with that "beautiful and difficult manner of ſinging. She has no "occaſion to deſire any perſon to aſſiſt her with a theorbo "or viol, without one of which her ſinging would "be imperfect; for ſhe plays upon theſe two inſtru-"ments perfectly herſelf. In ſhort I have had the "pleaſure of hearing her ſing ſeveral times above "thirty different Airs, with the ſecond and third "couplets, which ſhe compoſed herſelf. I muſt tell "you, that one day ſhe did me the particular favour "of ſinging with her mother and her ſiſter, her mo-"ther playing upon the lyre, her ſiſter upon the harp, "and herſelf upon the theorbo. This concert com-"poſed of three fine voices, and three different in-"ſtruments, ſurprized my ſenſes in ſo ſtrong a man-"ner, and raiſed ſuch a rapture of pleaſure in my "mind, that I forgot my mortal condition, and ima-"gined myſelf ſeated amongſt the Angels, enjoying "the happineſs of the Bleſſed in heaven." I have taken this paſſage from a Diſcourſe upon the Italian Muſick, printed with the Life of Malherbe and ſome other Tracts, at Paris in 1672, in 12mo, at the end of which we find theſe words: This Diſcourſe was writtn by Mr. Maugars, Prior of St. Peter de Mac, the King's Interpreter for the Engliſh Tongue, and likewiſe ſo famous for playing on the viol, that the King of Spain and ſeveral other Sovereigns of Europe deſired to hear him.

BARONIUS (DOMINIC) a Prieſt and Preacher of Florence in the ſixteenth Century, wrote very ſtrongly againſt the Church of Rome, and concurred with the Vandois in Piedmont to maintain the orthodox faith; but at laſt he was conſidered as a falſe brother, becauſe he aſſerted that in time of perſecution it was not neceſſary to declare the truth openly [A]. Celſus Martinengue, Miniſter of the Italian Church at Geneva, wrote againſt him upon that ſubject, and replies were made on both ſides. Theſe books are become very ſcarce, for what reaſon I cannot tell. Our Baronius compoſed a Maſs according to his own fancy, and he thought it a proper expedient for reconciling the differences of the two Religions. But he ſaw himſelf diſappointed in his attempt, for the Reformed rejected his projects (a).

(a) Taken from the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Churches of the Vaudois, written by Peter Gilles, chap. 10. p. 62, & ſeq. Geneva edit. in 1644.

[A] He aſſerted that in time of perſecution it was not neceſſary to declare the truth openly.] He does not therefore deſerve the name of Anti-Nicodemite, which Peter Gilles has given him, but rather that of Nicodemite. Let us ſee in what manner that Hiſtorian ſpeaks of him. Dominic Baronius, ſays he (1), was a Florentine, a Maſs-Prieſt, and Popiſh Preacher, of conſiderable reputation, and one who in the times of leſs danger had ſhewn ſome zeal for the true Religion, giving almoſt an entire conſent to it, and condemning almoſt all the ſuperſtitious conſtitutions of Popery: he retained but a few particular points, which he uſed to ſpeak of in ſuch ambiguous terms, that it was ſcarce poſſible to know what he believed, as appears from ſeveral Italian and Latin Tracts, which he wrote, and eſpecially from that concerning human Conſtitutions, in which he endeavoured to ſhew what might be admitted, and what ought to be rejected. In the ſame book, among ſeveral great errors, which he condemned in the Popiſh Church, he ſays of the Maſs..... I ſhall not quote the paſſage cited by Peter Gilles; but here is what follows immediately after that citation. He wrote in the ſame ſtyle of the Popiſh Superſtitions; but with all this he endeavoured to perſuade men, that in places and times of great danger it was lawful to diſſemble outwardly one's thoughts concerning ſuch errors as theſe, and even to go to Maſs, provided that a perſon conſtantly retained the truth inwardly, without approving any of thoſe errors in his heart. He ſaid that in ſuch times and places the Miniſter of Truth ought to employ himſelf among his Diſciples in ſhewing them the tares, and making them diſtinguiſh it from the good grain, and inducing them to hate the tares, and love the wheat in their heart; but with regard to the outward appearance, to let the Lord act in his own manner, without expoſing themſelves or others to great dangers..... The Sieur Celſus de Martinengue ..... confuted in an excellent long Treatiſe all the reaſons, which Baronius alledged to ſupport his opinion; and replies paſt to and fro on both ſides for ſome time. Baronius thinking himſelf capable of reconciling the two Religions, reformed the Maſs, in order, as he ſaid, that people might go to it with a ſafe conſcience, and he ſung it himſelf according to his own reformation of it, and did the ſame in ſeveral other points, imagining by this means he ſhould pleaſe all parties by thus acting the character of a Trimmer. But this conduct was condemned by a great number of ſincere Profeſſors, not only by words and writings, but likewiſe by actions, chooſing rather to loſe their earthly poſſeſſions and this temporal life, than to ſhew any outward conſent to the idolatry and ſuperſtitions of Popery (2).

(1) Peter Gilles, Hiſtory of the Churches of the Vaudois, ch. 10. pag. 62.

(2) Pierre Gilles, ibid. chap. 10. p. 64. See likewiſe p. 246.

☞BARROW (ISAAC) one of the greateſt Mathematicians and Divines of the ſeventeenth Century, was the ſon of Mr. Thomas Barrow, a Citizen of London of good reputation, brother to Dr. Iſaac Barrow Biſhop of St. Aſaph, and ſon of Iſaac Barrow of Spiny-Abby in Cambridgeſhire Eſq; (where he was in the Commiſſion of Peace for forty years,) ſon of Philip Barrow Doctor of Phyſic, a Benefactor to Trinity-College in Cambridge, and there Tutor to Robert Cecil Earl of Saliſbury, and Lord Treaſurer in the reign of King James I (a). He was born at London in October 1630 [A]. His mother was Anne, daughter of William Buggins of North-Cray in Kent Eſq; whoſe tender care he did not long enjoy, for ſhe died when he was about four years of age. His firſt education was at the Charter-Houſe for two or three years, where he behaved in ſuch a manner, as gave but little hopes of the great Man he afterwards proved [B]; but upon his removal to Felſtead in Eſſex, he ſoon made ſo conſiderable a progreſs in Learning and every valuable qualification, that his Maſter appointed him Tutor to the Lord Viſcount Fairfax of Emely in Ireland, who was then his ſcholar. During his ſtay at Felſtead he was admitted into Peter-Houſe in Cambridge, of which College his uncle, who was afterwards Biſhop of St. Aſaph, had formerly been Member; but when he was fit for and removed to the Univerſity in February 1645, he was entered into Trinity-College, where his condition being low, his father having ſuffered very much in his eſtate for his adherence to the Royal Cauſe, his chief ſupport at firſt was from the generoſity of Dr. Hammond, to whoſe memory he paid his thanks in an excellent epitaph among his Poems (b), wherein he deſcribes that great Man and himſelf too; for the moſt and nobleſt parts of that character exactly agree to them both. Here he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by an intenſe application to his ſtudies, and every inſtance of the moſt exemplary behaviour [C]; ſo that when the time came that he could be choſen Fellow of his College in the year 1649, he obtained it ſolely by his merit, having no friend to recommend him, as being of a contrary perſuaſion to thoſe, who then carried all things in the Univerſity. Upon his election he reſolved upon the profeſſion of Phyſic, but afterwards changed his intention, and turned his thoughts chiefly to the ſtudy of Divinity [D]; though

(a) See Mr. Abraham Hill's Account of the Life of Dr. Iſaac Barrow to the Reverend Dr. Tillotſon, Dean of Canterbury, prefixed to the 1ſt volume of Dr. Barrow's Works.

(b) See the 4th volume of his Works, p. 301. edit. 1687.

[A] He was born at London in October 1630.] This is the account of Mr. Abraham Hill in his Life of Dr. Barrow, addreſſed to the Reverend Dr. John Tillotſon Dean of Canterbury, and prefixed to the firſt volume of the Engliſh Works of Dr. Barrow. But Dr. Walter Pope in his Life of Dr. Seth Ward Lord Biſhop of Saliſbury (1) tells us, that this is a miſtake with regard both to the year and month, ſince he had often heard Dr. Barrow ſay, that he was born upon the twenty ninth of February; and therefore it could not be either in October or in 1630, that not being a leap-year. Dr. Pope obſerves, that he ſhould not have aſſerted this merely upon the credit of his memory, if it had been any other day of any other month, it being told him ſo long before, but that he had this remarkable circumſtance to confirm it; that Dr. Barrow uſed to ſay, it was in one reſpect the beſt day in the year to be born upon, for it afforded him this advantage over his fellow-collegiates, who uſed to keep feaſts upon their birth-day, that he was treated by them once every year; whereas he entertained them but once in four years, when February had nine and twenty days. However we may obſerve on the other hand, that Mr. Hill's account is favoured by the Epitaph upon Dr. Barrow, which was drawn up from his father's information, and tells us, that he was in the 47th year of his age, when he died in 1677.

(1) Chap. 19. pag. 129. edit. London 1697.

[B] Where he behaved in ſuch a manner, as gave but little hopes of the great man he afterwards proved.] His greateſt delight there was in ſuch ſports, as brought on fighting among his ſchool-fellows, in which he took a peculiar pleaſure himſelf. His courage remained with him ever after, yet he had perfectly ſubdued all inclination to quarrelling; but a negligence of his cloaths always continued with him (2). He abſolutely diſregarded his book; and his father had ſcarce any hopes of his ſucceſs in the profeſſion of a Scholar, to which he had deſigned him. In ſhort there was then ſo little appearance of that comfort, which his father afterwards received from him, that he often ſolemnly wiſhed, that if it pleaſed God to take away any of his children, it might be his ſon Iſaac; ſo vain a thing, as Mr. Hill obſerves, is man's judgment, and our providence unfit to guide our own affairs.

(2) Hill's Account of the Life of Dr. Barrow, &c. and Dr. Pope, pag. 131.

[C] Here he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by an intenſe application to his ſtudies, and every inſtance of the moſt exemplary behaviour.] Tho' he was now as it were without relations, yet he did not abuſe the opportunity to the neglect of his ſtudies, or the indulgence of any licentiouſneſs in his manners, but ſeaſoned his years with the principles and the exerciſe of diligence, learning, and piety, the beſt preparatives for the ſucceeding varieties of life. He continued ſo firm a Royaliſt, that he could never be prevailed upon by any means to take the Covenant; tho' he behaved with ſo much fairneſs, candour, and prudence, that he gained the good will of the chief Governors of the Univerſity (3). He was likewiſe kindly treated by Dr. Hill, whom the Parliament had appointed Maſter of Trinity-College, in the room of Dr. Comber, ejected for adhering to the King (4); and this maſter one day laying his hand upon his head, ſaid to him, Thou art a good lad; 'tis pity thou art a Cavalier. And afterwards, when he had made an oration on the Gun-Powder-Treaſon, in which he had ſo highly celebrated the former times, as to reflect much on the preſent, ſome of the Fellows moved for his expulſion; but the Maſter ſilenced them with theſe words, "Barrow is a better man, than any of us (5)." This, ſays Dr. Pope, is very remarkable, and an evident teſtimony of our young Scholar's irreſtible merits, which could, as the Poets feign of Orpheus, — Lenire Tigres rapidoſque Leones; that is, Tame ſavage tygers and fierce lions, make a Preſbyterian kind to a Cavalier and Malignant, which names the adherers to the King, Church, and Laws went under in thoſe days. When the Engagement was propoſed, he ſubſcribed it; but upon reflection repenting of what he had done, he went back to the Commiſſioners, and declared his diſſatisfaction, and procured his name to be eraſed out of the liſt. He was always ready to give the Juniors his aſſiſtance, tho' for all the exerciſes, which he made for them in verſe and proſe, he never received any recompence but one pair of gloves. While he was yet a young ſcholar, his judgment was too great to reſt ſatisfied with the ſhallow and ſuperficial ſyſtems of Natural Philoſophy then taught and received in the Univerſities, with which Students of lower abilities contented themſelves; but he applied himſelf to the reading and conſidering the writings of the Lord Bacon, Des Cartes, Galileo, and other great Genius's of the laſt Age, who ſeemed to offer ſomething more ſolid and ſubſtantial (6).

(3) Hill's Account, &c. ubi ſupra.

(4) Dr. Pope, pag. 132.

(5) Idem, ibid. and Hill's Account, ubi ſupra.

[D] Upon his election he reſolved upon the profeſſion of Phyſic; but afterwards changed his intention, and turn'd his thoughts chiefly to the ſtudy of Divinity.] He found the times not at all favourable to men of his opinion in the affairs of Church and State; and therefore in order

(6) Hill's Account, &c.

though at the ſame time he made himſelf maſter of almoſt all parts of Learning [E]. We have ſeveral Latin Orations and Theſes of his compoſition about this time, publiſhed among his Opuſcula, and particularly a ſpeech delivered upon the fifth of Nov. 1651 (c), and a Theſis defended at the Commencement 1652, wherein he endeavours to ſhew, that the Carteſian hypotheſis of Matter and Motion is not ſufficient to account for the principal Phænomena of Nature (d); and an Ode upon the ſame ſubject written in 1653 (e). July the 12th 1653 he was incorporated Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford immediately after the Act (f). When Dr. Duport reſigned the Chair of Greek Profeſſor, he recommended his pupil Mr. Barrow for his ſucceſſor; who juſtified his Tutor's opinion of him by an excellent performance of the Probation-Exerciſe. But the governing party thinking him inclined to Arminianiſm, he was diſappointed in the choice. However he always acknowledged the favour which Dr. Whichcote ſhewed him on that as on all other occaſions. Soon after this he entered upon his travels [F], in which he ſaw France and Italy, and proceeded as far as Conſtantinople. He has given us an account of his voyage

(c) Ibid. p. 327.

(d) Pag. 155.

(e) Ibid. p. 265.

(f) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 103. 2d edit. London 1721.

der to qualify himſelf, as he then thought, to do moſt good, he bent his ſtudies for ſome time towards Phyſic, and particularly made a great progreſs in the knowledge of Anatomy, Botany, and Chymiſtry. But afterwards upon deliberation with himſelf and conference with his uncle, afterwards Biſhop of St. Aſaph, he thought that profeſſion not well conſiſtent with the oath, which he had taken, when he was admitted Fellow, to make Divinity the end of his ſtudies; upon which he abandoned Phyſic, and applied himſelf principally to what his oath ſeemed to oblige him to (7).

(7) Idem, ibid.

[E] He made himſelf maſter of almoſt all parts of learning.] While he read Scaliger on Euſebius, he perceived the dependence of Chronology on Aſtronomy, which engaged him in the ſtudy of Ptolemy's Almageſt; and finding that book and all Aſtronomy to depend on Geometry, he applied himſelf to Euclid's Elements, not being ſatisfied till he had laid firm foundations. And thus he made his firſt entrance into the Mathematics, having the learned Mr. John Ray then for his companion in his ſtudies, and ſometimes his fellow-traveller in collecting of plants, and always for his very much eſteemed friend. He proceeded to the demonſtration of the other ancient Mathematicians, and publiſh'd his Eutlid in a leſs form and clearer method, than any one had been done before him. At the end of his Apollonius he has written, Intra hæc temporis intervalla peractum hoc opus; i. e. "This "work was finiſh'd between the 14th of April and "the 16th of May." In all his ſtudies his method was not to leave off his deſign, till he had brought it to effect, except in the Arabic language, in which he made an eſſay for a little while, and then deſerted it. When his opinion was demanded, he generally ſpoke to the importance as well as to the truth of the queſtion; which was an excellent advantage, and to be met with in few men's converſation; for as Cardan ſays, Tractare res multi norunt, æſtimare pauci (8).

April 14. May 16.

(8) Idem, ibid.

[F] Soon after this he entered upon his travels.] The partiality ſhewn againſt him, when he was Candidate for the Greek Profeſſorſhip was ſuppoſed by ſome to be one reaſon, that forwarded his Deſire to ſee foreign countries. And Mr. Hill obſerves, that there is no doubt but that he, who in leſs occurrences very judiciouſly conſidered all circumſtances, formed this reſolution upon good grounds. Dr. Pope tells us (9), that his diſappointment, the melancholy aſpect of public affairs, and a deſire to ſee ſome of thoſe places, which are mentioned in the Greek and Latin Writers, were the motives, which induced him to travel. In order therefore to provide for his voyage, in the year 1654 he converted his books into ready money, and went firſt to Paris, where he found his father attending the Engliſh Court, and out of his ſmall Viaticum made him a ſeaſonable preſent. He gave his College an account of his voyage thither in a Latin Poem dated from Paris February 9th 1655 (10); and made ſome farther obſervations in a Latin Letter (11), which ſhews his piercing judgment in political affairs, when he applied his thoughts that way. He gives in it an account of the diſputes between Monſr. Arnaud the Janſeniſt and the Jeſuits; and obſerves, that the ſecurity of the Proteſtants in that Kingdom then appeared evidently from a circumſtance, which had juſt before happened. The Archbiſhop of Tholouſe, celebrated among his own party for his great learning, having come to Paris, waited upon the Queen; and after other converſation, began to declaim againſt the Proteſtants, and complained, that they enjoyed too great a liberty in his Dioceſe. He deſired her Majeſty therefore to repreſs them, and reproached them with the appellations of heretics and ſeditious perſons. The Queen ſtop'd him in the midſt of his paſſionate ſpeech, and aſſured him, that ſhe had ſufficiently experienced their fidelity, and found them to be more faithful ſubjects than thoſe, who accuſed them of ſedition. Quæ ingerentem excipiens Regina, ſe illorum fidem expertam affirmavit, & fideliores ſubditos comperiſſe, quam qui ſeditionis ipſos inſimularent (12). One of the Mareſchals of France, who ſtood by the Queen, ſupported what ſhe had ſaid. At laſt the King himſelf came in, and being informed of the ſubject of the diſpute, ſignified that he was of the ſame opinion, and would continue to thoſe of the Reformed Religion the liberty, which had been granted them by the Edicts of his predeceſſors. Tandem ipſe Rex interveniens, & argumentum diſquiſitionis edoctus, ſe in eâdem eſſe ſententiâ, & velle libertatem anteceſſorum ſuorum edictis conceſſam ipſis præſtare ſignificavit. Mr. Barrow remarks afterwards, that when he came to give an account of the famous men in that celebrated Univerſity, he was entirely at a loſs, ſince he could not recollect any one of eminence there, except Monſr. Arnaud and Roberval, who was admirably well ſkilled in the Mathematicks. He can find no longer any of the Petavius's, the Sirmondus's, the Merſennus's, or the Gaſſendus's, there. That when he paſſes thro' and views the Colleges there, he ſees nothing remarkable but the walls and buildings themſelves; tho' in his opinion the Univerſity of Cambridge had no reaſon to envy that of Paris even upon this account; ſince if the Colleges of Sorbonne, Navarre, and Clermont were all thrown into one, it would not equal, much leſs exceed Trinity-College at Cambridge either in extent or magnificence. Numeroſa collegia pedibus peragranti oculiſque perluſtranti præter tecta nihil eminens, præter parietes nihil conſpicuum ſe objecerit. Quanquam hiſce, ſi oculi mei æqui ſint arbitri, Cantabrigia non inviderit. Nec ſi Sorbonæ ipſi, unà cum Collegio Navarreno in unum conjiciatur Claromontanum Jeſuitarum hoſpitium, totus ille acervus unicam S. Trinitati dicatam ædem vel amplitudine vel magnificentiâ exæquare, nedum excedere queat. After ſome months ſtay at Paris he went to Italy, and remained ſome time at Florence, where he had the favour, and neglected not the opportunity of peruſing a great many books in the Grand Duke's Library, and ten thouſand of his medals, and diſcourſing concerning them with Mr. Fitton, the fame of whoſe extraordinary abilities, ſays Mr. Hill, in that ſort of learning had cauſed the Duke to invite him to the charge of that great treaſury of antiquity. Dr. Pope (13) appears to have miſtaken the ſenſe of this paſſage in that Gentleman; for he tells us, that Mr. Fitton found our author's abilities ſo great in that ſort of learning, that upon his recommendation the Grand Duke invited Dr. Barrow to take upon him the charge and cuſtody of that great treaſure of antiquity. Florence was too dear a place for him to remain in long; his deſire was to viſit Rome rather than any city, but the plague then raging there, he went to Leghorn (14); where he was much careſſed by the Engliſh Merchants reſiding there (15). From thence he ſailed in November 1657 for Smyrna. But in his voyage they were attacked

(9) Ch. 19. pag. 133.

(10) See the 4th volume of his Works, p. 317, & ſeq.

(11) Ibid. pag. 352, & ſeq.

(12) Ibid. pag. 354.

(13) Pag. 134.

(14) Hill's Account, &c.

(15) Dr. Pope, ubi ſupra.

age from Leghorn to that city in one of his Poems. Upon his return to his own country he was epiſcopally ordained [G]. In the year 1655 he publiſhed Euclid's Elements compendiouſly demonſtrated [H]. At the Reſtoration of King Charles II his friends expected, that as he had ſuffered and merited ſo much, he would immediately be preferred; but he complained tacked by a pirate; and tho' he had never ſeen any thing like a ſea-fight, he ſtood to the gun appointed him with great reſolution (16); for he tells us in his Poem, intitled, Iter Maritimum à portu Liguſtico ad Conſtantinopolim (17), that liberty was dearer to him than life, and that he was much leſs fearful of death than ſlavery; in ſhort, that rather than ſuffer the miſeries of it, he ſhould chooſe to be ſtruck dead with thunder, or to precipitate himſelf into a chaſm of earth, or labour under the peſtilence, or bear all the inconveniencies of the utmoſt poverty, or pour out life thro' a thouſand wounds, or undergo any other calamity, which fortune, or fate, or the wrath of Heaven could inflict upon him.

(16) Hill's Account, &c.

(17) Publiſhed in the 4th volume of his Works, pag. 211, & ſeq.

Almaque libertas vitali charior aurâ,
Libertas! bullit cor, animuſque tumet:
Ut tibi ſubjiciar, monſtrum ſervile, coactus
Ut ſubdam arbitrio libera colla tuo:
Ut tua perpetiar generoſo verbera tergo
Vinctus, ſimque tuus, beſtia fœda, canis!
Me prius irato percellat Jupiter igni,
Intrepidum ferient tela ſuperna caput:
Aut mihi ſi tellus diſcluſo ventre debiſcat,
Ingrediar terræ lætus ovanſque ſinus.
Vexet acerba lues, paupertas durior illâ,
Quam fero, ſqualenti comprimat arcta jugo;
Sanguine perfundar totus, per vulnera mille
Exultans luteo carcere vita ruet;
Fluctibus exagiter, quos aut fortuna ciere,
Aut fatum valet, aut mitior ira Deûm;
Sim liber modo, nec mea mens obtemperet ulli,
Du mea, præſertim, barbare Turca, tibi.

(18) Pag. 136. Dr. Pope tells us (18), that it was an Algerine pirate, who attack'd them; and that Mr. Barrow during the fight betook himſelf to his arms, and ſtaid upon deck, chearfully and vigorouſly fighting, till the pirate, perceiving the ſtout defence, which the ſhip made, ſteered off and left her. I aſk'd him, continues Dr. Pope, why he did not go down into the hold, and leave the defence of the ſhip to thoſe, to whom it did belong. He replied, "It concerned no man more than myſelf; I "would rather have loſt my life, than have fallen "into the hands of theſe mercileſs Infidels." At Smyrna he was kindly entertained by Mr. Spencer Bretton, the Conſul there, (upon whoſe death in 1659 he wrote an Elegy in Latin (19),) and by the reſt of the Factory. At Conſtantinople he received many favours from Sir Thomas Bendiſh the Engliſh Embaſſador, and Sir Jonathan Daws; and there ever after continued between them an intimate friendſhip. As he could preſently learn to play at all games, ſo he could accommodate his diſcourſe to all capacities, ſo that it ſhould be agreeable and profitable. He could argue a point without arrogance or paſſion to convince the learned, and could talk pleaſantly for the entertainment of eaſier minds, tho' he ſtill maintained his own character, which had ſome ſuch authority, as is inſinuated in theſe words of Cicero to Atticus; Non te Bruti noſtri vulticulus ab iſtâ oratione deterret (20)? At Conſtantinople, the See of St. Chryſoſtom, he read over all the works of that Father, whom he much preferred before any of the others. He remained in Turky above a year, and then returned to Venice, where he was no ſooner landed, but the ſhip, which brought him, took fire, and was with all its cargo conſumed to aſhes, the men only eſcaping. From Venice in his way to England, he paſſed thro' Germany and Holland; and ſome part of theſe travels and obſervations are likewiſe related in his Poems (21).

(19) Printed in the 4th volume of his Works, pag. 302.

(20) Epiſt. 20. lib. 14.

(21) Hill's Account, &c. and Dr. Pope, pag. 135.

[G] Upon his return to his own country he was epiſcopally ordained.] The term of time was now ſomewhat paſt, before which all the Fellows of Trinity College are by the oath obliged to take upon them prieſtly Orders, and quit the College. He had no reſt therefore in his mind, till he procured himſelf to be epiſcopally ordained, which it is thought was done by Biſhop Brownrig, notwithſtanding the times were then very unſettled, the Church of England in great diſtreſs, and circumſtances much altered from what they were when he took the oath, wherewith others ſatisfied themſelves in the neglect of orders (22).

(22) Hill's Account, ubi ſupra.

[H] In 1655 he publiſhed Euclid's Elements compendiouſly demonſtrated.] It was printed at Cambridge in Latin; and an Engliſh tranſlation of it was publiſhed at London 1660. In the preface he tells us, that in this Work he had two points in view; the firſt of which was to join the greateſt compendiouſneſs of demonſtration with as much perſpicuity as the quality of the ſubject would admit; which he obſerved, that he had ſo far attained, that though poſſibly ſome other perſon might with greater curioſity, yet he preſumed none could with more conciſeneſs have demonſtrated moſt of the propoſitions; eſpecially ſince he had altered nothing in the number and order of the propoſitions, nor taken the liberty to leave out any of Euclid's as leſs neceſſary, or to reduce certain of the eaſieſt into the claſſes of Axioms; which however had been done by ſome other Writers, and particularly that moſt accurate Geometrician Andrew Tacquet, from whom he acknowledges that he had taken ſome things. He obſerves likewiſe that he ſhould have attempted nothing himſelf of that Author's elegant edition, if that learned Gentleman had not thought proper to publiſh only eight of Euclid's books illuſtrated by him, conſidering the other ſeven as leſs relating to the Elements of Geometry. But that for his own part, he had a different view from the beginning, not to compoſe Elements of Geometry at his own diſcretion, but to demonſtrate the whole of Euclid himſelf with all poſſible brevity. For with regard to four of his books, the ſeventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth, though they have not ſo immediate a relation to the Elements of plain and ſolid Geometry, as the ſix firſt, and two ſubſequent books; yet no perſon, who has obtained any meaſure of ſkill in Geometry is ignorant, how extremely uſeful they are in geometrical ſubjects, both with reſpect to the great affinity between Arithmetic and Geometry, and to the knowledge of commenſurable and incommenſurable magnitudes, which is of the higheſt importance to the underſtanding both of plain and ſolid figures. And the noble Theory of the five regular bodies contained in the three laſt books could not be omitted without prejudice, ſince Euclid being a follower of Plato's School, is ſaid to have compiled the whole ſyſtem only in reference to that contemplation, which Proclus declares in the following paſſage: Ὅθεν δὴ καὶ τῆς συμπάσης στοιχειώσεως τέλος προυτίθετο τὴν τῶν καλουμένων Πλατωνικῶν σχημάτων σύστασιν. Beſides Mr. Barrow was eaſily induced to believe, that it would be acceptable to all lovers of thoſe Sciences to have the intire work of Euclid as it is uſually cited and recommended. He was determined therefore to leave out no book or propoſition of thoſe, which are to be found in Peter Herigon, whom he was obliged to follow cloſely by having reſolved to make uſe for the moſt part of his ſchemes, becauſe he was apprehenſive that his ſudden departure out of England would not allow him time to deſcribe new ones, though he was ſometimes deſirous of doing it. Upon the ſame account alſo he purpoſed to uſe generally no other than Euclid's own demonſtration contracted into a more ſuccinct form, except perhaps in the ſecond and thirteenth, and ſometimes in the ſeventh, eighth, and ninth books, where it ſeemed convenient to vary a little from him. The other end, which he propoſed in this Work, was to gratify thoſe, who more affect ſymbolical than verbal demonſtrations; in which kind, as moſt perſons of our own Nation were accuſtomed to the Notes of Mr. Oughtred, he thought it moſt convenient to make uſe of them chiefly throughout. For no other Author that he knew of till then, except Peter Herigon, had attempted to publiſh and explain Euclid in that way. However the method of that learned Writer, though in many other reſpects excellent, and exactly accommodated to his peculiar purpoſe, ſeemed to him defective in two points; firſt, becauſe of ſeveral propoſitions brought to prove ſome particular Theorem or Problem, complained in two Latin Verſes, which he has not left among his Poems, that no perſon had more ſincerely wiſhed for his Majeſty's return, or was leſs ſenſible of the effects of it with regard to himſelf (f). However he wrote an Ode upon that occaſion, wherein he introduces Britannia congratulating the King upon his return (g). In 1660 he was choſen without a competitor to the Profeſſorſhip of the Greek Tongue in Cambridge, and ſpoke a Latin Oration upon his entrance into that Chair [I]. Mr. Hill (h) informs us, that ſome friend of our Author borrowed his Lectures, which he read there, without ever reſtoring them. July the 16th 1662 (i) he was elected Profeſſor of Geometry at Greſham-College upon the death of Mr. Laurence Rook, by the intereſt of Dr. Wilkins, afterwards Biſhop of Cheſter; and not only diſcharged the duty incumbent on him, but ſupplied the abſence of his Collegue Dr. Walter Pope, the Profeſſor of Aſtronomy there. His Latin inaugural Oration [K] is extant in the fourth volume of his Works (k). Among his other Lectures there were ſeveral upon the Projection of the Sphere, which with many other papers were lent out by him, and loſt (l). The ſame year he wrote a Greek Epithalamium upon the marriage of King Charles and Queen Catherine (m). About this time he was offered a living of good value; but the condition annexed of teaching the Patron's ſon made him refuſe it, as too like a Simoniacal contract. He was likewiſe invited to take the charge of the Cotton-Library; but upon trial for ſome time he

(f) Te magis optavit rediturum, Carole, nemo; Et nemo ſenſit te rediiſſe minus.

(g) Opuſcul. pag. 309, & ſeq.

(h) Account of the Life of Dr. Iſaac Barrow &c.

(i) Wood, in his Faſti Oxonienſ. vol. 2. col. 103. 2d edit. ſays it was in 1660.

(k) Pag. 90, & ſeq.

(l) Hill's Account, &c. ubi ſupra.

(m) Opuſcul. pag. 275, 276.

Problem, the latter does not always depend on the former; and it cannot readily be known when they do cohere with each other and when not, either from their order, or any other way; by which means, for want of the conjunctions and adjectives, Ergo, rurſus, &c. there ariſes a difficulty, eſpecially to thoſe, who are but little verſed in thoſe points. Again, it often happens, that this method cannot avoid ſuperfluous repetitions, by which means the Demonſtrations became ſometimes prolix, and ſometimes perplexed and intricate. All which inconveniences are eaſily remedied in Mr. Barrow's method by intermingling of words and ſigns at diſcretion.

[I] Spoke a Latin Oration upon his entrance into that Chair.] It is publiſhed in the fourth volume of his Works (21); and in it he pays a great compliment to the memory of Eraſmus, who had been a very noble inſtrument in reviving the ſtudy of the Greek and Latin Tongues, of Sir Thomas Smith; Sir John Cheeke; Downs; Crichton; and Dr. Duport. He repreſents his own inability to fill that Chair in a proper manner; and obſerves, that in all his travels abroad he had ſeen no where ſo many advantages for the cultivation of Learning, or ſo much good ſenſe, true judgment, real wit, and extenſive Learning, as in the Univerſity of Cambridge. That he ſhould have had no great concern, if he had been to have ſpoken before the Germans, whoſe brains are clouded with yeſterday's debauch; or the Hollanders, whoſe ears are little ſenſible of true elegance and politeneſs; or the light and fantaſtic French; or the Italians, who ſcarce underſtand any thing beyond their mother-tongue. Equidem apud Germanorum heſternâ crapulâ obnubilita cerebella, in Batavas aures pingui Minervâ obſtipatas, coram defultoriis Gallis, aut ad Italos ultra vernaculum idioma parum ſapientes, nihil admodum moraret verba faſturus (22). Whereas he was now to addreſs himſelf to men of the moſt accurate taſte and judgment, and who were particularly eminent for their ſkill in the Greek Language, ſo that Greece itſelf ſeemed to have tranſplanted itſelf from its former ſeat, and to have ſettled among them. He then apologizes for his own inſufficiency, ſince he had been expoſed to a long ſeries of diſtreſs and poverty, and cut off from all converſation with polite Authors by his travels into remote and barbarous countries. However as he had the honour of being elected, he ſhould endeavour to ſupply the want of genius by induſtry and unwearied application. And that the greateſt encouragement to him imaginable, was that the reputation of Learning was now reviv'd upon his Majeſty's Reſtoration, whereas the times before had been very unpropitious to the Muſes, and the ſtudy of arms alone had been regarded, ſo that Ennius's verſes might have juſtly been applied to them,

Spernitur Orator bonus, horridus miles amatur;
Bellipotentes ſunt magè quam ſapienti potentes.

No perſon ſhall now any longer be ſuſpected or obnoxious on account of his eminent learning or probity, as he lately muſt have been; when the din of war ſilenced all the poliier arts and ſciences, and ſuperior force enabled the loweſt and moſt profligate of mankind to trample upon men of the moſt diſtinguiſhed merit and genius. He then expatiates upon the excellence and advantage of the Greek Language above all others, which is the moſt ancient except the Hebrew, and prior to all the ſciences, as a parent to her off-ſpring, or a root to its branches. If we conſider its uſe, it extends itſelf to every kind of knowledge, and is remarkable for the force and energy and graces of it, ſo that it is peculiarly adapted to charm the ear, and touch the paſſions. Quanto magis incumbendum Græcæ linguarum principi, reliquas omnimoda excellentia quæ tanto ſuperat intervallo? Si ætatem ejus ſpectamus, præter unam humanæ loquelæ coævam Hebraicam antiquiſſima eſt, imò ſcientiâ omni non aliter quam parens ſobole, radice ſurculis, vetuſtior. Si uſum, is ampliſſimus eſt, ad omnis ſapientiæ ſtudium, ad omnem ingenii cultum ſe exporrigens; ſi commoditatem, vim, aut gratiam reſpicimus, nullam arbitror extiiſſe unquam mortali ſpiritæ modulatam, hac, quæ fuerit aut explicandis ſenſibus aptior, aut demulcendis auribus gratior, aut affectibus commovendis efficacior (23). He proceeds then to point out the ſeveral advantages of that tongue, and the merits of its writers in every branch of learning; and obſerves that the Latins borrowed all their knowledge; as Tully from the Greek Rhetoricians and Philoſophers; Virgil in his Bucolics from Theocritus, in his Georgics from Heſiod, and in his Æneid from Homer; Terence from Menander, and Seneca the Tragic Writer from Euripides. He remarks likewiſe, that the two noble Emperors, par nobile Cæſarum, Marcus Antoninus and Julian were ſo ſenſible of the defects of their own language, that they choſe to write in Greek, as moſt proper to expreſs every ſentiment with a peculiar beauty and energy.

[K] His Latin inaugural Oration is extant in the fourth volume of his works.] He opens it with a compliment upon Sir Thomas Greſham, the Founder of the College; and then proceeds to one upon Mr. Henry Briggs, who was the firſt Lecturer in Geometry there, and improved the invention of Logarithms; and Mr. Chriſtopher Wrenn, and Mr. Laurence Rooke, who had likewiſe held that Profeſſorſhip. He expreſſes his regret, that his own low abilities and qualifications rendered him incapable of filling in a proper manner the place of ſuch great men, his predeceſſors; having been a long time converſant among remote and barbarous Nations; and after his return employed in mere Grammatical Learning, and the little purſuits of Words and Phraſeology; ſo that he had been obliged to abandon the Mathematicks and all parts of Philoſophy, except Ethics, without almoſt any hopes of ever returning to them. Cui ab omnibus bonis literis tot annos exulanti, Barbaros Scythas inter & incultos Sarmatas verſanti, peragranti terras, trajicienti æquora, cum utriuſque elementi periculis, tumque gravioribus infortunii procellis conflictanti, tantum temporis decretum eſt, tantumque defluxit, exilibus nugis occupato. Qui ex quo, infauſto errore perfunctus, conquieſcere cæperam, in grammaticum mox priſtinum detruſus, & vocularum miſerabili aucupio damnatus, mathemati-

(21) Pag. 160.

(22) Ibid. pag. 104.

(23) Ibid. pag. 106.

he chose rather to settle at Cambridge. In the year 1663 he was appointed Mr. Lucas's Professor of Mathematics [L]. And though his two Professorships were not inconsistent, yet he contented himself with that of Cambridge, and May the 20th 1664 resigned that at Gresham-College, and was succeeded in it by Mr. Robert Hook, who obtained it by Dr. Wilkins's interest. His Mathematical Lectures read at Cambridge, while he was Mr. Lucas's Professor there, were published after his death at London in 12mo, 1684, under the title of, Isaaci Barrow Mathematicæ Professoris Lucasiani Lectiones habitæ in Scholis publicis Academiæ Cantabrigiensis, annis Domini 1664, 1665, 1666, & ultimæ quatuor incerti temporis. They were dedicated to the University of Cambridge by Mr. G. Wells, who observes that it would have been highly unreasonable to suffer any of the valuable performances of our Author to perish, when his divine Genius had restored to immortality the writings of those admirable antient Authors, Euclid, Theodosius, Archimedes, Apollonius, &c. The Writers of the Acta Eruditorum for February 1684 tell us (n), that though these Lectures are written merely upon the more obvious points, which are preparatory to the study of the Mathematics, yet they exhibit every where marks of our Author's admirable sagacity, judgment, and profound knowledge of the antient Philosophy, and contain several curious digressions upon several of the most important subjects. In 1669 he resigned likewise his Mathematical Professorship at Cambridge to his friend Mr. Isaac Newton, and determined to leave entirely the study of Mathematics for that of Divinity [M]. And now he was only a Fellow of Trinity-College, till his uncle, the Bishop of St. Asaph, whose eis protinus scientiis, & philosophiæ omni (unam forsitan moralem excepero) nuncium remiserim, imò bellum denunciaverim, vale saltem (ut mihi videbar) æternum dixerim (24). He afterwards proceeds to display the great advantages of the science of Geometry, which is not a mere amusement of the mind in chimerical and insignificant pursuits, but founded upon solid principles, and productive of the most useful consequences; the fruitful parent of so many arts, the immoveable basis of so many sciences, and the constant source of so many noble discoveries for the benefit of mankind. Tot artium fæcunda parens, tot scientiarum inconcussa basis, tot in rem humanam commoditatum perennis scaturigo, Geometria.

(n) Pag. 85, 89.

(24) Ibid. p. 97.

[L] He was appointed Mr. Lucas's Professor of Mathematics.] He had discharged his Professorship at Gresham-College in such a manner, and performed so well what Dr. Wilkins had undertaken for him, that when Mr. Lucas in the year 1663 founded a Mathematical Lecture at Cambridge, the same good and constant friend recommended him to the executors, Mr. Raworth and Mr. Buck, who very readily conferred upon him that employment. And the better to secure the end of so noble and useful a foundation, he took care, that himself and his successors should be oblig'd to leave yearly to the University ten written Lectures; and those of his, which have been published, will best shew how well he acquitted himself of that service (25). We have his Prefatory Oration spoken in the public mathematical school March 14th, 1664, published in the fourth volume of his works (26); in which he gives us a noble encomium upon Mr. Lucas, the Founder of the Lecture, and pays a compliment to Mr. Robert Raworth and Mr. Thomas Buck his executors. He then mentions his reasons for resigning his Greek Lecture for that of the Mathematics, and observes, that he had undertaken the former, at a time when the duty of it was very great, and the profits very inconsiderable: but that when the circumstances of it were changed to great advantage, he imagined several persons would undertake that province, who might execute it with more success than himself; upon which account he thought himself at liberty to pursue the bent of his own genius, and to exchange a very laborious task for one of less fatigue. For tho' he had never been averse to the study of Philology, yet he owned, that Philosophy had much greater charms for him; and though he did not despise that part of learning, which is merely conversant about words, yet he was still more pleased with the study of things. He afterwards shews the excellent uses and advantages of the Mathematics, and observes particularly, that it rescues the mind from credulity, fortifies it against the vanity of Scepticism, restrains it from rashness and presumption, inclines it to assent to things upon proper evidence, subjects it entirely to the just authority of reason, and clears it from the tyranny of delusive prejudices; fixes the caprice and fickleness of the imagination, sharpens the heavy genius, corrects the luxuriant, restrains the impetuous, and awakens the indolent and slow. Quin etiam his disciplinis assuefactam mentem à credulâ simplicitate penitus liberari; contrà scepticam vanitatem fortissimè muniri; à temerariâ præsumptione validè cohiberi; ad debitum assensum facillimè inclinari; legitimo rationis imperio perfectè subjici; iniquæ fallacium præjudiciorum tyrannidi contumaciter obluctari. Instabilem porrò phantasiam hac veluti saburrâ librari; hâc fluctuantem anchorâ retineri; obtusum ingenium hac cote exacui, luxurians hâc falce castigari, præfervidum hoc fræno reprimi, torpidum hoc stimulo excitari (27).

(25) Hill's Account, &c.

(26) Pag. 78, & seq.

(27) Ibid. p

[M] Determined to leave the study of Mathematics for that of Divinity.] Tho' his Geometricæ Lectiones had been some time in the world, he had heard of very few, who had read and considered it throughly besides Mr. Slusius of Liege, and Mr. Gregory of Scotland, two persons indeed, whose judgment were more than equivalent for that of a great number. But the little relish, which mathematical discoveries met with at that time, was a means of loosening Dr. Barrow from those speculations, and engaging him more closely in the study of Morality and Divinity, which had always been so predominant, as Mr. Hill observes, that when he commented on Archimedes, he could not forbear in his discourse to prefer and admire much more Suarez for his book de Legibus; and before his Apollonius he wrote this beautiful ejaculation. Ὁ Θεὸς γεωμετρεῖ. Tu autem, Domine, quantus es Geometra? Quum enim hæc scientia nullos terminos habeat; cum in sempiternum novorum theorematum inventioni locus relinquatur, etiam penes humanum ingenium; tu uno hæc omnia intuitu perspecta habes, absque catenâ consequentiarum, absque tædio demonstrationum. Ad cætera penè nihil facere potest intellectus noster; & tanquam brutorum phantasia videtur non nisi incerta quædam somniare, unde in iis quot sunt homines, tot existunt ferè sententiæ. In his conspiratur ab omnibus, in his humanum ingenium se posse aliquid, imò ingens aliquid & mirificum visum est, ut nihil magis mirum, quod enim in cæteris penè ineptum, in hoc efficax, sedulum, prosperum, &c. Te igitur vel ex hac re amare gaudeo, te suspicor, atque illum diem desidero suspiriis fortibus, in quo purgatâ mente & claro oculo non hæc solum omnia absque hac successivâ & laboriosa imaginandi curâ, verum multo plura & majora ex tuâ bonitate & immensissimâ sanctissimâque benignitate conspicere & scire concedetur, &c. i. e. "God acts the Geometrician. "But how great a Geometrician art thou, O God? "For since this science has no limits, and since there "is always room even for a human mind to discover "an infinite number of new theorems, thou perceivest "all these truths at one view, without any chain of "consequences, or the fatigue of long demonstrations. "Our understanding can scarce effect any thing in other "points; and like the fancy of brutes, seems only to "dream of some doubtful objects; for which reason "there are almost as many opinions in those points "as there are men. But in those subjects they all "unanimously agree; in them the human mind seems "capable of something even great and stupendous; "for whoſe conſecration Sermon to the Biſhoprick of Man he had preached July the 4th (o) 1663 upon Pſalm cxxxii. 16. gave him a ſmall Sine-Cure in Wales; and Dr. Seth Ward Biſhop of Saliſbury, who highly valued his converſation, conferred upon him a Prebend in his church; the profits of both which he beſtowed in charity, and reſigned them as ſoon as he was made Maſter of his College (p). The Biſhop of Saliſbury offered him the Archdeaconry of North-Wiltſhire, which he modeſtly refuſed (q). In 1670 he wrote a Latin Poem upon the death of the Ducheſs of Orleans (r); an Epicedium upon the Duke of Albemarle (s); and a Latin Ode upon the Trinity (t). And on Wedneſday in Eaſter Week 1671 he preached the Spittal Sermon before the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen concerning the Duty and Reward of Bounty to the Poor upon Pſalm cxii. 9. In 1672 he publiſhed his Optical Lectures [N], to which were added ſeveral Lectures in Geometry; and in 1675 he publiſhed an edition of the works of Archimedes, Apollonius's Conics, (o) Mr. Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1140. ſays the 5th.

(p) Idem, ibid.

(q) Dr. Walter Pope's Life of Dr. Seth Ward, Biſhop of Saliſbury, ch. 20. p. 143. edit. London 1697.

(r) Opuſc. pag. 293.

(s) Ibid. pag. 294.

(t) Ibid. pag. 273.

" for notwithſtanding its inſufficiency in other reſpects, " here it exerts itſelf with vigour and ſucceſs, &c. I " am inflamed therefore with love and admiration of " thee even upon this account, and I am anxious for " that day, in which I ſhall be permitted and enabled " by thy immenſe goodneſs and benignity to perceive " and underſtand not only theſe things, but even ma- " ny more truths of the higheſt importance, with a " mind purged from error and prejudice, and with- " out this ſucceſſive and laborious effort of the imagi- " nation."

[N] In 1672 he publiſhed his Optical Lectures.] The Imprimatur for publiſhing them is dated March 22d 166⅞; and they were printed at London in 4to 1672 under the following title: Lectiones XVIII Cantabrigiæ in ſcholis publicis habitæ, in quibus Opticorum Phænomenon genuinæ rationes inveſtigantur ac exponuntur. Annexæ ſunt Lectiones aliquot Geometricæ. Ab Iſaaco Barrow, Socio Collegii S. Trinitatis, Matheſeos Profeſſore Lucaſiano, necnon Societatis Regiæ Sodale. i. e. " Eighteen Lectures read in the public Schools of " the Univerſity of Cambridge; in which the true " Reaſons of the Phænomena in Optics are inveſtigat- " ed and explain'd. To which are added ſeveral " Lectures in Geometry. By Iſaac Barrow, Fellow " of Trinity College, Mr. Lucas's Profeſſor of Mathe- " mathics, and Fellow of the Royal Society." Dr. Barrow has dedicated this work to Robert Raworth and Thomas Buck Eſqs; the executors of Mr. Lucas, the Founder of the Mathematical Profeſſorſhip. In the Epiſtle to the Reader he informs us, that theſe Lectures were not deſigned to be publiſhed; tho' he was prevailed upon to ſuffer it by the importunity of others, and the deſire of ſetting an example to his ſucceſſors in that Profeſſorſhip, by his attempt at leaſt to promote the improvement of the ſciences; nor was he without hopes, that this work might prove uſeful in ſome reſpects. He deſires thoſe, who were well ſkilled in thoſe ſciences to conſider, that it was not written for men of their character alone, nor compoſed upon choice, nor drawn up at leiſure and after a long meditation, but that it was mere School-Lectures, which he was obliged to write in haſte, and adapted to a promiſcuous and popular audience, upon which account many things, which might ſeem low and trivial to thoſe of greater advancement in knowledge, were introduced; and therefore the reader was not to expect a performance, compoſed with accuracy, and digeſted into the beſt form. Meminiſtis autem obteſtor, qui in his Literis profectior es, quale ſcriptum attrectas; non utique tibi ſoli elaboratum; non ſponte productum; non diuturnâ meditatione ſubactos exhibens feriantis ingenii conceptus; at Lectiones Scholaſticas, primum officii neceſſitate expreſſas; tum ſubindè properantius effuſas, ut abſolveretur penſum, ac hora deflueret; demum ad promiſcui literarii populi inſtructionem comparatas, cujus intererat complura (qualia tibi videbuntur) leviora non prætermitti; ut fruſtra futurus ſis (id quod te monitum oportuit, ne multùm expectando tibi pariter obſis, ac mihi) accuratum hic quicquam, affabrè poſitum, aut contiunè digeſtum ſperans. Among thoſe friends of his, who perſuaded him to publiſh this work, he particularly mentions Mr. Iſaac Newton, his collegue, a man, ſays he, of a very excellent genius and prodigious knowledge, who reviſed the copy, and pointed out ſeveral things, which wanted correction, and made ſome additions of his own, which Dr. Barrow has inſerted and diſtinguiſh'd with a peculiar commendation. Quorum unus . . . . D. Iſaacus Newtonus, Collega noſter (peregregiæ vir indolis ac inſignis peritiæ) exemplar reviſit, aliqua corrigenda monens, ſed & de ſuo nonnulla penu ſuggerens, quæ noſtris alicubi cum laude innexa cernes. The other friend, to whom he acknowledges his obligations, was Mr. John Collins, whom he ſtiles the Merſennus of our country, and who took a great deal of pains in the publication of this work. To this book he has ſubjoined thirteen Lectures on Geometry, which treat principally of the general properties of curve lines. In his Preface to them, he tells us, that he had deſigned to publiſh the ſix laſt with another in this volume, as an Appendix to his Optical Lectures; and that otherwiſe he ſhould never have had any intentions of printing them. But as his Bookſeller thought proper, that they ſhould be publiſh'd ſeparately from his Optics, he had been prevailed upon to add the five firſt Lectures, which relate to the ſame ſubjects as the other, and which he had drawn up ſome years before without any deſign of publiſhing them, ſince they contained nothing but what was adapted to the uſe of young Students in thoſe ſciences. But with regard to the other ſeven Lectures, he publiſh'd them with leſs reluctance, ſince he was in hopes, that they contained ſome things, which perſons, who were more advanced in this ſcience, might be pleaſed to ſee. Alteras quas dixi ſeptem conſpectui tuo lubentiùs expono, nonnulla ſperans in illis haberi, quæ nec eruditiores piguerit inſpicere. The laſt was extorted from him by a friend of his, who had the greateſt right to command him in all reſpects, and was a man of great integrity, tho' in affairs of this kind, a very importunate Sollicitor. Ultimam Amicus (vir ſanè cum primis probus, aſt in hujuſmodi negotiis Flagitator improbus) extorſit, aut certè pro jure, quod meritò obtinet ſuo, exegit. The Gentleman meant here was Mr. John Collins, who was the principal means of obtaining from our author the publication of moſt of his mathematical works; and with whom Dr. Barrow maintained a conſtant correſpondence by letters, in one of which dated on Eaſter-Eve 1669, he has the following paſſage, with relation to his Optical Lectures, which we ſhall give the reader from the original communicated by the learned William Jones Eſq;

Dear Sir,

" I have received all yours. The firſt, if it had been " delivered to me in time, might have prevented you " ſome trouble; for had I known Monſr. Huygens " had been printing his Opticks, I ſhould hardly have " ſent my booke. He is one, that hath had conſide- " rations a long time upon that ſubject; and is uſed " to be very exact in what he does; and hath joyn- " ed much experience with his ſpeculations. What " I have done is only what in a ſmall time my " thoughts did ſuggeſt, and I never had opportunity " of any experience; ſo that I have great reaſon to " believe what he hath done with ſo much advan- " tage in all reſpects, will be much more perfect. " Yet ſeeing perhaps there may be in mine ſome " things, which have not occurred to him, or which " he did not intend to conſider, you may, if you " think good, proceed in ordering the impreſſi- " on; the manner of which I wholy refer to your " diſcretion. . . . . I have ſeverall new (I ſuppoſe) " geometricall theoremes of a general importance; " which perhaps I may put together, and add as an " Appendix, having digeſted them into Lectures &c. " I intended to ſend you ſome of them, but my bu- " ſyneſſe hath hindered me; which (beſides pupills " and other ordinary imployments) hath been impoſed " upon

Conics, and Theodosius's Sphærica [O]. He had hitherto possessed but a very small estate, which however was made easy to him by a contented mind; and he was far from envying the most opulent fortune. With the same decency and moderation he maintained his character under the temptations of prosperity, when he was appointed by the King Master of Trinity College in 1672 [P], upon the promotion of Dr. John Pearson to the Bishopric

" upon me by the College. 'Tis to make Theological " Discourses (as our Statutes order) upon the chiefe " points of Catechisme (the Creed, Decalogue, Lord's " Prayer, Sacraments, &c.) which out of terme so " takes up my thoughts, that I cannot easily apply " them to any other matter. For I have that imper- " fection, as not to be able to draw my thoughts ea- " sily from one thing to another." We have another original Letter to Mr. Collins to the same purpose dated from Trinity-College the twenty third of April 1670, and communicated by the Gentleman abovementioned.

Deare Sir,

" I received your last, and thereby perceive " that your honest Printer is yet somewhat slow " in performance. I request you to blott out those " four verses inscribed Juventuti Academicæ: for a " friend, whose advice I asked, hath perswaded me " that they are not proper. For the 13th Lec- " ture, being I tooke the pains to exscribe it, and " prepare it (as well as ever I should doe it, as I " thinke) I had rather it should passe; but am con- " tent you should doe therein as you please. If you " doe not like those words in the Epistle (27) (in " which I meant to jest with you, no more) concern- " ing it, I pray expunge them, and substitute these; " Ultimam apposui, materiâ quidem à reliquis abjunc- " tam, at scopo non ita dissitam, nonnullis eam haud " inutilem arbitratus. Concerning the Character, " which you spoke of, of my bookes, I shall esteeme " my selfe obliged to you, if you will effect, that " there be nothing said of them in the Philosophicall " Reports beyond a short and simple accompt of their " subject. I pray let there be nothing in commen- " dation or discommendation of them; but let them " take their fortune or fate pro Captu Lectoris. Any " thing more will cause me displeasure, and will not " doe them or me any good."

(27) Dr. Barrow means those words quoted above, Ultimam Amicus, vir sanè cum primis probus, ast in hujusmodi negotiis Flagitator improbus &c.

[O] An edition of the Works of Archimedes, Apollonius's Conics, and Theodosius's Sphærica.] It was printed at London in 4to under the following title: Archimedis opera, Apollonii Pergæi Conicorum Lib. IV. Theodosii Sphærica: Methodo nova illustrata, & succincte demonstrata. Per Is. Barrow, Exprofessorem Lucasianum Cantab. & Societatis Regiæ Soc. i. e. " The " Works of Archimedes; the four books of Conics of " Apollonius Pergæus; and Theodosius's Spherics; " explained in a new method, and demonstrated in a " succinct manner. By Is. Barrow, formerly Mr. " Lucas's Professor at Cambridge, and Fellow of the " Royal Society." In the preface to the reader before the Lemmata of Archimedes he observes, that gratitude obliges the Moderns to rescue from oblivion the antient Authors, who were the inventors of the Sciences. For though the greatest part of their discoveries are surpassed by those of the latter age with regard both to expedition and conciseness, yet the reading of the Antients has its proper use. For it is very agreeable to observe from what a foundation the Sciences are raised to such perfection; and it is of advantage to taste of those sources, from whence almost all the inventions of the Moderns have been derived; for the industry of the latter has appeared very conspicuous by pursuing or imitating the ingenious and subtle methods of the former. Neque tamen est quæ continent pleraque nostris artificiis vel promptius elici, vel concisius astrui possent, fructu penitus destituitur illorum lectio. Nam amœnum imprimis videtur quibus à fundamentis tantum in fastigium evectæ sunt Scientiæ dispicere; tum haud inutile fuerit degustare fontes, è quibus cuncta ferme recentiorum inventa dimanârunt; istorum quippe perquam ingeniosas atque subtiles persequendo vel æmulando methodos horum emicuit industria. Besides there is no better method of obtaining a true taste and skill in demonstration than from writings of the Antients, who are distinguished by a peculiar force and elegance in forming of Theorems; which as no person can ever excel, so scarce any one can obtain, who is a stranger to their Works; not to insist upon another consideration, that as these Writings are cited every where by the Moderns in confirmation of their own, it is absolutely necessary for those who treat of these subjects, to have them always at hand, and to be very conversant in them. Porro sincerum demonstrandi gustum ac peritiam non aliunde quis opinor felicius hauserit, quam ex iis, quorum in theorematis deducendis præcipuæ relucent solertia ac elegantia; quas ut nemo transgredi possit, ita vix assequi quisquam valeat ab illorum scriptis peregrinus; ut taceam, cum à posteris hæc Scripta suis firmandis præsternantur, allegenturque passim, illorum referre, qui hæc studia tractant, ea præsto ad manum, ne dicam ad unguem habere. The edition of these treatises of the Antients was principally owing to the sollicitations of Mr. John Collins mentioned in the preceding Note, as appears from the two following Letters of Dr. Barrow to him, communicated by the ingenious Gentleman mentioned in the preceding Note. The former is dated from Trinity College March the third 1665, " For your proposition concerning Archimedes and " Apollonius, I cannot well tell what to an- " swer. I have been offered by a friend to be " at the charges of printing them for me, which " would yield me, I suppose, a considerable benefit, " for I thinke I could put off many here. But till I " be necessitated by some engagement, I shall hardly " ever induce my selfe to take the pains, and spend " the time requisite for the reviewall of them; al- " though within two or three months I thinke I " could performe that. If the Stationer you mention " should make me a round offer, and propose faire " conditions, I might perhaps be moved. Till such " occasion I am likely to supersede. I have been " also urged to review that little Euclid, which ten " or eleven years ago I writ very hastily. I would " however gladly have it in my disposall; and there- " fore would know whether Mr. Neeland (who " printed it) his widow doe make any accompt there- " of. He gott (as I have been told from himselfe) " some hundreds of pounds by it; and did not keep " conditions with me in printing it so well as he " did promise me, so that I might presume to right " myselfe; but I would not have any controverfy, " nor doe the shadow of an injury to any. Where- " fore if you have opportunity of inquiry, and could " informe me, whether Mr. Neeland's Relict would " consent, that I dispose thereof at my pleasure, you " would favour me therein. Indeed if I should re- " solve about Archimedes or Apollonius, I should wil- " lingly have that booke goe along with them (correct- " ed and enlarged, and polished somewhat) by rea- " son of some short Scholiums, that might be conveni- " ently interserted as lemmatical and preparatory to " their demonstrations; as also I should add Theodo- " sius his Sphæricks, and some other elementary " things. But this is spoken in way of supposition, " &c." The latter Letter dated from Trinity-College October the 11th 1670, is as follows. Since my being at London I have been at Audley Inn, waiting there upon the Queene's family for one of my friends. Being thence returned I have bethought my selfe of my promise to you concerning my Perspective Lectures; the which I now send you, although I see part of them written so ill and so confusedly, that I feare you will hardly be able to make any thing of them. I have also with it sent you my Apollonius, which yet is little worth your looking in, having in it nothing considerable, but its brevity. It hath lyed by me without looking on for many years. The Lectures upon Perspective mentioned in this Letter were lost by some means or other.

[P] Appointed by the King Master of Trinity-College in 1672.] When the King advanced him to that dignity, he said, that he had given it to the best Scholar ſhopric of Cheſter. In this ſtation he acted in the moſt exemplary manner imaginable [Q]. But his valuable life was cut off May the 4th 1677, to the general regret of all good men [R]. His Engliſh Works were publiſhed in 1683 in three volumes in folio by Dr. John Tillotſon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury [S], who as well as Mr. Hill gives a noble character of our Author [T]. His Sermons are admired by all good judges in England. He was then his Majeſty's Chaplain in ordinary (28), who had ſeveral times done him the honour to diſcourſe with him; and this preferment was not at all obtained by faction or flattery. It was the King's own Act, tho' his merit engaged thoſe of the greateſt power and influence to contribute to it, and particularly Dr. Gilbert Sheldon, then Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Buckingham then Chancellor of Cambridge, and formerly a Member of Trinity-College (29). When the Patent for the Maſterſhip was brought, wherein there was a clauſe permitting him to marry, as it had been made before for ſome of his predeceſſors, he cauſed the Grant to be altered, judging it not agreeable to the Statutes, from which he neither deſired nor would accept of any diſpenſation. And he choſe rather, ſays Dr. Pope (30), to be at the expence of double fees, and procure a new Patent, without the marrying clauſe, than perpetually to ſtand upon his guard againſt the ſieges, batteries, and importunities, which he foreſaw that honourable and profitable preferment would expoſe him to.

(28) Dr. Pope, ch. 22. p. 164.

(29) Hill's Account, ubi ſupra.

(30) Pag. 165.

[Q] In this ſtation he acted in the moſt exemplary manner imaginable.] To ſhew his humility and care of the College-revenue, he remitted the charge of keeping a coach for him, which had been allowed a long while before to other Maſters (31). Beſides the particular aſſiſtance, which he gave to many in their ſtudy, he concerned himſelf in every thing, which was for the intereſt of his College; and he ſoon excuſed the Fellows from ſome expence and allowances, which they had made to his predeceſſors. Upon the ſingle affair of building their Library, he wrote out whole quires of paper, chiefly to thoſe perſons, who had been of the College, firſt to engage them, and then to give them thanks, which he never omitted. Theſe letters he did not eſteem enough to keep copies of them, but by the generous returns, which they brought in, they appeared to be of no ſmall value. He had always been a conſtant and early attendant at the chapel, and now continued to do the ſame; and was encouraged therein not only by his own devotion, but by the efficacy, which his example had upon many others of his College. In this place, ſays Mr. Hill, ſeated to his eaſe and ſatisfaction, a ſtation, wherein of all others in the world he could have been moſt uſeful, and which he meant not to make uſe of as a ſtep to aſcend higher, he abated nothing of his ſtudies. He yielded the day to public buſineſs, and took from his morning-ſleep many hours to increaſe his ſtock of Sermons, and write his Treatiſe of the Pope's Supremacy. He underſtood Popery both at home and abroad; he had narrowly obſerved it, militant in England, triumphant in Italy, diſguiſed in France; and had earlier apprehenſions than moſt others of the appearing danger, and would have appeared with the forwardeſt in a needful time.

(31) Idem, ibid.

[R] His valuable life was cut off May the 4th 1677 to the general regret of all good men.] Dr. Pope tells us (32), that a few days after he came to London to the election of Weſtminſter-School, he went to viſit Dr. Seth Ward Lord Biſhop of Saliſbury at Knightsbridge, where at dinner Dr. Pope obſerving that he did not eat, aſk'd him concerning the ſtate of his health. He anſwered, that he had a ſlight indiſpoſition, with which he had ſtruggled two or three days, and that he hoped by faſting and opium to cure it, as he had removed another and more dangerous ſickneſs at Conſtantinople ſome years before. But theſe remedies were ineffectual; for his diſtemper proved in the event an inward, malignant, and inſuperable fever, of which he died in mean lodgings at a Sadler's near Charing-Croſs, which he had uſed for ſeveral years. For tho', ſays Dr. Pope, his condition was much better by his obtaining the Maſterſhip of Trinity-College, yet that had no bad influence upon his morals; he continued the ſame humble perſon, and could not be prevailed upon to take more reputable Lodgings. Mr. Hill informs us, that being invited to preach the Paſſion-Sermon April 13th 1677 at Guildhall-Chapel (which was the ſecond Sermon, for which he ever received any pecuniary recompence,) he never preached but once more, for he fell ſick of a fever, which proved fatal to him. And Dr. Tillotſon obſerves in the Preface to the firſt volume of our author's works, that the Paſſion-Sermon was the laſt he preached but one; and I think, ſays he, the occaſion of his death, by a cold he then got, which in all probability was the cauſe of the fever, of which he died, to our unſpeakable loſs. This he ſent to the preſs himſelf, but did not live to ſee it publiſh'd. The Earl of Nottingham, then Lord High Chancellor of England, ſent a meſſage of condolance to his father, who had then ſome place under him, importing that he had but too great reaſon to grieve, for never father loſt ſo good a ſon; but that this was a conſideration, which ought to mitigate his ſorrow (33).

(32) Pag. 166, 167.

(33) Dr. Pope, pag. 167, 168. and Hill's Account, ubi ſupra.

[S] His Engliſh works were publiſhed in three volumes in folio by Dr. John Tillotſon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury.] The firſt volume contains thirty two Sermons preached upon ſeveral occaſions, the five firſt of which, as Dr. Tillotſon obſerves in his Preface, are deſigned to recommend Religion to the eſteem and practice of mankind from the conſideration of the various excellencies and advantages of it. The four following treat of the two great duties of Religion and parts of divine worſhip, prayer and thankſgiving, and contain likewiſe a very powerful perſuaſive to the practice of them. The three following were preached upon three ſolemn occaſions; the firſt of them upon the 29th of May 1676, the anniverſary of King Charles the ſecond's Reſtoration; the ſecond upon the 5th of November 1675, in commemoration of the Nation's great deliverance from the Powder-Treaſon; both in the year of his Vice-Chancellorſhip. The third at the conſecration of his uncle to the Biſhopric of Man; in which, ſays Dr. Tillotſon, he pleads for the due reſpect and reverence of the Clergy with ſo much modeſty, and yet ſo great force of reaſon and eloquence, that the whole profeſſion may juſtly think themſelves for ever indebted to him. Some of thoſe twelve Sermons were the very firſt that he made, by which we may judge with what preparation and furniture he entred upon this ſacred employment. The firſt of them was preached at St. Mary's in Cambridge June the 30*th* 1661, and was, I think, the firſt that he ever preached. Thoſe two excellent Sermons of Thankſgiving were the next; and the fourth in order was the firſt, which he preached before the King. The next ten Sermons relate to the Vices of the Tongue; and the eight following explain and enforce the two great Commandments of the Law, the Love of God and of our Neighbour. The two next were publiſhed by himſelf, and only theſe two. The firſt of them, concerning the Duty and Reward of Bounty to the Poor, was preached at the Spittal, and received with univerſal approbation; and perhaps, ſays Dr. Tillotſon, there is nothing extant in Divinity more perfect in its kind. It ſeems to have exhauſted the whole argument, and to have left no conſideration belonging to it untouched. The other was on the Paſſion of our bleſſed Saviour. The next part of the firſt volume contains his brief Expoſition of the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Decalogue, with the Doctrine of the Sacraments: and his Treatiſe of the Pope's Supremacy, with his Diſcourſe concerning the Unity of the Church. The ſecond volume contains his Sermons upon the ſeveral Articles of the Creed, wherein, ſays Dr. Tillotſon, he hath not only explain'd and confirmed the great Doctrines of our Religion, but likewiſe ſhewn what Influence every Article of our Faith ought to have upon our practice. The third volume contains many other of his Sermons upon ſeveral uſeful and important ſubjects of Divinity.

[T] Who as well as Mr. Hill gives a noble character of our author.] Dr. Tillotſon obſerves in the Preface to his edition of Dr. Barrow's Engliſh works, that he was ſo publicly known, and ſo highly eſteemed by all learned and good men, that nothing either needs or can be ſaid more to his advantage; and that he ſhall not within judges on account of the inexhauſtible fund of excellent ſenſe, of which they are full [U]. He was extremely fond of Poetry, and well ſkilled in it; and the greateſt part of his Poems are written in hexameter and pentameter verſe, after the manner of Ovid, whom he had a great eſteem for, preferring him even to Virgil himſelf, and declaring, that he thought the latter could not have written the Metamorphoſes ſo well as Ovid (u). He very much valued that part of Poetry, which conſiſts in deſcription; but the hyperboles of ſome modern Poets he as much deſpiſed. He was an enemy to dramatic entertainments, as a principal cauſe of the debauchery of the age; and the other cauſes he thought to be the French education and ill examples of great perſons. As for Satyrs he never wrote any; his wit was pure and peaceable (x). His Treatiſe of the Pope's Supremacy, and his Diſcourſe concerning the Unity of the Church, are excellent performances [X]. His leſſer pieces, written for the moſt part in Latin, were publiſhed in fol. in 1687 [Y], and dedicated by his Father to Dr. John Montague Maſter of Trinity-College in Cambridge, and in the narrow limits of a Preface ſo much as attempt the character of him, of whom either not a little or nothing at all ought to be ſaid. He tells us afterwards, that our author, as he was exemplary in all manner of converſation, ſo he was particularly free from the vices, detraction, and ſlander, and all the other vices of the tongue; "coming as near as is poſſible for hu- "man frailty to do to the perfect idea of St. James "his perfect Man." Mr. Hill in his Account of the Life of Dr. Barrow, informs us, that his Sermons were the counterpart of his actions, and that he has drawn in them the true picture of himſelf. That he was always one by his exact conformity to the rule in a virtuous and prudent converſation, and ſteered by the ſame compaſs to the ſame port, where the ſtorms forced him to ſhift his ſails. In ſhort, that all he had or could ſay, is far ſhort of the idea, which Dr. Barrow's friends have formed of him, and that character, under which he ought to appear to them, who knew him not.

(u) Dr. Pope's Life of Biſhop Ward, ch. 21. pag. 151.

(x) Hill's Account, &c.

[U] His Sermons are univerſally admired by all good judges &c.] Dr. Tillotſon obſerves in his Preface, that they as little need commendation as the author; their own excellency and eloquence will praiſe them beſt; and that as they want no other kind of excellency, ſo particularly they are animated throughout with ſo genuine a ſpirit of true piety and goodneſs, that he muſt either be a perfectly good, or prodigiouſly bad man, that can read them over without being the better for them. Mr. Hill tells us, that when he began to apply himſelf entirely to Divinity, he took a courſe very convenient for his public perſon as a Preacher, and his private as a Chriſtian; for thoſe ſubjects, which he thought moſt important to be conſidered for his own uſe, he caſt into the method of Sermons for the benefit of others, and herein was ſo exact as to write ſome of them four or five times over. His Sermons were all large and finiſh'd, and fairly written, which he was very ready to preach, i. e. to read or lend them as often as deſired. Had he been a ſettled Preacher, he intended them ſhorter, and he would have truſted to his memory. Mr. le Clerc remarks in his Bibliotheque Univerſelle (34), that the method of Dr. Barrow in his Sermons is ſuch as the ableſt Divines of the Church of England obſerve; and that having applied himſelf much to the Mathematics, he had acquired a habit of writing with exactneſs, of proceeding directly towards the point, and making uſe of ſolid proofs rather than figures of Rhetoric. And he tells us afterwards (35), that our author's Sermons are rather treatiſes or exact diſſertations, than harangues to pleaſe the multitude; and that if he had not reſolved to keep within the bounds of a mere Hiſtorian, he might aſſert, that he had never known a Sermon-maker comparable to him. It is ſaid that King Charles II uſed to call him an unfair Preacher, becauſe he uſed to exhauſt every ſubject, and left no room for any other perſon to write after him upon it. We may obſerve here, that his ſtyle is ſometimes objected to; but Mr. Hill remarks, that being engaged with variety of men and ſtudies, his mind became ſtored with a wonderful plenty of words, wherewith to expreſs himſelf; and it happened that ſometimes he let ſlip a word not commonly uſed, which upon reflection he would doubtleſs have altered, for it was not out of affectation.

(34) Tom. 3. pag. 312.

(35) Ibid. pag. 326.

[X] His Treatiſe of the Pope's Supremacy, and his Diſcourſe concerning the Unity of the Church, are excellent performances.] Dr. Tillotſon tells us in his preface to thoſe two works, that Dr. Barrow gave him upon his death-bed a particular permiſſion to publiſh his Treatiſe of the Pope's Supremacy, with this modeſt character of it, that he hoped it was indifferent perfect; tho' not altogether as he intended it, if God had granted him longer life. He deſigned indeed to have tranſcribed it again, and to have filled up thoſe many ſpaces, which were purpoſely left in it, for the further confirmation and illuſtration of ſeveral things by more teſtimonies and inſtances, which probably he had in his thoughts. And it would certainly have added much to the beauty and perfection of this work, if he had lived to have given it his laſt hand. However as it is, ſays Dr. Tillotſon, it is not only a juſt, but an admirable diſcourſe upon this ſubject, which many others have handled before, but he hath exhauſted it; inſomuch that no argument of moment, nay hardly any conſideration properly belonging to it, hath eſcaped his large and comprehenſive mind. He hath ſaid enough to ſilence the controverſy for ever, and to deter all wiſe men of both ſides from medling any further with it. The Doctor proceeds to obſerve, that whoever will carefully peruſe this Treatiſe, will find, that this point of the Pope's Supremacy, (upon which Bellarmin hath the confidence to ſay, the whole of Chriſtianity depends,) is not only an indefenſible, but an impudent cauſe, as ever was undertaken by learned pens. And nothing could have kept it ſo long from becoming ridiculous in the judgment of mankind, but its being ſo ſtrongly ſupported by a worldly intereſt. To this Treatiſe is added, for the affinity of the argument, Dr. Barrow's Diſcourſe concerning the Unity of the Church; "which he ſo explains, ſays Dr. Tillotſon, as quite to "take away the neceſſity of a viſible Head over the "whole Church for the preſervation of its Unity, "which is the only ſpecious, but yet a very remote "pretence for the Pope's Supremacy. For if a viſi- "ble Monarch of the Church were granted neceſ- "ſary, many things more muſt be ſuppoſed (which "neither yet are, nor ever can be proved) to make the "Biſhop of Rome the man." Mr. Hill tells us, that by this little piece of the Unity of the Church he has better deſerved of the Church and Religion than many, who make a greater figure in Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory and Polities. For upon his principles Eccleſiaſticiſm would be for edification and not for deſtruction. It is the learned Mr. Thorndyke he diſputes againſt; but that did not abate the intimate friendſhip, that was between them. The Teſtimonies relating to this Diſcourſe and the Treatiſe of the Pope's Supremacy, were very few of them tranſlated by the Author; which he certainly intended, having left ſpaces for it, and is ſince done with great care by two of his learned friends of his own college.

[Y] His leſſer pieces written for the moſt part in Latin, were publiſhed at London in fol. in 1687.] The firſt Tract is concerning the Holy Ghoſt, in which he endeavours to ſhew, that the Holy Ghoſt is a diſtinct perſon, co-eſſential with the Father and Son, and proceeding from them both. Spiritus Sanctus eſt perſona diſtincta, Patri Filioque coeſſentialis, & ab utroque procedens. The ſecond is concerning the Government of the Church by Biſhops, in ſupport of this propoſition, that the rejection of the Epiſcopal Government, where orthodox and lawful Biſhops may be had, properly conſtitutes a mortal ſchiſm. Rejectio Regiminis Epiſcopalis, ubi habentur orthodoxi & legitimi Epiſcopi, facit propriè ſchiſma mortale. Or as he concludes that Theſis, Epiſcopalis itaque Regiminis abjectionem quiſquis animo and to the Fellows of that College. He was one of the greateſt Mathematicians before Sir Iſaac Newton. He was an indefatigable Student; and during the Winter months and ſome part of the reſt roſe always before it was light (y). He had an undaunted courage, as appeared from ſome inſtances [Z]; and was remarkable for too great neglect of his dreſs, which expoſed him ſometimes to inconveniences, where he was not known [AA]; and for animo pravo (contentioſo ſcilicet, arrogante, pervicace, faſtidioſo, vel utcunque perverſo) eum quidni cum doctiſſimo reſpondente ſchiſmatis (& quidem mortalis, hoc eſt, peccati graviſſimi) reum pronunciem? i. e. "If any "man therefore ſhall endeavour the removal of Epiſcopal Government with an ill mind, (that is with a contentious, arrogant, obſtinate, haughty, or perverſe "mind in any reſpect,) why ſhould not I with the "learned Reſpondent pronounce him guilty of ſchiſm "(and indeed a mortal one, that is, of a very heinous crime)?" The third piece is concerning the three Creeds, upon this Theſis, that "the relaxing of the "faith in the three Creeds mentioned in the eighth Article of the Church of England, cannot be admitted "without the ſcandal of apoſtacy from the Univerſal "Church." Relaxatio fidei trium Symbolorum in octavo articulo Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ propoſitorum admitti non poteſt ſine dato ſcandalo apoſtaſiæ ab Eccleſiâ Univerſali. Our author obſerves, that the Creed aſcribed to St. Athanaſius does not receive its ſanction from the author, concerning whom the learned are not well agreed, nor from the antiquity of it, ſince it has not been generally known but for about a thouſand years, nor from the general aſſent paid to it, ſince it is only received by the Weſtern Church; but that it maintains its authority, becauſe it has been delivered down for ſo many Ages, and embraced thro' ſo large an extent of the Chriſtian world, and has this intrinſic advantage in it, that it is in ſome meaſure more perfect and full than the reſt, and more adapted to the ſupport of orthodoxy. Tertium, S. Athanaſio adſcriptum, ſymbolum, non auctoris claritate (is enim apud doctos haud adeo certus eſt) nec antiquitatis compertæ gratiâ (nam duntaxat à mille circiter annis ejuſce notitia percrebuit,) neque conſenſûs amplitudine (cum ab occidentali tantùm Eccleſiâ recipiatur) ita commendatum; hoc tamen nomine dignitatem ſuam tuetur, quod undicunque profectum tot per ſecula, tantamque per orbis Chriſtiani partem invaluit; quin & à ſe intrinſecùs hoc habet, quod reliquis quodammodo perfectius & plenius eſt, necnon ad ὀρθοδοξίαν adſerendam accommodatius. He remarks afterwards that ſome perſons except againſt ſome particulars in that Creed, and particularly againſt the damnatory clauſe. To which objection he replies, that this does not relate to the belief of the Creed, and conſequently has nothing to do with the queſtion, as appears from the order of the words themſelves; for immediately after the Introduction is added, And the Catholic Faith is this. And to the end of the Creed are ſubjoined theſe words, This is the Catholic Faith, which is likewiſe followed with the damnatory clauſe; ſo that the Creed itſelf is contained between theſe two ſevere ſentences. In the ſecond place, this ſentence does not ſeem to extend equally to all points of the Creed, but to thoſe chiefly which have been determined in univerſal Councils, and the contrary opinions which have been anathematized by the Fathers as hereſy. Thus for inſtance, a great many Divines, who are extremely attached to this Creed, would not for ſeveral important reaſons rank the Greeks among heretics, and exclude them from ſalvation, on account of their doctrine concerning the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt. For they conſider, that it would be very ſhocking to ſubject to ſo ſevere a ſentence ſo great a part of the Church, who have maintained that opinion ever ſince Photius's time at leaſt, that is, above eight hundred years. Beſides, ſay they, whence comes it, that moſt of the Greek Fathers eſpecially are in ſuſpence concerning this point, or affirm nothing definitively? Whence comes it, that the principal of them aſſert, that the manner of the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt is not a point of belief the leaſt eſſential to ſalvation? Why did the Council of Conſtantinople paſs it over without any particular determination? Or the following Councils prohibit that any definition ſhould be added upon that ſubject? How came Theodoret to oppoſe this doctrine with impunity, without any anſwer from Cyrill, and without being ſtigmatized upon that account with the name of Heretic by any one of his numerous antagoniſts? In the third place Dr. Barrow obſerves, that theſe damnatory ſentences are to be tempered and underſtood in ſuch a manner, as not to involve under them every perſon, who is merely ignorant, or errs and refuſes his aſſent out of ſimplicity, but only thoſe, who from corrupt affections, and with a mind really heretical, that is, ſelf-condemned, or hypocritical, raſh, factious, arrogant or obſtinate, oppoſe to the truth, ſuch men, who, according to St. Paul (36), are of corrupt minds, and therefore deſtitute of the truth. Ejuſmodi judicia ſic temperanda ſunt, ut iis non quilibet ignarus aut ſimpliciter errans & incredulus ſubjaceat; at ii ſaltem, qui pravis affectibus, animo revera hæretico (hoc eſt αὐτοκαταχρίτῳ, vel hypercritico, temerario, factioſo, arrogante, contumace) pateſactæ circa fidei doctrinam veritati præfracte obnituntur atque reclamant, ἀνθρώπους juxta Apoſtolum, διεφθαρμένους τὸν νῦν, ac inde, ἀκρίτους περὶ τὴν ἀλήθειαν. The next piece is to explode the notion of the Preexiſtence of Souls; and that which immediately follows is concerning the Power of the Keys, which he concludes with obſerving from St. Jerom upon this Text, in St. Matthew c. xvi. 19. And I will give unto thee the keys of the Kingdom of heaven, that ſome Biſhops and Prieſts miſtaking the ſenſe of it, aſſume to themſelves ſomething of the inſolent pretences of the Phariſees, ſo as to take upon themſelves either to condemn the innocent or to abſolve the guilty; whereas God regards not the ſentence of the Prieſts, but the life of the ſinner. Iſtum locum Epiſcopi & Preſbyteri non intelligentes aliquid ſibi de Phariſæorum aſſumunt ſupercilio, ut vel damnent innocentes, vel ſolvere ſe noxios arbitrentur; cum apud Deum non ſententia ſacerdotum, ſed eorum vita quæratur. This is followed by his Sermon ad Clerum upon Joel ii. 12. and by ſeveral Orations and Theſes, ſome of which we have already mentioned in this article; an Epitome of the Faith and Religion of the Turks in Latin; a Diſcourſe in Engliſh of the Superſtition of the Turks, with ſeveral Turkiſh Proverbs; and a Relation of the deſigns managed by the old Queen wife of Sultan Ahmed, and mother of Sultan Morat and Sultan Ibrahim, Emperors, againſt her grand-child Sultan Mehmed Chan, who now reigns, and of the Death of the ſaid Queen and her complices. This piece was written by Albert Bobovius, then Muſician of the Seraglio, and a Spectator of thoſe tranſactions. Then follow Dr. Barrow's Poems, with a Latin Oration ſpoken upon the 5th of November 1651, and another at the commencement, a Letter in the ſame language, a little Tract upon the Roman Seſtertium, and ſome Latin Verſes to Dr. Tillotſon, and Mr. Chriſtopher Wren.

(y) Dr. Pope, pag. 145.

(36) 1 Tim. vi. 5.

[Z] Of undaunted courage, as appeared from ſome inſtances.] We have mentioned above in the note [F] the great reſolution which he ſhewed in defence of the ſhip againſt the pirate. To this we may add another inſtance from Mr. Hill and Dr. Pope (37). Being at a Gentleman's houſe in the country, and going out very early, even before day, a fierce maſtiff, which uſed to be chained up all day, and let looſe late at night for the ſecurity of the houſe, perceiving a ſtrange perſon in the garden at that unſeaſonable time, ſet upon him with great fury. The Doctor ſeized him by the throat, threw him down, and lay upon him; and whilſt he kept him down, conſidered what he ſhould do in that exigence. Once he had a mind to kill him, but he changed this reſolution, judging, that it would be an unjuſt action, ſince the dog did but his duty. At laſt he called out ſo loud, that he was heard by ſome of the houſe, who came out and parted them, without any other hurt to the Doctor, than the ſtraining of his hands, which he felt ſome days after.

(37) Ch. 19. pag. 137.

[AA] Remarkable for the too great neglect of his dreſs, which expoſed him ſometimes to inconveniences, where he was not known.] Dr. Pope gives us a great inſtance of this (38). While Dr. Wilkins was Rector of St. Laurence-Jewry, being indiſpoſed, he deſired Dr. Barrow to give him a Sermon the next Sunday; who

(38) Chap. 20. p. 138, & ſeq.

for the length of his Sermons [BB]. He lies buried in Weſtminſter-Abby, with a monument erected by the contribution of his friends; an inſtance of gratitude not uſual in this age, and a reſpect peculiar to him among all the glories of that Church (z). His dear friend Dr. Mapletoft wrote his epitaph [CC]. He was of a healthy conſtitution, and uſed no exerciſe or phyſic but Tobacco, in the uſe of which he was very free, affirming that it was a Panpharmacon or Univerſal Remedy (aa), and imagining that it helped to regulate his thinking (bb). He was extremely fond of fruit, but it was to him Phyſic as well as food; and he thought that if fruit kills hundreds in Autumn,

(z) Hill's Account, &c. ubi ſupra.

(aa) Dr. Pope, pag. 145.

(bb) Hill's Account.

who accordingly came with an aſpect pale, and meagre, and unpromiſing, careleſly dreſſed, his collar unbuttoned, and hair uncomb'd. He mounts the pulpit, and begins his prayer; Immediately, ſays Dr. Pope, all the congregation was in an uproar, as if the Church were falling, and they ſcampering to ſave their lives, each ſhifting for himſelf with great precipitation. There was ſuch a noiſe of pattens of ſerving-maids and ordinary women, and of unlocking of pews, and cracking of ſeats, cauſed by the younger ſort haſtily climbing over them, that I confeſs, I thought all the congregation were mad. But the good Doctor ſeeming not to take notice of this diſturbance, proceeds, names his text, and preached his Sermon to two or three gathered or rather left together, of which number, as it fortunately happened, Mr. Baxter, that eminent Non-Conformiſt was one, who afterwards gave Dr. Wilkins a viſit, and commended the Sermon to that degree, that he ſaid, he never heard a better diſcourſe. "There was alſo among thoſe, who "ſtaid out the Sermon, a certain young man, who "thus accoſted Dr. Barrow as he came down from "the pulpit; Sir, be not diſmayed, for I aſſure you "'twas a good Sermon. By his age and dreſs he ſeem-"ed to be an apprentice, or at the beſt a foreman of "a ſhop; but we never heard more of him. I aſked "the Doctor, what he thought, when he ſaw the "congregation running away from him? I thought, "ſaid he, they did not like me, or my Sermon; and I "have no reaſon to be angry with them for that. But "what was your opinion, ſaid I, of the Apprentice? I "take him, replied he, to be a very civil perſon, and "if I could meet with him, I'd preſent him with a "bottle of wine." There were then in that pariſh a company of formal, grave, and wealthy Citizens, who having been many years under famous Miniſters, as Dr. Wilkins, Biſhop Ward, Biſhop Reynolds, Mr. Vines, &c. had a great opinion of their skill in Divinity, and their ability to judge of the goodneſs and badneſs of Sermons. Many of theſe came in a body to Dr. Wilkins to expoſtulate with him, why he ſuffered ſuch an ignorant, ſcandalous fellow, meaning Dr. Barrow, to have the uſe of his pulpit. They repreſented, that he looked like a ſtarved Cavalier, who had been long ſequeſtered, and thrown out of his living for delinquency, and was come up to London to beg, now the King was reſtored. Mr. Baxter happened to be with Dr. Wilkins at that time, who let them run themſelves out of breath, and when they had done ſpeaking, and expected an humble ſubmiſſive anſwer, replied to them in this manner: The perſon you thus deſpiſe, I aſſure you, is a pious man, an eminent Scholar, and an excellent Preacher. For the truth of this I appeal to Mr. Baxter here preſent, who heard the Sermon you ſo vilify. I am ſure you believe Mr. Baxter is a competent judge, and will pronounce according to truth. Then turning to him, Pray, Sir, ſaid he, do me the favour to declare your opinion concerning the Sermon now in controverſy, which you heard at our Church the laſt Sunday. Mr. Baxter upon this declared, that Dr. Barrow preached ſo well, that he could willingly have been his Auditor all day long. When they heard this encomium, they were all aſhamed and confounded; "for though, ſays Dr. Pope, they had a good opi-"nion of themſelves, yet they durſt not pretend to be "equal to Mr. Baxter; but at length, after ſome "pauſe, they all, one after another, confeſſed, they "did not hear one word of the Sermon, but were carried "to miſlike it by his unpromiſing garb and mien, the "reading of his prayer, and the going away of the "congregation, for they would not by any means have "it thought, if they heard the Sermon, they ſhould "not have concurred with the judgment of Mr. Bax-"ter. After their ſhame was a little over, they ear-"neſtly deſired Dr. Wilkins to procure Dr. Barrow "to preach again, engaging themſelves to make him "amends, by bringing to his Sermon their wives and "children, man-ſervants, and maid-ſervants, in a "word their whole families, and to enjoin them not to "leave the church till the bleſſing was pronounced. Dr. "Wilkins promiſed them to uſe his utmoſt endeavour "for their ſatisfaction, and accordingly ſollicited Dr. "Barrow to appear once again upon that ſtage; but "all in vain, for he would not by any perſuaſions "be prevailed upon to comply with the requeſt of "ſuch conceited, hypocritical coxcombs."

[BB] And for the length of his Sermons.] Dr. Pope tells us (39), that beſides his too great negligence in dreſs, he had but one fault, (if it deſerves that name,) which was, that he was generally too long in his Sermons. And now, ſays he, I have ſpoke as ill of him, as the worſt of his enemies ever could, if he ever had any. He did not conſider, that men cannot be attentive to any diſcourſe of above an hour's duration, and hardly ſo long; and that therefore even in plays, which are diſcourſes made for diverſion, and more agreeable to mankind, there are frequent pauſes and muſic between the acts, that the ſpectators may riſe from their ſeats and refreſh their weary bodies and minds. But he thought he had not ſaid enough, if he omitted any thing that belonged to the ſubject of his diſcourſe, ſo that his Sermons ſeemed rather complete Treatiſes, than Orations deſigned to be ſpoken in an hour. He was once requeſted by the Biſhop of Rocheſter then Dean of Weſtminſter to preach at the Abbey, and at the ſame time deſired not to be long, for that Auditory loved ſhort Sermons, and were uſed to them. He replied, My Lord, I will ſhew you my Sermon. The text was in the tenth chapter of Proverbs, the latter part of the eighteenth verſe; He that uttereth ſlander is a fool. The Sermon was accordingly divided into two parts; and the Dean deſired him to content himſelf with preaching only the firſt part; to which he conſented, though not without ſome reluctance; and in ſpeaking that only, he took up an hour and an half. This diſcourſe is ſince publiſhed in two Sermons, as it was preached. "An-"other time, ſays Dr. Pope (40), upon the ſame per-"ſon's invitation, he preached at the Abbey on an "Holiday. Here I muſt inform the reader, that it "is a cuſtom for the ſervants of the Church upon all "Holidays, Sundays excepted, betwixt the ſermon and "evening prayers, to ſhew the tombs and effigies of "the Kings and Queens in wax to the meaner ſort "of people, who then flock thither from all corners "of the town, and pay their two pence to ſee the "play of the dead Volks, as I have heard a Devonſhire "clown not improperly call it. Theſe perceiving Dr. "Barrow in the pulpit after the hour was paſt, and "fearing to loſe that time in hearing, which they "thought they could more profitably employ in re-"ceiving; theſe, I ſay, became impatient, and caus'd "the organ to be ſtruck up againſt him, and would "not give over playing till they had blowed him "down." But the Sermon of the greateſt length was that concerning Charity before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen at the Spittal, in ſpeaking of which he ſpent three hours and an half; and being asked when he came down from the pulpit, whether he was not tired, Yes indeed, ſaid he, I began to be weary in ſtanding ſo long.

(39) Pag. 146.

(40) Pag. 147, 148.

[CC] His friend Dr. Mapletoft wrote his Epitaph.] It is as follows: Isaacus Barrow. S. T. P. Carolo II. à ſacris. Vir propè divinus & verè magnus, ſi quid magni habent Pietas, Probitas, Fides, ſumma Eruditio, par Modeſtia, Mores ſanctiſſimi undequaque, & ſuaviſſimi. Geometriæ Profeſſor Londini Greſhamenſis, Græcæ Linguæ & Matheſeos apud Cantabrigienſes ſuos. Cathedras omnes, Eccleſiam, Gentem ornavit. Collegium S. S. Trinitatis Præſes illuſtravit, jactis Bibliothecæ verè regiæ fundamentis auxit. Opes, honores, & univerſum vitæ ambitum, ad majora natus, non contempſit,

Autumn, it preſerves thouſands (bb). His picture was never taken from the life; and the effigies on his tomb reſembles him very little. He was in perſon of the leſſer ſize and lean, of extraordinary ſtrength, of a fair and calm complection, a thin ſkin, very ſenſible of the cold; his eyes grey, clear, and ſomewhat ſhort-ſighted; and his hair of a light auburn colour, very fine and curling. He is well repreſented by the figure of Marcus Brutus in his Denarii (cc), whoſe character from Cowley, Mr. Hill applies to our Author; and obſerves, that Dr. Barrow had in himſelf this diſadvantage of wanting foils to augment his luſtre, and low places to give eminence to his heights; and that ſuch virtues as his contentment in all conditions, candour in doubtful caſes, moderation among differing parties, knowledge without oſtentation, are ſubjects fitter for praiſe than narrative. Mr. John Craige in his Methodus Figurarum lineis rectis & curvis comprehenſarum quadraturas determinandi (dd) highly extols his diſcoveries in Mathematics; but Baron Tſchirnhaus was of opinion, that theſe compliments were carried too high, as appears from a Letter of his dated February the 20th 1686, and publiſhed in the Acta Eruditorum (ee) for March 1686, wherein he makes ſome animadverſions upon Mr. Craige's book. However he aſſures (ff) us, that his reflections were not deſigned to intimate as if he did not value Dr. Barrow's diſcoveries, ſince he had the utmoſt eſteem for them, and recommended them in the ſtrongeſt manner to thoſe, who applied themſelves to theſe ſtudies. Mr. Leibnitz in a piece of his De Geometriâ reconditâ & Analyſi Indiviſibilium atque infinitorum publiſhed in the Acta Eruditorum for June 1686 (gg), giving an account of the ſeveral improvements made by the greateſt Mathematicians in that ſpecies of Geometry tells us (hh), that Dr. Barrow in particular wonderfully improved that Science by the invention of ſeveral excellent Theorems. Dr. Henry Pemberton in his Preface (ii) to his View of Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophy having obſerved that he had often heard that great Man cenſure the handling geometrical ſubjects by Algebraical calculations, and that he called his book of Algebra by the name of Univerſal Arithmetic, in oppoſition to the injudicious title of Geometry, which Des Cartes had given to the Treatiſe, wherein he ſhews how the Geometer may aſſiſt his invention by ſuch kinds of computations; he tells us that Sir Iſaac frequently praiſed Dr. Barrow, as well as Sluſius and Huygens, for not being influenced by the falſe taſte, which then began to prevail. Dr. Pemberton afterwards affirms, that our Author "may be eſteemed as having ſhewn a compaſs of invention equal, if not ſuperior to any "of the Moderns, Sir Iſaac Newton only excepted." Mr. Echard in his Hiſtory of England (kk) tells us, that he ſhewed himſelf of a moſt extenſive genius, profoundly verſed in Theology, as well as in other parts of learning, and had ſuch an invention and method, that all his Sermons ſeemed as compleat Treatiſes, in which the ſubject, after his peculiar manner, was exhauſted; and that his life was exemplary for piety, modeſty, and ſweetneſs. A very learned and ingenious Gentleman (ll) has in his poſſeſſion a great number of original Letters of our Author to Mr. John Collins, from which we ſhall give ſome extracts in the note [DD]; and

(bb) Ibid.

(cc) Ibid.

(dd) Pag. 3. edit. London 1685, in 4to.

(ee) Pag. 169, & ſeq.

(ff) Ibid. pag. 176.

(gg) Pag. 292, & ſeq.

(hh) Pag. 298.

(ii) Edit. London 1728, in 4to.

(kk) Vol. 2. B. 2. cap. 1. ad ann. 1677.

(ll) William Jones Eſq; Author of the Synopſis Palmariorum Matheſeos.

contempſit, ſed reliquit ſæculo. Deum, quem a teneris coluit, cum primis imitatus eſt, pauciſſimis egendo, benefaciendo quam plurimis, etiam poſteris, quibus vel mortuus concionari non deſinit. Cætera, & penè majora ex ſcriptis peti poſſunt. Abi, Lector, & æmulare. Obiit iv. die Maii, Ann. Dom. MDCLXXVII. Ætat. ſuæ XLVII. Monumentum hoc Amici poſuere. That is, according to Dr. Pope's tranſlation of it (41), "This "monument was erected by his friends to perpetuate "the memory of ISAAC BARROW, Doctor of Divi- "nity, and Chaplain in ordinary to King Charles the "ſecond. He was a godlike and truly great man, "if probity, piety, learning in the higheſt degree, "and equal modeſty, moſt holy and ſweet manners "can confer that title. He was Profeſſor of Geo- "metry in Greſham-College in London, and after- "wards of the Greek Tongue and Mathematics a- "mongſt his Cantabrigians. An honour to all his "Profeſſions, the Church, and Nation. He illuſtrat- "ed Trinity-College, as Maſter, and augmented it "by laying the foundation of a truly royal Library. "Riches, honour, and all things deſirable by moſt "other men, he did not contemn, but neglect. He "imitated God, whom he had ſerved from his youth, "in wanting few things, and doing good to all, even "to poſterity, to whom, tho' dead, he yet preaches. "The reſt, and, if it be poſſible, greater things than "theſe, may be found in his writings. Go, Reader, "and imitate him. He died the 14th of May in the "47th year of his age, and of our Lord 1677."

(41) Ch p. 22. pag. 169, 170.

[DD] Original Letters of our Author to Mr. John Collins, from which we ſhall give ſome extracts in the Note.] The firſt we ſhall mention is without a date, but we find it in the following paſſages relating to the characters of ſome books.

Honoured Sir,

"I received th e booke of Snellius, and that of "your own compoſition, which you were pleaſed to "beſtow upon me, and for which I thank you, though "muſt confeſſe it doth ſomewhat ſurpaſſe my capa- "city, who have little acquainted my ſelfe with that "kind of practicks, and indeed hardly with any. "That little ſtudy I have employed upon mathema- "tical buſyneſſes, being never deſigned to any other "uſe than the bare knowledge of the general reaſons "of things, as a ſcholar, and no farther; ſo that if "you propound any thing to me, I pray pleaſe to "doe it in the moſt general and abſtract termes, as "neere the geometricall ſtyle, as you can; otherwiſe "I ſhall hardly underſtand the queſtions.

"Concerning the Bookes you mention I have moſt "of them, particularly Hugenius de Magnitudine Cir- "culi, (which I would gladly have compared with "Snellius,) but his Treatiſe de Quadraturâ Circuli, "&c. I have not, but would gladly ſee, and have "it to my ſelfe, if procurable; for I exceedingly "eſteeme his writings; and if true that he hath ſett "out an Algebra, I ſhould be glad to have it, though "I kenn no Dutch, and would try what I could di- "vine out of it.

"I was familiarly acquainted with Renoldinus at "Florence; and he was then working upon his Al- "gebra. We may expect a collection of what is in for- "mer writers, but whether much new I cannot tell.

"What you ſpeake concerning the Parabolicall "Conoids, I doe not underſtand whether it is by way "of inquiry or offer. If you aſke me, I anſwer, "that I thinke I have ſufficient reaſon to pronounce, "that generally the proportions betweene ſegments "made by plaines parallel to the axis (or otherwiſe) "cannot geometrically be found out; becauſe they "cutt all the circles parallell to the baſe in different "unexplicable proportions; ſo that it were but a "vaine labour to endeavour the invention of them. "However I am now employed in thoughts ſo difand ſeveral papers of his never yet publiſhed relating to the Mathematics, particularly a Compendium pro Tangentibus determinandis, and a ſhort piece of the Nature of Equations, both in the Author's own hand; the Geometrical Conſtruction of Equations, and Additaments about Curves, tranſcribed from his papers by Mr. Collins, and ſome Conjectures upon the Nature of Colours.

"ferent

" ferent, that I cannot well compoſe my mind to " thinke upon it. If you remember, Merſennus and " Torricellius doe mention a general method of find- " ing the tangents of curve lines by compoſition of " motions; but doe not tell it us. Such a one I have " ſome time found out, and did thinke to ſend it to you, " it being only one theorem very eaſily and ſimply " demonſtrated; but wanting leiſure to dreſſe it, I " will attend till you call for it, if you thinke ſuch a " curioſity worth the regarding."

In another Letter dated from Trinity-College Septemb. 5th 1664, is the following paſſage:

Honoured Sir,

" Were I to compute the portions of Sphære or " Sphæroid, I ſhould onely uſe theſe rules out of Archi- " medes; $\frac{\varpi}{\delta}$ or $\frac{355}{113} : rnn - \frac{n^3}{3}$ * is the portion of the " Sphære (putting r for the Radius and n for the Axis " of the Portion) and $\frac{\varpi}{\delta} : \frac{rnn}{2} - \frac{r}{3t} n^3$ is the Por- " tion of the Sphæroid (putting r for the latus rectum, " and t for the tranſverſum, and n for the Axis of " the Portion."

* This is the ſame with $\frac{\varpi}{\delta} \times rnn - \frac{n^3}{3}$

In another Letter dated from the ſame College Novemb. 12th 1664 he writes as follows:

Honoured Sir,

" I have received, and thanke you for the Mengo- " lus †; I ſhall not have leiſure for a while to conſi- " der him ſeriouſly; but caſting my eye upon him, I " doe not wonder at Mr. Kerſey's not having pati- " ence to peruſe him; for I perceive he doth affect to " uſe abundance of new definitions and uncouth terms, " ſo that one muſt as it were learne new languages " to attaine to his meaning, though it may be only " ſomewhat ordinary is couched under them. I e- " ſteeme this a great fault in any writer; for much " time is ſpent and labour employed to leſs purpoſe " than needed, ſince there is little in any ſcience but " may be ſufficiently explained in the uſual manner " of ſpeaking, as particularly Mr. Cartes his Geometry " doth plainly ſhew, where ſo many uſefull rules are " delivered without any new words or definitions at " all. But I beginn to prate. However be pleaſed " to put this booke upon my accompt (ſeeing you can " furniſh your ſelfe with another;) for I love to have " by me divers bookes, which I do not much eſteeme; " upon which ſcore you need not ſcruple at your diſ- " cretion to ſend me any booke, that I have not. I " never matter the point of mony in this caſe, and " ſhall take any willingly and thankfully from you. " 'Tis hard if there be not one thing at leaſt to be " learned out of any new booke; and that ſatisfyes " me more than the expence of a few ſhillings can " diſpleaſe me."

† Author of the Elementa Geometria Specioſæ. Ben. 1659, in 4to.

In another dated from the ſame place Nov. 29th 1664 he writes thus:

Honoured Sir,

" Alſted's Admiranda Mathematica is nothing but " a very ſhort comprizall of the chiefe mathematical " Sciences, containing ſmall ſyſtemes of Arithmetick, " Geometry, Aſtronomy, Geography, Opticks, Mu- " ſick, Architecture, according to the methodicall or " Ramiſticall way. It is done, I thinke, well enough " according to the deſigne; but may well be wanted. " I cannot very well deſcribe to you Bartſchius his " Planiſphære. It treats more or leſſe concerning moſt " parts of Aſtronomy; but mainly concerning the " fixed Stars and their Aſteriſms, giving verball de- " ſcriptions, catalogues with Longitude and Latitude, " and three or four mapps or delineations of them in " plano. At the end are ſubjoined Ephemerides of the " Planets from the yeere 1662 to 1686, with ſome " other Aſtronomical Tables. Whether there be any " thing extraordinary in the booke, I cannot tell; for " I have looked very little upon it. But if you " pleaſe, I will ſend it you, that you may informe " yourſelfe. Thomæ Albii, (that is in plaine Engliſh " Mr. Thomas White) his Chryſaſpis is a very ſmall " Tract pretending to the Quadrature of the Circle (but " moſt eaſily confutable) as alſo to prove the Equality " of the Spiral Line to the Semicircumference of the " Circle, to which it appertains; both which errors " he hath recanted publickly. Whether Dibuadius " hath commented upon the laſt books of Euclid, I " cannot tell. Mine is only upon the firſt ſixe."

In another Letter dated from the ſame College Feb. 1. 166$\frac{4}{5}$ is another paſſage relating to Mengolus above mentioned:

Deare Sir,

" As for Mengolus I have been once or twice " looking into him; but his language is ſo uncouth " and ambiguous, his definitions ſo many and ſo ob- " ſcure, that I thinke it were eaſyer toward the un- " derſtanding any matter to learne Arabick than his " Dialect. So that (beſide that I doe very much diſ- " like ſuch kind of writing, and hope very little from " thoſe that uſe it) having buſyneſſe enough (which " the laſt yeere hath been encreaſed by divers Gentle- " men being committed to my care) I can hardly al- " low leiſure, and indeed have not patience enough " to ſearch into the depth of his obſcurityes. I ſee " that he propounds many ordinary things involved " in his way; but what he hath performed new I " cannot gueſſe." T.

BARTAS (WILLIAM DE SALUSTE, Seigneur du) a French Poet. See SALUSTE.

BARTHIUS (GASPAR) one of the moſt learned men, and moſt copious Writers of his age, was born at Cuſtrin in Brandenbourg, the 22d of June 1587 (a). His family was of an antient Nobility [A]; Charles de Barth his father, Profeſſor of Civil Law at Francfort upon the Oder, Counſellor to the Elector of Brandenbourg, and his Chancellor at (a) Hulſemannus, in Concione funebri, apud Freherum, Theatri Viror. Illuſt. pag. 1546.

[A] His family was of antient Nobility.] There are few Gentlemen of title, few great Lords, who trace their origin higher than Barthius has done his. One of his anceſtors diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the war againſt the Vandals in the retinue of the Emperor Lewis the Debonnaire in the year 856. He was a Bavarian; he commanded the Horſe, and was killed in that war, as Cyriacus Spangenbergius obſerves (1). The grandfather of Barthius was one of the principal Gentlemen of Bavaria; he went and ſettled himſelf in the circle of upper Saxony, and bought there ſeveral eſtates; and in the year 1545 he was honoured with divers noble titles by the Emperor and the States of the Empire. Avus idem noſter ne in his Terris minor eſſet gentibus ſuis alibi viventibus a Carolo quinto, Conſilio & Senatus-conſulto omnium Imperii ſtatuum tum Spiræ præſentium, ex integro Cæſareæ Majeſtatis & ſacri Imperii auctoritate utriuſque nobilis & miles Torneatius declaratus eſt, omniaque liberæ & veræ nobilitatis privilegia accepit, cum ſingulari integritatis, doctrinæ, & ſtrenuitatis teſtimonio anno Chriſtiano M. D. XLV (2). i. e. " That my grandfather might not be inferior in " rank in this country to that, which others of his " family held in other parts of the world, he was " knighted

(1) In Annalibus Saxonicis, cap. C. pag. 138.

(2) Barthius in Statium, tom. 2. pag. 1026.

at Cuſtrin, died the 6th of February 1597 at Halberſtad, from whence his widow removed to Hall with her children. Gaſpar was ſent to Gotha, then to Eiſenac, and after that to divers Univerſities of Germany and Italy (b). He became ſo learned in a ſhort time, that his childhood was admired by great Men [B], and he wrote divers books before he had a beard [C]. He had a prodigious facility in making Verſes [D]; and he publiſhed a great many of them [E]. He learned the living Languages, (b) Idem, ibid.

" knighted and declared noble by the Emperor Charles " V, and by the decree of all the States of the Em- " pire when aſſembled at Spires, and received all the " privileges of a free and true Nobility, with a ſin- " gular teſtimony of his integrity, learning, and va- " lour, in the year 1545." He exerciſed the office of Chancellor at the Court of Albert of Brandenbourg, Elector of Mentz, Archbiſhop of Magdebourg, and Cardinal. One of his anceſtors, whoſe name was Herman, was Grand Maſter of the Teutonic Order about the end of the twelfth Century (3). The old Annals mention him; Munſter ſpeaks of him in his Coſmography; and the Catalogues of the Grand Maſters of that Order, even thoſe, which Jerom Megiſerus has drawn up, have not omitted him. Other perſons of this family appear in the Accounts of Tournaments, and in the Collections of the Arms of the chief noble families of Germany. The father of Gaſpar Barthius had ſeveral brothers (4), who died all of them without children (5). One of them had been Maſter of the Horſe to ſome great Princes, and was a man of ſome learning (6). Barthius teſtifies that he ſhould be the laſt of his family: Superſtes nunc ego omnibus paterni mei nominis familiam meam univerſam mecum rebus humanis brevi educam (7). You will ſee him in the front of ſeveral of his Works with the title of S. R. Imperii Eques, that is, Knight of the Holy Roman Empire. The thought that his family would die with him afflicted him prodigiouſly: he laid it extremely to heart; he returned frequently to this melancholy object, which induces me to believe that he very eaſily comforted himſelf upon the death of his wife. She was barren, and he reckoned that his vigour of manhood would not laſt any longer than his wife; for otherwiſe he would not have ſpoken in the manner we have ſeen above. But when he leaſt expected it, his wife died. He ſoon married another, in order to ſee whether he could avoid the ſad fate, of which he had been ſo ſtrongly apprehenſive, of dying the laſt of his family. He did not conſider himſelf any longer as an uſeleſs weight upon the earth; this he might ſay properly enough, while he had no hopes of any children: but he had the good fortune of having ſons and daughters by his ſecond marriage; but he forgot to correct thoſe paſſages in his Commentary, wherein he appears to be without hopes of any ſucceſſor. If he would not correct his manuſcript, yet at leaſt he ſhould have added ſomething at the end of it concerning his ſecond marriage, which was more fruitful than the former. If it ſhould be aſked me whence I know that his firſt wife was not dead, when he complained that he was the only perſon remaining of his name, I anſwer, that I have made a ſhort calculation. Barthius's Funeral Oration informs me, that he became a widower in the year 1643, and that his mother died at Hall the 22d of January 1622. Now it was but eighteen years after her death that he made this complaint: Ego inutile ferè pondus terræ omnibus mei nominis mortalibus ſuperſtes ſupervivo integro octodecennio (8). That is, " I, though almoſt an uſeleſs load " upon the earth, have ſurvived all my family " full eighteen years." His firſt wife therefore was living then.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) In the ſpace of a few lines Barthius, pag. 1026, 1027, of his Commentary upon Statius, ſays, that he had ſix uncles by his father's ſide, and that his grandfather left ſix ſons. This is not exact.

(5) Illiberes omnes ... exceſſerunt. Barthius, in Statium, tom. 2. pag. 1027.

(6) Idem, ibid. pag. 1025.

(7) Ibidem.

BARTHIUS's falſe fear of dying without poſterity.

(8) Barthius in Statium, tom. 2. pag. 826.

[B] His childhood was admired by great Men.] Let me be permitted to extend the word Infancy a little beyond what it commonly is, and my text will be very true, ſince the great Scaliger had a conſiderable value for Barthius's firſt productions. " Cujus virtutem ju- " venilem accordatos auſus Joſephus Scaliger SUSPEX- " IT adeò, ut divinationis inſtar hanc illi de Barthio " vocem excidiſſe compertum ſit, natum eſſe adhuc " unum æternitati ingenium, quod ſi ad maturita- " tem perveniret, literas aliquandiu vivere poſſe " (9)." i. e. " Joſeph Scaliger had ſuch an eſteem " for his youthful virtue, and his ingenious attempts, " that it is certain he ſaid this of Barthius, which " appears to be prophetical: There is ſtill one genius, " ſays he, which is born for eternity; and if he comes " to maturity, Learning may live for ſome time among " us." Daumius aſſures us that ſeveral great Doctors were not aſhamed to learn of this young ſcholar: Eo adoleſcente uti Doctore non erubuerunt Taubmannus, Siberus, Schmidius. Quæ Gruteri aliorumque apud exteros virorum de eo tum lata fuerint judicia, domi eorum literæ aſſervatæ partim, partim lectæ docent (10). Another learned man ſpeaks of him in this manner; Novi . . . ante annos ferè quinquaginta pueri præſtabiles minas, cum ſub Wilkii p. m. maru eſſemus συσχολασαὶ: novi ante hos XLIII annos Witerbergæ adoleſcentem florentem gratia apud nonnullos, θαυμαζόμενον ἀεὶ κάτω ab æqualibus (11). i. e. " I knew his promiſing ge- " nius, when he was a boy about fifty years ago, " when we were ſchool-fellows under Wilkius; I " knew him at Wittenberg forty three years ago, " when he was a youth greatly in favour with ſeveral " perſons, and admired every where by his equals.

(9) Spizel. in Templo Honoris reſerato, p. 381.

(9) Spizel. in Templo Honoris reſerato, p. 381.

(10) Daumius, Epiſt. xiv. ad Reineſium.

(11) Reineſius, Epiſt. 15. ad Daumium, p. 46. This Letter is dated the 14th of January 1651.

[C] He wrote ſeveral books before he had a beard.] Mr. Baillet, who has placed him in his catalogue of his Famous Children, will give us a better account of him than any perſon. He will inform us, that Barthius at twelve years of age turned all David's Pſalms into Latin verſe of every kind of meaſure; and that he publiſhed the ſame year other Poems in the ſame language; and that the Collection of Miſcellanies, Satyrs or Sermons, Elegies, Odes, Epigrams, and Iambics, which he publiſhed at Wittemberg in the year 1607, contains all the Poems, which he wrote from the thirteenth to the nineteenth year of his age (12). " We learn from him- " ſelf (it is Mr. Baillet ſtill ſpeaks (13) that when he " was but ſixteen years of age, he wrote a Treatiſe or " Diſſertation in the form of a letter concerning the " manner of reading to advantage the Authors of the " Latin tongue, beginning from Ennius to the end of " the Roman Empire, and continuing them from the " decay of that Language to the Critics of the latter " ages, who have reſtored the antient Authors *. This " compoſition the Author aſſures us coſt him but four " and twenty hours; but it is ſo compact and elabo- " rate a performance, that it ſhews us Barthius muſt " at that time read a prodigious deal; and that his " reading was ſo far from being indigeſted or confu- " ſed, that it was attended with a good judgment, " &c." We may add to this, that he was but eighteen years of age when he wrote a Commentary upon Virgil's Æneis, which was printed at Amberg in the year 1608, and contains a great deal of Learning.

(12) Baillet, Enfans celebrés, pag. 297, 298.

(13) Ibid. pag. 296.

* It is inſerted in the 50th book of his Adverſaria.

[D] He had a prodigious facility at making verſes.] Barthius having taken notice that Statius congratulates himſelf in ſome meaſure for having employed but two days in writing the Epithalamium upon Stella, which contains two hundred and ſeventy eight hexameters, adds that this did not expoſe him to Horace's cenſure (14), ſince this was not making two hundred verſes in an hour, as the perſon did whom Horace ridicules (15). I find, continues he, a great hyperbole in this cenſure, though I am not ignorant what it is to make a great many verſes in a ſhort time; for in three days I tranſlated into Latin the three firſt books of the Iliad, which tranſlation contains above two thouſand verſes.

(14) Nam fuit hoc vitioſus, in horâ ſæpe ducentos,
Ut magnum, verſus dictabat, ſtans pede in uno.
Horat. Sat. 4. ver. 9. lib. 1.

(15) Barthius, in Statium, tom. 1. pag. 7.

[E] . . . . . And he publiſhed a great many of them.] For beſides thoſe mentioned in the remark [C], he publiſhed at Francfort in the year 1623 a Poem intitled Zodiacus Vitæ Chriſtianæ; Satyricon, pleraque omnia veræ ſapientiæ myſteria ſingulari ſuavitate enarrans. It is divided into twelve books. He publiſhed the ſame year and at the ſame place, Epidorpidum ex mero Scazonte Libri III, in quibus bona pars humanæ Sapientiæ metro explicatur. His Epigrams, divided into thirty books, and dedicated to King James, were publiſhed under the name of Tarræus Hebius (16). The four Books Amabilium Anacreonte decantati were printed in the year 1612. He wrote a Paraphraſe upon Æſop's Fables in verſe; a Tranſlation of Muſæus likewiſe in verſe; and a Poem of Leander (17).

(16) Spizel. in Templo Honoris, pag. 382.

(17) Idem, ibid. pag. 386, 387.

I believe

Languages, and he has ſhewn by his tranſlations from Spaniſh and French [F], that he was not contented with a ſuperficial knowledge of them. It is ſurprizing what a prodigious multitude of Authors he muſt have read, as appears from his Adverſaria, and his Commentaries upon Statius and Claudian. The greateſt part of the Critics have ſatisfied themſelves with knowing the profane Authors; but he did not confine himſelf to them; he gained likewiſe a very conſiderable knowledge of the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, and eſpecially of thoſe who lived in the middle ages. His application to books engaged him to renounce all kinds of employment, and to lead a retired life at Leipſic (c). He formed very early his reſolution to diſengage himſelf entirely from the world and from profane ſtudies, in order to apply himſelf wholly to the great buſineſs of ſalvation [G]. He executed this deſign in the laſt years of his life; and it appears from his volume of Soliloquies publiſhed in the year 1654, that he was profoundly meditating upon the concerns of eternity [H]. He died the 17th of September 1658, being a little above ſeventy one years of age (d). The Works, which he left in manuſcript [I]; thoſe

(c) Spizelius in Templo Honoris reſerato, pag. 383.

(d) Witte, Diar. Biograph.

I believe his Tranſlation of Quintus Smyrnæus in verſe was never printed. He mentions it in page 584 of the third volume of his Statius.

[F] His Tranſlations from the Spaniſh and French.] I cannot tell whether he tranſlated any thing out of this latter language but the Memoirs of Philip de Comines, which he put into Latin. He had a great affection for the Caſtilian Tongue; which he has ſhewn in divers places; and his commendations of the Spaniſh Books were not unknown to Don Nicholas Antonio (18). I know of but two Spaniſh Books tranſlated into Latin by Barthius; one is the Celeſtina, which he knew not the author of; the other is the Sequel of the Diana of Montemajor. The title which he gave his Tranſlation of the Celeſtina is as follows: Pornoboſcodidaſcalus Latinus. De lenonum, lenarum, conciliatricum, ſervitiorum, dolis, veneficiis, machinis pluſquam diabolicis, de miſeriis juvenum incautorum, qui florem ætatis amoribus inconceſſis addicunt, de miſerabili ſingulorum periculo & omnium interitu; at Francfort 1624. He has added Notes to his Tranſlation. The Spaniſh author of this Work or Tragi-Comedy, calls himſelf Rodericus Cota. The Continuation of the Diana of Montemajor tranſlated by Barthius is the work of Gaſpar Gil-Polo. Barthius's Tranſlation was printed at Hanaw in 1625 under the title of Erotodidaſculus ſeu Nemoralium Libri V. He likewiſe tranſlated into Latin, as Mr. Baillet informs us (19), the Pornodidaſcalus of Aretin. It is without doubt the ſame book, that Daumius ſpeaks of in theſe terms: Reliqua quæ . . . . . Barthius publicavit ex indiculo colloquio P. Aretini de las Damas ex Hiſpanico ab ipſo tranſlato, & a nobis recuſo nuper, adjecto cognoſcere poteris (20). i. e. "The other things, which Barthius publiſhed, you "may know from the Index, added to the Dialogue "of P. Aretin de las Damas tranſlated by him from "the Spaniſh, and lately reprinted by me." We may conclude from hence that this Latin Tranſlation of Aretin was not done from the original, but only from a Spaniſh verſion.

(18) See the Bibliotheque of the Spaniſh Writers, vol. 1. pag. 403, 413; and vol. 2. pag. 211.

(19) Jugemens des Savans, tom. 1. pag. 542.

(20) Daumius in the preface to Barthius's Commentaries upon Statius, dated the 15th of March 1664.

[G] He formed very early a reſolution to diſengage himſelf entirely from the world . . . . in order to apply himſelf . . . . wholly to the great buſineſs of ſalvation.] Having told us, that his mother had a fore-ſight of her death three years before ſhe died, and that he had ſurvived his good mother eighteen years, being ſound in all parts of his body, except that his ſight was a little weakened (21), he adds, Cupio autem cœptis ſcribendo laboribus demum aliquando defungi, & totum me Chriſto dedicare, quam rem ſæpius jam orſam hactenus infinita bellorum & bellicorum tumultuum exactionumque impedimenta hactenus ſuſpenderunt. i. e. "I am very "deſirous to finiſh the works, which I have begun, "and to dedicate myſelf wholly to Chriſt; which re"ſolution I have often undertaken, but been delayed "in executing it by the infinite obſtacles I have met "with from the tumults and diſturbances of the wars." To know at what time he wrote this; we need only to recollect, that his mother died in 1622. See the remark [A] towards the end.

(21) Barthius, Commentar. in Statium, tom. 2. pag. 826.

[H] He was profoundly meditating upon the concerns of Eternity.] Here is the teſtimony which Theophilus Spizelius gives of him: Sacrum nimirum ad Deum ſinceramque pietatem Barthius meditabatur acceſſum, plurimis piè literatorum ac Deo ſacratorum hominum exemplis incitatus. Quo de imprimis teſtatur inſigne SOLILOQUIORUM OPUS, extremis vitæ temporibus à Barthio publicatum, flagrantiſſimis ad Deum ſuſpiriis oppido plenum, & vel Auguſtino ſcriptore dignum, quod etiam hemiplecticus quotidiè revolvere, & per priorum meditationum veſtigia denuò cogitationes ſuas cœlo immittere conſuevit, quinimò divinum amorem, quem intimis fibris ſemel imbibiſſet, continuis precum ejaculationibus alendum jugiter atque roborandum putavit, quouſque è ſacræ pariter ac literariæ ſolitudinis diverſorio, annò ævi noſtri octavo & quinquageſimo, ætatis verò ſeptuageſimo primo emigravit (22). i. e. "He reſolved "upon a nearer approach to God and to true piety, "animated by the examples of ſeveral Men of Learn"ing, who have devoted themſelves to God. This "we have a remarkable proof of in his excellent "Book of SOLILOQUIES, publiſhed by Barthius in "the latter end of his life, full of ardent breathings "to God, and worthy of the hand of St. Auſtin him"ſelf. This he uſed to turn over daily, when he "was ſeized with the palſy; and by the traces of his "former meditations to raiſe his thoughts to heaven; "he ſtrengthen'd and confirmed the love of God, "which he had the deepeſt impreſſions of in his mind, "by continual prayers and ejaculations, till he de"parted out of this devout and learned retirement in"to another life, in the year 1658, and of his "age 71."

(22) Spizelius, Theat. Honor. pag. 384, 385.

[I] He left ſeveral works in manuſcript.] Daumius has informed the Public, that there are among the author's papers the ſecond and third volume of his Adverſaria; Notes and Gloſſaries upon the Writers of Paleſtine, publiſh'd by James Bongars: Benedictus Paulinus Petrocorius de Vitâ S. Martini, & Paullinus Pellæus cum Tertulliani Jona, Juretique & Barthii Animadverſionibus: XXI Books of Epigrams: XII Books of Anacreontics: the Zodiac of a Chriſtian Life, corrected and enlarg'd in ſeveral places: ſeveral other Poems, moſt part of which were never printed, and others had been corrected; Gloſſaries upon Valerius Maximus, and upon the Epiſtles of Pliny the Younger (23). Daumius declares, that if the cruelty of the times, which are abſolutely averſe to polite Learning, would permit him, and by the generoſity of any Mecænas his heirs might gain any advantage by it, all theſe works might ſome time or other be publiſhed. Si diritas permittat temporum politioribus heu Muſis prorſus infenſorum, fructuſque ſi aliquis Mæcenatum benignitate ad relictos τοῦ μακαρίτου hæredes ſit redundaturus (24). I have not heard that any of theſe manuſcripts have been reſcued from the cloſet of his heirs, except Paulinus Petrocorius de Vitâ S. Martini, which was printed in 1681, by the care of Daumius. The Bookſellers would not catch at this bait, as they did formerly, when Barthius touched them in point of honour by declaring in a Preface of his, that he had a great number of books, which waited only for the courteſy of the Bookſellers to appear in public (25), and which ſhould be publiſhed as ſoon as a good Bookſeller ſhould offer himſelf (26). They produced a very ſpeedy effect with regard to ſome of his works, but a ſlower with regard to others; but notwithſtanding the greateſt part of the books, which he gave the titles of, were printed, when this Preface was mentioned in the Bibliotheque Univerſelle. Let us ſee in what terms it was mentioned; the paſſage deſerves to be quoted; it contains a criticiſm, which is a little ſevere, but well grounded. "There is a Preface be"fore it, in which we find the titles of ſeveral books, "which (23) Daumius, in præfat. Comment. Barthii in Statium.

(24) Idem, ibid.

(25) Sequentur deinceps, uti quidem Typographorum comitas erit. Barth. Præfat. in Rutil. Itinerar. It is dated the 14th of October 1622.

(26) Exſpectant Editionem, ſi ſollertem Typographum nacti fuerimus. Idem, ibid.

thoſe which have been printed [K], thoſe which he loſt when his houſe was burnt [L], and thoſe, which it is known he was engaged in, and thoſe which are diſperſed I know not whither [M]; all theſe Writings, I ſay, riſe to ſuch a prodigious bulk, that one can ſcarce conceive a ſingle man could be capable of executing ſo great a variety of things. I cannot tell whether any perſons, who have lived to grow old amidſt the duſt of an office of Regiſters, ever wrote ſo much as this Author has done. There has been a ſtory told, which would much better have been ſuppreſſed, concerning a journey, which it is ſaid he took into Holland with a fair Lady [N]. Several men of abilities have complained of the printing of that ſtory, and treated it as a mere fable

" which the author promiſed to give the Public, but " a ſmall part of them only have appeared yet (27), " becauſe there were no Bookſellers to be met with, " as he obſerves himſelf (28), who had the ſame zeal " with himſelf for the advancement of polite Litera- " ture. But if all his works were like this, we may " be ſure that we have loſt nothing, at leaſt with re- " ſpect to part of them, but a vaſt number of quo- " tations, which we might eaſily diſpenſe with. Not " that there may not be valuable paſſages, as well as " in this; but they are hid as it were under the pro- " digious heap of quotations from the Ancients, ſo " that it would require a great deal of patience to diſ- " cover them (29)."

(27) It is certain that the beſt part of them is printed.

(28) He does not mention this at all in that Preface.

(29) Bibliotheque Univerſelle, tom. 5. pag. 240. in the Extract of Rutilius's Itinerary.

[K] . . . . . Others, which have been printed.] I ſhall only mention the chief of them: a large volume in folio, intitled, Adverſaria, divided into LX Books, Quibus ex univerſa antiquitatis ſerie omnis generis loci tam Gentilium quam Chriſtianorum Scriptorum illuſtrantur & emendantur, cum rituum, morum, legum, formularumque obſervatione & elucidatione, cum undecim Indicibus, ſeptem Auctorum, quatuor Rerum; at Francfort in 1624. The memory, reading and learning of this author appear here in a very ſurprizing manner; it is a pity that method and choice were not equally diſplayed in it. He left two volumes of Adverſaria of the ſame ſize, without reckoning his Reviſal and Correction of the former. De quo Adverſariorum Tomo ſecundo aut tertio, uterque enim jam peractus eſt, primo etiam recenſito in iis, & amotis nebulis, quas illi inducere livor voluit (30). The whole work would have contained CLXXX Books. There is ſomething immenſe in it, that tires even the imagination; but let us proceed to the other titles: Galli Confeſſoris Chriſtianæ Doctrinæ Compendium, ſeu Sermonem Conſtantiæ habitum, C. Barthius recenſuit, & Animadverſionum librum adjecit; at Francfort in 1623 in 8vo. Phœbadius contra Arianos, cum Animadverſionibus. Guil. Britonis libri Philippidos, cum Notis. Claudiani Ecdicii Mamerti de Statu Animæ libri III, cum Animadverſionibus; Cygneæ, 1655, in 8vo. Æneæ Gazæi Dialogus de Immortalitate Animarum, cum Zachariâ Mitylenæo Philoſopho Chriſtiano, Græcè & Latinæ, Lipſiæ, 1655, in 4to. Barthius gave a new Tranſlation of Æneas Gazæus, and made uſe of that of John Tarin with regard to Zacharias, and illuſtrated both theſe works with Notes. Soliloquia rerum divinarum, Cygneæ, 1654, in 4to. A large volume of Notes upon Claudian, printed in 1650 in 4to; and three large volumes upon Statius, printed in 1664 in 4to. He was not ſatisfied with this edition of Claudian, becauſe the Printer had not employed a good character (31). It is a pity that we have no Table of Contents, and no general Index to it. It is a defect, which his Commentaries upon Statius are free from.

(30) Barth. in Statium, tom. 1. pag. 110. See likewiſe Daumius's Preface.

(31) Barth. in Stat. tom. 1. pag. 434.

[L] . . . . . Thoſe which he loſt when his houſe was burnt.] It was a country-houſe of his; it was ſet on fire thro' the fault of the Farmer, or ſome ſuch perſon, who lodged in it. Cum villa noſtra urbana non bello, non latronum manu, ſed perfidi incolæ temeritate conflagravit (32). This without doubt is what Daumius calls Incendium Sellerhuſanum, that is, the Fire at Sellerhuſe, which happened in 1636. Etiam nonnulla flammis, ſays he (33), incendio Sellerhuſano anno M. DC. XXXVI abſumpta, periere. Barthius loſt upon that occaſion his Index Appuleianus (34); all that he had written upon Tertullian (35); his Index to Thucydides, &c. In quo ſcriptore (Thucydide) per bellicos hos triennales motus & exceſſiones ingens damnum accepimus; indicem enim tam in auctorem quam ſcholiaſten (qui recentior tamen eſt quam vulgo attenditur) confeceramus, is cum parte Bibliothecæ periit (36). Flammæ . . . ingens ſcrinium manu meâ ſcriptis chartis effertum, ſimul abſtulerunt; & ſic perierunt mihi multa juvenilia & puerilia ſcripta (37). i. e. " In which writer (Thu- " cydides), by reaſon of the diſturbances and removes, " which the wars have occaſioned for three years, " have ſuſtained a very great loſs; for the Index, " which I had made both for the author himſelf and " the Scholiaſt upon him, (which Scholiaſt is later " than is generally obſerved), is loſt with part of my " Library. The fire likewiſe deſtroyed a large ca- " binet full of manuſcripts of my writing; and by " this means a great many pieces, written by me in " my childhood and youth, were conſumed." He ſays that his Library had been twice plundered before the fire made a new depredation upon it: Adeſſe Bibliothecæ non poſſumus miris modis duabus vaſtationibus depopulatæ, & uno incendio vix dimidiatim ereptæ (38).

(32) Idem, ibid. tom. 3. p. 1398. He had ſaid in pag. 9. of the 1ſt volume, Flammæ non ab hoſte ſed domeſtico ſcelere meæ tum manſioni injectæ.

(33) Daumius præfat. in Stat.

(34) Barth. in Stat. tom. 1. p. 9. & paſſim alibi.

(35) Ibid. pag. 1338. of the 3d Tome, where he ſays, Natæ noſtræ in integrum ferè Tertullianum. i. e. " Our notes up- " on almoſt all " Tertullian.

(36) Ibid. tom. 2. pag. 306.

(37) Ibid. tom. 1. chap. 9.

(38) Ibid. tom. 2. pag. 372.

[M] . . . . . Which have been diſperſed I know not whither.] Daumius tells us, that after the author's death they ſought in vain for his Commentary upon St. Auſtin de Civitate Dei, his Book de Superſtitionibus Veterum, his Treatiſe de dubiis Scriptoribus, his Characters, and ſeveral other writings of that kind. Barthius quotes very often the books abovementioned, and gives us a very advantageous notion of them. It is very probable, conſidering the ſubjects of them, that they were not the leaſt valuable of his works. He had begun a great many others, to which he refers his readers, juſt as if they had been printed. See the Index Authorum to his Statius, in the word BARTHIUS.

[N] There is a ſtory told . . . . . concerning a journey, which it is ſaid he took into Holland with a fair Lady.] Mr. Colomies relates it upon the credit of Iſaac Voſſius. He was extremely blameable for printing ſuch things, which he had no other authority for but a mere ſtory told in converſation. Who does not know, that thoſe perſons, who value themſelves upon entertaining a company agreeably, are furniſhed with an infinite number of little hiſtories, which they add circumſtances to at their pleaſure, in order to render their ſtory more remarkable and agreeable? They would not take ſuch a liberty, if they knew that what they ſay would be printed. However that be, the ſtory is as follows: " Mr. Voſſius . . . . told me one " day that Barthius being come from Germany to Har- " lem to ſee Scriverius, brought with him a Lady, " who was perfectly beautiful; and that Scriverius " had no ſooner ſeen her, but he found means to " make Barthius drunk, that he might entertain that " Lady with more freedom; which deſign ſucceeded " according to his deſire. However this was not " carried on ſo, but that Barthius coming to himſelf " from his drunken fit had ſome ſuſpicion of what " had paſt, which was heightened in ſuch a manner, " that he carried away his Lady in a prodigious paſ- " ſion, and ſuffered her to be drowned in the Rhine " (39)." It muſt not be denied that Barthius had a bad reputation with regard to his morals. One of his beſt friends owns this; but he aſſirms that it was without grounds. De Moribus quæ invidi nugati ſunt, quorumque causâ ego ignotum meo malo abhorrebam, rem aliter quindecennali hac cum eo converſatione comperi. Adeo quicquid de eo dixerunt ſcripſeruntque ego hactenus prorſus credere abnui, cujus intima neſcio an æque alii patuerint (40). i. e. " With regard to his Morals, " concerning which his enemies reported many idle " ſtories, on account of which I entertained an aver- " ſion for him before I knew him, to my great diſ- " advantage; I have found by a converſation with " him of fifteen years ſtanding, that there was no " grounds for ſuch reports. And therefore I have hi- " therto refuſed any credit to the ſtories, which have " been told and written concerning him, which I can " do with the more confidence, ſince I think that no " perſon was ever ſo intimate with him as my ſelf."

(39) Colomeſii Opuſcula, p. 102. edit. Ultraject. an. 1669.

(40) Daumius, Epiſt. 14. ad Reineſium, p. 37.

fable [O]. Barthius had two wives (e); he married the firſt in the year 1630, and the ſecond in 1644. The firſt died in 1643, without having born him any children. The ſecond brought him one ſon and three daughters, and ſurvived him (f). He was four times in Cities which were beſieged, and eſcaped, having loſt his clothes and arms but once (g). He complained of being ill treated by Voſſius [P]. He warmly eſpouſed Scaliger's part againſt Scioppius [Q]; and he was not upon good terms with the learned Reineſius. The latter had too often ſurprized him in an error, not to have provoked him [R]. It was impoſſible that a man, who wrote ſo much, and with ſuch prodigious haſte, could eſcape the judicious cenſure of Reineſius. It is ſaid that it was not always through defect of memory that Barthius contradicted himſelf [S]. It will not ſeem ſurprizing

(e) Hulſemannus, in Orat. fun. Barthii.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Qui intra obſidendam obſeſſamque urbem aliquando fuerit. Id quod nobis quater contigit, nuſpiam læſis, niſi ſpoliatione una veſtimentorum & armorum direptione, Barth. in Stat. tom. 2. pag. 1041.

[O] Several men of abilities have complained of the printing of this ſtory, and treated it as a fable.] Here is what Morhof ſays of it: Quibus (Colomeſii Opuſculis) adjicitur libellus Gallica ſermone cui titulus Recueil des Particularitez, in quibus multa de eruditis familiariter à Voſſio aliiſque ſuppeditata laudato ſemper autore, vir ille effutivit, quæ inſignis ſane temeritas fuit. Multa tamen in his ſunt mendacia, quale illud de Caſparo Barthio horrendum, qui concubinam ſuam Rheno ſuffocaverit, quod ejus cum Scriverio amores deprehenderit (41). i. e. "To which (Opuſcula of Colomies) is added "a French piece intitled Recueil des Particularitez, "in which that author has told ſeveral ſtories con- "cerning learned men, which he had in converſation "from Voſſius and others, always mentioning his au- "thority for them. But there are many falſities a- "mong them, particularly that horrid one concern- "ing Caſpar Barthius's drowning his miſtreſs in "the Rhine, upon his diſcovering her gallantries "with Scriverius."

(41) Morhof. Polyhiſt. pag. 71.

[P] He complained of being ill treated by Voſſius.] Few perſons have had reaſon to make ſuch complaints; for there never was a learned man of greater humanity and moderation towards thoſe, whom he criticized upon, than Voſſius. But let us ſee Barthius's complaint at length. Quo loco vir doctiſſ. (42) pulchrè etiam de Lutatio judicat doctum eſſe lectuque dignum Exegeten, præter quidem gloſſemata. Sane longe melius & compertius, quàm nuper Joannes Gerhardus Voſſius, qui Lutatium ex Servio & Higinio compoſitum dicere auſus eſt maximam partem. Qui doctiſſimus homo cum alio nos loco perperam (ut clara res eſt, & demonſtratum jam nobis alibi) ineptiarum & abſurditatis nunquam à nobis læſus, & ab invidis planèque egregiè ineptis Thraſunculis incitatus, inſimulare auſus ſit, meritò utriuſque notæ hic habebitur, cum ea Commentariis Lutatianis inſint, quorum nec centeſimam partem Servianæ & Higinianæ Commentationes vindicare poſſint. Idem præſtantiſſimus vir incogitatè eodem loco ſcribit Lutatium à Lindebrogio primum editum (43). i. e. "In which place that very "learned man rightly judges of Lutatius, that he is "a learned and valuable Expoſitor, except the gloſſes. "This is much more juſt and reaſonable than what "John Gerard Voſſius has lately ſaid, who ventures "to aſſert that Lutatius is compiled from Servius and "Higinius. And as this very learned man has ac- "cuſed me in another place very wrongfully (as is "plain, and has been demonſtrated by me elſewhere) "of ignorance and abſurdity, tho' he was never of- "fended by me, and only put upon it by ſeveral "trifling boaſters, who are my enemies, he may juſtly "fall under both theſe characters here, ſince there are "thoſe things in the Commentaries of Lutatius, the "hundreth part of which can never be claimed by "the Comments of Servius and Higinius. The ſame "excellent man has very careleſly aſſerted in the "ſame place that Lutatius was firſt publiſhed by Lin- "debrogius."

(42) That is to ſay, Nicolaus Loenſis, chap. 18. of his Miſcellanea.

(43) Barth. in Stat. tom. 2. pag. 871.

[Q] He eſpouſed Scaliger's part againſt Scioppius.] There are three pieces againſt that great man's antagoniſt aſcribed to him; and we find his name in the Anagram of Tarræus Hebeius Nobilis à Sperga, under which he concealed himſelf. Reſoluto Anagrammate Gaſparis Barthii Berolinæi confirmat excellentiſſimus Geiſlerus de Mutatione Nominum. Exemplorum Decad. I. num. 5 (44). Theſe three books are intitled as follows; the firſt, Cave Canan, de Vitâ, Moribus, Rebus geſtis, Divinitate Gaſparis Scioppii Apoſtatæ, Satyricon, Hanov. 1612. in 12*mo.* The ſecond, Scioppius excellens; in laudem ejus & ſociorum; pro Joſepho Scaligero & omnibus probis Epigrammatum libri III, ex triginta totis hinc inde collati. It is printed with the preceding. The third, Amphitheatrum Sapientiæ, Hanov. 1613 in 8*vo.* See Rhodius in the paſſage above cited; and Placcius pag. 262 of his Pſeudonymous Writers.

(44) Rhodius, de Auctor. Suppoſ. num. 54.

[R] Reineſius had too often ſurprized him in an error, not to have provoked him.] Theſe were not errors, which a man of wit might have room to diſpute about: they were ſo obvious, as to be immediately condemned; and this is what diſpleaſes and offends an author moſt. A Cl. Barthio, quem tu tantum non in cœlum effers, & quem ſua defenſurum eſſe ſcribis, nihil indigni iniquive expecto, tam licèt ipſi in meis, ſi quando lucem adſpicient publicam, (lenta autem res eſt, & fortaſſe incumbent in ſpongiam, ut olim illius Ajax) quam in ipſius mihi licere viſum eſt experiri; non exiſtimo autem Soli obloquturum eſſe. Sunt enim pleraque, quæ nunc quidem produxi, adeò certa liquidaque, ut niſi temerè litigare velit, ne calamum quidem contradicturus mihi tingere debeat. Perpende, quæſo, mi cariſſimè NESTERE, ἔνθα πάθῃς, ubicunque ab eo diſſentio; maximè verò examina, quæ cap. 8. l. 2. quo ejus in Plinium Valerianum, dictum Empericum, illatæ emendationes producuntur, trado, & miraberis hominis doctiſſimi manifeſtiſſimas inſcitias, fruſtrationes, & puerilia παραράμματα, audaces etiam conjecturas in autorem non intellectum invectas deprehendes magno numero. Iſtas ſi quis præfractè tueri præſumpſerit, eum ne ſani quidem capitis eſſe dixero; Barthium autem mecum fore & viſurum, me quamvis indigno judice, id quod verum eſt, nullus dubito. i. e. "I expect nothing but candid treat- "ment from the celebrated Barthius, whom you ex- "tol almoſt to the ſkies, and who, as you inform me, "will defend his writings. The ſame liberty, that "I have taken with his works, he may take with "mine, if ever they are publiſhed, (for it will be long "firſt, and perhaps they will come to the ſponge, "like Auguſtus's Ajax); but I do not ſuppoſe, that "he will venture to exclaim againſt the Sun. For "moſt of the obſervations, which I have now pro- "duced, are ſo clear and evident, that he ought not "to take up his pen againſt me, unleſs he is willing to "precipitate himſelf raſhly into a controverſy, in "which he cannot defend himſelf. Conſider, my "deareſt Neſterus, without prejudice, the points, in "which I differ from him; but particularly examine "what I obſerve in Chap. 8. B. 2. where his Emen- "dations upon Plinius Valerianus, called the Empiric, "are diſcuſſed; and then you will be ſurprized that "ſo learned a man ſhould fall into ſuch groſs errors "and childiſh miſtakes; and diſcover that he has "preſumed to introduce a great number of bold "conjectures into an author, whom he did not un- "derſtand. If any perſon ſhould pretend obſtinately "to defend theſe things, I ſhould venture to ſay, "that he was not in his ſenſes. But with reſpect "to Barthius, I do not doubt, but that he will be "of my opinion, and diſcover where the truth lies, "tho' I am unworthy to ſhew it him." Theſe are Reineſius's words in a Letter, which he wrote to Neſterus the 31ſt of March 1638 (45). See likewiſe his fifteenth Letter to Daumius.

(45) It is the 6th.

[S] It is ſaid that it was not always through defect of memory that Barthius contradicted himſelf.] "Some "perſons have obſerved that when he paſſes his judg- "ment, he falls ſometimes into contradictions for want "of memory (46)." Daumius pretends that thoſe, who have taken notice of ſuch kind of contradictions, do not know the deſign of Barthius. "He wrote, "ſays he, every thing that offered itſelf to his imagi- "nation, to day one thing, to morrow another, in "order that when he ſhould reviſe it again, this "contrariety of opinions might engage him to exa- "mine prizing that his memory, how prodigious ſoever it was, very often failed him extremely, conſidering the manner in which he wrote his books [T]. He never made uſe of any Collections or Common-Place-Book, and ſcarce ever corrected what he had once written.

(46) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 3. pag. 464.

" mine the ſubject more accurately, and give him a " better opportunity of correcting or confirming what " he had publiſhed." Memini in publicis alicubi diſputationibus diverſæ ſententiæ ejus loca exagitata fuiſſe. Sed auctores ſcopum ſcriptoris neſcio an vel per tranſennam viderint. Novi enim, hoc conſilio, eoque fine BARTHIUM ea, quæ in mentem ſibi venerant, in chartam conjeciſſe, etiam diverſis diverſo tempore ſententiis, ut quandoque ad ea revertenti illa diverſitas ampliorem de veritate cogitandi ſuppeditaret materiam, occaſionemque longè commodiorem retractandi vel ſtabiliendi quod ſcripſerat. Id quod fine Capitis VI Libri Undecimi, & alibi ſæpius teſtatur (47). See how Reineſius has confuted this Apology (48).

(47) Daumius, Epiſt. 14. ad Reineſium, p. 37.

(48) Reineſii, Epiſt. 15. ad Daumium, p. 45.

[T] It will not ſeem ſurprizing that his memory ... ſhould fail him, conſidering the manner in which he wrote his books.] Let us hear his own words. Puto jam tale quid ſupra notaſſe. Non enim poteſt, ut nullis penitus rebus adjuti, omnium ſtrictam memoriam habeamus. Omnino enim aliter nos commentamur, quam ſolent homines etiam litteratiſſimi, dum auctores legunt, excerpentes quædam atque ea deinde excerpta in Silvam Obſervationum, eam porrò Silvam in Commentaria redigentes. Nunquam tale quid factum a nobis eſt. Sed ut cuique auctori enarrando benè facere volumus, arrepto illi Animadverſiones hoc genus imputamus, ſolius memoriæ beneficio nixi, quam marginalibus nonnunquam prius Notis inſtruimus, dum cum Libris veteribus Editiones comparamus. Cætera omnia è calamo fluunt, elegante & minuto literarum ductu. Nec inquam ſcripto repetitur; nec ullis lituris cruciatur. Quarum nec decem aliquas hactenus bi Commentarii agnoverint (49). i. e. " I think I have " obſerved ſomething of that kind above; for it is " impoſſible for me, unaſſiſted as I am with the uſual " helps, to remember every thing exactly. For my " manner of writing is very different from that of " the moſt learned Men, who, when they read Au- " thors, extract from them, and enter thoſe Extracts " in their Collection of Obſervations, which Collecti- " on they reduce into their Commentaries. But I " have never uſed that method; but whenever I un- " dertake to explain any Author, I write ſuch Ani- " madverſions upon him as theſe are, merely upon " the ſtrength of memory, which I ſometimes aſſiſt " beforehand with marginal Notes, while I am com- " paring the editions of Authors with the old manu- " ſcripts. All the reſt flow immediately from my " pen in a neat and ſmall character; I never write " any thing over again, or make any blots or altera- " tions in it; ſo that I have not yet made ten correc- " tions in all theſe Commentaries." I cannot tell whether it was a proper thing for an Author to make ſuch a boaſt as this; I think a greater reſpect is due to the public.

(49) Barth. in Stat. tom. 3. pag. 866.

☞BARWICK (JOHN) an eminent Engliſh Divine in the ſeventeenth Century, was born April the 20th 1612 at Wetherſlack in Weſtmorland, of honeſt parents (a). His father George was deſcended of the antient family of the Barwicks of Fair Ridge (b) near the little village of Stavely in the North part of Lancaſhire. His mother's maiden name was Barrow. His parents, though poſſeſſed but of a ſmall eſtate, by their frugal and prudent management, educated all their children in a very decent manner (c), and particularly deſigned their ſons John and Peter for Learning. John, who was ſeven years older than his brother Peter, having at firſt been put under the care of very inſufficient maſters, was afterwards ſent to Sedburg School in Yorkſhire (d); and in the year 1631 May the 14th, at the age of eighteen years (e) admitted into St. John's College in Cambridge, and placed under the tuition of the Reverend Mr. Tho. Fothergil (f), and applied himſelf with great vigour to his ſtudies. He had ſcarce taken his degree of Bachelor of Arts, before he was intruſted with the management of ſome affairs of the College of no little importance, his ſucceſs in which ſoon procured him to be admitted Fellow of the College April the 5th 1636 (g). Upon the breaking out of the civil wars he had a conſiderable ſhare in ſending the plate of the ſeveral Colleges to the King at Nottingham; and wrote in conjunction with ſeveral other Gentlemen Querela Cantabrigienſis, or the Univerſity of Cambridge's Complaint, being a repreſentation of the violences uſed by the Parliament-party againſt the Royaliſts, and another Tract againſt the Covenant intitled Certain Diſquiſitions and Conſiderations, &c. But he was not long after obliged to retire from the Univerſity to London, where in order to negotiate the King's affairs more covertly, he placed himſelf in the family of Dr. Thomas Morton Biſhop of Durham [A], where he brought back to the King's intereſt Sir Thomas Middleton and Colonel Roger Pope, the latter of whom he attended when dying of the plague (h). After King Charles I had delivered himſelf up to the Scots army, and enjoyed ſome degree of freedom, Mr. Barwick attended upon him, and received his commands in perſon, and was frequently ſent by his Majeſty to his friends at London; and when the Parliament and Army declared againſt each

(a) Vita Johannis Barwick S. T. P. a Petro Barwick, M. D. pag. 1, 2. edit. London 1721.

(b) Mr. Bedford, the Editor of the Latin Life, in his Engliſh Tranſlation, renders thus Bella Lira in the Latin.

(c) Vita Johannis Barwick, pag. 3, 4.

(d) Ibid. p. 4, 5.

(e) See the note on pag. 9. of the Engliſh Tranſlation of that Life.

(f) Vita, &c. pag. 7, 8.

(g) Note on pag. 13. of the Engliſh Tranſlation.

(h) Vita, &c. pag. 30, 31.

[A] In order to negotiate the King's affairs more covertly, he placed himſelf in the family of Dr. Thomas Morton Biſhop of Durham.] Dr. Peter Barwick tells us (1), that he had the management of the King's affairs, and as a ſecret ſpy carried on a private correſpondence between London and Oxford, where the King's head-quarters were; on the one hand communicating to his Majeſty all the deſigns and endeavours of the Parliament-party, and conveying his orders and commands on the other, being a man of great courage, as well as of extraordinary prudence and ſagacity. He procured himſelf to be appointed Chaplain to the Biſhop of Durham, that together with his function he might be enabled to manage the King's affairs more ſecretly, and be leſs liable to ſuſpicion, ſince in that ſpacious houſe he had an opportunity of concealing whatever cyphers he had relating to the King's buſineſs, and becauſe as he was very tenacious of Chriſtian ſimplicity, he was by this means always furniſhed with a true as well as convenient anſwer, if he ſhould be queſtioned concerning his employment in London. For this was both then his firm reſolution, and what he afterwards always religiouſly obſerved, whenever he fell into the enemy's hands, either to anſwer all their queſtions with the ſtricteſt truth, or to make them no anſwer at all; for he did not think it conſiſtent with his duty, if taken at any time, to clear himſelf with fictitious excuſes, or do any thing that ſhould interfere with the ſincerity of the Goſpel, leſt Chriſtianity ſhould ſuffer by his means. He reſolved rather with ſilence to anſwer all their captious and enſnaring queſtions, how much ſoever he might ſuffer by it, than hazard the leaſt damage to the public by an imprudent anſwer (2).

(1) Vita, &c. pag. 25, & ſeq.

(2) Ibid. p. 27.

each other, he took arms with the latter by the King's order, and converſed intimately with many Lords and others. The King, in reward for his great ſervices, honoured him with a teſtimonial written with his own hand; and by his orders concerted with Sir Thomas Middleton, and Mr. Richard Brown, who was knighted after the Reſtoration, and by their means procured a treaty with his Majeſty to be voted, but the place to be the Iſle of Wight, betwixt which and London he rode in one day, and returned in another (i). His exceſſive ſorrow upon the King's death threw him into a dangerous illneſs, but by means of his brother Edward he ſtill carried on his correſpondence with the Miniſters of King Charles II, till they were both betrayed and caſt into priſon. Auguſt the 7th 1652 he was diſcharged from his confinement, and applied himſelf to his private ſtudies, till he could conveniently return to the management of the King's affairs. He lived for ſome time at Sir Thomas Erſfield's houſe in Suſſex; and February the 23d 1655 he wrote a Letter to the Biſhop of Durham on occaſion of the ordinance for decimating the Laity, who had adhered to the King, and prohibiting the Clergy to officiate [B]. Upon his return to London he lodged in his brother's houſe, and attended Dr. Hewet upon the ſcaffold (k). He was of very great ſervice in effecting the Reſtoration of King Charles II, as appears from the Latin Life of him written by his brother Dr. Peter Barwick (l), and the original Letters which paſt between him and that King, and Sir Edward Hyde, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and afterwards Lord Chancellor of England, and publiſhed in the Appendix to his Life. He was ſent by the Biſhops to Breda to the King with inſtructions, and was there appointed to preach before him, and made one of his Chaplains (m). He would not wholly leave Cambridge till he had taken his degree of Doctor of Divinity; of which he had been admitted Bachelor at Oxford, February the 21ſt 1645 (n). The Latin Theſis, which he maintained upon his taking his Doctor's Degree, was, that the method of impoſing penance and reſtoring Penitents in the primitive Church was a godly diſcipline, and that it is much to be wiſhed it were reſtored (o). He was ſent with Dr. Dolben, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, to attend upon the Regicides after their condemnation (p). At the Counteſs of Derby's requeſt he reſigned his right to the Biſhoprick of the Iſle of Man in favour of her Chaplain Mr. Samuel Rutter (q), and declined the offer of the Biſhoprick of Carliſle [C]; but was advanced by the King to the Deanery of Durham [D] November the 1ſt 1660, in the room of Dr. William Fuller (r), which Deanery he held with the Rectory of Houghton in le Spring. Octob. 15th 1661 he was elected Dean of St. Paul's in London; in which ſtation he acted with the greateſt integrity and prudence imaginable. February 18th 1661 he was choſen Prolocutor of the Lower Houſe

(i) Ibid. pag. 57-63.

(k) Ibid. pag. 69-117.

(l) Ibid. pag. 118-185.

(m) Ibid. p. 188, 189, 190.

(n) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 50. 2d edit. London 1721.

(o) Vita, &c. pag. 194.

(p) Ibid. p. 201.

(q) Ibid. p. 206.

(r) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 50.

[B] Wrote a Letter to the Biſhop of Durham on occaſion of the ordinance for decimating the Laity, who had adhered to the King, and prohibiting the Clergy to officiate.] Dr. Peter Barwick tells us (3), that it had been deliberated, whether all thoſe who were ſuppoſed really to favour the Royal Cauſe, ſhould not be deſtroyed, agreeably to Hobbs's doctrine then lately publiſhed; but that Cromwell following milder counſels, and knowing that the number of ſuch perſons was too great to be ſlaughtered, contented himſelf with plundering them, though they had been more than once plundered before. From thoſe of the Laity, who had any part of their eſtate left, he exacted part of their revenue. But the Clergy having been already deprived of all, he thunders out a moſt cruel Interdict (4) againſt them, threatning every one of them with the ſevereſt impriſonment, who either in a public aſſembly, or privately in any Gentleman's houſe, ſhould preſume to preach or read prayers according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, or teach any ſchool. How Mr. Barwick behaved himſelf in this afflicted ſtate of affairs appears from his Letter to the Biſhop of Durham; wherein he tells him, that he cannot but from the bottom of his heart commiſerate the condition of ſuch of the Clergy, as have wives and children to maintain; but that he more laments the hard fate of the Laity, ſince their eternal is to be preferred to the temporal eſtate of the other. That as for his own part, he bleſſed God, he was very little concerned, having no one elſe to be ruined with, and being a perſon of no great importance; and yet if it were otherwiſe, he ſhould certainly be ſo much the fitter to bear teſtimony to ſo glorious a cauſe with any hazard whatever; which by God's help he will not think much to do, if he cannot otherwiſe perform that duty, which is ſo neceſſary to the Church. For the offices of preaching and duly adminiſtring the Sacraments, which were of late forbidden them to exerciſe, were thoſe two great truſts, which God had committed to his charge, when he undertook that difficult province, to which he vouchſafed to call him. And as to the form of common prayer, it is ſo far prohibited, that even the Apoſtles Creed, the very Pſalms of David, and the Lord's Prayer itſelf, may ſeem to fall under the ſame prohibition. That he hoped his Lordſhip would approve of what he had determined to do, eſpecially when he underſtood, that for fear of failing the Church in ſo neceſſary a duty, he purpoſed to perform it with more caution and ſecrecy than uſual. But this, ſays he, I have reſolved by God's aſſiſtance, that if ever I am proſecuted on that account, I will conceal nothing of what I do. For though I am not a perſon that would excuſe the madneſs of the Circumcellians (5), yet they were not condemned by the antient Fathers without ſome compaſſion for them. And certainly I had much rather ſuffer an unjuſt ſuſpicion of their temerity, than be accounted guilty of the crime of ſuch as were called Traditors, than which ſort of men nothing was of old more hateful either to God or Man. But I hope God will aſſiſt my infirmity in the diſcharge of this office &c.

(3) Pag. 107, 108.

(4) That of January 1655. Dr. Hammond's Life, pag. 11.

(5) A Sect of Donatiſts in Africa in the 4th Century, who, through a miſtaken zeal for martyrdom deſtroyed themſelves. See S. Auguſt. de Hæreſ. cap. 60. Contra Creſcon. Grammat. lib. 3. cap. 42, 43. Poſidon. de Vita Auguſtini, c. 10.

[C] Declined the offer of the Biſhoprick of Carliſle.] The King was very urgent to advance him to that See; but the Doctor earneſtly entreated, that he might be excuſed from accepting this royal favour, leſt he ſhould ſeem to ſome perſons to have a little gratified his own ambition in his zealous endeavours to preſerve the Epiſcopal Succeſſion in England. He being therefore unwilling to be advanced higher than the degree of a Preſbyter, ſince there were not wanting men of great merit, who could bear the weight of the epiſcopal office with leſs envy, as he imagined, than he, his Majeſty in regard of what he had deſerved from him, as well as from the Church, promoted him to the Deanery of Durham (6).

(6) Ibid. pag. 246.

[D] Advanced by the King to the Deanery of Durham.] In this Deanery he enjoyed a very large revenue, with which he repaired the public buildings, relieved the poor, and kept hoſpitality in a very generous manner. His firſt care was, that the worſhip of God ſhould be celebrated with the utmoſt decency, and a Biſhop choſen for the conſolation of the Widow Church. His next concern was, that all the houſes of the Prebendaries, and eſpecially the Cathedral ſhould be

House of Convocation [E], and appointed one of the nine Assistants to the twelve Bishops, who were commissioned to hold a conference with the number of Presbyterian Ministers upon the review of the Liturgy at the Bishop of London's lodging in the Savoy (t). After a painful illness of two years continuance he died at London October 22d 1664. His funeral Sermon was preached by his intimate friend Dr. Peter Gunning; and his Epitaph written by Mr. Samuel Howlet, Fellow of St. John's College in Cambridge (u). He publish'd some pieces [F]. Mr. Echard in his History of England (w) styles him a man of great worth and consideration; and having observed (x) that he had been ejected of his preferments, and notwithstanding his pious behaviour, used with inhuman barbarities, he tells us, that he bore all these with a noble constancy, and still kept an uninterrupted correspondence with Chancellor Hyde, and was not only very assisting to the necessities of the King in his exile, but was particularly instrumental in the restoration itself; "for which after the King's return, he was rewarded first with the Deanery of Durham, "and then with that of St. Paul's, in which preferment he left the world, when he had "a just expectation of something still greater."

(t) Note upon pag. 325. of the English Translation.

(u) Vita, &c. pag. 237, 238, 239.

(w) Vol. 2. book 1. chap. 1. ad ann. 1662.

(x) Ibid. c. 1. ad ann. 1664-5.

be repair'd and beautified. He took care likewise to erect a Grammar-School from the ground. He brought water into the College to supply all the Prebendaries houses; and took upon himself with great readiness, affection, and zeal, to bring all the Officers of the Church under good discipline and to a regular life, and to augment the stipends and salaries of the poorer sort, not only of the Mother Church, but of all the Churches, which depended upon it (7).

(7) Ibid. pag. 207, & seq.

[E] Chosen Prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation.] Dr. Peter Barwick tells us (8), that the favour and good will of those who advanced him to that dignity, gave him far more pleasure, than the dignity itself; when he found evidently, that some persons, whose interest it was very much, that the practice of Religion should be zealously promoted, were not yet sollicitous enough in their endeavours to restore the decayed discipline of the Church. But if the Convocation had thought fit, they might have consulted the reputation of the Clergy better either by reviving those old laws, which the late schism had rendered obsolete, or by making new ones, as in their prudence they should have seen occasion. "But who they were, says "the writer abovementioned, that prevented laying "hold of an opportunity of doing the Church that "service, it is not lawful to conjecture, where the "case is invidious, and perhaps not sufficiently known. "Yet this is most certain, that his sacred Majesty "granted this venerable Assembly liberty under the "Broad-Seal to accomplish this work. Nor is it "less certain, that the Convocation divided itself in"to divers colleges or committees for carrying it "on, and assigned each their peculiar share in it. "Yet to the very great regret of all good men these "preparations proved abortive; for the endeavours "of many, tho' very sincere, were wholly frustrated "by one or two, upon whom this affair wholly de"pended." This neglect of the interests of Religion afflicted Dr. Barwick in such a manner, that he declared, that neither the desperate disease, which he formerly laboured under, nor the severity of his confinement, nor death itself, nor the torture, which he was often threatned with, were ever so grievous to him. Hic autem rei sacræ neglectus adeò pium Barwici animum excruciavit, ut in hujusmodi gemitus solutum audivimus; non morbum olim deploratum, non durissima vincula, non mortem, non cruciatum sæpius intentatum sibi unquam adeo gravia fuisse (9). Dr. Peter Barwick observes, that it is not at all surprizing, that he should feel so exquisite a sorrow, since every man even of common humanity must have been affected to see such principles as these propagated with impunity by books exposed to public sale; that the murther of King Charles I and other atrocious crimes perpetrated by the late rebels, were facts done by persons not using their free-will, but necessarily complying with the will of God; and that God himself is both the Author and Persuader not only of all good, but likewise of all evil; nay that nothing is in its own nature either good or evil any farther than as it is forbid or permitted by the municipal law of every Government. Regicidium scilicet aliaque nefanda scelera à nuperis perduellibus perpetrata, non à libero arbitrio utentibus, sed à divino nutui necessariò obsecundantibus fuisse admissa; Deumque ipsum, non bonorum tantum, sed & malorum quoque omnium authorem & suasorem esse: in eo nihil quicquam suâ naturâ bonum vel malum esse, nisi quatenus legibus cujusque civitatis municipalibus vetitum vel permissum (10).

(9) Ibid. pag. 226.

(10) Ibid. pag. 226.

[F] He published some pieces.] I. The Fight, Victory, and Triumph of St. Paul, accommodated to Thomas (Morton) late Lord Bishop of Duresme; in a Sermon preached at his funeral in the parish church of St. Peter at Easton-Manduit in Northamptonshire, on 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8. London 1660 in 4to. II. A summary Account of the holy Life and Death of Thomas late Lord Bishop of Duresme: printed with the abovementioned Sermon. III. Deceivers deceived, or the Mistakes of Wickedness, &c. a Sermon preached at St. Paul's Cathedral Octob. 20th 1661, on Prov. xiv. part of the eighth verse. London 1661 in 4to. T.

☞ BARWICK (PETER), an eminent Physician, and brother of the preceding, was educated in the same schools, and at the same College with his brother, where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts at the end of the year 1642. And tho' he is so modest in the title of his book only to mention his having been formerly Scholar of St. John's College in Cambridge, yet he was certainly nominated and presented to a Fellowship there [A]. Leaving Cambridge, probably upon the ejectments, as his brother did, tho' he afterwards took his Degree of Master of Arts there in 1647, he was invited into Leicestershire, to be Tutor to a young Gentleman of great hopes, Ferdinando Sacheverell of Old Hayes in that County Esq; and acquitted himself so well of that employment, that his pupil dying some years after left him an annuity of twenty pounds for life, which was always most punctually paid him (a). In the year 1655 he was created Doctor of Physic; and about two years after he settled to practise in London (b), and

(a) See the Preface of the Editor of Vita Johannis Barwick S. T. P. a Petro Barwick M. D. edit. London 1721.

(b) Vita, &c. pag. 113.

[A] He was certainly nominated and presented to a Fellowship there.] The reverend and learned Mr. Thomas Baker, author of the Reflections upon Learning, who is of that College, informed Mr. Bedford the editor of Dr. Barwick's Life of his brother the Dean of St. Paul's, that it appears from Dr. Matthew Wrenn the Bishop of Ely's Register, that on the 3d of December 1644 Mr. Peter Barwick, then Bachelor of Arts, was nominated and presented by that Bishop, then a prisoner in the Tower, to the Fellowship of that College in the Bishop of Ely's gift, vacant by the marriage of Mr. John Topping Master of Arts. However tho' he had a right to this Fellowship, yet he was never actually admitted to it, as is evident from this, that there is no mention of his admission in the Register, and that Mr. John Heath was admitted April 26th 1650 in the next turn to Mr. Topping by the Visitors of the University; so that the Fellowship lay vacant for five years after it was quitted by that Gentleman (1).

(1) Preface to Vita Joh. Barwick S. T. P. a Petro Barwick M. D. edit. London 1721.

and married a widow of good fortune [B], by whom he had a ſon, who died an infant, and three daughters, the only ſurvivor of whom was married to Sir Ralph Dutton of Sherborn in the County of Gloceſter Baronet. Dr. Barwick lived happily with his Lady many years, and at laſt buried her in St. Faith's, his own Pariſh Church. Immediately after the Reſtoration he was appointed one of the King's Phyſicians in ordinary; and the year following, in acknowledgment of his own and the Dean his brother's faithful ſervices to the Crown, they and their heirs for ever had, by the King's command, the honour of an addition to the arms of their family, a red Roſe irradiated with gold, granted by a patent under the hand of Sir Edward Walker, the Garter Principal King at Arms, and under the ſeal of his office, dated 13 Car. 2. ann. 1661; a particular, which Dr. Barwick's modeſty would not permit him to take notice of in his brother's life. He was a zealous advocate for the immortal Dr. Harvey's Diſcovery of the Circulation of the Blood [C]. In the courſe of his practice he was particularly famous for his knowledge in the Small-Pox, and all kinds of Fevers; and did great ſervice in the time of the plague at London 1665 [D]. When the dreadful fire of that City the year following had forced him from the neighbourhood of St. Paul's, where he had purchaſed an houſe for the convenience of attending daily upon Divine Service in that Cathedral, the ſame pious reaſon determined him to take another houſe very near Weſtminſter-Abbey, where he lived to a great age, and conſtantly frequented the Prayers: he conſecrated the beginning of every day to God, as he always dedicated the next part of it to the poor; not only preſcribing them medicines at his own expence, but likewiſe charitably relieving their wants. About the year 1671, ſeven years after his brother's death (c), he began to draw up the Hiſtory of the Dean's Life in Latin [E]. In 1694 his ſight quite failed him; upon which he gave over his practice, and lived privately and retired, giving (c) See Vita Johan. Barwick, pag. 59.

[B] Married a widow of good fortune.] Her maiden-name was Anne Brown, of the family of the Browns in the County of Norfolk. She had been firſt married to Dr. Richard Howlet Dean of Caſſels (2) in Ireland, and afterwards to Mr. Sayon a Merchant of London. She was nearly related to Archbiſhop Laud, as we learn from that Prelate himſelf (3), on occaſion of mentioning Dean Howlet her firſt huſband.

(2) Not of Kilkenny, as was ſaid in the preface to the Latin edition. See the preface to the Engliſh Tranſlation publiſhed in 1724, in 8vo.

(3) See the Hiſtory of his Troubles and Trial, pag. 194, 195.

[C] He was a zealous Advocate for the immortal Dr. Harvey's Diſcovery of the Circulation of the Blood.] When Dr. Harvey had publiſh'd this Diſcovery, notwithſtanding the great applauſe it met with from all men of candour and learning, ſome perſons envying him the honour of it, repreſented it as a mere fiction; while others, who could not deny the reality of it, endeavoured to deprive him of the merit of it, aſcribing it to Hippocrates, or to ſome of the modern writers (4). But Dr. Barwick reſenting the injuſtice done to ſo great a man, and out of mere regard to truth, reſolved to undertake his defence; and by his extenſive learning gave a conſiderable ſanction to Dr. Harvey's cauſe, and brought great light to ſome of his experiments which had lately been publiſhed. And as he was a man of prodigious ſagacity and acuteneſs of genius, and uncommon eloquence, he placed this new doctrine, which he found to be true by various experiments, in ſo clear a light, in ſeveral diſputes upon that ſubject, that there was no longer any room for doubt about it (5). He wrote likewiſe ſeveral Tracts upon the Heart, Veins, Arteries, and the Circulation of the Blood, which well deſerved to have been publiſhed, if his modeſty would have permitted him to have done it. And as he had read the ancient writers in Phyſic, eſpecially Hippocrates, and the moderns likewiſe, with the utmoſt accuracy and attention, by this means he was capable of vindicating Dr. Harvey from all ſuſpicion of ſtealing his diſcovery from others; who therefore acknowledged very gratefully the obligations, which he was under to Dr. Barwick on that account. And the latter Phyſician uſed often to declare before the late Doctor John Woodward, Profeſſor of Phyſic in Greſham-College, who was very intimate with him, and laid the firſt foundation of his ſtudies under him, that he never reflected with more pleaſure upon any tranſaction of his life, than upon his ſupporting that excellent man in his diſtreſs (6). The editor of our author's Life of his Brother in Latin, in the Preface to the Engliſh Tranſlation of that Book obſerves, that he had met with an objection to this account with regard to Chronology; to which he replies, that tho' this Diſcovery was firſt publiſhed by Dr. Harvey in his Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis, printed at Franckfort in 1628 (7), when Dr. Barwick was a ſchool-boy; yet it met with ſo much oppoſition, that he was a Doctor of Phyſic, and very capable of maintaining and defending it, before it was generally received. For tho' Dr. Harvey lived to his 80th year in 1657, two years after Dr. Barwick took his Degree, Mr. Wood obſerves (8), that it was with much ado, that he ſaw the Circulation of the Blood eſtabliſhed before his death. He lived, ſays he, to ſee his doctrine with much ado eſtabliſhed, being the only one (as he adds from Mr. Hobbes (9), that did ſo.

(4) Preface to Vita Joh. Barwick.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Ibid.

(7) See Dr. Goodal's preface to his Hiſtorical Account of the College's Proceedings againſt Empiricks &c. edit. London 1684, in 4to.

(8) Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 6. 2d edit. London 1721.

(9) In Præfat. ad Element. Philoſoph. Sect. 1. de Corpore.

[D] Did great ſervice in the time of the plague at London in 1665.] He continued his attendance upon the ſick notwithſtanding he had been ſeized with that dreadful diſeaſe himſelf (10). Dr. Nathanael Hodges in his Λοιμολογία, ſive peſtis nuperæ apud populum Londinenſem graſſantis Narratio Hiſtorica (11), tells us, that among thoſe very excellent and celebrated men, who exerted their utmoſt endeavours in order to ſtop the courſe of the peſtilence, notwithſtanding the danger, to which they were expoſed, there were particularly thoſe learned and judicious Phyſicians, Dr. Francis Gliſſon, Regius Profeſſor of Phyſic in the Univerſity of Cambridge, Dr. Nathan Paget, Dr. Thomas Wharton, Dr. PETER BARWICK, Dr. Humphrey Brookes, and others. Neque verò deerant inſuper inſigniſſimi & clariſſimi viri qui privatam in peſte compeſcendâ (periculi tanti conſortes) operam navârunt, è quorum numero (non ſine honoris præfatione nominandi) erant viri eruditi & ſagaciſſimi Franciſcus Gliſſon, Prof. Reg. Cantab. Nathan Pagetius, Thomas Whartonus, Petrus Barwickius, Humphredus Brookes, & alii haud vulgaris famæ etiamnum hodie in vivis.

(10) Preface to Vita Joban. Barwick, ubi ſupra.

(11) Sect. 1. pag. 19. edit. London 1672.

[E] He began to draw up the Hiſtory of the Dean's Life in Latin.] He tells us himſelf (12), that he choſe to write it in Latin, in order to be prefixed to his brother's Theological Diſſertation in Latin, which he read, when he took his Degree of Doctor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Cambridge, that he might not be obliged to compoſe the ſame Hiſtory in a language not every where underſtood. Autoris vitam Latinè enarrare inſtitui, ne eandem hiſtoriam linguâ non in omnibus eâdem contexuiſſe cogerer. The Editor in his Preface to his Engliſh Tranſlation of it tells us, that with regard to the time when he finiſhed this work, he ſhall not inſiſt upon the calculation of his Latin Preface, becauſe he had determined upon farther conſideration, that Dr. Barwick's Appendix which he wrote upon Dr. Anthony Walker's publiſhing his faithful Account of the Author of Εικὼν Βασιλικὴ, muſt have been written before his eyeſight quite failed him, that is, before the year 1694, becauſe, though with ſome difficulty, he put his name; and conſequently the Life, which was compoſed twenty years before (13), muſt have been finiſhed before that year. But whereas Dr. Barwick ſays (14), that Dr. Walker, againſt whom that Appendix was made, was ſome years above ſeventy, aliquot jam annis ſeptuageſimo major, when (12) Vita Joh. Barwick, pag. 196.

(13) Vita, &c. pag. 256.

(14) Ibid. pag. 255.

ing himſelf entirely up to contemplation and the converſation of a few intimate friends, and particularly his neighbour Dr. Richard Buſby, Maſter of Weſtminſter School (d). From this ſedentary courſe of life, the Stone, which was the only diſtemper he was troubled with, grew very much upon him; and toward the end of Auguſt 1705, being ſeized with a vomiting and looſneſs, followed with an intermitting fever, and in a few days after with a great and ſudden evacuation of blood, he died on the 4th of September following in the eighty ninth year of his age, and by his own direction was interred privately, and without any monument, near the body of his beloved wife. He wrote in the Latin Tongue with great purity and elegance.

(d) See Mr. Maittaire's Latin Letter at the end of the Preface of the Editor of the Latin Life.

when he publiſhed his book againſt King Charles I's claim to the Εἰκὼν Βασιλικὴ, this muſt undoubtedly be a miſtake; for by the time of his admiſſion in St. John's College (15) he appears to have been born about 1622; ſo that in 1692 he was but ſeventy years old, and that book of his muſt have been publiſhed that year at fartheſt, becauſe Dr. Hollingſworth's anſwer to it was printed that year. With regard to the manuſcripts, from which this Life was firſt publiſhed in Latin, the principal of them is that of St. John's College in Cambridge, by the author's direction, as well as at his own charge, fairly copied from his original, bound in Turkey leather, with three of the King's original Letters and an Acquittance, all in his Majeſty's own hand, and repoſited in the Library of that College; together with another volume of Chancellor Hyde's, Dr. John Barwick's, and other original Letters and Papers relating to the ſame ſubject, to be publiſhed when the College ſhould think proper. The author's own manuſcript preſerved by his grandſon Sir John Dutton Baronet, can hardly be conſidered as a different one from that, which was tranſcribed word for word from it. But there was another manuſcript of this Life, all written likewiſe in the author's own hand, given by him in his life-time to Dr. John Woodward abovementioned, and for ſome time, with the author's approbation at leaſt, repoſited alſo in another eminent Library, that of St. Martin's in the fields; which varying conſiderably from the former, and this in ſome particulars, that at firſt view ſeemed to be rather an amendment of that, than to have been amended by it, ſeveral good judges were for ſome time inclined to think that manuſcript the correcter of the two; tho' it was difficult to account for the author's making any conſiderable alterations in a work, repoſited with ſuch care and charge for the public benefit, and not ordering thoſe alterations to be made in the copy, for which he had ſhewn ſo much regard. This determined the editor rather to tranſcribe the manuſcript in St. Martin's Library for the preſs, but with an intention to add from that of St. John's College whatever particulars of any importance were not in the other, as he had obſerved there were ſome. Comparing them more diligently with this view, as he met with ſeveral expreſſions both in the one and the other, which ſeemed to challenge the preference to each other by turns; ſo he took notice of one various reading, that muſt abſolutely determine the controverſy in favour of the manuſcript of St. John's College, which was that in p. 201, which ſtiles Dr. John Dolben now Archbiſhop of York, where the other calls him now Biſhop of Rocheſter. This alteration might indeed have been made by the Tranſcriber, and the word now only refer to the time of his copying it; but when the editor found by Sir John Dutton's original, that the expreſſion was the author's own, he was convinced, that the manuſcript of St. John's College was the laſt draught of the Life, and therefore reſolved to follow that; yet not ſo ſcrupulouſly, as either to forbear adding out of the other what was of any moment, and ſeemed to be omitted in this, only to ſhorten the Life, (a reaſon of little weight with the reader,) or much leſs minutely to alter every word, phraſe, or place of a word by the laſt manuſcript, in what he had tranſcribed from the firſt, where the meaning was the ſame in both. The Latin edition was attacked by an advertiſement in the Gazette of July 18th 1721, wherein it is repreſented as not genuine, but compiled out of two different manuſcripts, and modelled according to the editor's own humour and fancy; becauſe ſome paſſages not contained in one of thoſe manuſcrips are printed from the other, and that other manuſcript is repreſented as the author's undigeſted thoughts, and what upon better information he had rejected. The editor juſtified himſelf from this imputation by an Advertiſement in the Poſt-Boy of the 25th of the ſame month. T.

(15) See the Engliſh Tranſlation of Dr. John Berwick's Life, pag. 16.

The End of the SECOND VOLUME.

In the Text of the article of Godfrey Arnoldus, page 324, line 2, inſtead of Papiſts read Pietiſts; and in page 441 in the Note [DDD] of the article of Biſhop Atterbury the reader is deſired to correct an Error; for we are aſſured by the Gentleman there named, that he did not write or publiſh any thing under the title there mentioned, and that he never gave the ſanction of Earl Cowper's or of any other perſon's name whatſoever to any thing written or publiſhed by him in all his life; and that the whole fact as there told, ſo far as it concerns him, was miſrepreſented to us.